(d.) Lange characterizes the current interpretation as hyperbolic. If it be, then objection (a.) has no weight, for a hyperbole would not overstrain the idea of self-denial. But this interpretation is not strictly a hyperbole. For Paul wished by this to express a degree of feeling which could be measured in human expression by nothing less strong than this. The objective impossibility did not destroy the subjective intensity of feeling. And although he may not have actually formed the wish, still any student of human nature knows that feelings often exist, never taking shape in definite wish, which are contrary both to what is possible and what is actually wished. The expression is, however, truthful in Paul's consciousness, hence not a hyperbole.

On the whole, the objections to this view (3.) seem of so much less weight, that the majority of commentators adopt it. Besides the grammatical and lexical grounds in its favor, it presents the great Apostle to the Gentiles under the influence of feelings most akin to the self-sacrificing love of the Lord he preached. And it detracts nothing from our estimate of his affection to know, as he did also, that such love flowed only from his love to Christ, his fellowship with Christ, which would itself change hell to heaven.—R.]

My kinsmen according to the flesh [τῶν συγγενῶν μου κατὰ σάρκα]. This addition expresses both his former motive and his continued patriotic feeling (see chap. xi. 14).^{*} [There is, however, here an implied antithesis to "brethren in the Lord." Paul's patriotism is here justified, but, as the next verse shows, it has a deeper ground in the gracious gifts and religious advantages which the Jews had hitherto enjoyed.—R.]

Ver. 4. Who are Israelites. Οἱ Ἰσραηλῖται.—Quipe qui. Thus he announces the characteristics of his kindred "according to the flesh," who lay so near his heart, and the decline of whose glory excited his profound compassion. The collective glory of the Jews lies in the fact that they are Israelites—that they bear the honorable name of Israel, as those who are called, like their ancestor, to be a people of God consisting of wrestlers with God—a people of wrestling prayer. [It should be remarked here, that the ground of the prerogatives afterwards enumerated was the free grace of God, not any superior natural excellence of this people as compared with the heathen. This is implied in the very character of the prerogatives. Besides, in calling them "Israelites," there is a direct reference to the fact that their advantages grew out of their relation to one directly chosen of God. So that the very glory of Israel shows the sovereignty of God, toward which the chapter points, in discussing the enigma of the present position of this favored people.—R.]

By a rhetorically forcible καί, καί, &c., Paul now discloses six prerogatives, from νιοθεσία to ἐπαγγελία, after which he extols the highest glory of the Israelites—that the fathers belong to them, and of whom, as concerning the flesh, Christ also came.

He calls them Israelites, and not merely Israel (see ver. 6). Although the majority of the people turned away from Christ, and but a minority identified themselves with Him, this minority nevertheless constitutes, par excellence, the people of Israel. See the τινές in chap. iii. 3, and also chap. xi. 1. He can, indeed, call also the unbelieving majority "Israel" in a qualified sense (ver. 31). But the name "Israelites" is still placed as the name of honor at the very head of the advantages (see 2 Cor. xi. 22; Phil. iii. 5; John i. 47). On the use of the name in Josephus, see Tholuck, p. 476.

Tholuck's division of the advantages into three pairs is well grounded; but he is less warranted in regarding them as designations of their theocratic honor, their theocratic basis, and their theocratic hope, "to which the prerogatives of the fathers of the theocracy, and of their head, is connected as a fourth member." According to the import of the designations, the νιοθεσία indicates, at the outset, the whole state of honor; then the first pair describes the patriarchal foundation, including the new calling of Israel as a people; the second pair, on the contrary, set forth the Mosaic legal constitution of Israel; then, again, the ἐπαγγελία, "the promises," denotes the collective transition from Moses to Christ by the prophets. To these real advantages of Israel there then corresponds the antithesis of personal advantages: the true fathers of the people down to Christ.

Whose is the adoption [ὧν ἡ νιοθεσία] God's acceptance in the place of a child, adoption; yet not in the sense of the New Testament realization, but in that of the Old Testament typification (see Exod. iv. 22 ff.; Deut. xiv. 1; xxxii. 6; Hosea xi. 1; Rom. viii. 1, 2). The foundation of this adoption was the election, calling, and sealing of Abraham. But in this right of the child there was not merely comprised the real enjoyment of "theocratic protection," but also the foundation and guidance to real adoption (Gal. iv. 1, 2); and, in relation to the promise for the remaining nations, the determination that Israel should be the first-born son of God (Exod. iv. 22) [It therefore comprises, though only germinally and typically, the close union which Christ, the Only-begotten, who was in the bosom of the Father from eternity, forms between God and men through the regeneration of the Holy Ghost.—P. S.]

And the glory. The δόξα, כבוד יהוה. This is that revealed form of Jehovah underlying the call to adoption throughout the Old Testament, which often stands out more definitely in the appearance of the Angel of the Lord (see Lange's Comm. Genesis) [p. 386 ff., Amer. ed.]. Comp. Exod. xxiv. 16; xl. 34; 1 Kings viii. 10 f.; Ezek. i. 26, and other passages). Untenable explanations: 1. The ark of the covenant (Beza, Grotius, and others, with reference to 1 Sam. iv. 22). 2. The glory of Israel itself (Calovius, Köllner, Fritzsche, Beck and oth see). For the still more untenable explanations of Michaelis and Koppe, see Meyer (the adoption itself as glory, the promised felicitas). Meyer's own explanation is totally unsatisfactory: "The symbolical and visible presence of God as manifested in the desert as a pillar of cloud and of fire, and as the cloud over the ark of the covenant, the same כנפֿת־עֶבֶד" (Buxtorf, Lexic., Talmud, &c.). For more particular information on Meyer's indefinite view, see Tholuck.—De Wette and Philippi do not really get beyond "the visible and operative presence of God," or, the "symbol of God's gracious presence." [As Paul is enumerating the prerogatives of the Jews, a definite meaning is to be sought for. Meyer's view attaches a definite meaning to δόξα, extending it, however, over a wide period of time. Dr. Lange's objection to this grows out of his classification of these prerogatives in chronological order. If this δόξα must be referred to patriarchal times, then Lange's view alone is admissible; but the word is used by one who is glancing over the whole Jewish history, and in that history "the visible presence of God" seems most worthy of the title δόξα.—R.]

And the covenants. Αἱ διαθήκαι. The compacts. The δόξα already announced itself at the call of Abraham. [If Meyer's view of δόξα be adopted, then the reference to the call of Abraham in νομοθεσία is the point of connection here.—R.] The covenant with Abraham was renewed with Isaac (and this is of importance here, in contrast with Ishmael), with Jacob (in contrast with Esau), and, finally, with the whole people through Moses. Various explanations: 1. The two tables of the law (Beza, and others). 2. The Old and the New Testaments [see Textual Note].—R.] (Augustine, Jerome, Cocceius, Calovius; with reference to Jer. xxxi. 33). Meyer: "The compacts concluded by God with the patriarchs after Abraham." Comp. Book of Wisdom xviii. 22; Sirach xlii. 11; 2 Macc. viii. 15; Eph. ii. 12. [This is undoubtedly the simplest view.—R.]

And the giving of the law. Opposite explanations: 1. Meyer, and others: the act of giving the law, not ὁ νόμος itself. 2. Tholuck [Hodge], and most expositors: νομοθεσία, by metonymy for ὁ νόμος; νομοθεσία is the more rhetorical and euphonic word. Evidently, the act of giving the law would have had no permanent force for Israel apart from its substance; but even its substance would be no permanent νομοθεσία without the continued repetition (Deuteronomy), establishment, and restoration of the law. The νόμος was, and continued to be, a permanent act of the νομοθεσία. [Meyer inquires why Paul did not write νόμος, if he meant it. "At all events, whoever had the νομοθεσία, had also the νόμος. Still, the difference of signification is to be preserved. The giving of the law was a work by means of which God, who was himself the νομοθετής, distinguished the Jews above all other nations." It seems safer to make the primary reference to the giving of the law, without, however, excluding the necessary secondary reference to its substance.—R.]

And the service of the sanctuary. The worship, ἡ λατρεία; Heb. ix. 1. [The Jewish ritual service, including the tabernacle worship, but fully established in the temple. The connection of this with the giving of the law is sufficiently obvious.—And the promises, αἱ ἐπαγγελίαι.—R.] Meyer holds that the service corresponds to the giving of the law, as αἱ ἐπαγγελίαι (the Messianic prophecies) correspond to αἱ διαθήκαι. This is a chiasm, according to Meyer, occasioned by the necessity of the promises standing at the conclusion, immediately before the Promised One. But a chiasm is altogether out of the question, as the promises in the stricter sense—the prophetic promises—followed the giving of the law, and as the λατρεία also was already, in the main, a typical promise, from which the ἐπαγγελίαι are only to be distinguished as verbal prophecies. Tholuck concludes, without good ground, from the reasoning (ver. 6), that the predictions of the prophets are not meant here, but "chiefly" those communicated to the patriarchs. But how could Paul have enumerated the principal elements of Israel's glory, without thinking of the prophets? We must adhere to the position that, apart from the connections of historical sequence, the νομοθεσία, the δόξα, &c., and, indeed, all the particular elements, pervaded all the periods of Israel's existence. Even the νομοθεσία, for example, is found in the germ in Abraham.

Ver. 5. Whose are the fathers [ὧν οἱ πατέρες]. The fathers, the elect, the men of God, as prelude to the chief Chosen One, the Son of God; the glorious root of the Israelitish parent-tree, as well as the fatness of the tree (see chap. xi. 17), referring to the only glorious crown (Exod. iii. 13; iv. 8). These are chiefly, but not exclusively, the patriarchs, but, in addition to them, the long line of the true fathers of Israel.

And of whom as to the flesh is Christ [καὶ ἐξ ὧν ὁ Χριστὸς τὸ κατὰ σὰρκα]. It is the highest characteristic of Israel's glory, that Christ descends from it, or comes of it according to the flesh (Rom. i. 3; iv. 1 ff.). [Christ, the promised Messiah, is the greatest of all the blessings imparted to the people of Israel, to whom all the others pointed typically and prophetically, and in whom they first obtained their full truth and reality.—P. S.] The τὸ κατὰ σὰρκα is evidently a qualifying addition, and refers to an antithesis; Tholuck: "οὐ κατὰ τὴν θεότητα" (chap. i. 3, 4). [Alford marks the antithesis by rendering: "as far as regards the flesh;" finding in τὸ, accusative, the implication "that He was not entirely sprung from them, but had another nature."—R.]

Who is over all [ὁ ὢν ἐπὶ πάντων]. There are two renderings which are nearly allied: Who is God over all, blessed forever, and: Who is over all, God blessed forever. The doctrinal results are the same, whichever be adopted; but Lange prefers the latter, for reasons which will appear, and seems warranted in his preference. The E. V. gives the latter; Luther, and most interpreters, the former.—R.] We explain the passage thus: He who is over all Israelites, believers and unbelievers, is that glorified One of our universally known synagogical formula: God, blessed forever. Amen. We must first of all accept a strong Pauline breviloquence. Then we must call to mind Paul's expression concerning the unknown God (Acts xvii. 23). As Paul could say to the Greeks: "You seek and worship by your altar the one true God, without knowing Him," so can he say of the Jews: "Even those who reject Christ must render homage to Him, though unconsciously, as, by the well-known doxology, they often praise Jehovah, the God of revelation, who has appeared in Christ, and thus rules supremely over all, believers as well as unbelievers." The ὁ ὢν therefore stands for ὁς ἐστίν, though with the additional strength peculiar to the participle. That the ἐπὶ πάντων here refers to the Jews, according to their antithesis of believing and unbelieving Jews, is evident from the strong prominence previously given to them (οὗτινες, ὧν, ἐξ ὧν). [The form of the E. V. favors this view of ἐπὶ πάντων. By taking it as masculine, the whole clause is brought into closer connection with the context, an increased difficulty in the interpretation of the doxology is obviated, while this closer connection gives strength to the view that the doxology refers to Christ. It seems preferable to the view which connects it with θεός, in the sense of the supreme God (Hodge, and many others). Whether all that Lange suggests is included, is perhaps doubtful; but comp. his remarks below on Pa. lxxviii. 19.—R.]

God blessed for ever. Amen [Θεός εὐλογητός εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας, ἀμήν]. We must regard this clause as a quotation from the synagogal liturgy, sufficiently well-known to all the Jews, and to Jewish Christians and believers in general. According to modern usage, it should, therefore, be written with quotation-marks. But the sense is this: Christ is the object of the Israelitish doxology to the revealed God, Jehovah, for He is the δόξα itself; is consciously praised by some, and unconsciously by the rest; for this latter class, notwithstanding their rejection of Jesus of Nazareth, cannot get away from the adoration of the Shekinah, and thus Christ also, the personally revealed God, rules over all (as they praise Him), even over unbelievers, for their future salvation. This is therefore the last advantage of Israel (see chap. xi.). For the details of all the explanations, we must refer to the Commentaries extant.*

Every exposition is attended with great difficulties. The strongest reasons are still in favor of the old one, transmitted to us by the early writers, all of whom favored it, with the single exception of Theodore of Mopsvestia (see Tholuck, p. 479). We may say, perhaps, that Julian maintained, with Cyril, that Paul never called Jesus "God," and that the Codd. 11 [5], 47 place a period after σάρκα, and Cod. 71 places one after ἐπὶ πάντων. Here belong also Irenæus, Tertullian, Origen, &c., and the most of the later expositors (see Meyer). The passage is, therefore, a doxology to the divinity of Christ. This is most strongly favored by the requirement of the antithesis comprised in the τὸ κατὰ σάρκα (see chap. i. 3, 4; 1 Tim. iii. 16). This explanation has been rendered unnecessarily difficult by regarding ἐπὶ πάντων as neuter: "over every thing" (Beza referred it as masculine to the patriarchs, to the antithesis of Jews and Gentiles), thus giving up its proximate reference to the Jews.

Since the time of Erasmus, this exposition has been directly opposed by another, the reference of the clause to God. "The Codd. 11 [5], 47, of the 11th and 12th centuries, like Diodorus of Tarsus, place a period after σάρκα; this punctuation has been preferred by Erasmus, so that what follows is a doxology to the Almighty God. This proposition has found favor with the majority of recent exegetical writers, with the Socinians, &c., with Reiche, Rückert, Meyer, and Fritzsche." Tholuck. A middle ground is occupied by the interpretation which unites with a second punctuation proposed by Erasmus, according to Cod. 71, as it places a period after ἐπὶ πάντων; this has been adopted by Locke and Baumgarten-Crusius, a construction to which Tholuck also inclines to a certain degree. In addition to these three explanations are, the conjecture of Erasmus, that θεός is not authentic, and the reading ὡς ὁ θεός proposed by Crell, and others. But, according to Tholuck, the detached character of the doxology is against the third exposition.

The following may be said against the second explanation:

1. In simple doxologies, without a relative form, the εὐλογητός generally precedes the θεός. See examples in Tholuck, 483; Philippi, 369 ff. Tholuck regards it as a beautiful fact connected with Faustus Socinus, that his attention was first directed to this circumstance, and that, owing to it, he changed his exposition of the passage. Tholuck, indeed, cites a passage in which the εὐλογητός comes after the θεός (Pa. lxxviii. 10)—a passage which, in view of its connection, we regard as very important, and must hereafter return to it.

2. A doxology to the omnipotent God cannot interrupt the train of thought under consideration at its very outset; least of all, can an elegy or funeral discourse be changed abruptly into a hymn. The doxology for the whole discussion in Rom. ix.—xi., is at the conclusion of chap. xi.

3. The expression, τὸ κατὰ σάρκα, which limits Christ's descent from the Jews to His human nature, requires, as an antithesis, a reference to His divine nature. We have here had special reference to Calvin, Tholuck, Neander, and Philippi. In the attack on the old exposition, it is remarkable that the same critical exegesis which elsewhere urges the immediate context, and leaves the analogy of Scripture altogether in the background, here reverses its method. Meyer, indeed, only says, that both expositions might be equally right, according to the words. But he imagines that he can overcome the requirement of the antithesis in this passage merely by the assurance that divinity does not necessarily belong to the object represented. The doxologies to God which Meyer cites (Rom. i. 25; 2 Cor. xi. 31; Gal. i. 6; 1 Tim. i. 17), are fully occasioned by the connection, which would not hold good of the present doxology. Meyer contradicts himself when he first urges that the present passage does not read ὁ θεός, but only the predicative θεός, without the article; and when he concedes that Paul, by virtue of his appropriate and real harmony with John's christology, could, just as properly as John (chap. 1), have used the predicative θεός (divine nature) of Christ (with reference to Phil. ii. 6; Col. i. 15 ff.; ii. 9; 2 Cor. iv. 4), and yet urges that Paul never used the expression θεός of Christ, since he never accepted the Alexandrian form, like John, but adhered to the strictly monotheistical form. He seems, therefore, to regard that "Alexandrian form" as prejudicial to strict monotheism. It should be remarked that Meyer, who is usually so clear and decided in his statements of the reasons for his views, halts here, as if the grounds against the reference to Christ were not sufficient to satisfy himself. This fact is suggestive.—R.] As far as those passages are concerned in which Paul brings out the divinity of Christ, we refer to the Doctr. Notes. We must here, however, oppose the hereneutical supposition that there are no doctrinal ἑκαστὰ λεγόμενα as culminating points of the view corresponding with them. Meyer even holds that John calls Christ θεός; but once. It is a perfectly gratuitous increase of the difficulty before us, to say that Christ is here called God over all. It is certainly a fact that Paul speaks preëminently of the historical Christ, and that, when he expresses also the ontological idea of Christ, he immediately places it in relation with the historical perfection of Christ; but when this historical subordination which Paul expresses (1 Cor. viii. 6; Eph. iv. 5 f.; 1 Cor. xv. 28) is allowed to be identical with His ontological subordination, the error is owing to a defective ecclesiastical education and speculative penetration.

We now come to Ps. lxxviii. 19, according to the Septuagint: Κύριος ὁ θεὸς εὐλογητός, εὐλογητός κύριος ἡμέραν καὶ ἡμέραν. It must be borne in mind that Paul was particularly familiar with that passage. In Eph. iv. 8 he quotes a good part of ver. 18, and refers it to Christ. But this verse reads, according to De Wette's translation, thus: Thou ascendest to the high seat, thou leadest captive, thou receivest gifts for men, and the rebellious shall also dwell with Jah. Tholuck: Even the apostates shall still dwell with God the Lord. Do we not plainly hear the reëcho of this passage in the ὁ ὢν ἐπὶ πάντων? And since we know that Paul applies this passage to the glorification of Christ, is it not clear that he immediately adds that ascription of praise in Ps. lxxviii. 19? His expression occupies the middle ground between the LXX. and the Hebrew text. Hence we return to the acceptance of a synagogical form.

[The main point being not the synagogical form—to which, however, there is little to object—but the reference to Christ, the following summary in favor of that view is added:

(1.) This view is the most simple and natural one. Alford seems justifiable in remarking: It is the only one admissible by the rules of grammar and arrangement.

(2.) It accords best with the context, presenting an antithesis to τὸ κατὰ σάρκα, and forming a suitable culminating point after the enumeration of the advantages of the Jews.

(3.) It is sufficiently Pauline, for Paul wrote Col. i. 15 ff., and in view of that and many similar passages, any other reference would be derogatory to the divinity of Christ.

(4.) On no exegetical point, where there is room for discussion, has the unanimity of commentators, of all ages and confessions, been so entire, as in referring this to Christ.—R.]

B. The Apostle's exultation at the thought that the promise of God for Israel nevertheless remains in force (vers. 6-33).

FIRST PROOF: Differences in election (vers. 6-13). Meyer: "The first part of the theodicy is, that God's promise has not become untrue through the exclusion of a portion of the Israelites; for the promise is valid only for the true Israelites, who are according to the promise—which result is confirmed by the Scriptures."

Ver. 6. It is not however so that. The οὐχ ὥς δὲ ὅτι is variously rendered: 1. Analogously to the οὐχ ὅτι, not that, not in the sense that (Tholuck). But this does not afford a satisfactory connection with the foregoing. 2. Fritzsche: οὐ τοιοῦτον ὅτι [the matter, however, is not so, as that]. 3. Οὐ τοῖον δὲ λέγει: οἷον ὅτι, "but I do not say any thing of such a kind as that" (Meyer). 4. The least tenable explanation is, it is not possible that (Beza, Grotius). [Between (2.) and (3.) there is little choice. Paul does not say any thing of such a kind as that, because the matter is not so as that; or vice versa.—R.] The connection, therefore, consists in the Apostle's declaration of a restriction of the profound sorrow which he has already expressed; but not, according to Origen, in connecting the declaration that the promise still holds good, to the previously mentioned ἐπαγγελίας. Tholuck: "Paul adduces the proof according to the idea with which he was quite familiar, that the real Israel was not based upon its physical relationship with Abraham (Gal. iii. 9; Rom. iv. 12). This brings out in glaring contrast the shibboleth of the carnal Jew, &c.; gross heretics, deniers of the resurrection of the dead, &c., are only mentioned as exceptions."

The word of God hath come to nought [ἐκπύκνωται ὁ λόγος τοῦ θεοῦ]. The word of patriarchal promise in its relation to Israel, not specially to the ἐπαγγελίας alone.

For not all who are of Israel, are Israel [οὐ γὰρ πάντες οἱ ἐξ Ἰσραὴλ, οὗτοι Ἰσραὴλ]. The germ of the distinction between the true religious Israel and the impure and merely national Israelites, already lay in the Old Testament (see chap. x.; Ps. cxli. 1; Ezek. xlii. 9; Jer. vii. 28, &c.); the distinction was already prepared by the relations of election in the history of the patriarchs. The Apostle's thought distinguishes, first of all, between Israel as the collective people of God, and the single apostate branches. But then he establishes this general distinction chiefly by the relations of election.

Ver. 7. Neither, because they are the seed of Abraham are they all children [οὐδ' ὅτι εἰσὶν σπέρμα Ἀβραάμ, πάντες τέκνα]. The σπέρμα Ἀβρ. denotes here natural posterity, but the τέκνα, on the contrary, his spiritual posterity, and directly from Israel. It may be asked here, whether the subject of the preceding verse (which are of Israel) still continues (Meyer), or whether the present clause generalizes the subject: not all those who are Abraham's seed are therefore also Abraham's children. We prefer the latter construction, because, otherwise, the verse cited would furnish no proof. The first clause—for they are not all Israel which are of Israel, God's people—is therefore supplemented by the second—likewise not all who are descended from Abraham, and thus, directly from Ishmael and Isaac, are true children of Abraham; that is, not merely individual believers, as in chap. iv., but rather the individual chosen, elected beforehand through God's free choice.

This is now followed by particular proofs, which show that God's election, notwithstanding the promise given to Abraham, remained totally free, contrary to the boast of a right of natural descent.

First proof: Abraham's first born son was not Abraham's child of promise, but, according to God's disposition, the younger, with his seed. And that, indeed, was previously established by God. Refer ence could also be made here to the preference of Sarah to Hagar; and, therefore, the second and more convincing proof follows: Rebecca. It is important that Rebecca, and not Isaac, appears in the foreground, but then, also, that she conceived twins by Isaac in one pregnancy; and third, that a determination is made respecting children as yet unborn, which gave the preference to Jacob.

But (thus the promise reads) in Isaac [ἀλλ' ἐν Ἰσαάκ. Gen. xxi. 12. See Textual Note for the Hebrew.] Though the decisive promise is quoted directly and authentically, without a γίγναται, or any thing of similar import, as in Gal. iii. 11, 12, it is nevertheless a simple logical requirement to supply something of the kind mentally; this, however, is contested by Meyer. The promise is quoted from the Septuagint. Meyer maintains, in accordance with Gesenius, that the original text קָרָאָה would say: Through Isaac will the posterity be called; but that the Apostle has conceived the sense of the passage according to its typical meaning, and confined it to Isaac's person. [So Philippi, Ewald.] The entire digression on this supposed antithesis rests upon a mistake of the significance of the typical collective name. The name of Isaac here can just as little exclude his posterity, as the included posterity can exclude Isaac himself. Meyer says: all Jews belonged to the offspring of Isaac, and therefore the expression would be inappropriate, if those whose claims are to be disappointed, are also described by it. But yet, in vers. 11 and 12, the election of Jacob is evidently meant at the same time with that of his posterity, but without the Apostle having designed thus to favor again the claim of individual Jews. The examples cited serve to prove that the distinguishing process of election, in reference to the descendants of Jacob also, was not hindered by the election of their ancestor with his σπέρμα, but rather that it took place with perfect freedom in reference to the posterity.

Shall thy seed be called [κλήθησεται σοι σπέρμα]. Different explanations of the κλήθησεται (erit, shall be; shall be awakened; shall be called from nothing); [Tholuck, Stuart; Reiche. Meyer objects to this, on the ground, that this promise was made after Isaac was born. As we are less warranted in referring the citation exclusively to Isaac's descendants, than to Isaac alone, this objection seems to be valid and conclusive.—R.]

The καὶ brings out the freedom of Divine choice; not in the sense that he merely became the ancestor of the promised seed, but in and with Isaac the seed of promise belonging to Abraham was called, according to the election. [Hodge, Alford, and most.] Freedom of election is thus distinguished by two characteristics: only in Isaac, and, only by virtue of free appointment.

Ver. 8. That is, They who are the children of the flesh [τοῦτ' ἵσταν, οὐ τὰ τέκνα τῆς σαρκός. Comp. Gal. iv. 23]. The children who are to be regarded merely as the fruit of physical generation. The antithesis, the children of the promise [τὰ τέκνα τῆς ἐπαγγελίας], makes these appear as born under the predetermination and coöperation of the Divine promise. The expression, "promised children," would be too little; while the expression, "begotten by the power of the Divine promise" (Meyer), would be too strong. [The facts respecting the birth of Isaac, and Paul's language in Galatians, seem to justify

Meyer's view; the conception of Isaac was so extraordinary, and so connected with the promise, that he is called "after the Spirit," in distinction from one "born after the flesh," as well as "by promise;" still in neither case is Isaac said to be born by promise or after the Spirit, as if to guard against any thought of miraculous conception. Lange himself says below, that "the promise acted as a producing and coöperative cause."—R.]

Not "those children of the flesh are children of God [τὰ τέκνα τοῦ θ:οῦ], but the children designated by the promise are reckoned as seed [λογίζονται εἰς σπέρμα]. The antithesis must be carefully observed. Even the children of promise are not, in themselves, children of God in the New Testament sense. They are counted such according to their faith, and therefore typically so called in the sense that they are the seed of God's children as the seed of promise. Also in this line there are not yet children born of God (see John i. 13)."

Ver. 9. For this word was of promise [ἐπαγγελίας γὰρ ὁ λόγος οὗτος. Notice the emphatic position of ἐπαγγελίας. "The children of promise are reckoned for seed; for this word, in fulfilment of which Isaac was born, was a word of promise" (Alford).—R.] Free quotation from Gen. xviii. 10, 14, according to the Septuagint.

At this season [Κατὰ τὸν καιρὸν τοῦτο; i. e., next year at this time. See Textual Note.—R.] The accessory proof in this verse will show, first, that Isaac was now already an object of promise; second, that the promise ("according to the time") acted as a producing and coöperative cause; and third, that the bestowal of the right of childhood was attributed for Abraham's faith.

Ver. 10. And not only this; but when Rebecca also [οὐ μόνον δέ, ἀλλὰ καὶ Ρεβέκκα]. Winer's supplementing explanation, οὐ μόνον δὲ Σάρρα ἐπαγγελμένη ἦν (Meyer: Not only Sarah, but Rebecca also, had a Divine promise), is repelled by Tholuck, with the reminder that it was not Sarah, but Abraham, who had received that ἐπαγγελία. Tholuck, with Erasmus and Rückert, prefers to supply a τοῦτο μόνον δέ, and δεικνύει τοῦτο, or something similar, to Rebecca. Grotius, and others, in accordance with the sense, interpret similarly: non solum id, quod jam diximus, documentum est ejus, quod inferre volumus. [The view of Tholuck seems least objectionable. Ρεβέκκα is then either the nominative absolute, or we must accept an anacoluthon. The sense is the same in either case. Philippi prefers the former decidedly, on grammatical grounds, and takes this as almost = behold, Rebecca too. The progress of thought is against Meyer's view.—R.]

† [Stuart suggests the interpretation: "as at life-giving time; in which case the meaning would be, that God would again address her as a mother, who gives life to—i. e., bears, children." But there seems to be no reason for departing from the simple rendering of the LXX. quoted by Paul.—R.]

In consequence of the ambiguity of the brief form of expression, we must consult the contents themselves. But, according to these, Rebecca is not merely a second example, but even a new one for the same fundamental thoughts. She is a new example, in whom there appear three new characteristics. First, Rebecca appears in the foreground as a principal person, and becomes the parallel to Abraham. The Apostle says to the Jews, as carefully as he can, that the weight of the promise does not rest upon Isaac, the promised natural seed of Abraham, but on the daughter-in-law, Bethuel's daughter, who had become Isaac's wife. Then comes the principal characteristic which constitutes the real antithesis:

[Had conceived by one, our father Isaac, ἡ δὲ ἑὸς κοίτην ἔχουσα, Ἰσαὰκ τοῦ πατρὸς ἡμῶν.—R.] Between the twin children of one marriage, by one husband, and from one conception or pregnancy (ἑδ, κοίτη, see chap. xiii. 12; not emphasized as unity, but really so understood), the election already made the greatest difference before birth. This leads to the third characteristic:

Ver. 11. [Without their having as yet been born, or done any thing good or evil, μήπω γὰρ γεννηθέντων μηδὲ πράξαντων τι ἀγαθόν ἢ φαῦλον. See Textual Notes * and †.—R.] Before the children had done any thing either good or bad.* This example denies once more, as though superfluously, the exclusive privilege of birthright. In view of all this, we think that the real explanation of the οὐ μόνον δὲ is contained in the second characteristic—not merely that Sarah, the unfruitful one, is a proof, but also Rebecca, in her pregnancy with twins. It is Sarah, in so far as the promise determines a year beforehand that the unfruitful Sarah, instead of the mother of Ishmael, should be the mother of the promised one; and Rebecca, in so far as the promise made even the greatest difference between the twin-fruit of her womb.

The expression, τοῦ πατρὸς ἡμῶν, indicates that also the paternity of Isaac did not guarantee any choice concerning the Jews. The μήπω † expresses the fact that God's revelation concerning the preference of the younger before the birth of the twins (αἰρών must be supplied) was intentional, in order

That the purpose of God according to election might stand [ἵνα ἡ κατ' ἐκλογὴν πρόθεσις τοῦ θεοῦ μένη]. Meyer holds, that the ἵνα therefore determines, at all events, a purpose. But he incorrectly denies that the ἐκλογὴ here precedes the πρόθεσις. [Meyer opposes this precedence, on the ground that the election is essentially pre-temporal (Eph. iii. 11; 2 Tim. i. 9), objecting also to the view of Grotius, and others, that the phrase means: a decree considered with respect to an election. He holds that, as an essential inherent of the purpose, κατ' ἐκλογὴν expresses the modality of πρόθεσις. Perhaps it is not safe to affirm positively more than this respecting what belongs to the order in the mind of God Meyer also repels the strong view of Bengel: propositum Dei electivum; but after all has been admitted, that must be respecting the primary reference to theocratic privilege (Meyer limits thus), the Apostle's language fairly implies a choice of individuals, and a free choice, whether we can reconcile this with our systems, or our consciousness of our own freedom or not. The emphasis throughout, it may well be admitted, rests on the unmerited choice of Jacob, rather than on the rejection of Esau.—R.] The ἐκλογὴ is founded in the ἰδιότητα, and the πρόθεσις joins with the latter. Meyer's opposition to the explanation of the expression (of Rosenmüller, and others) propositum Dei liberum, is correct only so far as the election of love and arbitrary freedom are different; but the election of love is certainly free in relation to human claims. The following clause expresses a principal maxim of the πρόθεσις.

Not of works, but of him that calleth [οὐκ ἐξ ἔργων ἀλλ' ἐκ τοῦ καλοῦντος]. The explanation of most commentators, that the πρόθεσις is announced by this negation, is contrary to Meyer's assertion, that this addition relates only to μένη; and indeed he has this, his strong assurance, not from works, &c., but of him that calleth.—Works cannot be the foundation of the call to salvation, but just the reverse; it is only this call that can be the foundation of works. [This phrase seems to be "a general characteristic of the whole transaction" (Alford). Such a view is favored by the peculiarly broken construction of the whole verse. In any case, it establishes the position of Augustine: "God does not choose us because we believe, but that we may believe." "Hence, too, we are justified not on account of faith (propter fidem), but through faith (per fidem), which God himself works in us through the Holy Ghost (Schaff). Any other view would contradict the obvious meaning of this verse. Comp. Hodge and Philippi on each side of the predestinarian question as involved here.—R.]

Ver. 12. The elder (that is, the first-born) shall serve the younger [ὁ μείων δουλεύσει τῷ ἐλάσσονι] (Gen. xiv. 23, according to the Septuagint).—Here, again, Meyer finds a difference between the original sense of the passage and the Apostle's explanation. According to the connection of the original, the expression extends to the nations concerned (Jews and Edomites), and was fulfilled in David's conquest of the Edomites (2 Sam. viii. 14, &c.); * but Paul means, on the contrary, Esau and Jacob themselves. The adjustment of the difference by regarding the two brothers as representatives of two nations, is insufficient; rather, the indoies of Jacob was really continued in the Jewish people, and the indoies of Esau in the Edomites. [The reference of the original Hebrew, as shown by the context, is to the nations springing from the twin children ("two nations are in thy womb;" Gen. xxv. 23). Lange and Meyer agree that there is also a personal reference, though differing in their mode of stating the relation of the two

† [Meyer: "Not esse, because the negative relation is to be expressed subjectively—i. e., as presented and considered by God in the giving of His sentence." See Winer, p. 441.—R.]

Neither should be excluded, though the whole passage seems to indicate that the personal reference was the more prominent one in Paul's mind. On the national reference, Schaff remarks: "At all events, in the passages quoted here and ver. 13, Jacob and Esau appear as the heads of two nations. If the promised lordship of Jacob be not limited to the transfer of the birthright and the theocratic blessing to Jacob, but taken in its full, physical, and spiritual sense, the fulfilment did not take place until long after their death, in their descendants, when David conquered the Edomites (2 Sam. viii. 14). Since then the Ishmaelites and the Edomites, together with the other heathen, were at all events called to the gospel, though later than the Jews (comp. Gen. xxvii. 40, where Isaac predicts the future cessation of the bondage of Esau; and Amos ix. 12; Acts xv. 16, 17; Rom. xi. 11 ff.); it follows that Paul speaks here, not as many Calvinistic expositors misunderstand him, of an eternal reprobation, but of such a preference of one nation as shall prepare for the final salvation of all nations (we do not say, all individuals)." The individual reference is also undeniable, though it by no means follows that it here implies eternal results. The point here is not what or how much God did in His election, but that He had a πρόθεσις κατ' ἐκλογῆν.—R.]

Ver. 13. As it is written, Jacob I loved, but Esau I hated [τὸν Ἰακώβ ἠγάπησα, τὸν δὲ Ἠσαὺ ἐμισήσα]. Mal. i. 2 ff.: "I have loved you, saith the Lord. Yet ye say, Wherein hast thou loved us? Was not Esau Jacob's brother? saith the Lord: yet I loved Jacob, and I hated Esau, and laid his mountains and his heritage waste for the dragons of the wilderness." Here the statement that Jehovah hate! Esau is proved by the fact that He gave a desolate land to the Edomites for an inheritance, and that He called it a wicked land, on which His indignation rested. Thus the people are placed first here, but with them also their ancestor, as in Gen. xxv. 23 the ancestor is placed first, but with him his people also.

The following is therefore assumed throughout: 1. The continuity of the indoles in the ancestor and in the real substance of his posterity; 2. The universal connection between the indoles and its religious and moral conduct; 3. The universal connection between the religious and moral conduct and the historical decrees. The sum of these characteristics is now referred to the Divine purpose, and is applied to Esau in the sentence, "I hated him." Yet this sentence has, at most, only a relative meaning: God has hated Esau in the relation of Esau to Jacob, and in antithesis to the fact that He loved Jacob. God's whole arrangement, therefore, proceeds from the primary πρόθεσις; that He loved Jacob. In that fact lies the causality of Jacob's glorious history, the determination of his theocratic inheritance. But the whole sentence depends upon various conditions on both sides:

1. An economical condition. The question is not at all concerning decrees of eternal salvation and damnation, but concerning the economical relations of the ordination and call to the possession of salvation and to the economy of salvation in time. On the prospects of salvation for Edom, comp. Isa. xi. 14 (Dan. xi. 41); Amos ix. 12; Mark iii. 8. On the other hand, Edom has become, on its dark side, a type of anti-christianity. See the article Edomiter, in the Bibl. Wörterbuch für das christliche Volk.

Likewise the passage in Heb. xii. 17 relates to Esau's incapacity to inherit the theocratic blessing even with tears and penitence.

2. An individual condition. There could be also in Edom individuals having the character of Israel, and in Israel there could be individual Edomites. The LXX. has regarded Job as an Edomite prince. Allowing this to be uncertain, the Edomite nature of the Israelitish Judas is beyond a doubt.

3. A religious-ethical condition. Salvation was as little secured unconditionally to the individual Jew by Israel's election, as the individual Edomite was personally subjected to condemnation by that theocratic rejection of Edom (see Bengel). Meyer: "We must not attach such a merely privative meaning to the ἐμισήσα * as not to love, or to love less (Grotius, Estius [Hodge, Stuart], and others), which is also not confirmed by Matt. vi. 24; Luke xiv. 26; xvi. 13; John xii. 25; but it expresses just the opposite of the positive ἠγάπην.—positive abhorrence." This would be still more than hatred! Meyer also speaks of a becoming fond of and abhorrence even before the birth of the brothers. Yet here the meaning might be: I have loved the letter, but the spirit of the letter I have loved less!† This, indeed, might be said of many of the results of modern criticism and exegesis. Philippi lessens at least the antithesis in relation to Jacob and Esau themselves, but yet without thereby becoming rid of the traditional prejudices respecting the sense of this passage. "Jacob's reception of the theocratic birthright, and Esau's exclusion from it, constitute, in Paul's mind, only the type for the law of the reception of eternal salvation and of abandonment to eternal perdition." But the law of this reception and abandonment is not given here, but in Mark xvi. 16. The following interpretation is better, if we understand thereby not absolute, but relative antitheses. Calvin well explains ἀγαπᾶν and μισῆν by assume and repellers. The use of μισῆν is similar (Gen. xxix. 30, 31; Deut. xxi. 15 ff.; Prov. xiii. 24; Matt. vi. 24; Luke xvi. 13; Matt. x. 37; comp. with Luke xiv. 26; John xii. 25). "To hate father and mother, and his own soul, does not mean to love them less than the Lord, but to reject them altogether in a case of collision, or to so act toward them as if one positively hated them (?); in which case there might still exist a great deal of love for them, though certainly less than for the Lord."—If, indeed, absolute love and a conditional love = loving less, are at variance with each other, then the disregard, which is similar to hatred, though not partaking of the nature of hatred, follows of itself; it is the negation of the defect or of the sin to which the hated individual cleaves, but it is not the individual to which the defect or the sin cleaves. See also Tholuck, p. 498, against Fritzsche, Meyer, De Wette, and Philippi.

† (This is an allusion to the strictly literal and grammatical method of exegesis adopted by Meyer. But if we depart from the letter, who is to be the discernor of the spirit? There are but two answers: that of Rome (ecclesiastical authority), and that of Rationalism (individual human consciousness). The strict interpretation of Meyer is adopted by Fritzsche, De Wette, and others. Unquestionably the dealings of God with Esau indicate something positive, though, were it but the deprivation of love, the results of evil-doing would still account for the historical facts.—R.)

It must be observed, further, that, in ver. 18, the description of fore-ordination or predestination according to election, is introduced by ἡ κατ' ἐκλογὴν προόρις. The idea of election refutes the following claims to a right in God's kingdom:

1. The claim by virtue of natural descent from Abraham, the father of the faithful, especially by virtue of birthright; 2. The claim by virtue of descent from the legitimate marriage concluded under the promise; 3. The claim by virtue of the merit of works.

Election takes place freely:

1. Without regard to the advantage of birthright; 2. to descent from a family that is blessed; 3. to community even in a twin-birth; 4. and to the foreseeing of works. And all this is on the simple ground that election, a. voluntarily determines the indoles beforehand, thereby avoiding all appearance of natural necessity, the requirement of birthright, &c.; b. and, according to the indoles or economical endowment, it also makes a προόρις in regard to the economical call. [The sum of the whole matter, detaching from it all reference to the extent of the preference or the result of the choice of God in this instance, is, that God does exercise a prerogative of choice or election, independently of all these human considerations. That this is the point to which Paul would bring his readers, is evident from what immediately follows. A further proof that a general truth is also to be drawn from it, is afforded by the constant use made of special points in Old Testament history and of Old Testament passages to establish general propositions (see the case of Pharaoh, below, ver. 17, which, as far as the individual in question is concerned, has no connection with the discussion, and New Testament passim). This method of citation is based on the stability of the Divine character; to deny its propriety, is to presume an arbitrariness on the part of God, in far greater opposition to His character than is implied even in most fearfully fatalistic view of this chapter.—R.]

SECOND PROOF: *The antithesis in fore-ordination (predestination). God is not unrighteous in showing mercy and in hardening, and in His manner of uniting judgment and compassion (vers. 14-18). Meyer: The second part of the theodicy.

Ver. 14. What shall we say then? Is there unrighteousness with God? [Τί οὖν ἀποκρίσεται; μὴ ἀδικία παρὰ τῷ θεῷ; Comp. chap. iii. 5.] The Jew cannot refute the facts that shmael was rejected in spite of his birthright, and that Esau was rejected in spite of his legitimacy and birthright. Just here was a special point of pride with the Jew. But the consistency of this fact had now appeared—the absolute freedom of Divine choice. Israel's call was itself the strongest witness against the claims of the Israelites, because by it the most weighty prejudices concerning their privileges were overcome. But, finally, God's promise to Rebecca stood firm, and by this was decided, that the works of the Israelites could no more impose conditions on God's free exercise of His authority, than could be done formerly by the works of Jacob, when God assigned to him beforehand the domination over his brother—that is, the theocratic honor. It was especially this declaration against the claims established on works which was calculated to excite the Judaizing spirit, and lead it to the conclusion that, by so doing, God would be unrighteous. This is the interpretation of Augustine, Hervæus, the majority of Lutheran writers, and Bullinger and Tholuck. But even this conclusion he rejects with abhorrence (comp. chap. iii. 5). He adduces his proof immediately afterwards.

Meyer remarks: "This reason is demonstrative, in so far as by it the absolute divine worthiness of what God predicates of himself must be assumed." Yet this would be only an absolute proof of authority. Also, according to Calvin, the proof lies in the refuting effect of the biblical declaration: satis habet, scriptura testimoniis impuros lotratus compescere.* [In this choice and preference of the one before the other there is no unrighteousness. For he only is unrighteous who is under obligations which he does not fulfil; but God is under no obligations to His creature, hence can do with him what He will (vers. 14-29). God's will is the absolute and eternal norm of righteousness, and all that He does is necessarily right (Deut. xxxii. 4). There is no norm of righteousness above Him to which He is subject; else were God not God.—P. S.] For other explanations, see Tholuck, pp. 507, 508.

Tholuck: "Origen's regarding this as the objection of an opponent, and ver. 15 as the Apostle's answer, and vers. 16-18 as another objection of the opponent, is a result of doctrinal perplexity." Theodore of Mopsvestia, Storr [Jerome], and Flatt, regarded vers. 15-18, and Heumann, vers. 15-21, as the objection of an opponent. [Vers. 15 and 17 are quotations from the Scripture, and hence cannot be objections; while vers. 16 and 18 are not the incorrect deductions of an opponent from these passages, as Chrysostom and Pelagius suppose, but the correct conclusions of the Apostle himself.—P. S.]

Ver. 15. For he saith to Moses, I will have mercy on whom I have mercy, and I will have compassion on whom I have compassion [Ἐλεῖσω ὃν ἂν ἐλεῶ, καὶ οἰκτιρήσω ὃν ἂν οἰκτιρήω.† See *Textual Note, for the Hebrew]. An answer to the self-proposed objection in ver. 14, taken from Exod. xxxiii. 19, according to the LXX. The form of the original text is evidently this: I have (already) had mercy on whom I will have mercy, and I have had compassion on whom I will have compassion. The sense is therefore not: To whom I am gracious, to him I am gracious; that is, I act in the matter according to my own authority or freedom, unrestrainedness (the view of most commentators, also of Tholuck, p. 511. Yet the latter thus modifies his view, against Olshausen: The question is not concerning God's right, but God's grace; p. 114), but: I remain just, as Jehovah, and continue the work of my grace where I have once revealed it, &c.—That is, Jehovah is the God of revelation in His consistency, and so are also His grace and His compassion consistent. His freedom binds or unbinds itself. His freedom is rather to be regarded as decision also. According to the connection, indeed, the יְהוָה could be regarded as a future form; but this is hardly admissible in connection with the simple future form יִהְיֶה, and with the name Jehovah; therefore the Hebrew translations—for example, that of Philipsson—are to no purpose: "And as I have mercy on whom I have mercy," &c.

* [Hodge: "It will be remarked that these arguments of the Apostle are founded on two assumptions. The first is, that the Scriptures are the Word of God; and the second, that what God actually does cannot be unrighteous."—R.]

† [On the distinction between ἐλεῶ and οἰκτιρέω, Meyer remarks: "The distinction between these two words is not to be thus defined, with Tittmann, Synon., p. 69 f., that ἐλεῶ describes the active mercy, and οἰκτιρ. the sympathetic compassion; but rather, that the same notion of misericordia is expressed more strongly by οἰκτιρ. The latter is originally the bewailing sympathy, contrasted with μακαρίσκειν (Sanct., 3. 1. 19).—R.]

In sense, the inverted form of the LXX., from which Paul quotes, is therefore correct: καὶ ἐλεῖς ὅν ἂν ἐλεῖς, κ.τ.λ. [Alford objects, without sufficient reason, to laying the stress on ὅν ἂν, whomever; but Paul, following the LXX., makes it the scriptural expression of general proposition. It is in the form of a Divine axiom (Meyer).—R.] The meaning of the name Jehovah is: Divine consistency. But Jehovah's speaking to Moses has a special significance. The Jews regarded Moses as the founder of righteousness by works. Paul, on the contrary, brings out the fact that God said to this very Moses, that the consistency of the work of grace is grounded on the beginning of the work of grace in free grace. [This view is ingenious, and gives at least some warrant for a reference to works, which too often is "all supplied by the commentator" (Hodge). But it can scarcely be accepted, as it seems to be rather an effort to avoid than to discover the meaning of the passage.—As regards the thought of Divine consistency, which seems to rest on the present tense in the relative clauses, it is scarcely proper to limit the meaning thus. Certainly Meyer does not often let a grammatical point escape him; yet he paraphrases: "I will have mercy upon him who (in whatever given case) is the object of my mercy," so that I am thereby dependent on nothing without myself. That is the sovereignty of the Divine will of mercy. Notice that the future is the mercy, proving itself in fact and act, which God accords in all those cases where He stands to the persons affected in the settled disposition (present ἐλεῖς) of mercy."—R.]

Ver. 16. So then it is not of him who will-eth, &c. [ἀπὸ οὗ τοῦ θέλοντος, κ.τ.λ. On the construction, see Winer, p. 556.—Meyer: "From the saying of God, Paul deduces the inference lying therein respecting the causality of the Divine saving deliverance."—R.] That the entrance of human good conduct in faith is presupposed, follows not only from the analogy of Scripture, but also from the antithesis (ver. 17); though the Apostle here precludes the delusion that man, by his willing and running, can acquire that foundation of salvation which proceeds only from the freedom of the compassionate God. Meyer: "Incorrect, according to Locke, and most commentators; Reiche: θέλων is probably chosen with regard to Abraham's wish to constitute Ishmael, and Isaac's wish to constitute Esau, the heir; but ἐπιβ. is chosen with regard to Esau's fruitless running home from hunting (Theophylact thought that it refers to his running to the hunt).^{*} For Paul, by his ἀπὸ οὗ, draws his conclusion only from God's declaration promulgated to Moses." But, by this declaration to Moses, Paul proves that God was not unjust to Esau; that is, that God, acting in harmony with the application of that declaration to Judaism, does not now do any in justice to one who relies on righteousness by works. The willing and running are not rejected in them selves, but are elsewhere required according to the Divine call (1 Cor. ix. 24. Meyer even derives the running in this passage from the races, which ill suits the connection); it is only not recognized as the causality of the line of development. This causality is God's grace (the ἐλεῖς); must here be defined conformably to the preceding distinction between ἐλεῖς and οὐκ ἐλεῖς).

[Paul obviously draws an inference from ver. 15, with ἀπὸ οὗ. The question is, How general is that inference? The verse is certainly general in form; any limitation must be found in the preceding context, or in the scope of the Apostle's argument. To limit it to Esau, as an illustration of God's method, is, in fact, to extend it, since Esau was not of the chosen people; and what God said to Moses, the head of the chosen people, could not be applicable to him, unless it was of general validity. To limit it to the Jewish people, because they are under discussion in this part of the Epistle, is forbidden by the fact that the instances or illustrations are outside that people (Esau, Pharaoh). The only safe view is, that the word to Moses is a Divine axiom, and this, an inference of universal application and validity. It will not interfere with human means in salvation; for, if true, it applies to willing and running in general, and yet it stops no volition and its accompanying muscular exertion. That side of the matter is not under consideration. Alford: "At present the Apostle is employed wholly in asserting the divine Sovereignty, the glorious vision of which it ill becomes us to distract by continual downward looks on this earth. It is most true that the immediate subject is the national rejection of the Jews; but we must consent to hold our reason in abeyance, if we do not recognize the inference, that the sovereign power and free election, here proved to belong to God, extend to every exercise of His mercy—whether temporal or spiritual, whether in Providence or in grace, whether national or individual. It is in parts of Scripture like this that we must be especially careful not to fall short of what is written—not to allow of any compromise of the plain and awful words of God's Spirit, for the sake of a caution which He himself does not teach us."—R.]

The antithesis of the consistency of free Divine grace, as experienced by Moses, is the consistency of Divine judgment as revealed in the case of Pharaoh.

Ver. 17. For the Scripture saith unto Pharaoh. The γὰρ announces the proof which arises from the uniformity of the same Divine dealing in its rejection. The Scripture saith, is a metonymy for God saith according to the testimony of Scripture. But the metonymy brings out prominently the fact that this declaration of God is not merely temporary and isolated, but has the force of a permanent scriptural declaration, which is applicable to all analogous cases. The scriptural statement itself is in Exod. ix. 16.

[Even for this very purpose have I raised thee up, εἰς αὐτὸ τοῦτο ἐξήγειρά σε. For the original Hebrew, and LXX., here altered, see Textual Note.—R.] If we look at the connection, Paul's translation, ἐξήγειρά σε, corresponds in sense to the original text, הִנֵּנִי מִן־הַמֵּתִים, just as well as the δειγματοθήκης [LXX.] does, only it is more specific; from which consideration Meyer again educes a difference between the original sense of the Hebrew text and Paul's meaning. After the judgment of murrain and boils and blains (the fifth and sixth plagues) on Egypt, we read, as before: "Thy Lord hardened the heart of Pharaoh," after it had already been said (Exod. viii. 15, 32): "Pharaoh hardened his heart;" and Moses must solemnly declare God's message to Pharaoh, which, according to the translation of Zunz, is as follows: "For I would already have stretched out my hand, and would have smitten thee and thy people with pestilence, so that thou wouldest be cut off from the earth. Yet I have allowed thee to exist on purpose to show thee, my strength, and that my name may be extolled throughout all the earth." Evidently the translation allow to exist (also in Stier), is as much an enervation of the causal הִנֵּנִי as that of the LXX. is, and probably the cause in this case is also the same hesitation in accepting the full strength of the thought.

The expression is chiefly used of positive setting up (for example, of statues), and then also of arousing, awaking; and even the weaker meaning of allowing to exist has still the sense of a positive support. According to Meyer, Paul makes the Scripture say: "'I have awakened thee;' that is, allowed thee to appear, to stand forth; thy whole historical appearance has therefore been effected by me," &c. This interpretation introduces a harsh fatalistic sense into the text; and though Meyer presents a series of expositors as saying the same thing, this proves incorrect in the case of the very first one, Theophylact, who says: εἰς τὸ μέτρον ἡγαγόν. Bengel: πανταχούθεν πανταχούθεν προαυποτίθεται ὑποκείμενον ἅμα αὐτοῦ προϊόν. Philippi's explanation is: "I have awakened thee to being, let thee exist." Calvin's interpretation is strongest: Deus Pharaonem a se profectum dicit, eique hanc impositam esse personam.

The explanation: vivum te servavi (Grotius, Wolf, and others), at all events weakens the force; but it is not incorrect, since it follows from the connection: "I might have already destroyed thee, but, on the contrary, I have once more fully raised thee up." The interpretation, "I have raised thee up to opposition" (Augustine, De Wette [Haldane, Hodge: have placed and continued thee as my adversary. Alford: pro dire fecit, excitavit. Stuart: have roused thee.—R.), and others), has one feature of the context in its favor, namely, the circumstance that the word, according to the following σκληρύνει, appears to be used synonymously with this σκληρύνει. For, according to the sense, this idea is also comprised in the Apostle's translation, ἐξήγειρά σε; although this sense does not follow directly. He also presents no antithesis to the declaration: I could have cut thee off; the sense is rather: I have, so to speak, once more erected and raised thee up in thy hardened conduct from the judgment of death to which thou wast already subject, that I might show my power, &c.—To the more forcible construction of

[It is perhaps to be expected, that in the somewhat wide scope afforded to interpreters by the text of the Hebrew, LXX., and our passage, theological bias will largely determine the view of each. But Paul has chosen the stronger term, and uses it to establish a strong position (ver. 18, introduced by the inferential ἄρα οὖν). Hence, while we must utterly reject, both on lexical and theological grounds, the extreme supralapsarian view: God created thee —i. e., as a hardened sinner; the view of Lange, and many modern interpreters, is too weak—is out of keeping both with the original transaction and the use here made of it. The view of Meyer (and also substantially of Theophylact, Beza, Calvin, Bengel, Reiche, Olshausen, Tholuck, Philippi, De Wette, Hofmann, Schaff, and many others) is perhaps most tenable, and is certainly accordant with the original passage. The objection that it is fatalistic, is an objection of too wide scope. Olshausen: "It by no means follows from this high view of the subject, that St. Paul intends to say that God has made Pharaoh evil by any positive operation; but he only means that God permitted that evil person, who of his own free will resisted all those rich workings of grace which were communicated in rich measure even to him, to come into manifestation at that time, and under these circumstances, in such a form that the very evil which was in him should serve for the furtherance of the kingdom of The Good and the glory of God." So Schaff: "All events of history, even all wicked deeds, stand under the guidance of God, without whose will not a hair falls from our heads, much less is a world-historical fact accomplished. God does not cause the evil, but He bends and guides it to His glory."—A too definite, and too weak view, though a modification of the correct one, is that of Flatt, Benecke, Glöckler, and Wordsworth: placed thee as king.—R.]

That I might show in thee my power, and that my name might be declared throughout all the earth. This is a strengthening generalization of the purpose, namely, that God will make Pharaoh, precisely in his opposition, a monument of His power (His majestic power), by allowing him to perish. Pharaoh, the hardened one, will only experience His crushing power and become a monument of it; but in the world, the glory of His name revealing itself in Pharaoh's case will be declared to Israel (see the Song of Moses, Exod. xv.).

Ver. 18. Therefore on whom he will he hath mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth [ἄρα οὖν ὃν θέλει ἐλεεῖ, ὃν δὲ θέλει σκληρύνει]. This passage, if taken out of its connection, seems to declare an absolute predestination in the supralapsarian sense. Meyer, with others, protests against any mitigation of the sense: "Paul's simple and clear meaning is, that it depends upon God's free authority either to bless by His saving mercy, or to remove to that spiritual state in which one cannot be a subject of His saving grace, but only of His ὀργή." Of the two modes of view each of which, according to him, forbids the other—that Pharaoh in part produces his own hardness himself (Exod. viii. 15, 32; ix. 34), and that it in part seems to be wrought by God (Exod. iv. 21; vii. 3, &c.)—he makes the Apostle expressly follow the latter. [Meyer is perhaps unnecessarily harsh in his view, but he intimates that it suits the purpose of the Apostle better to choose this aspect of the hardening, as this Pharaoh, hardened by God, is to him a type of the Jew resisting the gospel.—R.]

The usual mitigations of the passage are, at all events, insufficient, particularly the explanation: though God permits hardening (Origen, Grotius, and others), and also the interpretation of σκληρύνει as duriter tractare (Carpzov, Semler, Beck, and others). Tholuck, without finally and positively adopting the latter of these, adduces many special grounds in its favor. [Against this untenable view of σκληρύνει, see Alford in loco. "The word here refers to a hardening, such a fortification in sin, that the sinner is unsusceptible of all workings of grace and better influences, the removal into a state where conversion is either absolutely impossible, or rendered difficult in the highest degree. This is an act of God, in so far as He has ordained the laws of the development of evil, 'that, propagating still, it brings forth evil,' (Schiller). It is here viewed as a punishment for a previous self-hardening of the sinner." (Schaff). So Hodge, who regards it as "the judicial abandonment of men 'to a reprobate mind,' a punitive withdrawing of the influences of His holy Spirit, and the giving them up to the uncounteracted operation of the hardening or perverting influences by which they are surrounded." So Wordsworth, but less strongly. If objection be made to such a judicial process as a work of God, then the same difficulty "lies in the daily course of His providence, in which we see this hardening process going on in the case of the prosperous ungodly man" (Alford). The facts remain, the solution is lacking, except so far as God plainly speaks in such passages as this. Meyer objects to the introduction of previous self-hardening here. See the clear and thoughtful note of Olshausen in loco.—R.]

Evidently, the context in Exod. ix. indicates a postponement of the well-merited judgment, in which postponement God's long-suffering is concurrent (comp. chap. xxiii.). The definite sense of the passage must be ascertained from the connection. We must here take into consideration the following:

1. Previously the question was, God's purposes preceding the birth of the children; here, on the contrary, it is the free will with which God dealt with fixed characters—Moses, on the one hand, Pharaoh, on the other. If this free will be referred to a purpose of God, it is nevertheless not the purpose of election, which first settles personality, but the purpose of ordination, which, in the establishment of its destiny, presupposes its conduct. Consequently, because this purpose is conditional, God is still left free to have mercy on the real Moses, just as He is free to harden the still existing Pharaoh.

2. As the ἐλεῶ must here be taken emphatically, and expresses the free consistency of Jehovah in His mercy to Moses until He can reveal His glory to him (see Exod. xxxiii. 19 ff.), so has also σκληρύνει, the meaning of a continuation of the judgment of hardening to the extreme, in antithesis to the self-ripened judgment of retribution. The more strongly we here press the δὲ θελεῖ, the more will every notion of an abstract authority be excluded, and the stronger becomes the emphasis on the pure divinity of the θέλει. [In other words, the more will the will of God, in its absolute freedom, appear, not as blind arbitrariness, which is the very reverse of freedom, but as a will of infinite love and wisdom. It proves itself such in the special cases from which the general proposition of this verse is drawn.—If θέλει (as is claimed by Professor Hitchcock, Lange's Comm., Eph. i. 9) always implies spontaneity, then the "will" here, in each case, finds its justification in the character of God, which immediately prompts it. This may be what Dr. Lange means by the "pure divinity of the θέλει."—R.]

3. The whole of the immediate result of this fearfully significant expression is, that God, in His freedom, has mercy on Moses to the utmost, and has, to the utmost, led Pharaoh to judgment; that Moses can thereby make no just claim on the ground of the righteousness of works, and that Pharaoh can protest against nothing that he might regard as injustice done to him. In this way the justifiable use of the passage quoted by Paul is determined. [The freedom of God seems to be the main thought. The reference to the righteousness of works seems needless. Meyer concludes his exegesis of the passage thus: "Undoubtedly the will of God is just and holy, but it is not conceived and presented here from this point of view, but in its independence of all human θέλει and ἐργεῖν, consequently in its simple self-origination (ἑαυτοῦ); which meaning is to be preserved in the clear sharpness of δὲ θελεῖ ἐλεῶ." The words certainly favor this view; we need but guard against inferences, which are drawn, not by the Apostle, but by imperfect human logic.—R.]

THIRD PROOF: God's freedom in the actual call to salvation (vers. 19–29).

A. The proof from the real relation (vers. 19–24).

Tholuck regards this section as the collective carrying out of the thought, that the excluded one can bring no complaint against God, because he is left free in his conduct, &c.; but Meyer, on the contrary, regards vers. 19–21 as the third part of the theodicy: "Man is not entitled to reply against God by saying, 'Why doth He yet find fault?' For his relation to God is as that of the thing formed to him that formed it, or of the vessel to the potter, who has power over the clay, of the same lump to make one vessel unto honor and another unto dishonor." * Then he regards vers. 22–29 as the fourth part of the theodicy: "God has endured with much long-suffering the vessels of wrath fitted to destruction, in order to make known His glory on the vessels of mercy, even us Christians, whom He hath called, not of the Jews only, but also of the Gentiles." We make the following distinction: In the first case, in vers. 6–13, the question was the freedom of God's election in antithesis to the human, and especially to the theocratic, right of inheritance. Then, in vers. 14–19, the question was, the freedom of God's ordination in antithesis to the claims of human righteousness by works (since even Moses himself, the lawgiver, did not merit mercy by the works of the law, and Pharaoh was visited by the judgment of hardening, instead of by the judgment of destruction which he had merited). The Apostle now passes over to God's freedom in His call.

ness made, there can be no doubt, that the objection the Apostle here raises and answers is one which arises at once against the freedom of God's will, viz., that it destroys our responsibility. As this was more likely to arise as an inference (οὖν, ver. 19, which seems to have troubled the transcribers, however) from what precedes, there is the greater ground for holding that the preceding verses refer to God's sovereignty, considered in the light of an objection (ver 14), and that this paragraph presents it in opposition to another (ver. 19). At all events, whatever limitations and special applications be made, the reader now deals with the passage (and subject) in this more general reference, and most commentators have felt obliged to treat it thus.—R.]

Ver. 19. Thou wilt say then unto me [ἐπεὶς μοι οὖν]. The conclusion which the Apostle allows the Jew to draw from the supposition that he has derived mercy and hardness from God's will, has been urged by thousands against Calvin's predestinarian system; and, indeed, they have done it with much better ground than the Jew could object to Paul's doctrine; yet they have also in many ways mistaken the infinite importance of the exercise of Divine authority in human guidance.

If the whole development of man is only an absolute Divine decree, the objection in ver. 19 says: Why then doth he yet find fault? [τί οὖν ἱς μέμψεται; See Textual Note 10.]. How, then, can God find fault with man, or rebuke him for being a sinner? By doing so, He would even contradict himself. The expression μέμψεται seems to be purposely chosen to bring out the authoritative character in a finding fault, in which the question cannot be a really objective relation to guilt. Tholuck: "Neither the charge against Pharaoh (Justin Martyr), nor that of the ungodly in the prophets (Zwingli, and others), is meant, but the rebuke of hardening brought against the Jews. Every penal declaration of revelation in general is meant, in so far as it would not be authorized by the doctrine of fate. The Jew does not here have in mind God himself, but that presupposition of the idea of God which Paul seems to present. But he nevertheless betrays the inclination of the one who relies upon the righteousness of works to find fault with God. [In so far as one holds that notion of God, however derived, which in any way allows the possibility of His being the author of evil in man, this objection will arise. It cannot be confined to the Jew and his legal righteousness. (Meyer, De Wette, make the objection general, while Philippi finds in the sharp answer of ver. 20 a proof that the objector is a Jew.)—R.]

[For who resisteth his will? Τῷ γὰρ βούληται αὐτοῦ τίς ἀντιστέκει; Meyer renders βούλημα, which Paul uses only here, das Gewollte—i. e., captum consilium. It obviously implies deliberation, as βούλημα does, when properly distinguished from θέλω.—R.] Though the ἀντιστέκει has the present meaning, yet the form seems to indicate also the thought that God has already anticipated every attempt of human opposition. The Apostle does not hasten to refute the charge directly, by urging the truth of the relations of guilt, because this charge is based upon such a one-sided standpoint from the overrating of human action, that this human boasting must first of all be prostrated. Chap. iii. 5 ff. proves that he can also reply to a similar charge by an answer which brings out the ethical relations in harmony with the connection. But the first task presented to him here is, to go back with the quarrelsome Jew resting upon the righteousness of his works, to the absolute dependence of man on God.

Ver. 20. Nay but, O man [ὦ ἄνθρωπε, μὲν οὖν γε]. We translate the μὲν οὖν γε with Tholuck: Much more; Meyer construes it as irony: "Yes, indeed, O man." Its most probable use is to strengthen the thought: "Just the opposite, O man, &c. Thou sayest that God disputes with thee, and thou rather, in thy erroneous claims of right, dardest to dispute with God." [Still better, Alford: "Yes, rather, taking the ground from under the previous assertion, and superseding it by another; implying that it has a certain show of truth, but that the proper view of the matter is yet to be stated. It thus conveys an intimation of rebuke; here with severity." Comp. chap. x. 18. Hodge: "Groes as is this perversion of the Apostle's doctrine on the part of the objector, Paul at first rebukes the spirit in which it is made, before he shows it to be unfounded."—R.] The ὦ ἄνθρωπε expresses already man's complete dependence on God; and this is increased by the σὺ τίς εἶ, who art thou [quantulus es; Meyer].

[That repliest against God, ὁ ἀνταποκρινόμενος τῷ θεῷ.] According to Theodore of Mopsvestia, Jerome, and others, Paul, in using the ἀνταποκρινόμενος, refutes his opponent by referring him to his own words. His opponent replies against God, and therefore opposes God, in the very moment in which he maintains that He cannot be opposed. In that case, indeed, μὲν οὖν γε would be ironical. This interpretation is ingenious, but too refined, and is opposed by the following words.

Shall the thing formed say to him that formed it, Why didst thou make me thus? [Μὴ ἐρεῖ τὸ πλάσμα τῷ πλάσαντι, τί με ἐποίησας οὕτως; An echo of, but scarcely a quotation from, Isa. xxix. 16, though the first clause is found word for word in the LXX.—R.] The explanation tractasti (Grotius, and others) is evasive. The tertium comparationis is the causality of him that forms, but here as the causality of the form. [It must be observed that even a pressing of the figure cannot make πλάσμα mean the thing created; the reference is not to original creation, but to the subsequent ethical moulding, from which, of course, must be excluded the mystery of universal sin referred to in chap. v. 12. That enters into the nature of the "clay" and the "lump" alike. Against Glöckler's argumentatio a minore ad majus: "If a thing moulded cannot thus speak, much less a man," &c., see Meyer in loco.—R.]

Ver. 21. Hath not the potter power over the clay [ἢ οὐκ ἔχει ἐξουσίαν ὁ κεραμεὺς τοῦ πηλοῦ]. The order indicates the two emphatic thoughts: 1. That the human subjects under discussion are as "clay;" "his clay," would be a proper rendering. 2. That God has power; the definition of that power is given in the next clause.—R.] Tholuck: "The potter's clay, regarded by infatigable as the massa jam perditā. The vessels are not considered, as is observed by th: GL ord. and Brenz, as naturally part silver and gold, and part dirt, but altogether dirt. Consequently, these expositors prefer the allusion to the Old Testament, Jer. xviii., where a people already ruined, which God forms into vessels of honor or dishonor according to its own conduct, is spoken of; the supralapsarians, on the contrary, as Thomasius, Estius, Calvin, and Gomarus, decide in favor of an allusion to Isa. xxix. or xlv. Supralapsarianism, to wit, regards the πῆλός as the massa absolute, qualis erat massa angelorum (Estius) and the πλάσμα—which the meaning of the word is alleged to favor—as the product of the first creation.* Tholuck finds in the simile only the sense expressed by Calvin: Nullam dei arbitrio causam superiorem posse adduci, &c. For the harsh expressions of Calvin, the still harsher ones of Zwingle, and the equally mild ones of Bullinger, see Tholuck, p. 528.

According to Arminius, and others, together with Lutherans, ver. 21 contains only a preliminary rejoinder; the real answer follows in vers. 22, 23. [It is indeed a preliminary, but one that "aims rather at striking dumb the objector by a statement of God's undoubted right, against which it does not become us men to murmur, than at unfolding to us the actual state of the case" (Alford). Comp. the emphatic order of the words.—R.] Besides, Arminians and Socinians have asserted that here Paul does not speak of "an election of individuals, but of classes—of believing Gentiles" (Tholuck).*

According to Tholuck, further, the principal question here is, What must we understand by the πῆλός? If we regard the earthy clod as the real clay from which man was made, then the work of Him that formed may be transferred to the creation itself. According to this idea, indeed, the individual man is only "a specimen of the species." But if we regard God's breath as the real substance of man's formation, according to the biblical idea of personality, Calvinistic supralapsarianism is obviated.

[Of the same lump to make, ἐκ τοῦ αὐτοῦ φύραματος ποιῆσαι. The power of the potter is defined more closely by the infinitive. Fairness to the figure compels us to identify the "clay" and the "lump." The "clay" is the substance itself; the "lump" presents it as already in use by the potter for his purpose. Beyond this we cannot press it. Meyer perhaps goes too far, but certainly is justified in making the πῆλός co-extensive with human nature. It must be borne in mind that the potter is not represented as making the "clay," or even the "lump," but as having power "over the clay," to make vessels "of the lump."—R.] The word here is not, as Meyer has properly remarked against Hofmann, created, but made. He understands by the φύραμα "the very same mass of human nature in and of itself." But we can just as little regard the massa jam perditā as merely the human race, prostrated in the ruin of the fall. In chap. xi. 16 the φύραμα is the Jewish people; and, according to ver. 24 of the present chapter, it is the same wretched state of the Jews and Gentiles at the time of Christ. God, as the Maker, in His exercise of the efficacious call (see ver. 24), has disposed of this φύραμα, first of all, of the Jewish people. [Granting this immediate reference, we must still avoid limiting the meaning of φύραμα. For even ver. 24 includes the Gentiles, while the discussion hitherto has embraced Ishmael, Esau, and Pharaoh.—R.]

[One vessel unto honor, and another unto dishonor, ὁ μὲν εἰς τιμὴν σκεῦος, ὁ δὲ εἰς ἀτιμίαν. Meyer calls attention to the position of εἰς τιμὴν. Even here, in this strong assertion of "power," the preparation of the vessel for honorable use is emphasized.—R.] But as he that forms does not wantonly destroy his φύραμα, but, according to his own pleasure, makes of it vessels unto honor and unto dishonor—that is, vessels for honorable and vessels for dishonorable use—so also does God's exercise of authority as Maker go no further than to appoint a great difference between honorable and dishonorable vessels of His call, according to the personal conditions which have been established by the call corresponding to the necessity of salvation (2 Tim. ii. 20; 1 Cor. xii. 28). But the Apostle does not carry out his figure in this direction. He rather urges, only for a moment, the figure that God has the ἐξουσία, the free and full power, which is at the same time essentially the right, to make of the φύραμα, of His people [or, of all people, of the race] vessels unto honor and vessels unto dishonor; but then, in ver. 22, he turns to say that God has never made full use of this right; but that He has even endured with much long-suffering the vessels of wrath which He found before Him, His object being to make known the riches of His glory on the vessels of mercy. In ver. 22 there is thus repeated the thought of the sentence awarded Pharaoh.

Preliminary note on the connection of vers. 22, 23. But how now? If God—notwithstanding His perfect power and His ready will to show forth His wrath and demonstrate His power—has just as much adhered to himself as formerly, when He suspended the judgment of destruction on Pharaoh, by enduring with much long-suffering the vessels of wrath fitted to destruction, that He might make known the riches of His glory on the vessels of mercy, which He had afore prepared unto δόξα—how does the case stand with the complaint that He makes an unrighteous use of His power? It is evident that the thought is presented here which is elaborated in chap. xi. In God's exercise of authority, judgment and long-suffering are united. His judgments are interpositions of long-suffering. In this sense God rules freely in His call, just as He has ruled freely in His election and ordination. With the explanation of the divine economy of the call, in vers. 21–24, the Apostle has also now refuted (in ver. 20) the charge that God is represented as an unrighteous God. He has therefore now proved the righteousness of divine ordination, vers. 15–18, from the righteousness of the divine call in ver. 20; just as he had already proved the righteousness of divine election (vers. 9–13) from the righteousness of divine ordination. The proof of the freedom of election lies in the fact that God is still free also in His ordination, and the proof of the freedom of His ordination lies in the fact that He is still free in His call.

But God's manner of using His freedom in these three stages testifies to the righteousness of His dealing—

1. His exclusion of Ishmael, gives an ethical character to the whole series of God's acts of freedom.
2. His hatred of Esau is only relative; it denotes the infinite difference between the two, by making the first-born theocratically subject to the younger.

3. It is plain, to one acquainted with the Scriptures, that God's hardening of Pharaoh resulted from Pharaoh's having hardened himself; and besides this, there is connected with this the additional fact that, even though Pharaoh was ripe for the judgment of destruction, God makes the useless man still useful by allowing him to exist longer, and by raising him up, in order, through him, to declare His power and His mercy. With the same consistency, He goes so far on the side of His exercise of mercy toward Moses, whose fidelity is well known to Israel, that He can reveal to him His glory, though it is in only a qualified manner.

4. He finally stood with the formative power of His call to salvation over the φίραμα of Israel prepared in the Old Testament, and could exercise His freedom by immediately allowing a Christianity to come from it, by virtue of which the whole φίραμα crumbled into vessels of honor and dishonor, if peradventure He allowed new wine to be poured into the old bottles, or the new cloth to be sewed into the old garment. But then it came to pass that another antithesis was prepared in the Israel of the apostolic age. The representatives of the φίραμα (not this merely) living at that time, had already transformed themselves in part into vessels of wrath, fitted to destruction; that is, to be broken to pieces (see Pa. ii.), but not to be worn out as vessels of dishonor; and the blessing of the Old Testament in part exhibited itself in them by their allowing themselves to be prepared by God as vessels of glory. And He was already about to break those vessels of wrath; but as He had once patiently made use of Pharaoh as a means of revealing His majesty and of declaring the glory of His name, so did He now endure in great long-suffering the vessels of wrath; and for this purpose, that their contradiction might be the means for the transference of salvation to the Gentiles, and for making known the riches of His glory on the vessels of His mercy. In brief, the turning-point was this: Instead of a φίραμα, which could have been simply used in the antithesis of vessels of honor and dishonor, He found that the developing process of the covenant people of the Old Testament had gone to such an extreme, that the people were divided into vessels of wrath and vessels of mercy; and instead of now making a stunted Jewish Christianity from the whole substance of the people, He established that economy of saving interposition explained by the Apostle in chaps. x. and xv.

Though Paul has principally allowed only the factors of the divine exercise of authority to appear, the ground for this was, that he had to establish the freedom of God's grace in relation to Judaism. But afterward he shows the righteousness of God in relation to the unbelief of most Israelites and the faith of the Gentiles.

Meyer remarks, in reference to the idea σκεῦος εἰς τιμὴν: "It shall be either honored, so that it has τιμὴν (as, for example, a sacred vase); or else it shall experience the opposite, so that ἀτιμία adheres to it (as, for example, a vessel designed for a low and filthy use)." According to 2 Tim. ii. 20, the difference in material comes most prominently into consideration; but as far as the use is concerned, the antithesis of sacred and unclean will suffice. Tholuck emphasizes principally the antithesis: held in honor and in dishonor, but maintains that the simile is not adequate in the very chief point of comparison; the potter moulds the clay, but God is the Creator of the creature, therefore Pareus also speaks of a comparatio a minori ad majus. Yet it is incorrectly assumed here that the creation is spoken of.

The passage undoubtedly cited by Pa. i,* Isa. xix. 16, refers to a people relying upon the righteousness of their works (ver. 13), on whom judgment is about to be visited (ver. 14), because they claim a false independence toward God in return for their service, as if God was related to them as an equal—as if the potter were equal with the clay, and the clay could say: "He has not made me," or, "He does not understand the matter." Besides, the vessels unto honor and unto dishonor must by no means be identified with the vessels of wrath and of mercy, which error has been committed by De Wette, Tholuck, Meyer, and others.

Ver 22. But what if God, although willing to show, &c. Εἰ δὲ θέλων ὁ θεός, κ.τ.λ. [See Textual Note]. The question as to what should be supplied with εἰ δὲ, is discussed below. Meyer suggests: "Wilt thou still venture this replying against God" (ver. 20).—R.] Two opposite explanations here present themselves: because God would, and although God would. The sense in the former case would be this: the μαρποθῆρια was also designed to enhance the penal judgment (De Wette, Rückert, [Calvin], and most commentators). But this cannot be the purpose of the μαρποθῆρια. Though the result is, that the judgment is enhanced (chap. ii. 4) by the abuse of the μαρπ., yet this abuse must by no means be referred to the μαρποθῆρια. The translation although God would, adopted by Fritzsche, Philippi, and Meyer, is therefore preferable. [It may be added in favor of this view, that it gives to θέλων the meaning of willing—i. e., spontaneous will. It was the will of God, growing out of His character, to show His wrath, &c., but He endured notwithstanding, &c. The other view takes the participle in the sense of purposing, which is too strong. The passage then prevents another answer to the objection of injustice, by showing how the sovereign God had withheld the exercise of a power in accordance with His holy will. The position of θέλων, as Meyer remarks, prepares the way for the strong contrast with "long-suffering."—R.] If we look at the explanatory parallels in Pharaoh's history, the meaning becomes more definite: although, and since already; as God was already about to do. In Exod. ix. 16, God said to Pharaoh: "For now I will stretch out my hand." Likewise the aorists ἐνδείξασθαι, γνωρίσαι, indicate this readiness of judgment, not less than the expression σκεῦος ὀργῆς, and especially κατηρτισμένα. The expression: ἐνδείξασθαι τὴν ὀργὴν καὶ γνωρίσαι τὸ δυνατόν,† in connection with the foregoing, forcibly calls to mind the declaration to Pharaoh.

Endured [ἤνεγκεν]. Chrysostom, De Wette, and others, have referred this to the long-bearing with Pharaoh; but Meyer, on the other hand, is of the opinion that Paul means the previous time in general (which shall thus continue under this divine forbearance until the second coming of Christ). But it is evident from the connection, that the Apostle means the hardened portion of the Israelitish people. This is the view of Tholuck, with others: "The unbelieving Jews at Christ's time; there can only be a mere allusion to Pharaoh." For other views, see Tholuck.*

The whole passage in vers. 22, 23 has occasioned very great difficulty. The principal difficulty lies in the fact that it is not fully carried out; that is, that it is an aposiopesis. Augustine [so Stuart] observed this, and supplied a ὅτι τίς ἐστι from ver. 20; but the better supplement would be: μὴ ἀδίκια παρὰ τῷ θεῷ; μὴ γένοιτο! in ver. 14; but the best of all would be chap. xi. 33.

The second difficulty lies in the brief expression καὶ ἵνα, which at once becomes clear by bringing over once more the ἡνεγκεν: has also endured in order to. For the different attempts at construction, see Tholuck (p. 535).

1. Καὶ γυνώσκειν, καὶ ἵνα γυνώσκη; the καὶ—καὶ just as well—as also (Nösselt, Baumgarten-Crusius). Tholuck says, on the contrary, that in that case it must read θέλον ἦν.

2. Our own construction. The καὶ ἵνα is connected to ἡνεγκεν, so that the latter expresses a double purpose (thus Calvin, Grotius, Winer, Meyer, and others).† Tholuck does not regard the connection by the mere καὶ as sufficient, and thinks, with Baumgarten-Crusius, that this construction does not present any clear thought. But the previous formation of this clear thought is already contained in Exod. ix. 15, 16.

3. Beza, Rückert, and Fritzsche, have connected καὶ ἵνα to the participial καταρτισμένα: "those who are originally (!) appointed to destruction, for the purpose," &c. The καὶ would thus be exegetical, which is Calvin's view of the thought; but the καταρτισμ. is totally misconstrued. Tholuck proceeds, with Philippi, from the unwarranted supposition, that the Apostle is expected to treat uniformly of God's dealings in relation to the συνὴ ἐς ἀμπύαν and to the ἐκ τυμῆς; he requires, accordingly, the acceptance of a double anacoluthon. "Mentally, the Apostle must have written," &c. Philippi interprets similarly. (See Meyer [p. 380, 4th ed.], on the contrary). On the constructions of Hofmann, Bengel, Schöttgen, and Beck, see Tholuck, p. 533 ff.

With much long-suffering [ἐν πολλῇ μακροθυμίᾳ]. On the obscurity of the idea of μακροθυμία in Calvin, Hofmann, and others (as only meaning waiting for), see Tholuck, p. 536.

* [The more general reference is to be preferred, and, in any case, it is implied; for all ante-Christian history must be viewed as long-suffering forbearance in preparation for the great revelation of mercy. Comp. all the more modern conceptions of ancient history.—R.]

† [Alford agrees substantially with this view, but prefers to supply: "what if this took place," this ὅτι θέλει, θέλει. So Ewald. Dr. Hodge joins the clause with θέλει, or rather supplies θέλει, which is not only objectionable on the grounds he states himself, but untenable, if the sense be: although willing. Stuart takes a somewhat different view of the syntax of the passage, and paraphrases the whole: "If God, in order that He might exhibit His primitive justice and sovereign power, endures with much long-suffering the wickedness of the impenitent and rebellious who are worthy of His divine indignation; and if He has determined to exhibit His rich grace toward the subjects of His mercy whom He has prepared for glory, even toward us whom He has called, Gentiles as well as Jews; who art thou?" &c. This gives too strong a meaning to θέλει, and is not so justifiable grammatically as the view of Meyer and Lange.—R.]

[The immediate end of the long-suffering is undoubtedly to lead to repentance (comp. chap. ii. 4. 2 Peter iii. 9, 15). But, as Alford intimates, this is a mystery we cannot fathom.—R.]

Vessels of wrath [σκεύη ὀργῆς]. Without the article. Not some, but those in general, limited, however, by the clause immediately following. The absence of the article seems also to favor Lange's distinction between "vessels unto dishonor" and "vessels of wrath."—R.] Meyer: Vessels full of Divine wrath. Totally foreign to the figure! Vessels filled with Divine wrath would be very holy and honorable, as is the case with the vials of wrath in the hand of the angels, in John's Revelation. De Wette and Tholuck correctly explain: Objects of divine wrath. [So Stuart, Hodge. The latter takes the phrase as a modification of "vessels unto dishonor" (ver. 21).—R.] The figure in Pa. ii. 9 is undoubtedly closely connected with the Apostle's thought.

Fitted for destruction [καταρτισμένα ἐς ἀπώλειαν]. This is the end for which they are fitted; the divine ὀργή is accomplished in the ἀπώλεια.—R.] Meyer: "But the subject who has fitted them for the ἀπώλεια is God (see ver. 20 f.), and the insertion of any clause by which it should follow that they had fitted themselves for destruction (see Chrysostom, Theodoret, Ecumenius, and Theophylact) is contrary to both the word and the context (likewise Tholuck and De Wette)." But apart from the fact that, according to Pa. ii., God breaks the vessels of wrath, but does not make them, the very decided change of the verb as well as of the tense (καταρτισμένα; ἃ προτοιμάσεν) should guard the exegetical author, who usually holds so tenaciously to the letter, against this conclusion. It is a much bolder leap from the thought: God has the power to make vessels unto dishonor, to the thought that He has made the vessels of wrath. In the Apostle's choice of verbs he presents three antitheses, which may well serve as a warning to the expositor.

1. The verbs themselves are different: in καταρτίζειν, the idea of making ready predominates (to make fitting, to prepare fully); but in the expression προτοιμάζειν, on the contrary, the idea of the previous preparation predominates.

2. The former word is put in the perfect, and (which strengthens the matter) also in the participle; but the latter, being in the form of the aorist, is much less conclusive.

3. The former stands irrelatively in the passive; but the latter, as activity, is referred definitely to God. Such antitheses as these cannot be dusted off by the brush of mere assurance. Therefore a third explanation takes its place beside the two foregoing ones. According to this last, the perfect passive participle must be read as a verbal adjective: prepared, ready, as in Luke vi. 40, &c. (Grotius, Calovius, Beck). The Apostle has probably chosen this form, because this being ready certainly arises from a continual reciprocal action between human sin and the Divine judgment of blindness and hardness. De Wette has an uncertain surmise of this relation: "The mixture of two different modes of view—the moral and the absolute—undoubtedly occurs here. It must also be granted that the Apostle avoids saying: ἃ κατήρτισε ἐς ἀπώλειαν (Bengel)." The "two different modes of view" are reduced to one, according to which every development of sin is a network of human offences and Divine judgments.

that are related to each other as chain and clasp.* The poet knew something more of the matter than many theologians, when he wrote: "This is the very curse of evil deed," &c.; † provided the curse is not taken as a mere phrase.

Ver. 23. And that he might make known the riches, &c. [καὶ ἵνα γνωρίσῃ τὸν πλοῦτον, &c.] As intimated above, this clause should be connected (Winer, p. 530) with endured. Καὶ, also. This was a second purpose of God's endurance, undoubtedly the more important one. Ἴνα is of course telic.—Τῆς δόξης αὐτοῦ. The divine majesty in its beneficent glory. Bengel: Bonitatis, gratia, misericordia, sapientia, omnipotentia.—R.] The riches of glory form the antithesis to another miserable train of development which Christianity could conceivably have taken within the Jewish nationality. The riches of glory are the train of development which God has actually taken, the course of the unlimited universality of evangelization, to the wonderful blessing of which, in the conversion of the Gentiles, the Apostle ever reverts with rapt adoration (chap. x. 11; Eph. iii. 5-10; Col. i. 6, 20 ff.).

According to Calvin, the πλοῦτος τῆς δόξης should be so regarded that by the interitus improborum eo luculentius divina bonitatis, erga electos amplitudo should be strengthened. According to the explanation of the Remonstrants, the liberalitas of God should be made known on the vessels of mercy, by the comparison of this mercy with the patient endurance with the vessels of wrath. According to Fritzsche, the purpose of sparing the Jews was, that many of them might be converted before the second coming of Christ. But this overlooks ver. 24, according to which the vessels of mercy are only partly among the Jews.† Meyer must also here mix up the second coming of Christ, which he everywhere brings in, just as Dr. Baur does Clemens Romanus. "If, namely, God had not so patiently endured the σκεὴ ὀργῆς, but had already permitted His penal judgment to be inflicted upon them (which must be regarded together with the second coming), He would have had no period to declare His glory to σκεῖν ἔλεος." That is, the final judgment, as the end of the period of mercy, would have been present with the complete penal judgment of Israel. The destruction of Jerusalem has certainly become a type of the end of the world, but not the end of the world itself. The Apostle presents us with an excellent exegesis of his own language, in chap. xi. 11, 25; Acts xiii. 46, and also in other passages.

[On vessels of mercy, ἐπὶ σκεὴν ἔλεους. Not to (de Wette), but toward, with regard to, depending on πλοῦτον (Alford). The making known is represented by the preposition as stretching itself over the men who are its objects (Meyer). The latter is preferable. We have no right to limit the "vessels of mercy" to any period. The preceding context would extend the reference to the times of Pharaoh; ver. 24 extends it indefinitely into the Christian dispensation.—R.]

Which he before prepared for glory [ἃ προητοίμασεν εἰς δόξαν. The verb is aorist, and refers to a definite past act. The two meanings suggested by Hodge: (1.) predestined; (2.) prepared by providence and grace (also that of Olshausen), are both objectionable. (1.) Because it is not the proper meaning of the word; (2.) because this is a continued work, and would be indicated by the perfect, as was the "fitted" of ver. 22. It probably refers to the actual constitution of the individual, as clay in the hands of the potter, the result of election, yet distinct from it.—There is no necessity for limiting δόξα to "the glory of the new covenant." Its antithesis, "destruction," shows that it means the full and eternal glory of the kingdom of heaven.—R.] Tholuck translates, "which he had prepared unto glory from eternity," and remarks thereon, that, from the circumstance that the κατηρτισμένα does not have the προ before it, it follows that Paul could have thought only of a decretum electionis, but not reprobationis. [So Schaff.] Tholuck cites, in favor of this explanation, Eph. ii. 10· Matt. xxiv. 34; Book of Wisdom viii. 9.

We must remark, in relation to the middle passage, that the expression: Βασιλεία προτοίμασμένη ἀπὸ καταβολῆς κόσμου must not be confounded with πρὸ καταβολῆς κόσμου. From the foundation of the world, through all time, God has labored for the preparation of the βασιλεία. The thought, God has chosen us before the foundation of the world, is also totally different from the infeasible thought, that He prepared us for glory before the foundation of the world. The two other passages are equally undemonstrative. Meyer explains, more correctly, thus: God formed the σκεὴ ἔλεος therefor beforehand, before He declared His glory on them. But the general statement has also its historical relation on this side. As the true children of faith among the Jews came out from the pedagogical exclusion under the law (Gal. iii. 28), they found themselves already prepared for the glory of the new covenant, and the preparatory mercy had operated in this direction on even many of the Gentiles (chap. ii. 14, 15). The πλοῦτος τῆς δόξης came over them like the rising of a spiritual sun—ἐπὶ σκεὴν ἔλεος, the vessels which were subjects of mercy—and went far beyond them in the evangelization of the Gentile world (see Isa. ix. 2).

[The paraphrase of Meyer (vera. 22, 23) is appended, as a clear résumé of the exegesis, for the most part supported in the notes above. "But if God, notwithstanding His holy will leads Him, not to allow His anger and His power to remain unproven, but to make it known in act, has yet, with great long-suffering, endured such as were objects of His wrath, and spared them the destruction, into which they are, however, fitted and prepared to fall, as a vessel from the potter—endured and spared not merely as a proof of such great long-suffering toward them, but also with the purpose of making known, during the continuance of this forbearance, the fullness of His glorious perfection upon such as are objects of His mercy, whom He had before prepared, as a potter a vessel, and enabled for eternal glory." R.]

‡ [The advantage of a general reference throughout the passage is apparent here. The making known is something which occurs not once, but throughout the whole gospel dispensation, as ver. 24 requires.—R.]

Ver. 24. As such he also called us, &c. [οἷς καὶ ἐκάλεσεν ἡμᾶς, κ.τ.λ. Οὕς, of which kind, quales (Alford). As such vessels of mercy, he also, besides preparing, called us. He prepared us among these vessels of mercy, and, as such, has also called us, Jews and Gentiles. Stuart would supply here ἤλπισε, He showed mercy to us; but this is unnecessary in our view of the passage. —R.] We have already brought out the meaning of the ἐκάλεσεν in this passage. It denotes the fundamental thought of vers. 21–23, God's freedom in the economy of His call. Even us whom; namely, even such vessels of mercy; or they, even whom. That is, in this characteristic He has also called us (not us also) as vessels of mercy. Because He had in mind only objects of mercy, but not the probable legitimate heirs, He could, consistently with His mercy, conformably to His preparatory mercy, really call us:

Not from among the Jews only, but also from among the Gentiles. [Ἐξ, from among. Bengel notes the reference to the call of the Jew as: "Non eo ipso vocatus, quod Judæus est, sed ex Judæis." Hodge: "How naturally does the Apostle here return to the main subject of discussion! How skillfully is the conclusion brought out at which he has continually aimed!" —R.]

B. The third proof, corroborated by witnesses of the Old Testament (vers. 25–29).*

Ver. 25. As he saith also in Hosea [ὡς καὶ ἐν, κ.τ.λ. See Textual Note 1, for the Hebrew text. Alford suggests, very properly, that καὶ implies "that the matter in hand was not that directly prophesied in the citation, but one analogous to it." See below. —R.] The call of believing Gentiles is not only a New Testament fact, but is also attested previously in the Old Testament. —In Hosea; that is, in the Book of Hosea. —The first quotation is Hosea ii. 23: "And I will say to them which were not my people (see Hosea i. 9), Thou art my people; and they shall say, Thou art my God." Paul has changed the ἐγὼ of the original text and the LXX. into καλέσω, which, according to Fritzsche and Meyer, should mean, I will call. Tholuck, on the contrary, properly observes that the naming of them already comprises the call. Paul has also left out the addition, irrelevant in this connection: "And they shall say, 'Thou art my God;'" while, on the other hand, he has, in conformity with the sense, correctly supplied the clause καὶ τῇ οὐκ ἡγαπήμεν, κ.τ.λ., in harmony with Hosea i. 6, referred to Hosea ii. 23.†

Ver. 26. And it shall come to pass, that in the place. [See Textual Note 2.] In order to understand the whole argumentative force of this citation, we must, like the Apostle, connect the second citation, Hosea ii. 1 (LXX. i. 10), with the first (and this is simply an exegesis according to the analogy of Scripture, as we frequently find in Paul). The Apostle, designing to emphasize the word ἐπίκλησις, brings it out once more in his conclusion: καὶ ἐπὶ κληθήσονται, κ.τ.λ. Hitzig explains the expression: in the place, by instead of. According to Meyer, the prophet meant by this expression the locality of the Gentiles, the Gentile lands; but Paul understood by it, Palestine. That the expression denotes the stay of the Jews in the Gentile world, is proved by Hosea i. 11: "Then shall the children of Judah and the children of Israel be gathered together, and appoint themselves one head, and they shall come up out of the land." It is just on this point that the weight of the proof rests. The call will be published to them among the Gentiles, therefore among the "no-people," among whom they themselves are scattered as "no-people."

* The reference is undoubtedly to the symbolical names given by the prophet to a son and daughter (chap. i. 6, 9): Lo-Ammi (not my people) and Lo-Ruhamah (not having obtained mercy). In order of birth the latter stands first, as well as in the passage cited. This is natural, as visible deprivation of mercy precedes visible rejection as a people. The Apostle inverts the order, however, perhaps because the prominent thought for his purpose was: not my people, &c. —R.]

† (Dr. Hodge makes of vers. 25–23 a distinct section, in which the Apostle confirms the position of the preceding section (the freedom of God in selecting the objects of His mercy) by declarations of the Old Testament (1.) vers. 25, 26. Aliens were to be included in the kingdom of God; (2.) Only a small portion of the Israelites should attain to these blessings; vers. 27–29; hence the Gentiles are called, and the Jews as Jews rejected; vers. 30, 31. The reason of their rejection was refusal to submit to gospel terms of salvation; ver. 32. As predicted, they were offended at their Messiah; ver. 33. —R.]

According to Meyer, Paul finds the demonstrative force of the two passages in the fact, that he perceives the mercy shown to the ten tribes as a type of the reception of the Gentiles to salvation. According to Tholuck, his proof rests upon the hermeneutics of the Jewish exposition. This "was accustomed to refer biblical declarations, according to the law of ideal analogy, to such subjects also as are comprehended in the same category" (see p. 541).* It must be assumed that the decision: "not my people," has placed the Jews among the Gentiles, and that the decision: Lo-Ruhamah, has adjudged them to be a very intractable people even among the Gentiles themselves. If, now, the call to salvation is published to this not my people, in the midst of the Jews, then it has a creative, original meaning; it is not published to Israel as God's people, but it creates for itself a people of God from the mixed "no-people" of the Jews and of the Gentiles. According to the typical construction, De Wette has referred the τόπος to the ideal state or divine kingdom, and Fritzsche to the cætus Christianorum. Yet, according to the connection, this locality means the equalization of Jews and Gentiles in one common need of mercy.

Ver. 27. And Isaiah cries also concerning Israel, Though the number of the children of Israel be as the sand of the sea, a remnant shall be saved. [Vers. 27 and 28 contain a quotation from Isa. x. 22, 23; the verses being divided differently, however. The original reference was undoubtedly to the return from Babylon. Here, however, the emphasis is laid on remnant, mainly with reference to the call of the Gentiles, though perhaps not without a secondary reference to the future salvation of Israel—a premonition of chap. xi. —R.] That the question in the foregoing was the call of the Gentiles (the Jews, of course, included, in so far as they have sunk into heathen dom), and not the call of the Jewish people, as Hofmann holds, is proved by the verse which now follows—a quotation from Isa. x. 22, nearly according to the LXX. The Apostle here emphasizes the remnant, as he has emphasized the Gentile land in the foregoing passage. Only a remnant of Israel, εὐὸ ὑπόλειμμα, will be saved. The LXX. translated the original נִשְׁבָּר: will return, be converted, by σωθήσεται, in the sense of will be saved, though in a more restricted sense than Paul intends. The term remnant is of all the more weight, as it stands in contrast with the declaration, "though thy people Israel be as the sand of the sea." Similar passages: Isa. lrv. 8, 9; Mal. iii. 2; iv. 1.—The crying, κλάει, describes the bold declaration of a truth very offensive to the people.

Ver. 28. [For he is finishing the word, and cutting it short in righteousness; because a short word will the Lord make upon the earth. λόγον γὰρ συντελεῖν καὶ συντεμνῶν ἐν δικαιοσύνῃ· ὅτι λόγον συντεμνόμενον ποιήσει κύριος ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς. See Textual Notes 24, 25. Lange renders: For he who consummates the reckoning, is also he who limits it in righteousness. Yea, a restrained work will the Lord carry out on the earth. Against this view, see below.—R.] Zunz translates the following words of the same quotation, פְּלִיין דְּרִיזָה, &c., thus: "The ruin is decreed, righteousness overflows. For the Lord, the God of Hosts, executes a firmly determined desolation in the midst of all the land." The LXX. has translated: λόγον συντελεῖν καὶ συντεμνῶν ἐν δικαιοσύνῃ, ὅτι λόγον συντεμνόμενον κύριος ποιήσει ἐν τῇ οἰκουμένῃ ὅλη. Paul follows this in the main, with the exception of the last words.

It may now be asked, Has the LXX. translated incorrectly, and has Paul incorrectly quoted from it, under the supposition that this translation corresponds better to his purpose? (see Tholuck, pp. 542 ff.) פְּלִיָה means, first of all, completion, consummation, and concurs with the λόγος in the idea of settlement (see the LXX., 1 Macc. x. 40, 42, 44). Accordingly, פְּלִיין also means the judgment of destruction in the sense of settlement. Now the LXX. translates the first clause thus: "He who has determined the settlement (the same as the final judgment) is the same who limits it, cuts it short in righteousness; so that a remnant can be left from the destruction." We read the καὶ συντεμνῶν as a conclusion with ἐστὶ, and understand by righteousness, not penal righteousness, but righteous restraint in punishing, according to the saving purpose of righteousness, whose highest glory does not consist in inexorable rigor.

This translation is undoubtedly exegetical. First, it takes over Adonai, the subject of the following clause, in order to bring back the definition of the first clause to the defining clause. Then it does not explain the שְׁבָרָה as a higher degree of the first term פְּלִיין דְּרִיזָה, but, antithetically, as a mitigation, which is even already indicated in the פְּלִיין. This exegesis will be perceived from the sense, also, to be altogether correct. Destruction is defined as settlement, but therewith also cut short; overflowing (restraining itself) with righteous mildness, deliverance. The word שְׁבָרָה frequently has the sense of mildness, of righteousness, as fairness in its saving effect. The verb שְׁבָרָה is here transitive. See Gesenius, Lexicon. On συντεμνῶν, see the Lexicon. This translation is further in harmony with the connection which gives prominence to precisely this thought, that a remnant shall be saved from the decreed judgment.* The "shortened days," in Matt xxiv. 22, denote the same thing. See the Commentary on Matthew [Amer. ed., pp. 425, 426].

The second clause changes the maxim of divine government declared in the first clause, according to which, judgment always brings a deliverance, into a declaration; here the word of the LXX. is explained of itself by the foregoing: for the Lord will effect a shortened, that is, a moderated settlement in the whole world, or, as Paul says in a more general way, upon the earth. Now there seems to be no support for the συντεμνόμενον in the original text. But the niphel participle נִתְּמָה, like the substantive נִתְּמָה, does not by any means denote in turn, like פְּלִיָה, the penal judgment in itself, but the definiteness and fixed limitation of the penal judgment. Thus the word נִתְּמָה after פְּלִיָה, in Isa. xxviii. 22, evidently serves to express the limitation of the judgment, as is plain from the explanation in vers. 23-29. (Ver. 28: He will not ever be threshing it.) Therefore the Vulgate properly translates consummationem et abbreviationem audiui; according to the Septuagint, συντελεσμένα καὶ συντεμνόμενα πράγματα ἤκουσα. Comp. also Dan. ix. 27; xi. 36. From this it follows that in the פְּלִיין, in the first member of Paul's citation, there is comprised not merely the close, but also the limiting conclusion of the judgment of destruction.

According to Meyer (and Fritzache), the LXX. exhibits an ignorance of the passage, yet Paul found the sense of the translation suited for his purpose. In consequence of a defective construction, the word λόγος has been differently explained: purpose; fact; dictum. According to Meyer, the λόγος συντεμνῶν signifies the shortest possible consummation of the λόγος. Tholuck: "The Lord will execute an exactly defined declaration." (On the usual opinions on Paul's quotations, see Tholuck's Note on p. 543. See also the account of the different expositions of the present passage; for example, the patristic one of Chrysostom, Augustine, and others, that λόγος συντεμνῶν is the gospel as an abridged doctrine of salvation, in antithesis to the elaborateness of the Old Testament).* Luther's translation of the present passage is very inexact,† but it is

ver. 27, is not upon the salvation of the remnant, but upon the fact that only a remnant will be saved. Nor does the remoter context favor such a mitigated view. It is not in accordance with the passage cited from Hosea, nor with ver. 24, still less with vers. 30-33.—R.]

* [Alford seems to include both promise and threatening in λόγος, and makes the object of the citation a confirmation of "the certainty of the salvation of the remnant of Israel, seeing that now, as then, He, with whom a thousand years are as a day, will swiftly accomplish His prophetic word in righteousness."]

As a curious specimen of interpretation, that of Wordsworth is appended: "There seems to be here in the mind of the prophet a contrast between the paucity of the numbers to which the Israelites are to be reduced, and the abundance of righteousness vouchsafed to them. The quantity will be small, but the quality will be good. The LXX. gives a paraphrase (not a literal translation) which embodies this sense, and which is adopted by the Apostle."

† "The word λόγος, as used by them, appears to signify an account or reckoning, and, derivatively, a sum or catalogue of people. The sense, therefore, is: 'Summing up and cutting short the reckoning.' The λόγος is the count or muster-roll of the people. The census of the Israelites will be cut short to a small number, but the smallness of the number will be amply compensated by the righteousness with which God will endue it by virtue of its faith in Christ." A method of exegesis like this compensates for the discovery of so many things not in the text, by omitting so much that is there.—R.]

* [Yet the emphasis, as will appear from the notes on more in harmony with the sense than the more recent explanations.

[Few verses present such a combination of difficulties as this one.

(1.) Critically, the text is in doubt. See *Textual Note*²⁴, where the longer reading of the Rec. is accepted (against such careful critics as Lachmann, Alford, Tregelles).

(2.) The LXX. seems to have departed from the sense of the Hebrew original. Paul varies from the former, but not materially; thus endorsing what is deemed by many an incorrect rendering of the Word of God. Out of this grows the difficult exegetical problem of getting the sense of the Hebrew out of the Greek words (which seems to be Dr. Lange's endeavor), or the equally difficult solution of the strange fact, that an apostle would choose such an altered version of the Hebrew.

(3.) This state of things has encouraged expositors in departing almost at pleasure from the obvious meaning of Paul's words, while it has not led them to adopt the obvious meaning of the words of the prophet. Dr. Lange has chosen an ingenious interpretation, with a view of discovering in the passage a declaration of forbearance on the part of God. It is open to lexical objections (see below), and is not in accordance with the context; since the only verse which intimates a kindred thought is ver. 22, while the immediate connection is rendering the opposite thought very prominent.

The only method which seems fair in dealing with any author when he quotes, is to take it for granted that he quotes wittingly, and then to interpret his citation, making the original passage, especially when used through the medium of a translation, entirely subordinate. The interpretation then becomes a simple exegetical question. What, then, does Paul say here, as his view of the meaning of the prophet's words?

(a.) Λόγος, word, saying. It does not mean work (E. V.). Many render: decree. Doubtless this idea underlies the passage, and is found in the Hebrew, but the Greek word never means this. It is better, then, to render word (i. e., of promise or threatening, probably both—threatening to the mass of the people, promise to the remnant). This is the view of many of the best modern commentators, although they differ as to the precise reference.

(b.) Συντέμνω, συντεμνέτω. The verb (only here in the New Testament) means to cut short, to finish rapidly. It obviously refers to the rapid accomplishment of what God has said. It seems, then, altogether unnecessary to find in the rapid accomplishment of what God says, an indication of something different from what He says—i. e., that this quick fulfilment of wrath is an exhibition of mercy to those who are its objects. This is Dr. Lange's position. Admitting that "in righteousness" includes God's mercy to the chosen remnant, that does not imply "mitigation of judgment" to the apostate mass. Nor is it necessary to find a different meaning for the word in the second clause, though such a variation can be justified. We render, therefore: is cutting short, and cut short, supplying forth (with the present participles; Meyer, and others).

in order to save the remnant. The former thought is the prominent one, as we infer both from the context here, and from the original. The sense of the whole verse then is: He (i. e., the Lord) is finishing and cutting short the word (making it a fact by rapid accomplishment) in righteousness, for a cut-short word (one rapidly accomplished) will the Lord make (execute, render actual) upon the earth. This is, in the main, Meyer's rendering. While the original reference was to the Jews in the times of Isaiah, the Apostle here makes the prophecy of more general validity, referring it to the sad fact that most of the Jews were cut off (so Hodge), though including the other fact, that the remnant should be saved, both sides supporting the general thought of the chapter. Dr. Lange at last comes to nearly the same view. The question then arises, Is this at all in keeping with the words of the prophet himself? A comparison will show that it preserves the spirit of Isaiah's language most fully, and actually conveys to the reader's mind a clearer sense than a literal rendering of the Hebrew would do. Hence he used the LXX., and (as all authors do) inserted such unimportant words as would make its language conform to the use for which he designed it.—R.]

The prophet has uttered a twofold truth in the quotation; first, that only a remnant will be left from the great judgment of destruction, but that this remnant shall be preserved in security. The Apostle, in vers. 27 and 28, has brought into prominence this first feature, but without altogether excluding the second. This latter is proved by the remaining part of his citation.

Ver. 29. And, as Isaiah hath said, or prophesied (Isa. i. 9), &c. καὶ, καθὼς προείρηκεν Ἰσαΐας, κ.τ.λ. We give the pointing of Meyer (a comma after καὶ). The meaning then is: And, as Isaiah has already said (so I appropriate his words), Except, &c. See below, however. If it be objected, that this gives to the verb the unusual sense of prophesy, it will be seen that this is not the necessary meaning of has already said. The introduction of καθὼς calls for some such paraphrase, and the πρό seems to refer to the time of the Apostle, rather than to the place of the last citation. Besides, the propriety of a direct adoption by the Apostle appears both from the use of the first person, and the quasi-prophetic character of the application Paul makes of the passage here.—R.] The explanation: he has already said, namely, in an earlier chapter (Erasmus, Calvin, Grotius, and others), is opposed by Tholuck, and others, with the remark, that such a reference to earlier passages is without an analogy in the Apostle's constant quotation memoriter. Against this explanation, at all events, is the Apostle's design of returning to the fact of the present condition of believing Israel; so that he seems to construe the prophet's declaration chiefly as a typical prophecy. But that passage is immediately more than a description of an existing condition; it is a vision of an immeasurable ruin extending to the future,* as the passage, Isa. vi. 9;

* [Dr. Dreschler remarks on Isa. i. 9 (Der Prophet Jesaja, i. p. 84): "The prophet with a few ground-strokes gathers up the whole future of the people of Israel. He announces a period of judgment as an unavoidable passage-way; then, again, a time of salvation. But the period of judgment comprehends in itself all the judgments then standing without as yet: every visitation, of which history from that time on knows ought, is a proof of this word of prophecy, a fulfilment of it. . . . Just so is the period of salvation conceived as the sum-total of all fulfilment in general,

comp. Matt. xiii. 15; John xii. 39 ff.; Acts xxviii. 26, 27; 2 Cor. iii. xiv. ff. It may be asked, whether we would read καὶ ἔστι καθὼς Ἦσ. &c.: It stands thus, as Isaiah has prophesied, or: And—as Isaiah has prophesied—Except, &c. Meyer defends the latter construction; but we prefer the former, because the Apostle designs to adduce this quoted expression, like the former and the following one, as an expressive prophetic declaration. The term σπέρμα means the κατάλειμμα, as well in its external smallness as in its inward importance for the future. The Septuagint has translated the עֲרֵב of the original text by σπέρμα.* Compare Isa. lrv. 8.

FOURTH PROOF: The correspondence between God's freedom in His government with the freedom of men in their faith or unbelief. The stability of the fact that the Gentiles believe, and Israel, in its popular totality, does not believe (vers. 30-35). Meyer says, on this section: "The Jews themselves bear the guilt of their own exclusion, because they obtained it not by faith, but by works of righteousness, for they were offended at Christ."

[A new chapter should begin here. For, having already stated the objective, Divine ground of the rejection of the Jews, Paul now passes to the subjective or human cause, hinted at frequently before, viz., their unbelief. They were rejected by God, because, in spite of the many warnings of their own prophets, they sought their own righteousness, springing from an external view of the law, and were offended at the promised Messiah, when He actually appeared, instead of seeking salvation through vital faith in the grace of God in Christ. This mode of view, which is carried out further in chap. x., solves in part the enigma of the preceding discussion; yet it cannot be denied that, in the Divine predestination, there ever remains an obscure background, which reason is not in a condition to fully comprehend, and should humbly adore.—P. S.]

Ver. 30. What shall we say then? [Τί οὖν ἐροῦμεν; Precisely as in ver. 14, where it introduces an objection.—R.] We may ask, whether the Apostle again uses this expression here in order to avoid a false conclusion, or whether he merely "deduces the historical result from the foregoing prophecies" (Meyer).† Evidently, this passage is a turning-point of the greatest importance. The Apostle has heretofore described God's freedom, and finally His freedom even in rejecting the greater part of Israel in contrast to His call of the Gentiles, and has strengthened his declaration by appealing to the prophecy of the Old Testament. This is now the place where this question arises: From all this, does there not follow fatalism, or a simple absolute authority of Divine freedom? He does not absolutely express this false conclusion, in order to make short work of it by a μή γένοιτο, because he has really anticipated it already. But he actually removes it. The Gentiles have not first attained to salvation from an exercise of absolute authority; they have attained to righteousness, the righteousness of faith, which can only be obtained from the source of righteousness.

Some expositors (Pelagius, Cyril, Theodore of Mopsvestia, Flatt, Olshausen) have not understood the expression from ὅτι τοῖς Ἰουδαίοις as an answer, but as the real import and continuation of the pending question, under different modifications (ὅτι as because, that, somehow that). This is opposed by the following: 1. The statement in vers. 30 and 31 can by no means be regarded as a summary of the foregoing; 2. It has not been at all present as yet in this definite deduction of the antithesis. It contains something new, which only arises as a conclusion from what has preceded. Chrysostom says that this passage is the σαφιστάτη λύσις of the chapter. Baur, and others: The Apostle here first becomes conscious of the subjective point of view. Tholuck, correcting this view, says that the Apostle here first brings it out to prominence. On the discussions of the Predestinarians and the Remonstrants concerning the τί οὖν ἐροῦμεν, see Tholuck, p. 546.

That the Gentiles. Ἐθνη; not merely Gentiles. [Against Meyer, who says: "Not the Gentiles as a whole. On the Gentile side was righteousness," &c.—R.]

Who were not following after righteousness, attained. Τὰ μή διώκ. The Apostle uses the διώκειν with especial reference to the races (see Meyer on Phil. iii. 12, 14), and thus καταλαμβ. means not merely the reaching, but also grasping; in this case it is especially the grasping of the prize (see 1 Cor. ix. 24). This constitutes a double antithetical oxymoron. The Gentiles did not run after righteousness, and yet even they grasped righteousness at the goal of the race-course.* But the Jews, who ran, or so far as they were runners after the law of righteousness, never reached the proper terminal point of the race—the well-understood law. The Apostle does not design to say that the Gentiles in general had known no higher pursuit; for he has already referred to the Gentiles in his expression concerning preparatory grace: ἡ προητοιμασία ἐν δόξῃ.† But the Gentiles were not only not companions with the Jews in the course in which the latter ran after the law of righteousness; righteousness, as an explicit moral law, was not the fundamental idea of their pursuit (although it constituted the unity of the platonic virtues). The Greek struggled for ideality, or wisdom, while the Roman struggled for an innocent legal order, or for power. Thus it came that they did not run astray by looking at an analytical phantom of righteousness, like the majority of the Jews; and hence that they could be subjected (that is, for a preliminary condition of faith) to the curse of their ideals, to a profound despair in themselves and in the glory since the complete realization of all God's promises will bring what will still all the longing and the thirsting of the human heart from thenceforth and forever.—P. S.]

† [Alford answers thus: "This question, when followed by a question, implies, of course, a rejection of the thought thus suggested; but when, as here, by an assertion, introduces a further unfolding of the argument from what has preceded." What follows is not a question. See below.—R.]

* (It seems best (with Meyer) to consider righteousness as used, in this part of our verse, without special reference to the Christian standpoint. Dr. Hodge really advocates this view, but is hampered in reaching it by the limited meaning he places upon the word as used by Paul. Stuart renders law, justification in each case, which is altogether untenable. See p. 74 ff., &c.—R.)

† [See ver. 23. It is doubtful whether such preparation as is there referred to, includes, in any sense, the propaedeutic relation of the Gentile world to Christianity, however extensive that relation was.—R.]

of the world (see chap. iv.; Acts xvi. 9; Rom. ix. 27-30).*

Even the righteousness which is of faith [δικαιοσύνην δέ, κ.τ.λ. That is, precisely the true righteousness. On the delicate meaning of δέ, see Alford in loco; Winer, p. 412.—R.]

Ver. 31. But Israel, following after the law of righteousness, attained not to the law [Ἰσραὴλ δὲ διώκων νόμον δικαιοσύνης, εἰς νόμον οὐκ ἔφθασεν. On the reading, see Textual Note ²⁰, and below.—R.] It is not: the righteousness of the law, but, more strongly: the law of righteousness. This would mean, in the figure of the race, that Israel has by no means advanced so far as to run after righteousness itself; the programme of the race became its goal; in striving after an endless analysis of the law, it has run astray in statutes of external legality. Therefore it has come to pass that it has not reached νόμος in its truth—that is, in its real inward character—and that, after all its running, it has never attained to the true beginning, the principle of the running. This antithesis is in harmony with the subject-matter (see Rom. vii. 7 ff.), and is much stronger than if the Apostle had said: It has not attained to the law of the righteousness of faith, which would be self-evident; or even if he had said: It has not attained to the righteousness of the law according to the letter—which charge he could not bring against them. Therefore we prefer the reading of Codd. A. B. D., given in the text. [The briefer reading is quite well supported, and certainly, when rightly understood, adds to the force of the passage. They did not even attain to the law. Comp. Alford in loco.—R.] It hardly needs to be called to mind, that the question here is relatively concerning the Gentiles and Israel; that is, concerning the antithesis between the believing Gentile world and unbelieving Israel. This limitation in reference to Israel lies in the διώκων νόμον.

The law of righteousness. The expression has been regarded by many as an exchange for δικαιοσύνην νόμον (Chrysostom, Calvin, Bengel, and others). Undoubtedly this was the basis of the effort of the Jews, but their real following extended, in Pharisaism, far beyond, to the amplification of the law into an endless series of ordinances. The view: The justifying law (Meyer), obscures the strong emphasis of the νόμος itself, when this νόμος is subsequently explained thus: "The law was an ideal, whose realization the Israelites strove to experience by their legalness." Comp. chap. ii. 17-24. The theoretical, legal orthodoxy of the Jews was the perfect development of their righteousness of works, according, also, to the Epistle of James.†

Most of the early expositors (Chrysostom, Theodoret, and others) hold that Paul meant the Mosaic law in both cases in ver. 31. Others, on the contrary (Theodore of Mopsvestia, Bengel, and De Wette [Hodge]), have understood, by the second law, the Christian δικαιοσύνην. These two constructions are opposed not only by the διώκων (Meyer: it does not express the effort to fulfil the law, but to possess the law), but also by the consideration that a true following after the Mosaic law—that is, after its fulfilment—must not only lead to it, but even to Christianity (see chap. vii.). Tholuck (with Calovius, Philippi, and others) takes νόμος in the wider sense, as via, disciplina of righteousness: "They strove for the means which furnished justification." But this striving, construed in a general sense, cannot be regarded as fruitless. The law, in the former case, can only mean their illusive image of the law, according to which the law, in its external shape, should become to them a real means of justification, and would in reality be made this means; * but, in the second place, it is the Mosaic law in its truth, and in that inward tendency by which it became the schoolmaster which led them to Christ.

Ver. 32. Wherefore? [διὰ τί;] The failure to attain to the law.

Because they sought it not by faith [οὐκ ἐκ πίστεως. The E. V. properly supplies sought it]. As the proper observance of the law leads to saving faith, so does it proceed from a germ of faith, which is shown by Abraham's historical precedence of Moses. Faith is the inward relation of confidence and obedience to God's Word; only the Spirit in the law gives to the legal striving, which is a preparatory school to the gospel, its proper direction.

But as by works [ἀλλ' ὡς ἐξ ἔργων. On ὡς, comp. Winer, p. 573. Alford: "as 'if about to obtain their object' by." See Textual Note ²⁰.—R.] Meyer correctly maintains that the ὡς is not redundant—as Koppe holds—and that it does not indicate hypocrisy, according to Theophylact; but Meyer is incorrect in opposing Fritzsche's construction, presumed works, with this explanation: As a διώκων proceeding from works is constituted. His ground is, that the Jews really set out from the works of the law, but not simply from true works (see chap. x. 3).† A pointed ἐξ ἔργων must correspond to the pointed ἐκ πίστεως, which former can then be only an ὡς ἐξ ἔργων. In their seeking, they proceeded on the supposition of having one treasure of good works, and they continually piled law upon law, in order to become richer in such works. In short, the starting-point, but not the διώκων, should be emphasized as fundamentally false.

For they stumbled [προσέκλιναν γάρ. On the rendering, should γάρ be rejected, see Textual Note ²⁰. Meyer, however, opposes this connection, though rejecting γάρ. The figure of a race, if not prominent here, seems at least to have suggested the "stumbling."—R.] To what does for refer? First of all, it presents the proof that the Jews did not stand in the direction of faith, but in the illusion of the righteousness of works. Then this proves indirectly, also, the principal statement

* [On this thought, see especially Griechenthum und Christenthum, by Dr. G. C. Selbert, 1837, referred to in the General Introd. Matthew, p. 6. The author is now a pastor in Newark, N. J.—R.]

† [Dr. Hodge seems to prefer the following view: "The word law may be redundant, and Paul may mean to say nothing more than that the Jews sought righteousness, or justification, but did not attain it." This, no doubt, is the substance, though it may not be the precise form of the thought." This is but avoiding an interpretation, and in a way which the learned commentator would deem unjustifiable if applied to less sacred forms than those written by an Apostle.—R.]

† [The word as transfers the matter to the sphere of subjective fancy, and expresses this: that the Jews imagined they were doing the works of the law, but did not really do them, according to the deeper sense and spirit in which the law should be apprehended. Comp. Isa. lviii. 2-Phil. iii. 9.—P. 8.]

as vers. 30 and 31. But the full strength of the proof lies in the fact that they have come to shame at the touchstone of the true Israelites, which made a distinction between those who trusted (that is, believers) on the stone laid by Jehovah, and those who stumbled—that is, who were defective in faith because of their presumed righteousness of works.

At that stone of stumbling [τῷ λίθῳ τοῦ προσκόμματος]. (Isa. viii. 14; xxviii. 16; Luke ii. 34; 1 Cor. i. 23; 1 Peter ii. 6-8). The Jews, in their hypocrisy, have been offended first of all at the unworldly spirituality, the penal office, the independence, and the spiritual freedom of Christ (see Matt. iv. 1 ff; John ii. 18; iv. 1; v. 9 ff.), and then, in their claim to the reward of universal Messianic glory, at His poor appearance, His renunciation, His love of sinners, and His suffering and death on the cross. In their running, they ran all the more violently against the stone, because they were just then engaged in their strongest running. The Apostle proves that this fact also is represented beforehand in the Old Testament. He here freely connects the passages in Isa. viii. 14; xxviii. 16, into one prophecy, in which he follows the original text in preference to the LXX. According to Isa. viii. 14, Jehovah himself assuredly becomes a stone of stumbling to both houses of Israel; but it is Jehovah who has now concealed His face, in order to declare himself in future to those who patiently wait for Him (see Isa. viii. 17; ix. 7). But that, in chap. xxviii. 16, only the ideal theocracy of the Old Testament sphere is meant, seems very doubtful. The ideal theocracy of the Old Testament is properly defined as the growth of the New Testament kingdom of God. Now, if a corner-stone for this is laid in Zion, it must nevertheless be the foundation of the "ideal theocracy," and not the whole ideal theocracy itself, or even this ideal theocracy apart from its foundation. Likewise, the collective corner-stone in Zion (ver. 16) constitutes a grand antithesis to the Jewish dissolution of God's Word into a ruined diversity (ver. 13), and it stands in connection with the judgment, from which the ἐπὶ ὁλίμῃ appears. Therefore Paul and Peter had a perfect right to regard this passage as more than a typical prophecy.

Ver. 33. [As it is written, Behold, I lay in Zion a stone of stumbling, &c. The "stone of stumbling and rock of offence" (σκανδάλον; LXX: πτόμας) is taken from Isa. viii. 14, and substituted for the "corner-stone," &c., of chap. xxviii. 16. Both passages were interpreted by the Jews as referring to the Messiah. Comp. Luke ii. 34; 1 Peter ii. 6-8. The combination is therefore both justifiable and natural.—He who believeth on him, καὶ ὁ πιστεύων ἐπ' αὐτῷ. Πᾶς, which is found in chap. x. 11, is omitted here (see Textual Note). The emphasis there is on πᾶς; here, on πιστεύων, in antithesis to ver. 32.—R.]

Shall not be put to shame, κατασχυνθήσεται. The original word חָשַׁתָּ [make haste; Genesis: haste hastily.—R.] is here given as an explanation, after the precedence of the Septuagint [κατασχυνθήσεται, from which Paul varies, as above].

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

[The Literature on the Doctrinal questions involved in this chapter really includes all works on systematic theology, all confessions since the times of the Reformers, together with a large proportion of modern psychological and ethical treatises. The larger commentaries, especially those of Hodge, Stuart, Tholuck, Philippi, Meyer, Haldane, Wordsworth, Jowett, and Forbes, are very full on the predestinarian question. The literature of the Arminian controversy (much of which is enumerated in the Homiletical Notes on chap. viii.) bears on this subject. (Comp. lists, Introd. p. 31, v. 12-21, p. 191.) We may mention further: AUGUSTINE, De libero arbitrio; ANSELM, De libero arbitrio; also, De casu Diaboli. The works of CALVIN, ARMINIUS, EPISCOPUS, PRIMS, EDWARDS, An Inquiry into the Freedom of the Will (in numberless editions; necessarian in its conclusions, and more commented upon than any work in this department of thought). COLERIDGE, Aids to Reflection (latter part; his views have done much to mould thought in England and America). The Canons of the Synod of Dort give the strongest Calvinistic statements. A list of important controversial works is given by Tholuck (pp. 466, 467). The philosophical works which discuss the subject in its ontological aspects cannot be enumerated, but the names of SIR WM. HAMMILLTON, J. S. MILL, MANSEL, BAIR, TAPPAN, MCCOY, readily suggest themselves to the American reader. The latest monograph, published in America, is by G. S. BISHOP (Newburgh, N. Y.), Reprobation (a sermon on ver. 22), New York, 1869.—R.]

1. In regard to the copious, and, in many respects, mysterious contents of this chapter, we must refer principally to the Exeg. Notes, where we have anticipated many points. We would also refer to the history of the exposition of this chapter, and especially to the monographs bearing on the subject, mentioned above. The real difficulties which the chapter presents have been greatly increased by attempts at its exegesis. This has occurred, first, in consequence of the little account that has been taken of the connection, the immediate relation of this chapter to Israel, and the judgment of hardening on Israel; and because there has not been an effort made to explain with sufficient clearness, according to the analogy of Scripture, the nature of the judgment of hardening, or sin in its third potency. A second cause of difficulty has been the confusion of the antitheses of the Apostle with the antitheses of the history of doctrines—of Augustine and Pelagius, or Calvin and the Catholic righteousness of works, or even the doctrine of the Remonstrants. A third source of difficulty has been a failure to use aright the key to this chapter in the passage, chap. viii. 29, 30, and a disposition rather to accept a contradiction between Rom. ix. 7-29 and chaps. ix. 30-xi. 36, than to accommodate the former part of the whole section to the latter.

2. In the division and headings we have already given the connection between the whole of this section and the former chapters. The fundamental thought is, the antithesis of sin and grace in its three potencies.

First antithesis: The actual corruption of the whole world, and therefore no conceivable righteousness of works; in contrast with this is the saving and preponderating righteousness of faith, which is prepared by the heartiness of conduct toward the law, in antithesis to external legality (chaps. i. 18-v. 11).

Second antithesis: The corruption of human nature, the hereditary character of liability to sin and of the judgment of death, in which the whole creature-sphere of humanity is subject to vanity and corruption; but Christ as the preponderating principle of the new birth and of the glorification of man, of humanity and its sphere, stands in contrast with the Adamic principle. This principle is operative from the standpoint of a watchful spiritual life, which abnegates the old carnal propensity, in order to lead to resurrection a new embryonic life of consecrated corporeality, in antithesis to the life in the stability of the flesh to death, to which the external legality also belongs (chap. v. 12-viii. 39).

Third antithesis: The corruption of the religious people, the noble people of humanity, and of the manifested form of their theocracy, in the judgment of historical hardening, in consequence of their false reliance on natural descent, historical privileges, and the righteousness of a practice of legalism. In contrast with this, on the other hand, is the freedom of Divine grace in its election, ordination, and call, which, as election distinguishes persons, as ordination shows mercy and hardens, and as a call makes the judgment of hardening first of all a means for the advancement of the call to salvation, and finally cuts itself short and is turned in another direction by the historical exercise of compassion. On both sides it is conditional, in consequence of the antithesis of pride and humility (chaps. ix-xi.)

8. The construction of the chapter. The Apostle's first prologue (vers. 1-5). An apology for his painful duty to pronounce clearly the decisive declaration on the rejection of the majority of Israel; or, if we may so speak, to sum up all the individual experiences and Divine judgments relating to this fall. At the same time, he pronounces an elegy on the fall of his glorious people of God, on the retributive rejection of the old hereditary people of God, in antithesis to the realization of the glorious inheritance of God's children (chap. viii.), with the declaration of his patriotic and tragical feeling (increased and become to him a "thorn in the flesh" by its ruin with the direction which the Jews had taken, and by the hatred with which they opposed his love)—an analogue to David's elegy on the fall of Jonathan, Jeremiah's Lamentations, and similar laments in the Old Testament. But he finally gives expression also to a doxology in regard to the victorious exercise of the authority of the God of revelation on Israel, as well in its ancient history as in its New Testament fulfilment in Christ, whose glorification predominates over the division between believing and unbelieving Israel. The theme: The rejection of the majority of the members of the Israelitish people is not an abrogation of the promise to the theocratic Israel itself (ver. 8).

First proof (from the time of the patriarchs): The fact of election. The election is not made conditional by descent, nor by heirship, nor by birth-right, nor by works; it is God's free exercise of love in the predetermination of an individual and personal nature, which is only self-conditioned by the organic relation to Christ and to each other into which the elect individuals shall enter, and by the promise made to them, in which the thought of love, which shall appear in future conceptions and births, is already reflected. It unites in the relative antithesis (Jacob and Esau) the infinitely great difference in the qualifications of persons for God's kingdom, but not the absolute antithesis of salvation and condemnation (vers. 6-13).—[The doctrine of the predetermination of a part of the human race to eternal perdition by no means follows from the statements of these verses. Even Calvin himself calls the decree of reprobation "horrible" (decretum horribile, atamen verum), and it is opposed to those passages of the Scriptures according to which God wills not the death of the sinner, but that he might turn unto Him and live. (1.) The Apostle is not treating here at all of eternal perdition and eternal blessedness, but of a temporal preference and disfavor of nations in the gradual historical development of the plan of redemption, which will finally include all (chap. xi. 25, 32), and hence the descendants of Esau, who stand figuratively for all the Gentiles (Amos ix. 11, 12; Obad. 18-21). On this account we may well say, with Bengel: "Not all Israelites are saved, nor all Edomites lost." (2.) The hate of God toward Esau and his race cannot be sundered from their evil life, their obduracy against God and enmity to His people. It is true, ver. 11 (with, however, ver. 13, does not stand so closely connected as ver. 12) seems to represent not only the love of God, but His hatred as transferred even into the mother's womb. But it must not be forgotten that, to the omniscient One, there is no distinction of time, and all the future is to Him present. Besides, an essential distinction must be made between the relation of God to good and evil, to avoid unscriptural error. God loves the good, because He produces the very good that is in them; and He elects them, not on account of their faith and their holiness, but to faith and holiness. But it cannot be said, on the other hand, that He hates the evil men because He produces the very evil that is in them; for that would be absurd, and destroy His holiness; but He hates them on account of the evil that they do or will do in opposition to His will. While human goodness is the effect of Divine love and grace, on the contrary, human wickedness is the cause of Divine hatred and abhorrence; and on that account alone can it be the object of the punitive wrath and condemnatory decree of God. Were evil the effect of His own agency, He would be obliged to condemn himself—which is irrational and blasphemous.—P. S.]

Second proof (from the time of the giving of the law): The fact of ordination. The predetermination of the historical train of development of persons is the free exercise of God's (Jehovah's) righteousness on persons. It is not made conditional on a self-volitional human willing and running; but it conditions itself by its consequence in relation to a definite human course of conduct, by further showing mercy on him to whom mercy has once been shown, and allowing all his experiences to contribute to his salvation, and, by its influence and long-suffering, leading him who has once hardened himself to the judgment of hardening. In the infinitely vast antithesis between the one to whom mercy has been shown and the hardened one (Moses and Pharaoh), it constitutes the perspective of the antithesis of a final glorification and rejection, but not yet this antithesis—i. e., the final judgment itself (vers. 14-18).

Third proof (from the time of the development of Israel of the Old Testament):

a. The fact of the call. The free exercise of Divine wisdom on the πίψαμα, or the spiritual, plastic material of the ancient world, and especially on Israel. This exercise is not made conditional on the historical Israel's claims to inheritance, and had the right to make of Israel, as it had become, vessels unto honor and unto dishonor, by a universal Christianization. But the call makes itself conditional by the actual state, in which it still endures with much long-suffering the existing vessels of wrath, which are already fitted to destruction, that, by their existence and opposition, the full display of God's glory, of His spiritual revelation in Christ, may be made known on the vessels of mercy. It thereby constitutes the economic antithesis of hardening in the New Testament, and of the historical judicial curse on the great mass of Israel, and of an opposing immeasurable display of the glory of its exercise of mercy in the Gentile world. But this antithesis, as we shall further perceive, does not preclude the possibility of mercy on individual Jews, and of the rejection of individual Gentiles (vers. 19-24).

6. The proof of this freedom of the Divine call from the Old Testament. First, the equalization of Jews and Gentiles in their rejection is prophesied by Hosea (ver. 25). Second, the equalization of Gentiles and Jews in the mercy shown to the latter (ver. 26). Likewise, Isaiah has prophesied, first, the reduction of the great mass of Israel to a small remnant, who shall be saved from the judgment (ver. 27); but second, the certainty that such a remnant shall arise from a judgment cut short by righteous mildness (vers. 28, 29).

Fourth proof: The correspondence of the exercise of Divine authority on Jews and Gentiles, with their ethical conduct, or with the antithesis of faith and unbelief. The conclusion from the whole chapter, as drawn by the spirit of the Apostle (vers. 30-33).

[4. This chapter cannot be fairly explained or properly honored without a recognition of the profound truth which lies at the foundation of the doctrine of election, viz., the free, unconditioned grace of God. Those expositors who would limit the sovereignty of the Divine will by human freedom, and deduce salvation more or less from the creature, must do great violence to the text if they make it accord with their systems. Yet we must guard against the opposite extreme of supralapsarianism, which, with fearful logical consistency, makes God the author of the fall of Adam, hence of sin; thus really denying both God's holiness and love and man's accountability, to the ultimate extinguishment of all morality. Many, indeed, have held this view, whose lives, by a happy inconsistency, were far better than their theories. They arrived at this extreme position through a one-sided explanation of this passage, and through the logical consequence of their conception of the sovereignty of God's all-determining will. But if we would not have the Bible prove any thing man wishes, we must interpret single passages in their connection with the whole, and according to the analogy of faith. In the early part of this Epistle (chap. i. 18; iii. 30), Paul unequivocally declares that God is not the author, but the enemy and judge of evil; how, then, can he here affirm a specific Divine foreordination of sin and perdition? In chap. v. 12 ff. he shows that redemption through Christ, as to its indwelling power and purpose, is fully as comprehensive as the fall of Adam. With this agree many passages, which speak of God's sincere will to save all men, and of a general call, extended not at once, but gradually, to all (Ezek. xxxiii. 11; 1 Tim. ii. 4; Titus ii. 11; 2 Peter iii. 9). Accordingly, Paul must have in mind here such a general reprobation, as is either a self-incurred result of unbelief, or only a negative preparation for the extension of the plan of salvation, which it therefore ultimately furthers. Besides, in chap. x. the casting away of the Jews is attributed to their own unbelief, hence to the personal guilt of the creature; and in chap. xi. the rejection is represented as temporary. In God's grace decree, the fall of the Jews redounds to the blessing of the Gentiles, and the conversion of the Gentiles ultimately to the salvation of the Jews. So He has permitted the fall of Adam, in order to redeem humanity in Christ, the second

Adam (ver. 12 ff.); He has included all under His obedience, that He might have mercy upon all (chap. xi. 32; comp. Gal. iii. 22). But the salvation can become actual only gradually; and the gradual redemption of all (not all as individuals, but the mass in an organic, not a numerical sense) presupposes the temporary rejection of some.

The Scriptures teach, on the one hand, the absolute causality and unconditioned grace of God. and, on the other, the moral nature of man, including also his relative freedom and his responsibility (i. e., human personality). They ascribe redemption and sanctification, as well as the creation and maintenance of all things, to God alone. He works both to will and to do of His good pleasure (Phil. ii. 13); no man cometh to the Son, except the Father draw him (John vi. 37, 44); without the Son, believers can do nothing (John xv. 5). Not only the beginning, but also the progress and completion of conversion, are attributed to God (Jer. xxxi. 18; Heb. xii. 2; Luke xxii. 32; Eph. ii. 10; 1 Cor. iv. 7; 2 Thess. iii. 2; 1 John v. 4). Hence all believers confess, with Paul: "By the grace of God I am what I am" (1 Cor. xv. 10), and ascribe all the honor and glory to the Lord alone (2 Cor. x. 17). Indeed, even evil, as a phenomenon, and according to its material forces, cannot be excluded from the absolute activity of God. He hardens Pharaoh and raises up Nebuchadnezzar; He creates the light and the darkness; He gives peace and effects evil (Isa. xlv. 7); and there is no evil (misfortune) in the city, that the Lord has not done (Amos iii. 6).—On the other hand, however, the Scriptures never treat of man as a mere machine, but as a moral being. They hold up before him, in the Old Testament, laws, with the promise of blessing if he obeys, and the threat of a curse if he transgresses; they offer him, in the New Testament, the gospel, baptism, faith; bid him, with fear and trembling, work out his own salvation (Phil. ii. 12); present to him the highest moral duties as commands: Be ye holy, be ye perfect; and account sin and the rejection of salvation as his own personal fault. "How often would I have gathered you, as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not" (Matt. xxiii. 27; Luke xiii. 34)."

* [Forbes thus lays down the fundamental truths on this difficult subject:

"All good originates from God.

All evil originates from the creature.

Election originates in the free grace of God.

Reprobation originates in the free-will of man.

To God belongs the whole glory of the salvation of the Elect.

To man belongs the whole responsibility of the ruin of the Reprobate."

See his Dissertation, pp. 380-475.

That these positions are not reconcilable by human logic, is evident from the discussions on the subject; but this cannot, of itself, disprove their truth. It is the old and ever-recurring mystery of the origin of evil. Forbes seeks to prove that these positions are compatible with the doctrinal statements of the Westminster Assembly. Those who wish the sharpest predestinarian views, may find them in Haldane's notes on this chapter. The Synod of Dort, which is considered by many the representative of hyper-Calvinism, only goes thus far in speaking of the reprobates: "Whom God, out of His sovereign, most just, irreprehensible and unchangeable good pleasure, hath decreed to leave in the common misery into which they have wilfully plunged themselves, and not to bestow upon them saving faith and the grace of conversion; but permitting them, in His just judgment, to follow their own way, at last for the declaration of His justice, to condemn and punish them forever, not only on account of their unbelief, but also for their

If the first truth respecting the absolute, creative causality of God in the works of creation, redemption, and sanctification be denied, we fall into the Pelagian error, which destroys the very marrow of Christianity, and attributes salvation to the creature; but if the second class of Scripture texts be denied or wrested, we are brought to the brink of the abyss of fatalism or Pantheism; man is degraded into a mere instrument without a will, and his responsibility, guilt, and punishment abrogated. The task of theology consists, not in the establishment of one of these postulates at the expense of the other, but in reconciling both, and bringing into right relations with each other the infinite and finite causality; in loosing, not in cutting the gordian knot. This is, indeed, one of the greatest and most difficult problems, which can never be fully solved from the standpoint of earthly knowledge. Only after the accomplished victory over evil can the deep, dark enigma of evil, which forms the main difficulty in the problem, be fully solved.*

For practical and popular use, the following remarks will suffice:

(1.) There is an eternal predestination of believers unto holiness and blessedness, and hence they must ascribe all the glory of their redemption, from beginning to end, to the unmerited grace of God alone.

(2.) They do not, however, on this account cease to be free agents, responsible for all their doings; but, as God works in nature not magically and immediately, but through natural laws, so He works in men, through their wills, hence through the mediation of finite causes; and the more that grace is developed within them, so much the more is their true freedom developed; so that perfect holiness and perfect freedom coincide with each other. Accordingly, the highest freedom is the complete triumph over the evil, and is consequently identical with the moral necessity of the good. In this sense, God is free just because He is absolutely holy.

(3.) There is no Divine foreordination of sin as sin, although He has foreseen it from all eternity, and, other sins. And this is the decree of reprobation which by no means makes God the author of sin (the very thought of which is blasphemy), but declares Him to be an awful, irreprehensible, and righteous judge and avenger" (Canon I, Art. xv.). This is as far as any ought to go, but it is by no means a reconciliation of the two sides of revealed truth, or an attempt at it.—R.]

* A few scholæ may be added here: 1. The relation of scientific theology to revealed truth, is that of science in general to the truth it seeks to systematize. Hence theology has unsolved problems, and these furnish the stimulus to further investigation. 2. Theology is not to be considered untrustworthy in its settlement of great questions, because some remain unsolved, nor can the failure of its attempts at solution invalidate either the positions already won, or the separate truths which it has not yet reduced to a system. 3. The modesty of true science has a place in theological discussion. If theologians claim that their attempt at the solution of such a problem as that presented in this chapter is the only one that should be made, the objector may feel that, in successfully opposing that view, he has overthrown the truth itself. 4. The problem is one that is ontological as well as theological, and hence cannot be escaped by rejecting revelation. Atheism avoids it solely by negation, pantheism by opposing the testimony of our own consciousness. Whoever believes in a personal God and his own personality, is confronted with it. The safer position for a child of God to take is that which leaves the difficulty where the greatest glory is ascribed to God. History shows that those who thus acted were not the least concerned to live under the fullest sense of their accountability. The Christian life is thus far the only solution of this great problem; a mystery which is practically reconciled only by one yet greater, the mystery of godliness, God manifest in the flesh.—R.]

with respect to redemption, permitted it, while constantly overruling it to His purposes. Hence, those who are lost are lost through their own fault, and must blame their own unbelief, which rejects the means of salvation proffered them by God.

(4.) In the time of the calling of nations and individuals to salvation, God proceeds according to a plan of eternal wisdom and love, which we cannot fathom here, but should adore in silent reverence.

(5.) The right use of the doctrine of election is the humbling of sinners and the comforting of believers, as well as the increase of their gratitude and happiness. Only a culpable misunderstanding and misuse of it can lead to carnal security and to despair.

(6.) Instead of meditating much upon the profound depths of the Divine decrees, it is better for each to make his own calling and election sure, and, with fear and trembling, to work out his own salvation.—P. S.]

5. The forbearance and confidence with which the Apostle pronounces his opinion on the fall of Israel, his patriotic and truly human pain (2 Cor. xii. 7-9), and his prophetic elevation above it, reaching to sublimity, are characteristics of this wonderful man of God.

6. Israel's glory is revealed in the correspondence of its great actual blessings with its chosen individuals. The line of actual saving blessings enters into reciprocal operation with the personal line of the fathers down to Christ according to the flesh, the climax in which divinity and humanity unite. Its foundation is Israel's adoption, in Abraham, to sonship. On this there is founded, first, the patriarchal antithesis of the doğa or of the revealing angel of Jehovah, and of the covenants, in which the evangelical element is properly placed in advance of the legal element, conformably to the character of the patriarchal revealed religion; then comes the antithesis of the Mosaic period, of the gift of the law, and of the services; and here, in conformity with the character of the legal economy, the legal element precedes the evangelical. Both the patriarchal and Mosaic economies then comprise each other, just as the evangelical and legal elements are comprised in the promises of the prophetic period. It has already been remarked that, notwithstanding this articulation, each particular of the attributes mentioned is peculiar in a more general sense to the entire theocracy.

7. Careful attention must be paid to the fact that, in the election in vers. 6-13, the communication of the Divine decree precedes the birth of the children. But, on the other hand, in the ordination in vers. 14-18, it applies to characters already existing—Moses and Pharaoh—in accordance with the direction which they have taken themselves. In the call in vers. 19-24, this communication finally follows the state of the case already existing: Vessels of wrath, vessels of mercy. From the whole of this section, chaps. ix-xi, it follows that the decrees underlying these communications belong also to eternity. But they belong to eternity as decrees which are conditioned upon individual conduct, as God universally conditions himself in the measure which He adopts in reference to persons to be determined or already determined, and their personal relations. The decree of election (or of love) takes cognizance of no other condition than that the single individual must be defined according to the organization of the members of God's kingdom in Christ.

The decree of ordination (or of righteousness) is conditioned by the fact that individuals, in their free self-determination, need, both for themselves and for their relation to the whole body, their historical designation and special guidance. The decree of the call (or of wisdom) is conditioned by the fact that it makes the judgments pronounced on unbelief itself means for subserving the promotion of faith. The distinction of the elder theology, decretum redestinationis, decretum gratiæ, decretum justificationis, has confused election and ordination—which has generally been the case from Augustine's time down to the present. This distinction has likewise overlooked the fact that the decretum gratiæ constitutes the very centre of the decretum predestinationis (Christ ὁ ἰσχυρέως, Acts x. 42; Rom. i. 4). The decretum justificationis is most intimately connected with the decree respecting the vocatio.

8. We have elsewhere brought out the truth, that the wonderful flower of the biblical doctrine of election, like the aloe, has been long concealed, yet with its character determined, in the sharp thistle of the ecclesiastical doctrine of predestination; and that it is a duty of our day to acquire, with its full idea, the whole depth and glory of the biblical doctrine of personality; but not to seek to weaken and render indifferent, by the old Lutheran or Arminian-Reformed definitions, the solution of an enigma to whose real solution every living distinction of individuals contributes, more than a scholastic hatching of confessional antitheses can do. In this respect, Lavater's Physiognomy may be regarded as an explanatory enlargement upon Calvin and Zwingli. The mystery of predestination, like that of the atonement, and every other Christian mystery, is reflected in the midst of life.

17. Ver. 15. On the idea of consistency in the name of Jehovah, as well in His having compassion as in judging, see the Exeg. Notes. It is in harmony with the righteousness of Jehovah's exercise of authority, that even the judgment of death redounds to the life of the sincere and compassionate one; while the gospel, on the other hand, is a savor of death unto death to the perverse and unbelieving. But the consistency of Jehovah does not lie in His carrying out the abstract decrees of His own will, inflexibly and in an exact direction, but in His remaining like himself, and therefore in His even assuming a different position in relation to the changed positions of man; yet this is, of course, in harmony with the consistency of the principles established and realized by Him. Therefore, there is propriety in speaking of a Divine repentance—for example, in the history of the Flood. The position of mankind toward God has become so thoroughly perverted, that the Creator must become the Destroyer. Comp. Ps. xviii. 24-27.

18. On the Egyptians' remembrance of the Pharaoh under whom Israel went forth, see the article Egypten, by Lepsius, in Herzog's Theol. Encyc., and Tholuck, p. 516. On the hardenings of Pharaoh especially, see Exod. iv. 21. Since the judgment of hardness is here declared collectively, the passage does not decide on the succession of the particular ones. The same applies to chap. vii. 8. Then the particular historical ones follow. First, Pharaoh is hardened by the counteraction of the magicians (chap. vii. 13, 22). A significant illustration of the free volition of Pharaoh in the latter case; see chap. vii. 23. In chap. viii. 15 we read: "Pharaoh hardened his heart, and hearkened not unto them." And now his heart becomes hardened, even in spite of the warning of the terrified magicians; chap. viii. 19. Again, in chap. viii. 32: "And Pharaoh hardened his heart." We read the same thing in chap. ix. 7. But in chap. ix. 12 we read: "And the Lord hardened the heart of Pharaoh." In chap. ix. 34, on the other hand, we again meet with self-hardening, which is then designated as a judgment; ver. 35. In chap. x. 27, the Lord again hardens him. The same occurs in chap. xi. 10; xiv. 8.

As regards this whole series of particulars, the atomistic exegesis of earlier times led to its being regarded as fatalistic. But we must, in the first place, distinguish the prophetic declarations of the judgment of hardening as general views of the whole course of events, from the historical particulars. As for the historical particulars, we must always be very careful to notice that the hardening is not a single act, but a long succession of acts, which succeed momentary shocks and apparent awakenings. But the periods of hardening themselves are divided into three particular acts: 1. Pharaoh is hardened by the magicians; 2. He hardens himself; 3. The Lord hardens him. We must further consider, that he always hardens himself just as soon as he has recovered a little from the penal judgments. But the series of his expressions of penitence must be regarded as arising particularly from fear (attritio, not contritio). Pharaoh's starting-point is the defiant question: Who is the Lord? chap. v. 2. Then he requires a miraculous proof: chap. vii. 7-10. He does not take the first plague to heart, because the magicians do likewise; chap. vii. 22, 23. The first shock and its characteristic expression; chap. viii. 8. Similar emotion; ver. 28. The first confession of sin; chap. ix. 27, 28. The second, chap. x. 16. It is characteristic that Pharaoh pays least attention to the plagues that least affect him and his house. This may be seen in the first and third plagues; but he observes with more attention, on the other hand, the second and fourth, which rest heavily upon himself. He does not trouble himself about the murrain the boils and blains seem to spare him personally. The thunder and hail, on the contrary, terrify him; the locusts also, but the darkness less. Finally, the death of the first-born at the decisive moment breaks the tyrant's defiance, yet without being able to convert him. And it is out of this wonderful network of human offences and Divine judgments that a ponderous fatalistic decree has been contrived. Meyer quite gratuitously opposes Olshausen's explanation, that the hardening assumes at the outset the already existing beginnings of evil. The ὁ θεός does not oppose it, for God can let man die before his hardening. Meyer, also, does not favor Calovius' definitions of hardening, that God does not harden man ἐν ἁγνότητι, but 1. συνχωρητικῶς, propter permissionem; 2. ἀφορμητικῶς, propter occasionem; 3. ἐγκαταλεπτικῶς; 4. παράδοτικῶς.

19. Just as Pharaoh hardened himself more and more at Moses' deeds of faith, so was Moses always advanced and strengthened in faith by the trials of faith which were prepared for him by Pharaoh's hardenings—that is, by the apparent failure of his miraculous deeds. This is a fundamental law of God's kingdom. The kingdom of darkness displays itself in its reciprocal action with the kingdom of light, but the latter is also displayed in its reciprocal action with the former.

20. Tholuck's explanation on having compassion and hardening, p. 523, harmonizes with the old Lutheran dogmatics. Meyer's résumé, p. 310.

[Pages 390 ff., 4th edition. Justice to this author, whose clear and acute exegetical notes have been so freely used by Dr. Lange, as well as in the additions, requires the insertion of a larger portion of his theological résumé than is given in the original.

"The contents of chap. ix. 9-23, as they have presented themselves purely exegetically, and taken in and of themselves, of course exclude the idea of a decree of God conditioned by human, moral spontaneity; for indeed God's absolute activity, considered in itself as such, cannot depend on that of the individual; but a fatalistic determinism, which robs man of his self-determination and free self-positing for salvation, making him the passive object of Divine arbitrariness, must not be deduced from our passage as a Pauline doctrine. For this reason, that this passage is not to be considered separately from what follows (vers. 30 ff.; x. 11), and also because the countless exhortations of the Apostle to believing obedience, to steadfastness and Christian virtue, as well as all his warnings against falling from grace, are so many witnesses against that dreary view which annuls the nature of human morality and responsibility. Should we, with Reiche, Köllner, Fritzsche, and Krehl, suppose that Paul, in his dialectic zeal, had permitted himself to be hurried into self-contradiction,* we would have a self-contradiction so manifest, yet so extremely important and dangerous in a religious and ethical aspect, so harshly opposed to the Christian moral ideas of Divine holiness and human freedom, that it were least of all to be expected of this Apostle, whose acuteness and dialectic skill could guard him against it on the one hand, while especially, on the other, his apostolic illumination and the depth and clearness of his moral experience must guard him against it." "But this by no means justifies the interlining of the clear and definite expressions of the Apostle in our passage, on the part of anti-predestinarianism from Origen and Chrysostom until now, to the effect that the moral self-determination and spontaneity of man is the correlative factor to the Divine decree. The correct judgment of the deterministic propositions (vers. 15-23) lies rather between the psychologically and morally impossible admission of a self-contradiction, and the exegetically impossible interpolation in this way, of thoughts the direct opposite of the Apostle's expression. How there can be the concurrence, so necessary in the moral world, of the individual freedom and spontaneity of man and the absolute self-determination and all-efficiency of God, is incomprehensible to human reflection, at least so long as it does not desert the sphere of Christian view, and pass into the unscriptural, pantheistic sphere of Identity, in which, indeed, there is no place for freedom in general.* Whenever, of the two truths: 'God is absolutely free and all-efficient,' and 'man has individual freedom, and is also on his side, in his own self-determination as free agent, the causer of his salvation or misery,' we handle but one, and that one consistently, and hence, one-sidedly, we are compelled to speak as if the other seems to be invalidated by our reasoning. But only seems; for, in fact, there is in this case only a temporary and conscious abstraction with respect to the other." "Paul, then, found himself in this case. For he wished to present, in opposition to the fancy of the Jews respecting descent and works, the free and absolute almightiness of the Divine will and work, and all the more decidedly and exclusively the less he would leave any ground for the presumptuous error of the Jews, that God must be gracious to them. The Apostle has here placed himself entirely on the absolute standpoint of the theory of God's pure independence, and that, too, with all the boldness of clear consistency; but only until he has done justice to that polemic purpose. Then he returns (vers. 30 ff.) from that abstraction to the human-moral standpoint of practice, so that he grants to both modes of view, side by side, that right which they have within the limits of human thought. The view which lies beyond these limits, the metaphysical relation of the essential connection of the two points, viz., objectively Divine and subjectively human freedom and voluntary activity, was necessarily without and beyond his present circuit of view. He would have had no occasion either to enter upon this problem, since it was incumbent upon him to defeat the Jewish presumption with but one side of this—with the absoluteness of God. That, or how far the Divine election is no electus militaris, but finds its norm immanently in God himself through His holiness, and thus may be conditioned by moral conditions on the human side, remains for the present entirely out of the account. It enters, however, with ver. 30, in which the one-sided method of consideration, followed for a time, is again compensated for, and the ground afforded for a time for apologetic purposes, to the doctrine of absolute decrees, is again withdrawn."—R.]

He opposes those who have charged the Apostle with a self-contradiction—determination and freedom (Reiche, Köllner, Fritzsche, &c.); but he himself thinks that the metaphysical relation of unity between the all-prevailing efficiency of God and man's freedom is incomprehensible by Christian reflection, and that, therefore, we can only speak of the one, considered in itself alone, in such a way that the other seems to be removed by our reasoning. But this is not the case if we speak either of human freedom or of God's free grace in a proper way. The former assumes dependence on God; the latter requires faith. Though God's all-efficiency is not conditional on man, yet it conditions itself as the personal exercise of authority in relation to man, so soon as he is determined by election, according to the stage of development in which man is. It may also be said that the one decree of God is explained, according to chap. viii. 29, 30, in five decrees, and these are reciprocally conditional.

If the decree of election were an absolute determination of salvation and condemnation, there would be no peculiar decree of ordination or historical predetermination; God would no more be free to say to Moses, "I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy." But if the decree of ordination were absolute, then we could no more speak seriously of a new decree of the call, and still less of a free idea of justification, as well as of glorification. The Divine decree in relation to the final judgment has conditioned itself by the nature of all the preceding decrees. And only in this way does God remain a free God, while, on the other hand, we would make of an unconditional decree of predestination itself a real divinity, which would have bound the personal God. But it is quite in harmony with the nature of religion, the real relation between God and man, that the truth asserts the majesty of the Divine right against every human arrogation, every irreligious claim against God. The free power of election stands in opposition to the claim of a natural heirship in God's kingdom; the free power of grace, in its historical exercise of authority, opposes the claim to the merit of works; and the free power of the Divine call in the economic relations of God's kingdom opposes the claim to both. If the point is reached where man will make God conformable to himself, before whom he would present himself independently, yea, one whom he thinks that he can bind by "replying against" him, then God himself opposes him in His truth as the God who stands in absolute free power above him, and before whom he is as nothing, or as the clay in the potter's hand. Up to this point the Apostle must have recourse to the Jewish assumptions against God's majesty. The pioneers of the Reformation, but particularly the Reformers themselves, were in a similar situation; ecclesiastical tradition had, in the latter case, taken the place of descent from Abraham; ecclesiastical righteousness of works had taken the place of Levitical righteousness of works; the self-righteous creature began to prescribe laws for his Creator. The Reformers, adding to the truth, thus reversed the relation: God's sovereignty and grace are every thing, while the arrogated right and merit of man are nothing. But their arriving in theory—which was really only one chapter in their system—to the negation of human freedom of election (Melancthon, in his later life, excepted), and their being led into contradiction with their ethical principles, were in part a tribute of weakness which they had to pay to their independence from the Catholic Augustine (strong expressions of Calvin and Zwingli, see Tholuck, p. 528), and in part the false conclusion from a profoundly justified religious feeling. They taught, with good ground, that God's government of the world is a government controlling and pervading all moral events, and that even sin is not merely permitted, but accepted and determined as a fact in God's plan; only they had not yet found—as Sebastian Frank, at their time, and, subsequently, such orthodox teachers in the Church as Breiting, Voetius, and others—the distinction between sin as a wicked counsel of the heart, that merely appertains to man, and sin as a fact in which inward sin itself is already treated with irony, captured, and judged (see Prov. xvi. 1 ff.). The Apostle himself, on the contrary, has united the doctrine of the absolute judicial power of God with the doctrine of the importance of faith, yet particularly with the declaration that God has delayed His historical judgment in long-suffering, and has made the already existing judgment of hardness a medium of compassion.*—"The people, clay in the potter's hand," is a frequently recurring biblical expression. See Tholuck, p. 530; also the Note on p. 532; likewise p. 536.

21. The concatenation of judgment and compassion which appears throughout in the facts of Holy Scripture, as well as in its doctrine, has not been sufficiently comprehended and made use of by the popular ecclesiastical conception; and this is a principal source of its hindrances and imperfections. Righteousness and mercy are regarded as collateral modes of God's revelation. Judgment and compassion absolutely preclude each other. But the Scriptures unite both facts in various ways.

First, the reconciliation of men themselves, both collectively and individually, inwardly as well as outwardly, is made conditional on a judgment which separates the old from the new life. Second, the display of redemption and its institutions, of the theocracy and of the Church, is conditioned by judicial acts that separate the old from the new states. Third, judgment, even from the flood downward, separates an old from a new race, and brings to pass the redemption of the latter by the still conditional rejection of the former. Even in the final judgment, the consummation of heaven is made conditional on the separation of the wicked; Matt. xiii. 43.

22. With the confusion mentioned above, there is also connected the fact that righteousness has ever been too much regarded as the extreme consequence of rigor, but not also in the light of forbearance and mildness. This latter idea of righteousness is frequently taught in the Scriptures (see Matt. i. 19; 1 John i. 9), and so also in the present chapter, ver. 28. Comp. also chap. iii. 26, p. 185.

23. The full and direct force of the passage in ver. 31 is only reached by accepting the reading preferred by us. The Jew's righteousness of works, as such, was never faithful righteousness of works, but a righteousness of boasting of the practice of statutes, and therefore it was a failure to obey the true remains itself. In a similar sense, James portrays the orthodoxy of the Jews (see the Commentary in loco). This is also the case with the ecclesiastical righteousness of works in the Middle Ages; its weight does not lie in fidelity to the law, but in the fanatical zeal to explain and sharpen the statutes to excess. And so the orthodoxy of the seventeenth century was not strictness of confessional fidelity, but zeal for the statutory amplification and sharpening of confessional formulas. Centrifugal deviations from the collective fundamental thought and original fountain everywhere prevailed.

24. Israel, in its guilty and accursed destiny, is also a type of the richly deserved curses in the political as well as in the ecclesiastical life of nations.

Knight, on the above interpretation. Ibid.—J. F. H.]

The Apostle's sorrow for his brethren: 1. A great sorrow, so that he wished to be accursed from Christ for them; 2. A natural sorrow, because they (a.) are his kinsmen according to the flesh; (b.) are Israelites to whom pertaineth the adoption, &c. (vers. 1-5).

An apostolical asseveration (ver. 1).—Words only have strength when our conscience bears us witness in the Holy Ghost that we say the truth in Christ (ver. 1).—The witness of our conscience in the Holy Ghost is a witness for us that we say the truth in Christ (ver. 1).—Magnanimous heaviness and magnanimous pain (ver. 2).—The Apostle's readiness to stake the dearest possession for his brethren (ver. 3).—The difference between Israelites and Jews (ver. 4).—What do Israelites possess? 1. The whole of the Old Testament, with all its covenant blessings; 2. The fathers; 3. Through the fathers, Christ, so far as His human descent is concerned, belongs chiefly to them (John iv. 22) (vers. 3-5).

STARKE, CRAMER: In important matters for God's honor and the advancement of our neighbors' salvation, we may swear (Isa. xix. 18; Jer. xii. 6); but to wantonly affirm a thing before God, is an abuse of God's name (Exod. xx. 7) (ver. 1).—The saints are not stoical blocks of wood (!); therefore we should also weep with those that weep, and rejoice with those that rejoice (ver. 2).—Love has certain degrees, and one may with a good conscience prefer to love his natural friends and blood relations to others (ver. 3).—Nova Bibl. Tüb.: Nothing grieves pious people more than the ruin of the ungodly. Particularly a true shepherd can do nothing else than speak of them with sorrow and tears (ver. 2).—HEDINGER: This is love! Oh, that we had even a less degree of it! Exod. xxxi. 32.

GERLACH: Calvin beautifully says: "It is not contradictory to this wish of the Apostle, that he knew of a surety that his salvation by God's election could not prove a delusion. For as such a glowing love always burns out more violently, so does it as nothing and care for nothing except its object" (vers. 1-5).

LISCO: The Apostle's sorrow at Israel's unbelief (vers. 1-5).—In Christ every thing was glorified and fulfilled which Israel already had; how important, therefore, it was to believe in Him whom the antitypes had announced, and who brought grace and truth! John i. 16, 17.

HEUBNER: Asseveration of the Apostle's love for his people (vers. 1-5).—It is only a spirit sanctified by God's grace that can be grieved at the spiritual fall of others. The unconverted man is indifferent to the moral misery of his neighbor. The holiest sorrow is for others (ver. 2).

BESSER: Throughout the Holy Scriptures there is not another passage where, as in the present instance, the most profound darkness of sorrow is in juxtaposition with the brightest sun of joy. Paul has ascended on the wings of faith to the height where he sees the whole kingdom of the world and the devil lying at his feet; and, sheltered in the rock-strong love of God in Jesus Christ, he has sung a triumphal song in the upper choir. There he pauses, and as one who is still dwelling in the land of pains and tears, just at this point he discloses to his brethren, first, the profound and concealed sorrow of his life by a solemn assurance of that of which he would have God also conscious (ver. 1).—The sainted BUNDEL says: "Souls which have made no progress, do not comprehend Paul's wish. We should not lightly pronounce judgment upon the measure of love in Moses and Paul. The modicum of our thoughts of love is too small for us to do so; just as a boy does not appreciate the heroic spirit of a general" (ver. 3).—Not Jacobites, but Israelites, wrestlers with God, are called the descendants of the patriarch, who obtained of the Lord a blessing upon his seed, that they might be called after his name, and the names of his fathers Abraham and Isaac (ver. 4).—Eight blessings of God's house united in four pairs (vers. 4, 5).

[BURKITT: God has placed a conscience in every man, whose office it is to bear witness of all his words and actions; yea, of all his thoughts and inward affections. Conscience is God's register, to record whatever we think, speak, or act; and happy is he whose conscience bears witness for him, and doth not testify against him.—Ver. 2. Note: 1. What are the dismal effects and dreadful consequences of obstinate unbelief, under the offers of Christ tendered to persons in and by the dispensation of the gospel, without timely repentance? 2. The true spirit of Christianity is to make men mourn for the sins and calamities of others in a very sensible and affectionate manner. Good men ever have been and are men of tender and compassionate disposition; a stoical apathy, an indolence of heart, a want of natural affection, is so far from being a virtue, or matter of just commendation unto any man, that the deepest sorrow and heaviness of soul in some cases well becomes persons of the greatest piety and wisdom; 3. Great sorrow and continual heaviness of heart for the miseries of others, whether imminent or incumbent, but especially for the sins of others, is an undoubted argument, sign, and evidence of a strong and vehement love toward them—

HENRY: We ought to be in a special manner concerned for the spiritual good of our relations, our brethren and kinsmen. To them we lie under special obligations; and we have more opportunity of doing good to them; and we must, in a special manner, give account concerning them, and our usefulness to them.—HODGE: Fidelity does not require that we should make the truth as offensive as possible. On the contrary, we are bound to endeavor, as Paul did, to allay all opposing or inimical feelings in the minds of those whom we address, and to allow the truth, unimpeded by the exhibition of any thing offensive on our part, to do its work upon the heart and conscience.—J. F. H.]

[SCHAFF: Vers. 4, 5. These advantages of Israel, sketched by the Apostle, are at once types and prophecies of the higher blessings, which continue uninterruptedly in the Christian Church, and are enjoyed daily and hourly by all believers. In their lap is the adoption and heirship of eternal life, the continued presence of the Lord in the means of grace, the eternal covenant of grace instead of the successive covenants, the free, life-giving spirit, instead of the killing letter of the law, the worship in spirit and in truth in all places instead of the service confined to Jerusalem, the far more plain and precious promises of the heavenly Canaan and amaranthine inheritance, the incomputable cloud of witnesses, patriarchs, prophets, apostles, martyrs, and confessors, from all climes and tongues, and, as the sum of all blessings, Jesus Christ, the God-man and Saviour, who is flesh of our flesh, ay, our Brother and Friend, and yet exalted above all, the eternally adored Head of the Church, which He calls "His body, the fulness of Him who filleth all in all."—R.]

a. Vers. 6-13. Who are the true Israelites?

1. By no means all who are of Israel, or are the seed of Abraham, are children according to the flesh; but rather, 2. The children of promise, whom He has freely chosen according to His purpose (vers. 6-13).—The question of Divine adoption does not depend upon natural descent, but upon the mercy of the call, without the merit of works (vers. 6-13).—God's word (promise) has not failed because many are not Israelites—that is, are not participators in the promise (vers. 6-8).—Neither has God's word failed to us because many who are called evangelical are not evangelical (vers. 6-8).—How Paul, the Apostle of the righteousness of faith, reminds us of John the Baptist, the preacher of repentance! Comp. vers. 6-8 with Matt. iii. 9.—The children of the promise: 1. Isaac, the son of Abraham; 2. Jacob-Israel, the son of Rebecca (vers. 9, 10).—The mystery of election and reprobation (vers. 10-14).—Not by the merit of works, but by the mercy of Him who calleth! A passage: 1. For our humiliation; but also, 2. For our consolation (ver. 12).

STARKER: God does not look at carnal service and external advantages and privileges in the distribution of His mercy and spiritual blessings; 1 Cor. xv. 10 (ver. 12).—HEDINGER: God's word always has its fulfilment in either one way or the other; Jer. xxxii. 42 (ver. 6).—Beware of founding your hope of salvation on birth, or the visible Church, or merely seeming work. One must inwardly be a Christian and Abraham's heir (ver. 7).

SPENER By this instance (vers. 8, 9) Paul has sufficiently shown that salvation does not depend on natural birth, and that, therefore, not all the descendants of Israel were necessarily the people of the covenant. But because it might have been said that Ishmael was born of the bondwoman, and lost such an honor in consequence of his wicked life, for he was a scoffer, Paul proceeds to show, by the example of Esau and Jacob, that it depended upon God's free choice as to whom He would show certain spiritual or temporal advantages and benefits, in which case He does not look at works (vers. 10-13).

ROOS: The children of the promise are such as have become the children and true seed of Abraham by belief in God's promise (vers. 8-11).—An election does not preclude the foreknowledge of faith and works, but, on the contrary, it always goes in advance, while faith and good works follow afterward. Thus, a soldier is chosen before he has furnished a proof of his bravery; a child is chosen for adoption before he has given evidence of filial gratitude. The exhibition of bravery and gratitude is hoped for. But what is man's hope, is God's foreknowledge. Yet it must not be said that, in making an election, the one who chooses has been influenced by works that have already occurred. It was not from works already performed by Jacob that God's promises resulted, but from the loving will of God, who stands in need of nothing, whom no creature can place under obligation, and who does not inwardly pass from hatred to love (vers. 11-13).

GERLACH: As the preference of Jacob to Esau, and of the Israelites to the Edomites, was declared by God before the birth of the two ancestors, and thus what Jacob had in advance could by no means depend upon any privilege or merit of birth, so is free grace the bestowal of justification through Christ; it does not depend upon anticipated virtues or services of him who receives them; it admits valid claims of any kind (vers. 11-13).

LISCO: The Apostle's purpose is to prove that God, far from all arbitrary authority, and with the most exalted love, holiness, and wisdom, though without binding himself to natural laws (primogeniture, posterity of Abraham), or to the narrow limits of a certain descent, proceeds in His guidance of nations, and now calls this one and now that one to the gospel, just as He formerly called to a share in the privileges of the old covenant people. The Israelite, as such, had legal claims to salvation in Christ, yet not on account of his natural descent, as is shown from both the examples adduced. Even Esau's descendants, and, indeed, all heathen, have been called to salvation in Christ; therefore evidently Esau's rejection is by no means regarded as eternal, and the object of Jacob's preference is the temporary salvation of the nations descended from both Esau and Jacob (vers. 11-13).

HEUBNER: We must maintain: 1. Paul's speech is altogether individual or national, and applies solely to Israel, in order to prostrate Israel's perverse pride; 2. The question is not concerning an eternal election and reprobation, but the calling of a people by the external call, by revelation, and concerning the subsequent rejection of such a call (vers. 6-13).

b. Vers. 14-18. Is God unrighteous? This objection is refuted by Paul: 1. By reference to God's declaration to Moses; 2. By reference to such a declaration to Pharaoh (vers. 14-18).—Moses and Pharaoh: 1. Moses, an example of God's mercy and compassion; 2. Pharaoh, an example of hardening; 3. Both together are examples of God's free election (vers. 14-18).—On what does our salvation depend? 1. Not upon our willing or running; 2. But upon God's mercy (ver. 16).

STARKE: God is and ever remains righteous, however He disposes things according to His sovereign will and good pleasure (ver. 14).—Oh, the great and exceeding riches of divine mercy and compassion, by which God performs all the good which He bestows on man, without regard to any service, greatness, honor, or appearance! (ver. 15).—HEDINGER: One's own running, working, exerting himself, devising services, doing penitence, and inflicting scourging, crawling into caves and putting on sackcloth, accomplish nothing; God must open the heart, and, when He knocks, open to Him! He has the key himself, and you have from Him the hands and the power to throw wide open for His entrance (ver. 16).—Hardening is a great judgment. Many are involved in it, and yet they do not know it (ver. 17).—SPENER: Thus God's will is perfectly free and unconfined in its own work, and He has the power to show mercy or not, just as He will, without our ability to find sufficient cause for the difference, although He himself, as the wise and holy God, does nothing without a holy cause, so that even His freest power wills and does in such a way as His wisdom perceives conducive to His glory. For as men of understanding do not foolishly and thoughtlessly use their freedom, but do every thing considerately and with a rational choice, even when they are in the enjoyment of the most unfettered freedom, how should we suppose that the all-wise God can have mercy and harden without holy causes, or in any other way than is in harmony with His goodness, righteousness, and majesty, though above our understanding? This should be enough for us: The holy and righteous God, who never can wish to do any thing evil, wills it to be thus.

ROOS: Ver. 16: Moses desired to see God's glory; but his desire would not have obtained this view by force. More than once Moses ascended to the top of Sinai, and came down again; but his running did not earn as a reward that which he prayed for. God met his willing by compassion: out of compassion He crowned Moses' ascent of Mount Sinai by an extraordinary blessing.—GERLACH: Ver. 16: Paul elsewhere exhorts (1 Cor. ix. 24-27; Phil. iii. 12-14) in the most decided way to will and to run; but it is a willing whose soul is God's mercy toward sinners, and it is a running whose power is God's renewing grace.

LISCO: The last and only ground of participation in God's kingdom is and ever remains God's mercy (ver. 16).—All of Pharaoh's efforts did not prevent the execution of the Divine purposes, but he himself became, contrary to his will, an instrument for their execution; accordingly, God was glorified in the perverse king, who did not escape His righteous punishment (ver. 17).—Thus, then, God shows His mercy on whomsoever He will with unlimited freedom; and He hardens whomsoever He will—that is, He allows His mercy to redound to the ruin of those who, like Pharaoh, are impervious to all of His instructions and guidance; and thus it can also come to pass to the unbelieving Jews, that God will withdraw His mercy from them if they scorn His gospel, just as Pharaoh once despised God's will (ver. 18).

HEUBNER: No people can prove that it will be God's people (ver. 16).—The humiliation of presumptuous tyrants is a glorification of God (ver. 17).

—Hardening is therefore never a blindly absolute, but always a righteous decree of God on those who have long withstood all of His calls. Pharaoh would not have been hardened, if his many cruelties had not already hardened his heart (ver. 18).

BESSEY: To sum up, says Luther (Works, vol. xxii. p. 745): "Every thing is spoken against the proud. 'He to whom I give shall have it, and you shall not take it from me by your holiness.' What more shall he do? He nevertheless says, 'You shall have it, but if you seek and wish to have it for the sake of your righteousness and your piety, I cannot and will not allow you to have it; I will sooner tear to pieces and destroy every thing, both priesthood and kingdom, and even my own law. But show me mercy, and you shall have it.'" (ver. 16).—He who can still take upon himself to say, "God has had compassion on me because I am not as Pharaoh was," has not yet read the Epistle to the Romans aright. The reverse is the case: Because God has had compassion on me, I am not as Pharaoh, but as Moses (ver. 18).

c. Vers. 19-29. Nay, but, O man, who art thou that repliest against God? 1. Remember that thou art only the work, but He is the Maker; 2. Therefore submit unconditionally to His sovereign will (vers. 19-21).—What does God design by His unconditional and free election? 1. On one hand, to show His wrath and make known His power; 2. But, on the other, to make known all the more, by this means, the riches of His glory (vers. 22-29).—The vessels of wrath and the vessels of mercy (vers. 22-24).—Who are the vessels of mercy? All who are called; not alone, 1. of the Jews, but, 2. also of the Gentiles (ver. 24).—Hosea and Isaiah as witnesses of God's grace, showing mercy on and calling Jews and Gentiles: 1. Hosea; 2. Isaiah (vers. 25-29).

LUTHER: Although the greater part fall away and remain unbelieving, He will nevertheless not let all fall, but will support the rest, and by them all the more abundantly disseminate His word and grace, in order that they may be righteous and glorious (ver. 28).

STARKE: God, in leading man to salvation, does not deal with him according to the unconditional purpose of His will and with unlimited power, but in a certain order, in which they who are ennobled by the rational soul have obtained the freedom to obey or to oppose (ver. 29).—Also teachers and preachers must exhibit an appropriate gentleness when censuring the ungodly, and must not always select the rarest words of abuse and reproach, to pour them out upon them like a heavy shower (ver. 26).—Do not despair, though you be miserable; the merciful and gracious Lord can cause a light to arise within you; Ps. cxli. 4 (ver. 25).—HEDINGER: God be praised for His long-suffering! How many thousand brands of hell dost thou bear with! Thou art, and ever remainest, my righteous God! Ps. ciii. 8 (ver. 22).—LANGE: If you would be a true vessel of mercy, you must draw grace for grace from the fulness of Jesus (John i. 16).—Let the love of God be poured out in your heart by the Holy Spirit (chap. v. 6); and in order that you may be useful in the Lord's house, and a vessel sanctified to His honor, seek to be purified from contact with all impure vessels (ver. 28).

SPENER: The Apostle says of the vessels of mercy, that God has prepared them for glory. He is not only their Creator, but their being the vessels of

His mercy is His own preparation. But he does not say of the vessels of wrath, that God prepared them for destruction, but that they are filled to destruction who have fitted and corrupted themselves to it, so that their condemnation does not come from God, but only that He has long borne with them patiently, just as He did to Pharaoh, and that He finally destroys them with all the more violence. By this are declared His glory, power, compassion, and righteousness, without one coming in conflict with the other (vers. 22, 23).—ROOS: The great long-suffering of which Paul speaks, proves that God takes no pleasure in the destruction of the vessels of wrath; for if He had wished, He could at any time have given them up to destruction sooner than He really did; but the efficacious call, which applies to the vessels of mercy both of the Jews and Gentiles, proves that God does not indulge a preconceived hatred either of the Jewish people or of the Gentile nations, and it is only His call that makes a difference between the vessels of wrath and of mercy (vers. 22-24).—GERLACH: We must always bear in mind, that when God has compassion, and when He hardens, He acts in different ways; in the former case, He produces good in the human heart by His compassion; and in the second, He withdraws from man His divine light and life, yet does not awaken evil in him, but only allows the evil already existing to assume the form and take the course which, to Him, is evidently necessary for the salvation of the world. Man's seeing, in mercy as well as in hardening, a perfectly similar operation of God—namely, His own arbitrary authority—is his own fault, since he closes himself against God's compassionate love by his own claims (ver. 21).

LISCO: All humanity, and not merely Israel (which fancied itself thus), is like the clay from which God, of His own free choice, chooses unto participation in the kingdom of heaven; and He is not bound to Israel in such a way that He cannot also appoint the Gentiles to the same privilege (vers. 20, 21).

HEUBNER: Before God rejects a people, He patiently gives it time for repentance (vers. 19-23).—Especially on ver. 19: The universal objection of all determinists, fatalists, and absolutists, is: "How can man be free, since in his existence, and in the formation and change of his mind, he is totally dependent on God?" This is here represented in a special direction, thus: "How can sin be imputed to man? Why does God's punishment of him enrage him? He is only what God makes him! Who can oppose God?" This objection is still frequently heard in such modifications as these: "Man becomes every thing, just according as he is trained, educated, and placed in a favorable or unfavorable state?" We may answer this objection somewhat as follows: Although man does not himself control his destiny, and although this destiny has an influence upon his development, yet it is by no means compulsory; the external world does not operate irresistibly upon him.—Yet Paul does not exactly answer thus, but says, ver. 26: "Yea, dear man," &c.—Ver. 21: This comparison would be inaptly applied if it were regarded as an irresistible formation of character: "Can God not make out of this man a bad one, and out of that a good one?" The question is only the determination of the external state which operates on man. "Cannot God, according to His own will, direct to every one his condition and all the circumstances that operate upon him?" It still depends on man whether he will make use of his condition in this or that way, and in what shape he will allow himself to be formed. Comp. 2 Tim. ii. 20, 21. In Jer. xviii. 6, the type of the potter applies to the events that God allows a people to experience, but not to the determination of their salvation or destruction.

d. Vers. 30-33. The faith of the Gentiles, and the unbelief of the Jews: 1. The establishment of this fact; 2. The explanation of its origin (vers. 30-33).—In the righteousness of faith, the law of righteousness is really fulfilled (vers. 30, 31).—Who attains to the law of righteousness? All who seek its fulfilment, not: 1. By the works of the law, but, 2. By faith (vers. 31, 32).—The stumbling-stone: 1. For some a rock of offence; 2. For others a rock of salvation (ver. 33). Comp. 1 Peter ii. 4-10.

LUTHER: Christ justifies without works; they who do not believe Him, run against Him and stumble (ver. 32).

STARKE: O thou tempted soul, who art ever indulging in fearful thoughts, thou shalt certainly not be ashamed! (ver. 33).—CRAMER: If one should seek fire in snow, or ice in fire, he would not find it, so he who seeks life, righteousness, and salvation in the law, and not in Christ, will never receive them (ver. 32).

SPENER: God laid such a stone in Zion as would of itself be a stone of help, a tried and precious corner-stone, on which the fallen could and should rise. But man's wickedness, &c., causes many to stumble against it, and their fall is more dangerous than if such a stone had not been placed there. Yet God's saving counsel must not be in vain for all, for there are others, on the other hand, who hold to this rock, and believe on it. These will not be deceived in their hope, nor come to shame, as they will take from it that which they have hoped for—salvation (ver. 33).

ROOS: As Paul had previously made every thing dependent on simple grace and mercy, and on God's free will, so he now makes every thing dependent on faith. Grace and faith, the will of God and faith, correspond to or meet each other. Grace is in God, faith is in man (vers. 30-33).—GERLACH: God did not enforce His right against the unbelieving Israelites, nor harden their hearts, nor fit them for destruction, because He predestinated them for destruction before their existence, but because they "replied against God" (vers. 18-22).

LISCO: The reason why Israel refuses to accept the gospel, and is rejected, is because they seek it—righteousness—before God, not of faith, but by doing the works prescribed in the law; and therefore they experience the judgment of falling against the stumbling-stone (ver. 32).

HEUBNER: No people or no man is so corrupt that God cannot call and save if they will only believe in the gospel, and become sensible of their guilt (ver. 30).—All the works on which man relies cannot save him, but rather hinder him (Luke xii. 24). Therefore the paradox: It would be better for many if they were worse (ver. 32).—Offence at Christ is culpable; it is one that is taken, and not given (ver. 33).

BESSER: Luther (Works, vol. vii. p. 321) strikingly compares the law to the field in which Christ, the Treasure, is buried. The Jews had the field, and even tilled it with great pains, but they did not see the buried treasure; but the Gentiles, on the contrary, since they found Christ in the law, went for joy beyond the law, and sold every thing which they had, and bought the field with its treasure—that is, the law with Christ (vers. 30, 31).

LONG: The forbearance and decision with which the Apostle expresses the strict judgment on Israel, is an example for us, when occasion occurs, to speak unpleasant truths.—The Apostle's fidelity to the Israelites is conditioned by his fidelity to the Lord; or the duty and limits of patriotism.—Israel's fall is an eternal admonition for churches, states, and nations.—The greater the glory of a community, the deeper is its fall.—Israel, which was once saved, is now judged in Christ its Head.—God's freedom with respect to humanity: 1. How it is bound by institutions and promises; 2. Yet how it also remains free.—His freedom in His determinations: 1. In the determination of the personalities themselves; 2. Of their fate, and its effect; 3. Of their call to the kingdom.—The freedom and consistency of Divine sovereignty in the name Jehovah.—The antitheses: Israel and Isaac, Jacob and Esau, Moses and Pharaoh. The judgment of hardening elucidated by Pharaoh's history.—Judgments changed by the sovereignty of God himself to the glorification of His mercy.—God's judgments are cut short by His wisdom and grace.—The importance of faith in antithesis to ordinances.—The twofold operation of the cornerstone.

LIGHTFOOT: Ver. 3. We owe charity to every one because of his soul. If a soul, in its essential constitution, be not beautiful and lovely, what thing upon earth can be accounted beautiful and lovely? A soul that carries the image of God in its very constitution—that is like to the nature of angels in its essence and being—that is capable of divine nature and of eternal life and glory—if it is be not lovely, what is it? It is a great piece of wisdom to study souls, and to observe the nature, worth, price, and excellency, both of our own and other men's; and there is not a more general and comprehensive cause of the ruin of souls, than men's ignorance of and unacquaintance with their own souls. Shall I hate any man's soul? It may be united to God. Hate any man's body? It may be a temple of the Holy Ghost. Any man's person? He may be an inheritor of eternal glory. Scorn not poor Joseph; for all his rags and imprisonment, he may come to sit upon a throne. Despise not poor Lazarus; for all his sores and tatters, he may be carried by angels into Abraham's bosom.—BURKITT: Learn: 1. What the sincere believer shall not be ashamed of: a. He shall never be ashamed of his choice; b. Nor of his profession; c. Nor of the cause and interest of Christ, which He has owned and vindicated in the world; d. Nor of any time sincerely spent in the work and service of Christ; e. Nor of reproaches and sufferings, tribulations and persecutions, for the sake of Christ; f. Nor in eternity, that he never was ashamed here of Christ and His gospel, His work and service, His cause and in terest. 2. When the believer shall not be ashamed: a. When he is called to bear testimony of Christ before the world, at the hour of death, or at the day of judgment; b. Nor the dreadfulness of the day, nor the majesty of the Judge, nor the number of the accusers, nor the impartiality of the sentence, nor the separation which shall then be made. 3. Why the believer shall never be ashamed: a. Sin, the cause of shame, is removed; b. Those only from whom he can reasonably fear shame, will never be ashamed of Him; c. He can look God and Christ, his own conscience and the whole world, in the face, without shame and suffering.—HENRY: What does God do for the salvation of His children? He prepares them beforehand for glory. Sanctification is the preparation of the soul for glory, making it meet to partake of the inheritance of the saints in light. This is God's work; we can destroy ourselves fast enough, but we cannot save ourselves; sinners fit themselves for hell, but it is God that prepares saints for heaven.—WATERLAND: There is a degree of pity and regard due even to very ill men, to ungodly, and sinners; not to be shown by caressing them and smiling upon them, but by earnest and ardent endeavors to reclaim them. There is not a more forlorn or miserable wretch under heaven than an overgrown sinner, become mad, desperate, and incurable in his sins. For though such persons regard neither God nor man, nor have any mercy or tenderness for friend or brother, but would go any lengths in mischief, and set the world on fire, if it lay in their power, yet we very well know, all the while, that they are weak and impotent, and are under bridle and restraint. The utmost they can do is only to afflict and torment good men for a time here, while they themselves lie exposed to eternal vengeance, to torments everlasting hereafter.—DODDRIDGE: We know a descending, a risen Redeemer. He still visits us in His gospel, still preaches in our assemblies, and stretches out a gentle and compassionate hand to lead us in the way of happiness.—Where we see a zeal for God, let us pay all due regard to it, and compassionate that ignorance which may sometimes be mingled with it.—SCOTT: Modesty, caution, humility, and profound awe of the holy majesty of God, should restrain and guide the tongues and pens of all who speak or write on the great subjects connected with salvation, however satisfied such men may be with their own views of them; and every sentence which is written or spoken with impetuous injustice to God, is a proof of the pride and irreverence of the writer or speaker.—HONG: Vers. 15–19. It should be assumed as a first principle, that God cannot do wrong. If He does a thing, it must be right. And it is very much safer for us, corrupt and blinded mortals, ~~to~~ to argue, than to pursue the opposite course, and maintain that God does not and cannot do so and so, because, in our judgment, it would be wrong.—J. F. H.]

GENERAL SECTION.—More decided explanation of the mysterious fact. The faith of the Gentiles and the unbelief of Israel.

CHAP. X. 1-21.

A. Self-righteousness, and the righteousness of faith (vers. 1-11).

- 1 Brethren, my heart's desire [or, good-will, symploia] and prayer¹ to God for Israel [on their behalf]² is, that they might be saved [for their salvation]
2 For I bear them record [witness] that they have a zeal of God, but not accord-
3 ing to knowledge. For they, being ignorant of God's righteousness [not knowing
(i. e., mistaking) the righteousness of God], and going about [striving] to establish their own righteousness,⁴ have not submitted themselves unto the righteousness 4 of God. For Christ is the end of the law for [unto] righteousness to every 5 one that believeth.⁵ For Moses describeth [writeth concerning] the righteousness which is of the law, That the [saying, The]⁶ man which doeth those things 6 [who hath done them] shall live by them [or, in it].⁷ But the righteousness which is of faith speaketh on this wise [thus],⁸ Say not in thine heart, Who shall ascend into heaven? (that is, to bring Christ down from above [omit from 7 above]:) Or, Who shall descend into the deep? (that is, to bring up Christ
8 again [omit again] from the dead.) But what saith it? The word is nigh thee, even [omit even] in thy mouth, and in thy heart: that is, the word of faith, which 9 we preach: That [Because] if thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus [or, Jesus as Lord],⁹ and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath [omit hath] 10 raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved. For with the heart man believeth [faith is exercised]¹⁰ unto righteousness; and with the mouth confession is 11 made unto salvation. For the Scripture saith, Whosoever believeth on him shall not be ashamed [put to shame].

B. The equal claim of Jews and Gentiles to faith. Hence the necessity of universal preaching. The unequal results of preaching (vers. 12-18).

- 12 For there is no difference between the Jew and the Greek [distinction between Jew and Greek]:¹¹ for the same Lord over all is [is Lord of all],¹² rich 13 unto all that [who] call upon him. For whosoever [every one who]¹³ shall call 14 upon the name of the Lord shall be saved. How then shall [can] they call¹⁴ on him in whom they have not believed? and how shall [can] they believe¹⁵ in him of whom they have not heard? and how shall [can] they hear¹⁶ without a 15 preacher? And how shall [can] they preach,¹⁷ except they be sent? as it is written,¹⁸ How beautiful are the feet of them that preach the gospel [those who 16 bring glad tidings] of peace,¹⁹ and bring glad tidings of good things! But they have not all obeyed the gospel [did not all hearken to the glad tidings].²⁰ For 17 Esaias [Isaiah] saith, Lord, who hath [omit hath] believed our report?²¹ So then faith cometh by [of] hearing, and hearing by [through] the word of God.²² 18 But I say, Have they not heard [Did they not hear]? Yes [Nay] verily, their sound went [out] into all the earth, and their words unto the ends of the world.

C. The unbelief of Israel and the faith of the Gentiles already prophesied in the Old Testament (vers. 19-21).

- 19 But I say, Did not Israel [Israel not]²³ know? First Moses saith, I will provoke you to jealousy by them that [with those who] are no people, and by 20 [with] a foolish nation I will anger you. But Esaias [Isaiah] is very bold, and saith,²⁴ I was found of them that [by those who] sought me not; I was made 21 manifest unto them that [those who] asked not after me. But to [of] Israel he saith,²⁵ All day long I have [omit have] stretched forth my hands unto a disobedient and gainsaying people.

¹ Ver. 1.—[After ἀφ' ὧν, K. L. Rec. insert η, defended by Philippi; omitted in K. A. B. D. F. G., by Lachmann, Tischendorf, Meyer, Tholuck, Alford, Tregelles. Probably inserted to limit ῥῶν ὁσῶν to ἀφ' ὧν, since η seemed improper to connect it with ἐνδοξα. On the meaning of the last-named word, see involved in the omission, see Exeg. Notes.

⁶ Ver. 5.—[The correct reading is difficult to determine. Most editors now retain αὐτῶν (Rec., K². B. F. G., most versions and fathers). Instead of ἐν αὐτοῖς (Rec., K¹. D. F. L., some versions and fathers, Meyer, Wordsworth, Lange), the reading ἐν αὐτῶν is found in K¹. A. B., many versions, and is accepted by Lachmann, De Wette, Alford, Tregelles. The singular would be a variation from both the LXX. and the Hebrew; yet this but renders an alteration to the plural (for the sake of conformity) the more probable. On the other hand, Meyer urges strongly that the plural stands or falls with αὐτῶν, which is now generally accepted. The change to the singular may have been made to guard against the validity of the righteousness of works, as indeed A. substitutes ἰσχυρῶς for ῥῶν. With some hesitation, I hold to the reading of the Rec.

¹⁰ Ver. 12.—[Literally: there is no distinction of Jew and Greek; but this sounds too abstract, as if the distinctions were obliterated, as in Gal. iii. 28. Here it is better, then, to preserve the concrete idea, by using between. So Rev. Five Ang. Clergymen.

¹⁴ Ver. 14.—[Rec., A. K. L.: πιστεύουσιν. K. B. D. F. G.: πιστεύουσιν. The last two prefix the argument: Ver. 14.—[Rec., L.: ἀκούουσιν; K¹. D. F. G.: ἀκούονται; A². B. C.: ἀκούουσιν; the latter, though not so well supported as the other aorists, is probably correct, since there is no reason for a change of tense.

¹⁵ Ver. 15.—[Rec. (no MSS.): κηρύσσουσιν; K. A. B. D. K. L.: κηρύσσουσιν. This well-supported aorist seems to decide the other cases.

¹⁸ Ver. 16.—[Here also gospel is too restricted. The above emendation is adopted by Amer. Bible Union, Noyes, Five Ang. Clergymen.

¹³ Ver. 20.—[The Hebrew text of Isa. lxx. 1, as far as cited by Paul, is:

יְרֵרָה שִׁמְשֵׁן לְלֹא שְׂאֵלִי נִקְצָאֲרִי לְלֹא בְּקִשְׁרִי

The LXX.: ἐμμενὲς ἐκμενέμεν τοῖς καὶ μὴ ἐκμενέμεν, ἐκμενέμεν τοῖς καὶ μὴ ἐκμενέμεν. The variations are a transposition of the clauses, and ἐκμενέμεν, instead of ἐκμενέμεν. The Hebrew is followed with exactness.—Ec is inserted after ἐκμενέμεν, in B. D. F.; bracketed by Alford and Tregelles.

¹⁴ Ver. 21.—[The order of the LXX. is: ἡμεῖς οὖν ἔχουσιν; otherwise the citation is exact. The οὖν ἐκμενέμεν is an addition of the LXX. The Hebrew gives but one adjective, יְרֵרָה, rebellious.—To Israel, is not correct; with respect to, concerning, is the meaning, which, however, is sufficiently indicated by of; so Five Ang. Stargymen, Amer. Bible Union.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Summary.—The fact of the partial rejection of Israel, &c. The fact is not a fatalistic decree, for the Apostle prays for Israel, and bears record to their zeal; vers. 1, 2. It rests rather on the antithesis between self-righteousness as the presumed righteousness which is of the law, and the righteousness which is of faith; vers. 3, 4. The righteousness of faith, although arising from Israel, is proved by the prophecy of the Old Testament to be, according to its nature, accessible to all men, and not confined to the Jewish nation. It is universal; that is, accessible to all in its internal character, because it is allied to the inward nature of man; vers. 5, 9. Its universality is confirmed by experience; vers. 10, 11. It is proclaimed by the Old Testament Scriptures, which promise, in Christ, salvation to every man. There arises therefrom the universality of faith—the freedom of faith to Jews and Gentiles; vers. 12, 13. This freedom of faith is made actual by the universality of the preaching of the gospel and of the apostolic mission; vers. 14, 15. Unbelief is voluntary, like faith. The gospel is conditioned by faith; vers. 16–18. But the faith of the Gentiles is prophesied in the Old Testament, as well as the unbelief of the Jews; vers. 19–21.

[There is little difference of opinion among commentators respecting the meaning of this chapter as a whole. Dr. Hodge coincides most nearly with Dr. Lange in his divisions. Tholuck, Philippi, Meyer, Alford, make two sections. (1.) The further exposition of the fact that the exclusion of Israel is founded on their own unbelief; vers. 1–13. Alford: "The Jews, though zealous for God, are yet ignorant of God's righteousness (vers. 1–3), as revealed to them in their own Scriptures (vers. 4–13)." (2.) Proof from Scripture of the same fact; vers. 14–21. Tholuck: "They could not excuse themselves by this, that God had not done His part to make humanity know the gospel, or that it had not reached them, or that they could not have seen what their conduct with regard to it and God's dealings with the Gentiles would be." The connection with chap. ix. 33 is very close; and as the Apostle is accustomed to repeat, at the close of an argument, the proposition from which he started, the repetition of the quotation of chap. ix. 33, in ver. 11, favors the division of Dr. Lange.—R.]

Faith, vers. 1, 2. The fact described is no fatalistic decree.

Ver. 1. Brethren [Ἀδελφοί]. Bengel: "Hunc quasi superata præcedentis tractationis, secretitate comiter appellat fratres." Comp. 1 Cor. xiv. 20; Gal. iii. 15.—R.] Though this is an address to all readers, yet it is directed with special feeling to the Jewish Christians. Repetition and

My heart's desire, or, good-will [ἡ μὴ ἐκδοκία τῆς ἐμῆς καρδίας]. A real antithesis to the μὴ is contained in the judgment passed in ver. 3. [See Winer, p. 535; who thinks the antithesis was too painful to be expressed. All admit that the thought is found in ver. 3.—R.] Meyer, contrary to Chrysostom, Theodoret, and most of the early writers, as well as De Wette and Olshausen, holds that ἐκδοκία cannot mean wish, desiderium, but only benevolence (Vulgate, voluntas; Augustine, bona voluntas; Calvin, benevolentia). Tholuck: "There is, indeed, no example as yet in which ἐκδοκία is exactly equal to 'wish.' But how could the Apostle have said, 'My good pleasure and my prayer for them to God are directed to their salvation.' Yet he regards it advisable to adhere to the translation: My good-will for them. [The lexica' objection to rendering ἐκδοκία, desire, is weighty. On the other hand, the rendering good-will severs it from the context. The insertion of ἡ after ἐκδοκία was probably an attempt to avoid this difficulty. Alford suggests a "mixture of constructions: the Apostle's ἐκδοκία would be their salvation itself—his ἐκδοκία, κατὰ, was eis σοῦ." We hold to the more usual meaning of the word. Wordsworth pushes it as far as this: "Probably he uses this word because he wishes to represent the salvation of the Jews as a thing so consonant to God's wishes and counsel, that, as far as He is concerned, it is as good as done; and the Apostle delights in looking back, in imagination, upon that blessed result as already accomplished." There is little warrant in the word or context for such an interpretation.—R.]

And prayer to God [καὶ ἡ ἐκδοκία πρὸς τὸν θεόν]. The latter phrase can be limited to ἐκδοκία without adopting the poorly supported ἡ. The "prayer" was undoubtedly "of his heart," but there are no grammatical reasons for connecting that phrase with these words. Ἀκδοκία is, strictly, petition, request.—R.] We refer καὶ ἡ ἐκδοκία back to καρδία, and then exclusively to πρὸς τὸν θεόν. My heart is not only full of good-will toward the Jews, but it can also venture to intercede for them before God—a proof that they falsely regard me as their adversary—and I have not yet given up the hope of their salvation. This also comprises a pledge of Divine compassion. [So Bengel. "Non orasset Paulus, si absolute reprobati essent."—R.]

[On their behalf is for their salvation, ἵνα αὐτῶν εἰς σωτηρίαν. The correct reading shows how close the connection with chap. ix. is. Meyer: "Σωτηρία is the end which my ἐκδοκία would have for them, and my prayer asks for them." The E. V. gives the correct sense though in a paraphrase.—R.]

Ver. 2. For I bear them witness [μαρτυρῶ γὰρ αὐτοῖς. Γάρ introduces the reason for the preceding declaration.—R.] He still sees, even in their error, something good: they have a zeal of God [ζῆλον θεοῦ ἔχουσιν. Zeal for God, not great zeal, or godly zeal.] (Acts xxi. 20; xxii. 3; Gal. i. 14; John ii. 17.) This will, indeed, not be the only ground of his εὐδοκία, but is the ground of the cheerfulness of his intercession for them.

But not according to knowledge [ἀλλ' οὐ κατ' ἐπίγνωσιν. Comp. chap. iii. 20, p. 123; Col. i. 9 (Lange's Comm., p. 17).—R.] The ἐπίγνωσις is the knowledge which, being the living principle of discernment, impels far beyond the mere historical γνώσις. Meyer's definition: in consequence of the ἐπίγνωσις, is incorrect. The antithesis: κατὰ ἄγνοιαν, Acts iii. 17. The Apostle's statement may, as all events, be designed to alleviate his charge. The bright as well as the dark side of the religious zeal of the Jews was and is a peculiar phenomenon in the history of the world. [The objective advantages of the Jews were given in chap. ix. 1-5; here we have the subjective religiousness, which corresponds, although degenerating into blind fanaticism. Yet religious fanaticism, we infer from this passage, is preferable to religious indifferentism. There is something to hope for, a ground for good-will, where there is earnestness.—R.]

Vers. 3, 4. Self-righteousness, and the righteousness of faith.

Ver. 3. For they, not knowing (mistaking) the righteousness of God [ἀγνοῦντες γὰρ τὴν τοῦ θεοῦ δικαιοσύνην]. We take ground, with De Wette, and others, against Meyer, who does not see in the idea of ἀγνοῦντες the element of mistake, but merely the declaration of ignorance. [Meyer justifies his position, by saying that Paul was only proving the "not according to knowledge"—R.] But simple ignorance, without guilt, could have no meaning whatever in the present instance; and still less could it be the cause of wicked results. The same holds good of chap. ii. 4; 1 Cor. xiv. 38; see also Tholuck, in loco. Their ἀγνοῦν is the cause of their seeking to establish their own righteousness, and consequently they did not submit themselves to the Divine righteousness revealed in the gospel for faith.*

And striving to establish their own righteousness [καὶ τὴν ἰδίαν δικαιοσύνην ζητοῦντες στήσαι. See *Textual Note]. Essentially, it is the same as the righteousness of the law, according to Phil. iii. 9. Formally, this expression is stronger, because it not only signifies acquired righteousness in distinction from that which is bestowed, but as the real principle of this acquired righteousness, it denotes one's own choice, power, and will, as well as man's own will in opposition to God's choice, grace, and order. [The point of this distinction is lost, if the phrase be construed as = their own justification.—R.] Therefore this effort remains a nugatory ζητεῖν στήσαι (chap. iii. 31; Heb. x. 9). The στήσαι expresses the element of pride in their effort.

* [Stuart, and others, take the phrase righteousness of God here as = God's method of justification. How incorrect this is, will appear from a reference to p. 74 f. Dr. Hodge says, very properly: "It is that on which the sentence of justification is founded." Alford: "that righteousness, which avails before God, which becomes ours in justification."—R.]

[Have not submitted themselves, &c., ἐκείνην δικαιοσύνην . . . οὐκ ὑπέταξαν.] Meyer regards the ὑπέταξαν as passive, as in chap. viii. 20; 1 Cor. xv. 28. Tholuck, on the other hand, correctly regards it as reflexive.*

Ver. 4. For Christ is the end of the law [τέλος γὰρ νόμον Χριστός]. First, τέλος must be left in its full signification, and not be considered merely as the negative end by which the νόμος is made void; second, Χριστός is = Christ himself, not simply the foundation, the fundamental law of His theocracy (Meyer), or the doctrina Christi (Socinians, and others). In both cases, Meyer's explanation † would destroy the full meaning of the text. The same thing is declared in reality by the passages, Matt. v. 17; Rom. xiii. 10; Gal. iii. 24; Eph. ii. 15; Col. ii. 14. The end of the law was Christ, because Christ was, in a positive form, the fulfilment of the spiritual, essential import of the law, and therefore He was, at the same time, the making void of the imperfect Old Testament form of the law. Comp. 1 Tim. i. 5; 1 Peter i. 9; Rev. xxi. 6; xxii. 13. The centre of the idea is therefore final aim, purpose, and end (Chrysostom, Melancthon, Calvin, and others). There is no good ground for dividing this explanation into two different ones. On one hand, Erasmus, Wolf, and others, have brought out the positive view: Fulfilment of the law. The alternative here: obedientia activa, or obed. activa and passiva (see Meyer), must be removed. As for the negative view of the idea, Meyer cites a large number of authorities who harmonize with him in limiting it to this; yet he can hardly prove this by Augustine, Olshausen, and many others.‡ Even ver. 4 plainly says that Christ is in so far τέλος νόμον as He is unto righteousness to

* [Alford defends the passive sense, as expressing the result only, it might be themselves, or some other that subjected them—the historical fact was, they were not subjected. But as this verse presents an antithesis to πίστεως (ver. 1); and as the whole current of thought implies their personal guilt, the middle sense is preferable, and is adopted by the majority of commentators.—R.]

† [Meyer thus paraphrases: "For in Christ the valid of the law has come to an end, that righteousness should become the portion of every believing one."—R.]

‡ [Dr. Lange's view is, on the whole, to be preferred; but he does not clearly state those of other commentators. We append, therefore, the three opinions most in vogue. (1.) Christ is the aim (Endziel) of the law. (So Chrysostom, Calvin, Beza, Bengel, Alford, Webster and Wilkinson, and others.) This view means either (a.) the end of the law was to make men righteous, and this end is accomplished in Christ (Chrysostom, Stuart, and others); or, (b.) the law led to Him, as schoolmaster (Calvin, and others, Tholuck reaches this from another point of view). (2.) Christ is the fulfilment of the law (τέλος = πληρωμα). This is, indeed, true, but scarcely meets the requirements of this passage, especially if law be limited to the ceremonial law. (3.) Christ is the termination of the law (Augustine, Luther, Tholuck, Meyer, Hodge). This is the chronological view, which Dr. Lange calls the negative one. In what sense he is the termination of the law, is also a matter of dispute (ceremonial, or moral). Some confusion exists in most commentaries in the citing of authorities. In fact, these meanings largely run into each other. In favor of the last, it may be urged that the Apostle is drawing such a contrast here between the righteousness of the law and the righteousness of faith (ver. 5, 6), as requires a strong antithesis between the law and Christ; but unless we interpret: "When Christ came, the old legal system was abolished, and a new era commenced" (Hodge), this antithesis will not be correct. Yet the fact that Paul quotes from the law itself to support the claims of the righteousness of faith, seems inconsistent with this view. (See below.) Nor will it be evident how this verse introduces a proof of the non-submission of the Jews to the righteousness of God (ver. 5), unless it asserts that the law led to Christ, rather than that Christ abolished the law. All three views may be included but the first is the more prominent one.—R.]

every one that believeth, εἰς δικαιοσύνην παντὶ τῷ πιστεύοντι, and the γὰρ introduces just the proof that the Jews did not submit themselves to the righteousness of God, which, however, was manifested in Christ's fulfilment of the law (comp. chap. ix. 31). The question of the extent of prominence here given to the negative side of the τέλος, is connected with the explanation of vers. 5 and 6. [Stuart, following Platt, renders εἰς, with respect to. It is better to take it as indicating result or purpose. The former will be preferred, if τέλος be rendered aim; the latter, if it be rendered termination. The sense will then be, either: Christ is the aim of the law, so that righteousness may come to every one, &c.; or: Christ abolished (or fulfilled) the law, in order that, &c. The word righteousness has here the full sense, "righteousness of God;" but the emphasis rests on believeth.—R.]

Vers. 5-9. The universality of the righteousness of faith is proved by the Old Testament also.

On the citations. It is evident that vers. 5 and 6 present an antithesis between the idea of the righteousness which is of works and the inward essence of righteousness. But it is clear from the place of the citations, that this antithesis means no contradiction between the Old and New Testament. The quotation in ver. 5 is taken from Lev. xviii. 5; the quotation in ver. 6 from Deut. xxx. 11-14. It is evident, therefore, that the Apostle places the two sides of the law in contrast, one of which is an external Jewish law of works, and the other is an inward law of the righteousness which is of faith, or a law designed for the inward life; the one is transient, the other permanent. Therefore, he takes his first statement from Leviticus, and from that part of it where the laying down of the Mosaic obstacles to marriage is introduced; the second, on the other hand, is taken from Deuteronomy, which early imparts a profoundly prophetic meaning to the law. Therefore we read, first: Moses describeth, or writeth (and what he writes is a command); but then, The righteousness which is of faith speaketh (and what it says is a proclamation). Though the Apostle holds Deuteronomy to be as fully Mosaic as Leviticus, yet, in the former, Moses administers his office as the Old Testament lawgiver of the Jews; while, in the latter, the prophetic spirit of the righteousness of faith speaks as decidedly through him as if it altogether took his place.

Ver. 5.* For Moses writeth respecting the righteousness, &c. [Μωυσῆς γὰρ γράφει τὴν δικαιοσύνην, κτλ. The accusative after γράφειν is either governed by the verb in the transitive sense: to write of, to describe, or is the remote object, that concerning which it is written. The rendering: describeth is perhaps too strong, though lexically admissible.—R.] Ἰδού, John i. 46. The citation is from Leviticus, according to the LXX., but of the same purport as the original text.

We further read: Moses writeth down, or commands: The man who hath done them [ὅτι ἔποιτας αὐτὰ ἄνθρωπος]. The ποιήσας is emphatic, yet it is significantly connected with ἄνθρωπος. Αὐτὰ, that which is written, the commandments; the law, in the analytical form of commandments. The emphasis here rests on the doing. "But the righteousness which is of faith says: 'The word is nigh thee, even in thy mouth, and in thy heart; only confess with thy mouth, and believe in thy heart.'"

Shall live by them [ζήσεται ἐν αὐτοῖς. See Textual Note]. If αὐτῇ be adopted as the correct reading, it refers to the righteousness accruing from the doing of the commandments (Alford). Dr. Lange renders ἐν, durch, but this is too strong; in the strength of, is better.—R.] The different readings appear to have arisen from an apprehension that the Apostle's expression might cause a misunderstanding, perhaps an acceptance of the possibility of righteousness by works. Hence the omission of αὐτὰ, and the reading ἐν αὐτῇ ("He shall live by righteousness itself"). Cod. A. even reads: τὴν διὰ ἐκ πίστεως. A proof how decidedly the early Church rejected the righteousness of works. The assurance of life has been referred to the life in Palestine. But the historical standpoint of the Mosaic economy indicates something further than the vita prospera. Proof: 1. The vita prospera in the real sense, or as the welfare of the people, is a special promise for obedience to parents; Exod. xx. 12. 2. The most direct meaning of the passage in Leviticus is, that the transgression of the following statutes is connected with the punishment of death; chap. xviii. 29. 3. The passage in Deut. xxx. 16, not to mention Ezek. xx. 11, indicates something further than the mere vita prospera.*

There are here two antitheses: first, that of the externality of the law and the inwardness of the gospel; second, that of doing and experiencing. In the first case the promise reads: shall live by them; and in the second case there is the assurance: he shall be delivered, shall be saved. We have already observed that the Apostle did not wish to say that there is a contradiction between the Moses of Leviticus and of Deuteronomy; we may now ask, whether he has instituted an irreconcilable contrast between the two passages. This is very supposable, if ver. 5 be regarded as a purely hypothetical and almost ironical promise: If one fulfil all the commandments of the law, he would certainly live by them; but since no one is capable of this, no one can find life by the commandments. Therefore, after ver. 6, the gospel now takes the place of the law. [So Hodge, and others.] But this cannot be the Apostle's meaning. For, first, in that case the law would have been useless from the beginning. Second, an analytical fulfilment of the law would be designated as analytical, or at least as a theoretical way of life, by the side of the practical, and thus two kinds of righteousness would be conceivable, as well as two kinds of life. But, in our opinion, ver. 5 is not merely designed to prove that the law is at an end, but that its end has come because Christ has come. Therefore the expression in ver. 5 has an enigmatical form, as that in 1 Tim. iii. 16. Moses inscribes his precepts thus: The man which doeth those things—that is, who truly fulfils them—shall live by them. To be sure, the most direct Jewish social sense of this declaration was, that the observer of the commandments should not be subject to death, but live. But in its religious meaning, the law was as a sphinx, whose riddles every Israelite should attempt and try hard to solve until he came to self-righteousness, until the people became matured, and until the Mun came who solved the riddle.* In Leviticus the significance of the form of the passage under consideration, "the man which doeth those things shall live by them," appears in the addition: "I am the Lord." The Lord holds up the prize, and pledges it; Christ has won it. Thus ver. 5 means not only the fact that Christ has made void the law by the fulfilment of the law, but also that he has transposed and transformed it from the whole mass of external precepts to a principle of the inward life. Therefore the Apostle can immediately assume, in ver. 6, that Christ is known and is near to all, and accordingly apply the statement of Deut. xxx. 11-14.

* [To this may be added the exalted sense which ζωή has in the New Testament. Comp. Tholuck, Trench (referring to Christ's calling himself ζωή): "No wonder, then, that Scripture should know of no higher word than ζωή to set forth either the blessedness of God, or the blessedness of the creature in communion with God." Syn. N. v. Testamenti, § xxvii.—R.]

Ver. 6. But the righteousness which is of faith [ἡ διὰ πίστεως δικαιοσύνη]. Just as Moses has referred prospectively to Christ by the law, so does the righteousness which is of faith, or the gospel, refer retrospectively to Him.† The connection of the declaration in Deuteronomy is as follows: in chap. xxix. the curse is threatened the people if they become apostate; and in chap. xxx. mercy is promised them if they be converted. Ver. 10: (The Lord will bless thee) "if thou turn unto the Lord thy God with all thine heart and with all thy soul." Then, the ground of the possibility of such a conversion consists in the heartiness in the real spiritual nature of the law, which will always reassert and prove itself. The Apostle fully develops this christological germ by applying the promise of the righteousness of faith from the law to the gospel. The development is as follows:

1. As the inward character of the law was high and intelligible to the Jews at that time, or during the previous period in general, so high and intelligible must Christ, as the end of the law, now be to them.

2. As Moses, at that time, referred to an unbelief which regarded the law as merely external, arbitrary, and therefore foreign, far-fetched, so does there now stand in the way an unbelief, which mistakes and regards as an odd and peculiar phenomenon the near Christ, the nearness of Christ, which lies in His affinity to the inmost necessities of the heart.

3. If, at that time, the unbelieving Jew could say, "Who shall bring down the law?"—namely, that which was once neglected and lost—from above that means, in the language of the present, "Who shall bring Christ down from above?" although He has come upon the earth, and has here finished His life, and incorporated himself with humanity.

4. If, at that time, the unbelieving Jew said: "Who shall go over the sea for us, and bring the law to us?"—that is, as much as to say from the future world, the lower regions—that question is now, "Who shall bring Christ to us from the dead?" although Christ has risen from the dead, and has sealed His resurrection by the outpouring of His Spirit.

5. But just as, at that time, the essence or word of the law was infinitely near to Israel as an outline of its most personal and inward nature, so is now Christ, or the gospel by Him, still more than the fulfilment and completion of the most inward nature of man to righteousness and salvation. For if the law was already glorious, how shall not the gospel exceed in glory? 2 Cor. iii. 7-11.

Speakech thus [οὕτως λέγει]. The Apostle's decided intention of finding in the passage in Deuteronomy itself the real sense which he further expounds, is evident from the fact that he allows the righteousness which is of faith, personified in that passage, itself to speak. The multifarious surprise expressed by expositors on the Apostle's citation is chiefly traceable to a defective construction of the passage in Deuteronomy. According to Meyer, the meaning of the Mosaic passage is: The commandment is neither too hard nor too far; the people speak of it, and it is impressed in their hearts, in order that it may be performed. De Wette adopts the same view. According to Tholuck, the words would say: The faithful observance of the law is made so easy to man after the revelation that has taken place. But how can Moses say to the people, whose apostasy he hypothetically assumes, in their apostasy: Thy God will again accept thee if thou turn to Him, for thou hast the law in thy mouth and in thy heart—in the sense that the people are still living in the knowledge of the law, that the law is still in their hearts, and that they only need to perform it? The explanation of ver. 14 lies rather in ver. 15: The law is the true life of man himself; it is his real good. The transgression of the law is death and evil. God can therefore deliver man from the transgression of the law, because the law is as an inalienable appointment in his heart, and because he returns to his God when he comes to himself (Luke xv. 17). Because of this inwardness of the law in itself, it can be written upon man's heart (see Deut. xxx. 6); it can always revive afresh in him. The law is therefore not merely concealed from, or foreign to, man; it is not simply something positive from heaven, which may again altogether vanish to heaven; and it is no simple promise or threat from the future world, or from the realm of the dead, "from over the sea," which may be forgotten until death. Rather, it is still with Christ. For undoubtedly the Apostle will not merely say, in ver. 8, Faith is so high to men, because Christ is preached to them as the One who has become man, and is risen from the dead; but because the truth of Christ's incarnation and resurrection can unite, in the faith of their heart and in the confession of their mouth, for the completion and salvation of their inmost nature. The typical prophecy of the Mosaic passage, which Paul, the great master, has strikingly brought out, lies in the fact that conversion to the law is the beginning of its hearty reception, but that faith in the gospel is its completion; or, objectively defined, that the law is the shadow of the inward life, and that Christ is the life of this life itself.

* [Dr. Lange thus attempts to avoid the two opposing views (1.) that an actual outward obedience was followed by actual temporal blessings, and that this was all the saying of Moses meant; (2.) that the law belonged to a covenant of works, the conditions of which could not be fulfilled. The first is altogether out of keeping with the Apostle's argument. The second seems to put the law in a wrong position; for the law, although made a mere expression of the condition of a legal righteousness, is really something far more; it is the schoolmaster, &c., comp. chap. vii. and Gal. iii. 19-25. The antithesis between vers. 5 and 6 is not absolute, but relative. Even the doing and living, pointed to Christ, was fulfilled in Christ; who, by His victorious doing and living, makes us live and do.—R.]

† [Stuart: "But justification by faith speaketh thus. The sense is the same as to say: 'one who preaches justification by faith, might say,' &c. This is scarcely allowable, for it transfers the whole passage altogether out of the period of Moses' words, besides putting a limited and unexact meaning upon δικαιοσύνη.—R.]

On the different misunderstandings of this typical prophecy, see Tholuck, who speaks of a profound parody, p. 557 ff. Explanations: Only an application of the words of the law in the Old Testament (Chrysostom, Theodoret, &c., down to Neander); accommodation (Thomasius, Semler); ἐπινοία (Grotius); allusio (Calixtus); suavissima parodia (Bengel, and others).*

The explanations divide themselves into two principal classes. According to one, Paul has made use of the words of Moses for clothing his thoughts, with the knowledge that they, considered in themselves, expressed something altogether different. Philippi calls it "a holy and lovely play of God's Spirit upon the word of the Lord." But would not that be a very unlovely play of the Apostle upon the word of the Lord? Likewise Tholuck is of the opinion, that there has been a failure to prove an application corresponding to the meaning of the text, and, still less, the identity of the historical meaning with the Pauline interpretation. Naturally, the constructions of this class are partly of a critical (Semler) and partly of an apologetical nature (Bengel).

The other class accept, that in the declaration of Moses the Apostle has really found the prophecy declared by him. But this again divides into two subdivisions: 1. He was the expositor of that passage in his spiritual illumination as an Apostle; 2. Rather, one intimately acquainted with the rabbinical hermeneutics. Calvin, and others, who belong to the first subdivision, hold that universa doctrina verbi divini is meant; Knapp, the commandment of love toward God; Hackspan, and others, the messianic promise; Luther, who is frequently hesitating, belongs to both of the principal classes (Tholuck, p. 558). The expositors of the other subdivision regard Paul's interpretation as an allegorical exegesis—that Paul, using the Jewish expository art, has allegorized the passage, and has found in it a Midrash, or secret meaning. Meyer regards the sum of the oracular meaning to be this: "Be not unbelieving, but believing!" A Midrash, indeed, which might well be drawn from every verse of the Bible.

[The majority of commentators adopt the view, that Paul does not cite the words of Moses as such, but merely adapts them to his purpose. But the position of Dr. Lange seems preferable, not only because this "adaptation" or "accommodation" is not what we would expect from such a writer as Paul, but because the other view is more in accordance with the context. As Forbes well says: "St. Paul's great object in reasoning with his countrymen is to prove to them, out of their own Scriptures, that God's mode of salvation, from the first, had been always the same (simple faith in Him), and that their Law was but a provisional dispensation, designed to prepare for the universal Gospel, which was to embrace all equally Gentiles as well as Jews. Is it likely that the arguments adduced to persuade the Jews of this from their own Scriptures would, even in part, be words turned from their true meaning in the Jewish Scriptures?" Vers. 2 and 3 show how necessary this proof is. This view accords, too, with ver. 4, and the real position of the law. Alford: "The Apostle, regarding Christ as the end of the law, its great central aim and object, quotes these words not merely as suiting his purpose, but as bearing, where originally used, an a fortiori application to faith in Him who is the end of the law, and to the commandment to believe in Him, which is now 'God's commandment.' If spoken of the law as a manifestation of God in man's heart and mouth, much more were they spoken of Him, who is God manifest in the flesh, the end of the law and the prophets." "In this passage it is Paul's object not merely to describe the righteousness which is of faith in Christ, but to show it described already in the words of the law." Thus the connection as well as the contrast of law and gospel are preserved. This view suits the precise circumstances of the original utterance (see Forbes, pp. 356 ff.). That the variation (in ver. 7) and the omission of parts of the original, do not interfere with it, is obvious.—R.]

Say not in thine heart [μή εἰπῇς ἐν τῇ καρδίᾳ σου. LXX.: λέγων; Hebrew, -בְּלִבְךָ]. The passage is taken out of its grammatical connection, and "in thine heart" added, as might well be done. The phrase is = think not (Alford).—R.] This is the ever-recurring secret or expressed language of the unbeliever. Revelation is something thoroughly heterogeneous and strange to, and in disagreement with, my nature. To the words say not, Paul has added in thine heart, perhaps to bring out the contradiction, that a witness of faith can assert itself in the same heart in which unbelief speaks negatively.

Who shall ascend into heaven? [Τίς ἀναβήσεται εἰς τὸν οὐρανόν; The τίς of the LXX. is omitted.] This formerly meant: It is impossible to bring down from heaven the law (that which we have lost, because it was foreign to us); but it now means: Who shall bring Christ down from heaven, that He may become man? the incarnation of the Son of God is inconceivable. Thus the actual incarnation of Christ is, to Paul, the full consequence of the moral truth of the Mosaic law.

[That is, to bring Christ down, τοῦτ' ἐστὶν Χριστὸν καταγαγεῖν]. The τοῦτ' ἐστὶν lays down the meaning of the Old Testament language in the New Testament sense. On the different explanations of it, see Tholuck, p. 565 [The two leading interpretations are (1.) That is to say—i. e., whoever asks this question, says, in effect, Who will bring Christ down? thus he denies that He has come already—makes of the Incarnation an impossibility. (So Erasmus, Calvin, Philippi, and others.) (2.) That is, in order to bring Christ down. This gives the purpose of the ascending. In this view, τοῦτ' ἐστὶν is = the rabbinical וְכֵן. This implies also a denial of the Incarnation. See Meyer. In its favor is the fact, that a final clause follows in Deuteronomy. The reference to the present position of Christ at the right hand of God (Calvin Reiche, and others) is out of keeping with the con text, especially the order in ver. 9. The passage has been tortured into a variety of special applications, but the majority of commentators now support the reference to the Incarnation, though differing as to the precise character of the questions (see below). It should be noticed, that this view assumes the certainty of the preexistence of Christ.—R.]

* [So Hodge: "Without directly citing this passage, Paul uses nearly the same language to express the same idea." Stuart: "It is the general nature of the imagery, in the main, which is significant to the purpose of the writer. Paul means simply to affirm that, if Moses could truly say that his law was intelligible and accessible, the doctrine of justification by faith in Christ is still more so." But this method of regarding the passage is open to very grave objections. It regards Paul as sanctioning that dangerous use of Scripture, "by way of accommodation," which is evidently wrong, judged by its evil effects on preacher and people at the present day.—R.]

Who shall descend into the deep? [ἢ τίς καταβήσεται εἰς τὴν ἄβυσσον; LXX: τίς διαπεράσει ἡμῖν εἰς τὸ πέραν τῆς θαλάσσης]. An explanation of the Mosaic passage: Beyond the sea! According to Schulz, (Deuteronomium), Beyond the sea refers only to the vast extent of the sea. This would be tautology in relation to the foregoing. To bring from beyond the sea, can also not mean (according to Vitringa), to bring over from the Greeks. That the sea may be considered as עֲדֵימָה, ἄβυσσος, is proved by the harmony of the Septuagint. But עֲדֵימָה is not עַד, and over the sea is altogether a different idea from into the deep. The probable solution of the difference is, that the ideas over the ocean and beneath the earth coincide as designations of the realm of the dead. The Greek Tartarus is, indeed, under the earth, but not a real cavern under the earth. The Greek Elysium lies far out in the ocean, on the Isles of the Blessed. Also, in the present passage, Paul has evidently found the realm of the dead to be indicated by the words beyond the sea. Similar notions existed among the Celts and Germans. Meyer dismisses the question in a very untenable manner, when he says: The view of Reiche, Bolten, and Ammon—that the place of the blessed (over the sea) is also meant in the Hebrew—confounds a heathen representation with the Jewish one of Sheol (see Job xxi. 5, 6).

[Dr. Lange (following Chrysostom, De Wette, Meyer, and others) assumes throughout that these questions are questions of unbelief, although finding in the passage something more than Meyer's brief statement: "Be not unbelieving, but believing." Alford gives a full discussion of the three views: questions of unbelief, of embarrassment, of anxiety. He combines all three: The anxious follower after righteousness is not disappointed by an impracticable code, nor mocked by an unintelligible revelation; the word is near him, therefore accessible; plain and simple, and therefore apprehensible—deals with definite historical fact, and therefore certain; so that his salvation is not contingent on an amount of performance which is beyond him, and therefore inaccessible; irrational, and therefore inapprehensible; undefined, and therefore involved in uncertainty. Thus, it seems to me, we satisfy all the conditions of the argument; and thus, also, it is clearly brought out that the word themselves could never have been spoken by Moses of the righteousness which is of the law, but of that which is of faith." Dr. Hodge does not clearly define which view he adopts, although objecting to the thought, that the object is to encourage an anxious inquirer.—R.] The reference of unbelief to an unbelief in the sitting of Christ at the right hand of God (by Melancthon, Calvin, and others), removes the centre of the object of faith; this centre is the resurrection.

Ver. 8. But what saith it? [ἀλλὰ τί λέγει;] After the Apostle has shown what the righteousness which is of faith forbids saying, he brings out what it says itself to unbelief. Rückert and Philippi [Hodge and Stuart] have intensified too much the antithesis between Moses and the righteousness of faith; Meyer obliterates it by formally referring even the expression concerning the righteousness of faith to "For Moses writeth." [The former position is almost inseparable from the view of ver. 4, and of the use of Old Testament language, which these commentators hold.—R.]

The word is nigh thee [ἐγγύς σου ἐστί; ἔφημά ἐστιν]. The ἐγγύς σου is stronger than if it were ἐγγύς σου. It is one next to thee, a neighbor, a relative of thine. The opinion of Chrysostom, Grotius, and others [held to some extent by Stuart, Hodge, and others], that this verse is an assurance how easy it is to become righteous, is foreign to the context. We must not suppose that this is an expression of merely the historical acquaintance with Christianity. If this were the case, how could it be said to the doubter and unbeliever: It is in thy mouth and in thy heart? [The Apostle evidently here says, not what is, but what may be, just as Moses had done (Tholuck).—R.] But as the word of life, which should be peculiarly in the mouth and in the heart, it is attested in a twofold way. First, it is the word of faith,* which we, the apostles, as God's heralds and Christ's witnesses, preach. Second, its effect is, that he who confesses Jesus with the mouth as his Lord, and believes in his heart that He is risen from the dead to a blessed life, shall be saved.

Ver. 9. Because [ὅτι]. The E. V. follows Beza, the Vulgate, &c., in rendering ὅτι, that, indicating the purport of the word preached. Dr. Hodge gives, besides, a view which connects this verse directly with the former part of ver. 8: it says that, &c.; but this is opposed by any proper view of the citation from Deuteronomy. The sense, as now generally agreed (Tholuck, Stuart, De Wette, Meyer, Alford), is that of because, or for, giving a proof of what precedes. To mouth and heart correspond confession and belief. This purport of the preaching would scarcely be stated in this form.—R.]

[If thou shalt confess with thy mouth, ἐὰν ὁμολογήσῃς ἐν τῷ στόματι σου. Confession is put first here, on account of the connection with the words quoted in ver. 8. This is a further proof of the meaning because. In ver. 10, belief comes first.—R.]

Jesus as Lord [κύριον Ἰησοῦν]. The mass of commentators are disposed to take κύριον as a predicate placed first for emphasis, and render as above. So Tholuck, Stuart, Hodge, De Wette, Meyer, Schaff, Webster and Wilkinson, Noyes, Lange. Alford doubts this interpretation; comp. his note in loco. See Textual Note. Hodge: "To confess Christ as Lord, is to acknowledge Him as the Messiah, recognized as such of God, and invested with all the power and prerogatives of the mediatorial throne." Used in such close connection with a citation from the LXX, which translates Jehovah by the same word κύριος, it certainly means more than an acknowledgment of power and moral excellence; especially as this part of our verse corresponds with the coming down from heaven alluded to in ver. 6.—R.] Just as the words "Lord Jesus" correspond with to bring down from heaven, so raised him from the dead corresponds with to bring up from the dead.—[Thou shalt be saved, σωθήσῃ. Belief, with the heart, in the central fact of redemption, the resurrection, not as an isolated historical event, but as linked indissolubly with the coming down of the Son of God, now the ascended Lord—and hence confession of Him as such—these are the requisites for salvation. "A dumb faith is no faith" (Olshausen).—R.]

For with the heart faith is exercised unto righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation. The Apostle presents, in this verse, the parallelism with reference to ver. 9, and the underlying passage of Deut. xxx. 14. Yet he now reverses the order of heart and mouth, in harmony with the genesis of the life of faith, especially in the New Testament. As a matter of course, faith and confession are connected with each other, just as the heart and the mouth, or as the heart and speech; that faith without confession, would return to unbelief, but confession without faith would be hypocrisy. However, the distinction is correct: first, faith in the heart, then, confession with the mouth. There is the same distinction of effects. Faith in the heart results in justification; confession with the mouth—that is, the decided standing up for faith with word and deed—results in σωτηρία in its final signification, deliverance from evil to salvation, with the joy and freshness of faith.* It is natural to man that only that first becomes his complete possession and his perfect joy which he confesses socially with his mouth, and which he maintains by his life. See Tholuck, p. 571, on the apprehension of the early Protestant orthodoxy, that by a distinction of the two parts εἰς δικαιοσύνην and εἰς σωτηρίαν prejudice would be done to the doctrine of justification.† The doctrine of the righteousness which is of faith has, indeed, been carried to such excess, that it has been regarded as prejudiced by the requirement of the fruits of faith in the final judgment. This reduces it to a dead-letter affair, and is a failure to appreciate the necessary elements in the development of life. The Apostle's testimony is so decidedly one of experience, that it expresses the permanent force of the law of faith by the passive forms: πιστεύεται, ὁμολογείται. This is its custom; thus is the kingdom of heaven taken by force.

For the Scripture saith (Isa. xxviii. 16). "Πᾶς," says Meyer, "is neither in the LXX. nor in the Hebrew, but Paul has added it in order to mark the (to him) important feature of universality, which he found in the unlimited ὁ πιστεύων."

* [Alford thus paraphrases: "With the heart, faith is exercised (πιστεύεται, men believe) unto (so as to be available to) the acquisition of righteousness, but (q. d., not only so; but there must be an outward confession, in order for justification to be carried forward to salvation) with the mouth confession is made unto salvation." See the terminus ultimus et apex justificationis, consequent not merely on the act of justifying faith, but on a good confession before the world, maintained unto the end."—R.]

† [Dr. Hodge is very guarded here "By confessing him before men, we secure the performance of His promise that He will confess us before the angels of God." But surely we may not fear to interpret salvation as an actual salvation, begun here in us, and to culminate at that time, when we shall be thus confessed.—R.] ev."* This is, in meaning, certainly contained in the πιστεύων. The weight of the clause lies in the fact that only faith is here desired. The Apostle has very justifiably referred the ἐν αὐτῷ to Christ.

Shall not be put to shame. That is, shall attain to salvation (see chap. v. 5; ix. 33).

B. The universality of faith. Vers. 12, 13. The testimony of Scripture for the universality of faith.

Ver. 12. For there is no distinction between Jew and Greek [οὐ γὰρ διαφορά Ἰουδαίου τε καὶ Ἑλλήνος. This rendering is more literal than that of the E. V. See Textual Note 11. Greek stands here for Gentile. Comp. chap. i. 18; also in chap. iii. 22.—R.] No difference in reference to the freedom of faith; in reference to the possibility and necessity of attaining to salvation by faith. The right of faith is the same to Jews and Gentiles. Proof:

For the same is Lord of all [ὁ γὰρ αὐτὸς κύριος πάντων. See Textual Note 2.] Strictly speaking, we must suppose a breviloquence also here: One and the same Lord is Lord over all. The one Lord is Christ, according to Origen, Chrysostom, Bengel, Tholuck, and most other expositors (see ver. 9). Others refer the expression to God (Grotius, Ammon, Köllner, &c.); Meyer, on the other hand, has good ground for observing that it was first necessary to introduce the Christian character,† as Olshausen has done ("God in Christ"); see Acts x. 36; Phil. ii. 11.

Rich. [Lange: erweisend sich reich.] ἰζου- τῶν (see chap. viii. 32; xi. 33; Eph. i. 7; ii. 7-iii. 8).

Unto all [εἰς πάντας. Alford: toward all; Lange: über Alle; Meyer: für Alle, zum Besten Aller; Olshausen: "By εἰς is signified the direction in which the stream of grace rushes forth."—R.] This is both the enlargement and restriction of Christ's rich proofs of salvation. Only those who call upon him [τοὺς ἐπικαλουμένους αὐτόν], but also all who call upon him, share in His salvation. The calling upon Him is the specific proof of faith, by which they accept Him as their Lord and Saviour.

Ver. 13. [For every one whosoever, &c., πᾶς γὰρ ὅς, &c., &c. See Textual Note 12.] Scriptural proof: Joel iii. 5. [LXX. and E. V., ii. 32.] Tholuck: "The omission of the exact form of the quotation occurs either in universally known declarations, as in Eph. v. 31, or where the Apostle makes an Old Testament statement the substratum of his own thought, as in chap. xi. 34, 35." Paul has specified the name κύριος in Joel as the name of the God of revelation, in harmony with the messianic passage. [If we accept a reference to Christ in ver. 12, we must do the same here, as, indeed, the next verse also requires. Alford well says: "There is hardly a stronger proof, or one more irrefragable by those who deny the Godhead of our Blessed Lord, of the unhesitating application to Him

* [Alford: "The Apostle seems to use it here as taking up καὶ τὸ πιστεύον, ver. 4." At all events, there is a recurrence to the starting-point, chap. ix. 22 where the same passage was cited, and this enlargement of it is at once established in the verses which follow. A weighty monosyllable!—R.]

† [Meyer means that, if God is referred to, we must add this definition, "God in Christ;" which is altogether contrary, as he well remarks.—R.]

by the Apostle of the name and attributes of Jehovah."—R.]

Vers. 14, 15: The realization of the universal righteousness of faith through the universality of preaching and the apostolic mission.

Ver 14. How then can they call on him? [πῶς οὖν ἐπικαλέσονται αὐτῷ, κ.τ.λ. See Textual Note "a," and below.] The proof, clothed in the vivacious form of a question, of the necessity of the universal apostleship and of his preaching, is a sermon. Faith in the Lord precedes calling upon Him (in order to be saved); the hearing of the message of faith precedes faith; but His message presupposes preachers, and preaching presupposes again a corresponding mission. From this it then follows, that the apostolate urges forward the preaching in the name of the Lord, and that unbelief in the apostolic message is disobedience to the Lord himself.* The view of Grotius and Michaelis, that vers. 14 and 15 are a Jewish objection and excuse, complicates the Apostle's perspicuous train of thought. But Chrysostom and others have correctly observed, that he here establishes the universal apostleship by virtue of the institution of faith, even in respect to the Jews, and to the narrow Jewish Christianity; but, according to Meyer, he does not reach this point until ver. 18 ff., where, indeed, he first makes full application of its establishment. Meyer: "Important Codd. have the conjunctive (deliberative) aorist instead of the future, which Lachmann has accepted. But the testimony is by no means decisive. [See Textual Note "a." On the future, see Winer, p. 262.—R.] The subjects of those who call are all who are called to salvation, Jews and Gentiles, in the universal sense. [Or, as Alford suggests, "men, represented by the πᾶς ὃς ἂν of ver. 13."—R.] Thus the preachers, in vers. 14 and 15, are still indefinite (De Wette, and others, against Meyer).

[How can they believe, &c., πῶς δὲ πιστεύουσιν οὐ οὐκ ἤκουσαν. On the construction of the genitive οὐ, see Meyer; comp. Eurip., Medea, p. 752. Meyer seems scarcely justified in insisting upon the correctness of the Vulgate: quomodo credent ei, quem non audierunt. The E. V. gives the proper meaning.—Without a preacher, χωρὶς κηρύσσοντος. Tittmann, Syn. N. T., p. 98: χωρὶς ad subjectum, quod ad objecto se junctum est, refertur, ἄντιν autem ad objectum, quod a subjecto abesse cogitatur. Dr. Lange may be correct in claiming that the preachers are as yet indefinite, but the beautiful precision of the Greek requires us to find an intimation of the certainty of the universal gospel proclamation. In the first two questions, there is an absolute negative; in the third, χωρὶς occurs, implying the probability that one will preach; in the last, we have ἐὰν μή, which indicates that, however men may fail to call and hear, those who will preach will certainly be sent forth. This turn of expression seems to have escaped the notice of commentators, but it points directly toward the position the Apostle is establishing: the universality of the means provided by God for the salvation of men, whether they hear or forbear.—R.]

* [Dr. Hodge: "It is an argument founded on the principle, that if God wills the end, He wills also the means." He properly opposes Calvin's view, that the Apostle is proving the design of sending the gospel to the Gentiles from the fact that they have received it. Still, Dr. Lange's view (which is that of De Wette and Meyer) seems yet more exact, since the providing of the means is more marked in this passage than their success.—R.]

Ver. 15. [And how shall they preach, except they be sent? πῶς δὲ κηρύξουσιν ἐὰν μὴ ἀποστολῶσιν;] The definite preachers spring first from the divine mission. But the Apostle proves, by Isa. lii. 7, that there must be such sent (apostolic) preachers.

As it is written, How beautiful, &c. The Apostle here repeats the prophet's announcement in an abridged and free manner, but yet in strict conformity with the sense; following the original text more closely than the LXX. According to Meyer, the prophetic passage in question speaks of the happy deliverance from exile, while the Apostle has very properly interpreted it in its messianic character as a prophecy of the gospel preachers of the messianic kingdom. But the full, mysterious messianic import of the prophetic passage extends beyond the meaning of a typical prophecy as verbal prophecy. The beauty of the feet of the messengers of peace is hardly spoken of, because the feet of the one who approaches become visible (Tholuck), but because they, in their running and hastening, in their scaling obstructing mountains, and in their appearance and descent from mountains, are the symbolical phenomena of the earnestly desired winged movement and appearance of the gospel itself. Paul has left out the mountains, and has given the collective singular a plural form, according to the sense; peace has to him the full idea of the gospel salvation; the good things are the rich, displayed, saving blessings which proceed from the one salvation.

Vers. 16–18: But as the gospel is, on the one hand, naturally free and universal in relation to the antithesis of Jews and Gentiles, so, on the other, it is, according to its inward nature, conditioned by the antithesis of faith and unbelief.

Ver. 16. But they did not all hearken to the glad tidings [Ἀλλ' οὐ πάντες ἠγάκουσαν τῷ εὐαγγελίῳ]. The aorist is historic; during the preaching (Alford). Hence the general reference is to be admitted, especially as the ἀλλὰ contrasts with the preaching to "all," the limited result.—R.] Theodore of Mopsvestia and Reiche do violence to the connection in reading these words as a question. Fritzsche holds that they refer to the Gentiles; and Meyer, to the Jews. But they refer chiefly to the difference between believers and unbelievers in general, for there were also unbelievers among the Gentiles; and, above all, the question was the general establishment of the antithesis: believers and unbelievers, and then its application to Jews and Gentiles.

Lord, who believed our report? [Κύριε, τίς ἐπίστευσεν τῇ ἀκοῇ ἡμῶν;] An exact quotation from the LXX.] This citation from the prophet Isaiah, chap. liii. 1, is mainly a strong proof of this: that the preaching of salvation does not meet with faith on the part of all to whom it is preached, although in this citation the reference to the Jews comes out more definitely. The hyperbolic expression of the prophet means: "Only a few believe." The entire contents of Isa. liii. prove that here we have not only to deal with a typical prophecy, but also with a verbal one.

On the different interpretations of ἀκοή, see Tholuck, p. 577: "Tha' which is preached." "to preach what is heard from God." Meyer: "The preaching which is apprehended;" or, in which the stress rests upon the right apprehension (the words of obedience).—Not all. That is, not all within the reach of preaching (ἀκοή, ῥῆμα). [The word ἀκοή has occasioned much difficulty. For, if rendered report, preaching, here, then it would seem natural to give it the same sense in ver. 17. But if this be done, then "word of God" must receive an unusual meaning (see below). Generally the commentators have admitted his meaning here without question, and then in various ways met the subsequent difficulty. Forbes, however, strikes at the root of the matter, and claims that there is no ground for rendering ῥῆμα, report—i. e., what we cause others to hear. His view has been adopted by Hengstenberg, and is the most satisfactory solution yet offered. ἀκοή, like the Hebrew equivalent, he claims with reason,* refers to the message viewed from the side of the hearer, not from that of the preacher. The prophet is speaking in the name of his countrymen, as he does throughout the chapter: Who (of us) hath believed that which we heard? (See Forbes, pp. 362 ff.) This view is more literal; it does not disturb in the least the general drift of the argument, while it relieves ver. 17 of a great difficulty. In fact, Meyer, Alford, and others, approach this sense, but too indirectly; this is as simple as it is satisfactory.—R.]

Ver. 17.† So then faith cometh of hearing [ἄρα ἡ πίστις ἐξ ἀκοῆς]. From the ἀκοή. Explanations: The message preached (Tholuck, Meyer [Hodge, and most]); the act of hearing (Calixtus, Philippi, and others); hearing with faith (Weller, and other Lutheran expositors). As this preaching does not meet with universal faith, only the announcement itself can be meant. [Accepting Forbes' explanation of ἀκοή in ver. 16, we apply it here: Faith comes from what is heard, not the act of hearing—which gives a different sense from ver. 16; nor what is preached—which confuses this word and ῥῆμα.—R.]

And hearing through the word of God [ἡ δὲ ἀκοή διὰ ῥήματος θεοῦ]. See Textual Note 22 on the reading Χριστοῦ.] Different explanations of the ῥῆμα θεοῦ: 1. God's revealed word (Tholuck, and others); 2. God's order, commission (Beza, Meyer [Hodge], and others). The ground: Because otherwise ῥῆμα θεοῦ would not be different from ἀκοή. But strictly speaking, both definitions are indissolubly united in the revealed word with which prophets and apostles were entrusted. The Divine message, as such, is a formal sending, or a commission and a material sending; or, with these, also a preaching. Therefore Tholuck does not appear to be correct, when he says that τὸ ῥῆμα θεοῦ ἐπὶ τῶν denotes not God's order, but His oracles; Jer. i. 1, &c. Nevertheless, there does exist a difference between this ῥῆμα and the ἀκοή; ἀκοή is every message of salvation to the end of the world; but the ῥῆμα θεοῦ denotes the Divine sources of revelation, on whose effluence the authority and effect of every message depend: The word, and the fact, and the effect in life taken together. Therefore διὰ ῥήματος. [The thing heard is through or by means of the revelation of God.

* [This is the classical usage, and all the New Testament passages can be quite as readily explained thus. The Hebrew word is not Hiphil, yet the common interpretation forces a Hiphil sense upon it.—R.]

† (Stuart has a singular view respecting this verse. He finds in it the suggestion of the Jewish objector, whom he has already discovered in vers. 14, 15, to the effect that "many of the Jews are not culpable for unbelief, inasmuch as they have not heard the gospel, and hearing it is necessary to the believing of it."—R.)

This is the sense, if we adopt the usual meaning of ἀκοή; and, indeed, it gives ῥῆμα a simpler sense. De Wette suggests that ῥῆμα prepares for τὰ ῥῆματα in the next verse.—R.]

Ver. 18. But I say, Did they not hear? [ἀλλὰ λέγω, μή οὐκ ἤκουσαν;] The indefinite it [which Dr. Lange supplies] is regarded by Meyer as denoting the ἀκοή; and, according to Tholuck, as that which has heretofore been the subject under consideration; which is sufficient. [All the difficulty about the verb here disappears, if Forbes' view be accepted. There is no necessity for going back to ver. 14, or making the matter indefinite. The Apostle has been speaking of the necessity of hearing, of the thing heard; now he says, did they not hear? The universality of the privilege is affirmed.—R.] Although reference is constantly made to the Jews, the question is nevertheless, principally and formally, concerning unbelievers in general. If unbelievers, as unbelieving people, can excuse themselves by saying that they have not heard God's message, the most direct answer would be: "Then they would not be unbelievers in the specific sense." But the Apostle rather brings out the fact of the incipient universal propagation of the gospel, by clothing it in the language of Pa. xix. 4, from the LXX.

[Nay, verily, μενοῦνται. Comp. chap. ix. 20. So far from this being the case, their sound went out into all the earth, &c., εἰς πᾶσας τῆς γῆς, κ.τ.λ. An exact quotation from the LXX. (Pa. xviii. 5; Heb. xix. 5; Eng., xix. 4.—R.) In the Psalm, the question is undoubtedly the universal revelation of God in nature; therefore we cannot regard it as a real prophecy, and as an argument in the usual sense. However, the Apostle seems to clothe his view of the incipient universality of the gospel in those words of the Psalms, because he perceived in the universal revelation of nature the type and guarantee of the future revelation of salvation. Then, his having given to the ῥῆμα θεοῦ another reference, also corresponds to this freer application of the passage (there, the sound of God's works; here, the preacher). (Dr. Lange here follows the mass of commentators (including Stuart, Hodge). But Calvin, Stier, Hengstenberg, Alford, Forbes, regard these words "as possessing a real argumentative force, when interpreted according to their genuine meaning as designed at first by the Psalmist." Alford urges the fact: "that Pa. xix. is a comparison of the sun, and the glory of the heavens with the word of God." Calvin: "As He spoke to the Gentiles by the voice of the heavens, He showed by this prelude that He designed to make himself known at length to them also." Dr. Lange, it is true, approaches this view, yet does not find it in the Psalm, but in the Apostle's use of it. Was the Apostle likely to convince his countrymen by putting a new meaning on their Scriptures?—R.]

On the gross misconstruction of this passage, that the gospel should extend everywhere, even at Paul's time, see Meyer [p. 408, 4th ed.]; Tholuck, p. 580. As for the ecstatic salutation of the universality of God's kingdom, then first appearing, which often occurs in Paul (see Col. i. 25), compare the two statements of Justin Martyr and Tertullian: Tholuck, p. 380. That which appears surprising is:

* [The LXX. thus renders שָׁמַע, which means, to hear; then, from the string of consonants, their—R.]

the hyperbolic form of the Apostle's statement of the universal propagation of the gospel, disappears just in proportion as that propagation is regarded not quantitatively, but qualitatively. Jerusalem and Rome were the centres of the ancient world. But, in addition to them, there were many other general centres. The error of expounding the passage in the sense of a quantitative universality could not hold good, even if we admit that the gospel had at that time reached America; the whole of the fifth grand division of the world, as well as all Africa, would also have to come into consideration.

C. The faith of the Gentiles and the unbelief of Israel. Vers. 19-21: Propheesied already in the Old Testament.

Ver. 19. But I say, Did Israel not know? [μὴ ἴσταντο οὐκ ἔγνω.] The Apostle now passes over to the long-prepared antithesis of unbelieving Israel and of the believing Gentiles. But yet, in his representation of this fearful inversion (which stirred up unbelieving Judaism) of the old theocratic relation—according to which the Jews were God's people, and the Gentiles were given up to themselves—he has recourse to the witnesses of the Old Testament respecting the beginning and prospect of this inversion. After the first question: "Have unbelievers not heard the gospel?" there follows the second: "Did not Israel know it?" We may now ask: What is referred to? Explanations:

1. That the gospel should pass from the Gentiles to the Jews (Thomas Aquinas, Calovius, Tholuck [Stuart, Hodge, Jowett], and others). But that threat was only conditionally uttered, and is not contained in the foregoing.

2. The gospel (Chrysostom, and others). [Here must be classed Calvin and Beza, who supply: the truth of God; Philippi and Forbes: the word or message of God (from ver. 17). The last named defend their view, from the emphasis which seems to rest on Israel (in the correct reading), and from the parallelism with ver. 18. Meyer opposes, with reason, the μὴ-οὐκ, which anticipates an affirmative answer; nor is this objection met, by saying that an affirmative might be expected, that Israel ought to have known the gospel. Paul knew too sadly that the reverse was the fact.—R.]

3. That the gospel should become universal, according to the preceding language of the Psalm (Fritzsche, De Wette [Alford], Meyer).^{*} Meyer places Tholuck also in this category. Tholuck, however, now declares for (1.), as follows: "But yet the following prophetic declarations do not contain so much the universality of preaching, as explanations of the inverted relation which God will assume toward Gentiles and Jews."

At all events, the citation immediately following is not simply a proof of the universality of the gospel. But it only follows therefrom, that a new statement is made with the proof. This also holds good of the last quotation. The progress is as follows: a. Universality; Pa. xix. b. The faith of the Gentiles for the awakening of the faith of the Jews; Deut. xxxii. 21. c. The faith of the Gentiles; Isa. lxv. 1. d. The unbelief of the Jews; Isa. lxv. 2. Therefore we regard the explanation of Fritzsche,

&c., as correct, and all the more striking, as the fulfilment of this very ancient prospect just now becomes an offence to Israel.—Proof:

First Moses saith [πρῶτος Μωσῆς, λέγει. First, "in the order of the prophetic roll" (Alford), with reference to Isaiah, as one among the many who spoke afterward to the same effect. Wetstein, Storr, Flatt, join πρῶτος with οὐκ ἔγνω, but on insufficient grounds.—R.] The future universality of the Abrahamic blessing had been declared earlier, but it was Moses who first declared that there should be no difference between Jews and Gentiles before God's righteousness; indeed, that possibly the Gentiles, in their good conduct, might be preferred to the Jews in their bad conduct. Thus the same Moses who communicated to Israel its economic advantages over the Gentiles, was he who had set up the rule of faith by which this relation could possibly be inverted in the future.

I will provoke you to jealousy [Ἐγὼ παραζηλώσω ὑμᾶς. The only variation from the LXX. (which closely follows the Hebrew) is the substitution of ὑμᾶς, in each clause, for αὐτοὺς.—R.] Thus Moses speaks to Israel in the name of the Lord; Deut. xxxii. 21.

With those who are no people [ἐπ' οὐκ ἔθνη. The precise force of the preposition is with difficulty conveyed by any English word. It is not = against, although that is implied; nor = by, means of, but rather, on account of. With expresses the weaker shade of instrumental force sufficiently well, but the real sense is: aroused on account of and directed toward a no-people.—R.] עַל אֵין נָפֶשׁ. The Gentile nations were not recognized as true nations in the idea of the people, because they were devoid of that religious and moral principle which transforms nature into a moral nationality; see chap. ix. 25; 1 Peter ii. 10. עַל, from אֵין, denotes, strictly speaking, the increasing mass of natural human beings; עַל, from עַם, a connection, assembly, community. [The words people, nation, are used in the E. V. to preserve the distinction between the Hebrew words. Despite the fact that the LXX. has used the same word to render both, it has not been overlooked in the E. V. in this passage.—R.] The explanation of the "no-people" (the οὐκ denies the idea contained in a nomen connected with it), is found in the following parallel:

By a foolish nation [ἐπὶ ἄσυνετοῦ ἐθνους].^{*} The religious and moral folly of the Gentile consisted in his not seeking God's signs with resignation; for which reason they also could not seek Him. Paul, with good ground, sees in the thoroughly prophetic song of Moses, which looked far beyond Israel's history in the wilderness and its relation to the Canaanites (Deut. xxii. 43), a typical, and still more than a typical prophecy, which should be fulfilled in many ways in preludes, and which has finally been fulfilled in the almost complete changes of the relation between Israel and the Gentiles in relation to the gospel. In ver. 21, neither Israel's idolatry in the wilderness, nor the Canaanite people, is meant alone. On the different untenable explanations, including those of Philippi, see Tholuck, p. 583 [given above].

^{*} [Breitshneider and Reiche take Israel as the object of the verb, and supply God as subject. Did not God know Israel? But this is arbitrary, and not in accordance with the context.—R.]

^{*} [Noyes, in his version, preserves the parallelism of the verbs, παραζηλώσω, παροργίζω, by the phrase: I will move you to jealousy, I will excite you to indignation.—R.]

Ver 20 But Isaiah is very bold, and saith [Ἡσαΐας δὲ ἀποτολμᾷ καὶ λέγει. Lange: But Isaiah even ventures to say; which is the spirit of the Greek. Bengel: Quod Moyses innumerat, Esaias eudacter et plane eloquitur.—R.]. The Apostle regarded it as great boldness in Isaiah to say the words of chap. lvi. 1 and 2 in the hearing of the Jews, as the first verse, according to his explanation, expressed mercy to the Gentiles, and the second the hardness and apostasy of the Jews.

[I was found by those who sought me not, Ἐκείθεν τοῖς ἐμὲ μὴ ἠγοῦσιν, &c. See Textual Note * for the text of the Hebrew original and the LXX., to the former of which Dr. Lange refers so frequently. The Apostle has transposed the clauses.—R.] The question is now raised first of all by the later exegesis, whether Paul's explanation of Isaiah's passage is correct? Meyer says: "In its strict sense, Isa. lvi. 1 (freely from the Septuagint, and with an inversion of both the parallel members) treats of the Jews; but in a typical sense, which Paul clearly perceives in it, they are types of the Gentiles," &c. But in this case, Paul would have made an exegesis without any evidence, and would have exposed himself to the legitimate contradiction and censure of the Jews. Tholuck also remarks, that if the Apostle, in ver. 1, referred directly to the Gentiles, his application would have to be regarded as having missed its object. In the first place, namely, Tholuck says that rabbinical expositors (Jarchi, &c.) have "simply and unsatisfactorily" explained vers. 1 and 2 as relating to the same subjects. He further says: "Independently of these rabbinical predecessors, the same explanation has been adopted by Gesenius, Ewald, Hitzig, and Umbreit, which last writer translates: I was to be inquired of." There is just ground for disapproving of Luther's confidence in inserting in ver. 20: to the Gentiles, and in beginning ver. 21 with a for—for I speak, &c. Yet the exegetical authorities cited are utterly refuted, not only by Paul's authority—although we cannot even admit that in one of his last sword-thrusts he has made not merely a random stroke, but even wounded himself—but also by the connection of the whole of Isaiah's passage, chap. lxiii. 7–lxvi. The antitheses in general between the strongly Old Testament Jewish prayer in chap. lxiii. 7 ff., and the prophetic New Testament answer of God in chaps. lvi. and lxvi., are first to be considered. It is said that the prayer is undoubtedly designed to express Israel's state of mind; that it contains angry and passionate elements; and that the Lord must now reveal himself that the Gentiles will tremble at His name (ver. 17; chap. lxvi. 1). The prayer is a conflict between the profoundest contrition and the most painful dejection, and it dies away in a question which sounds like a reproach. The Lord now answers, it is said, in the cold reproach: "I was to be sought." And this is claimed to be the simplest rendering of נִדְרַשְׁתִּי. But what does the Lord answer in relation to the people of Israel, and in relation to the Gentiles? In chap. lxiv. 8 ff. we read: "Thou art our Father; we are the clay, and thou our potter," &c. Finally: "O Lord, wilt thou hold thy peace, and afflict us very sore?" Compare here the answer in chap. lvi. 2, and further. In ver. 8 the familiar thought again recurs to the prophet: A remnant of the people will be saved; from ver. 18 onward he explains by a grand antithesis. From this antithesis there then arises the description of the new Israel, which was to be called by another name (ver. 15). On the Gentiles, see chap. lxvi. 12, 18, 19, 21. But the antitheses between chap. lvi., vers. 1 and 2, come still more into consideration. In ver. 1 we read, וְאֵלֵינוּ; in ver. 2, וְאֵלֵינוּ. The וְאֵלֵינוּ, in ver. 1, is וְאֵלֵינוּ בְּיָמֵינוּ, which could not very well denote the Israelites, whether the people be considered passive or active (see Tholuck, p. 553), as the question in both cases is the official form of their religion; וְאֵלֵינוּ, on the other hand, in ver. 2, is designated as וְאֵלֵינוּ; it is a people pledged to the Lord, but is now an apostate people. The antithesis is still stronger, that the Lord is now a subject of search on the part of a people (Goi) which had never inquired after Him; that He is found by those who did not seek Him, and must merely be found with the words וְנִדְרַשְׁתִּי, while He had to spread out His hands in vain the whole day to a rebellious people. In ver. 1, a people is spoken of which now not only inquires after the Lord, but even searches after Him; but, in ver. 2, it is a people which has so fully turned away from Him, that He seeks it the whole day in vain. Thus the וְאֵלֵינוּ, in ver. 2, rather than וְאֵלֵינוּ at the beginning, must be read as a strengthened preterite. The Lord answers the question, whether He would afflict very sorely, by referring to His compassion to the Gentiles (Jerome). Then He explains, in ver. 2, how this turning from them has occurred. "I have spread out my hands" (in vain), &c. The exegetical abridgment of this last chapter is connected with an abridgment of the whole of the second part of Isaiah. Tholuck, not satisfied with the defence of the older interpretation of this passage by Hengstenberg, Hofmann, and Stier, takes a middle position between Paul and the expositors cited, by remarking "that the prophet did not speak, in ver. 1, of the Gentiles, and yet that Paul did speak, in ver. 2, of the Jews." But what would the ἀποτολμᾷ then mean? Paul could, indeed, have good ground for not naming the Gentiles, because a consequent exclusion of the chosen substance of Israel could have been inferred. Stier's explanation is therefore so far correct as it holds that, in ver. 1, Israel is added, yet not after its first call, but after its dissolution into the "no-people" of the Gentile world.* [There is no other view of the passage, except that which refers it, as originally used, to the Gentiles, that consists with Paul's prudence as a reasoner, much less with his apostolic authority and inspiration. To the argument of Dr. Lange nothing need be added.—R.]

Ver. 21. But of Israel [πρὸς δὲ τὸν Ἰσραὴλ]. Erasmus, adversum; De Wette, [Philippi, Alford (Meyer, an)], and others, with respect to Israel; Vulgate and Rückert, to Israel. We adopt with respect to, since the prophet had already made the foregoing declaration to Israel.

He saith [λέγει]. Namely, Isaiah, in the name of God.—[All day long I stretched forth my hands, Ὅλην τὴν ἡμέραν ἐξέπτεσα τὰς χεῖράς μου.] The spreading out of the hands, says Tholuck, is not (as Fritzsche would have it) the gestus of the one inviting to his embrace,† but, according to Chrysostom, the gestus of the sup pliant. Between the two meanings of this gestus there lies also a third; and, after all, one does not preclude the other. The principal idea is the gestus of gracious, importunate, and expressed admonition, of entreaty, compassionate sympathy, and continuous appeal.

And gainsaying [καὶ ἀντιλέγοντα]. Meyer holds, contrary to Grotius, and most expositors, that the ἀντιλέγοντα must not be understood as stubborn, but contradictory. But contradiction, in the sphere of religion, is the decisive expression of opposition. [Philippi thinks this added attributive expresses the positive side of disobedience; the other, ἀπειθοῦντα, the negative. If so, both were necessary to convey the full meaning of the Hebrew word used by the prophet. "They say to God, offering them salvation: we will not."—R.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The intercession of the believer a sign of hope and salvation to those for whom it is made.

2. The bright and dark sides of religious zeal. If it be not purified by progressive, living knowledge, it becomes perverted into the carnal zeal of fanaticism. On the first appearance of Jewish fanaticism, see the Commentary on Genesis [p. 564, Amer. ed.].

3. Self-righteousness has many forms. The starting-point is the effort for the righteousness of the law, not as it is attained inwardly by simplicity and humility, but as it, by self-complacency and impurity, falls into externality. In this direction the righteousness of the law becomes the righteousness of works; and from this there results self-righteousness, which branches out into many forms—into the ecclesiastical and political form of confessional and partisan righteousness; into the ecclesiastical and scholastic form of doctrinal righteousness (orthodoxy); into the worldly form of moral righteousness; into the pietistic form of righteousness of feeling; and into the philosophical and brutal forms of the denial of all personal guilt. In all forms it inverts the relation between God and man—between the Creator and the creature—between God's sovereignty and man's own will—between God's law and the self-made service and law—between grace and works—and between the ground of life and the most outward false show. Its real want is the want of the heart's upward look at the throne of God's eternal majesty; and this want is also the first guilt; the positive ruin connected therewith is the baseness of the mind's look at things below; the lost state of the mind's look in the abject beholding of self. But as this self-righteousness is so thoroughly selfish that it misunderstands and scorns the proffer of God's freely-given righteousness, the gospel of grace, so is it likewise selfish in connecting itself inseparably with fanaticism.

4. Christ is the end of the law, because He is the fulfilment of the law; therefore He is, on one side, the end where the law is changed into the collective principle of the new birth; and, on the other, He is the end in which it lays off its eternal Old Testament form and meaning; just as ripe fruit becomes freed from its bondage in the husk. See Exeg. Notes.

5. Ver. 5. The doctrine of eternal life has developed itself embryonically by stages: In this life, God's blessing, God's glorious deliverance from the manifold danger of death, and, in the future, the peaceful slumber of those delivered from beds of earthly suffering, their celebration of the marriage supper of the Lamb, and their safety in Abraham's bosom, &c. This development, just as every biblical doctrine, has taken place in organic conformity to the law. According to Tholuck, p. 557, the eschatology of the Jews of Palestine at the time of Christ had already attained to the idea of eternal life. Yet they hardly attained to the idea of eternal life in the Christian sense. [It must ever be remembered that the ideas, immortality and eternal life, are not identical. Zōē has a new meaning in the New Testament. Comp. the thoughtful remarks of Trench, Syn. N. T., § xxvii.—R.]

6. The righteousness of faith speaks even in Moses, if Moses be properly understood and explained. [Comp. Exeg. Notes on vers. 7-9.—R.]

7. The truth of the inward essence of the law, like that of the gospel, and therefore the truth of the whole saving revelation of God, is based on its inward character—on its inward union with the most inward nature of man. Its impregnability and incorruptibility also rest upon the same basis. Just as man must return from all by-ways (for his salvation or for his judgment) to the idea of God, so also must he return to the idea of the God-man, of guilt, the atonement, deliverance, the new birth, and the new and eternal life. The objection urged against revelation, and especially against Christianity, that this religion beclouds the earthly life by an exclusive representation of heaven, and the present by an exclusive assertion of the future, the realm of the dead, and duration after death, is removed by a passage which the Apostle cites and elaborates from Deuteronomy. Christ is on the earth in so far as He has become inseparably incorporated with it by His historical presence and union with humanity; and He is just as much in this life, and present in His judgments and bestowals of salvation, as He is in the eternal world, as the future Finisher of all things.

8. Faith and confession; see Exeg. Notes. The delivering power of confession. Because it: 1. makes inward faith irrevocable; 2. Breaks loose from unbelief; 3. Unites with believers, becomes flesh and blood, and, in a good sense, acquires worldly form, worldly power, and the power of manifestation; 4. Pledges itself to full consistency in word and deed, life and death. Christians have had good ground for holding martyrdom in such high honor. But if martyrdom can be exaggerated and overvalued, how much more can a confessional righteousness be overvalued, which seeks its protection and peace under the shadow of formulas!

9. The centre of faith and the centre of confession; see ver. 9. The centre of faith is Christ's resurrection, with all that it comprises; the centre of confession is Jesus as the Lord, and therefore not "the Christianity of Christ," but the Christ of Christianity. [Hence the Apostle does not say: If thou shalt confess with thy mouth my doctrine, and believe in thine heart in justification by faith, thou shalt be saved; yet how often he is represented as saying this, and no more. The living Christ is not in such a gospel.—R.]

10. With the complete freedom of revelation and of God's people there has also come the full protection of faith against unbelief.

11. The riches of the Lord to a praying human world.

12. The order of the gospel message. Its necessity, its promise, its authority, its condition (the Divine mission; direct or indirect). See the interesting statements which Tholuck makes, p. 580 ff., on the assertion of the Lutheran theologians of the seventeenth century, as well as of their latest companions in adherence to the letter, that this text (and the article of the general call) forces us to accept the position that the gospel had been preached in all the world at Paul's time.

13. We must be careful to distinguish, that the question here is the necessity of the official bearers or messengers of God's word, but not of them exclusively. Or, more strictly speaking, the sending has two sides, and does not consist simply in official arrangements and forms. [This is even more apparent, if we understand ver. 17 to refer to what is heard, rather than what is preached, and then consider how the Apostle proves from an Old Testament description of the voice of God in nature (ver. 18), the universality of this privilege.—R.]

14. The feet of the messengers on the mountains, or the beauty of the progressive course of the gospel.

15. Unbelief in the gospel is disobedience, specific disobedience and rage; Pa. ii. The more grossly and roughly human nature is apprehended, the more external become the ideas of obedience and disobedience; the more profoundly, purely, and inwardly they are viewed, the more profoundly, purely, and inwardly is this antithesis defined; and, finally and fundamentally, faith in God's word is specific obedience, while unbelief is specific disobedience, specific rebellion. [The LXX. form of Isa. lrv. 2 (ver. 21), by dividing the idea of rebellion into disobedience and gainsaying, only recognizes the connection between refusing God's commands and contradicting His words: disobedience and unbelief, acting and reacting upon each other continually.—R.]

16. The prudent advance of the Apostle in his judgment, that Israel has changed its part with the Gentiles by its unbelief, and has become an apostate people, is here a characteristic of his masterly apostolic wisdom of instruction, as well as of his apostolic heart, as, with a shudder of inmost sorrow, he gradually draws aside the curtain from the ghastly picture of Israel. The argument from the Old Testament is in conformity with the law that every apology must be discussed from the acknowledged sources, statements, or principles of the opponent, and that its possibility ceases where there cease to be positions in common.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

a. Vers. 1, 2. The benevolent disposition of the Apostle toward Israel. It is clear: 1. From his wish and prayer that they might be saved; 2. From his record that they have a zeal of God, but not according to knowledge.—A zeal for God is good, but it should not exist without knowledge (ver. 2).

—How often ignorant zeal occurs: 1. In domestic; 2. In civil; and 3. In ecclesiastical affairs; and, unfortunately, it occurs most frequently in the last (ver. 2).—The folly of ignorant zeal. It is foolish: 1. In regard to its starting-point; 2. Its end; 3. The choice of means (ver. 2).—Wise and ignorant zeal.

STARKE: Oh, how can men so transgress as to be led by a blind religious zeal to oppose the dearest truths of the gospel by an imaginary defence of orthodoxy; and thus hate, calumniate, and reproach Christ in His members, and always think, with those ancient enemies, that, by so doing, they do God service (John xvi. 2).—HEDINGER: The zeal of the Jews crucified Christ.

SPENER: All the persecutions which have been, and still will be inflicted on pious Christians, are committed by those who do not know the truth and doctrine of godliness; who regard others who are attached to it as false and wicked people; and who think that they render God a service when they persecute them (John xvi. 2); but yet, by this very means, they thrust themselves into God's judgment, and are not at all excused for their error (ver. 2).

HEUBNER: What is blind zeal in religious matters? Whence does it come? If it be wholly unclean, it is self-love, selfishness; if it be merely joined with perverse measures, then it arises from a weakness of understanding, and, in that case, has also a mixture of egotism! True zeal is pure and clear.—Compare Paul's early Jewish and later Christian zeal.

BESSER: When Paul cherishes, and expresses in praying to God, the hearty wish that they who have stumbled against the stone of offence may yet be saved, he certainly has no knowledge of any absolute decree of condemnation on any man, not even on the most stiff-necked Jews (ver. 1).—One of our older teachers laments: "The Jews had, and still have, a zeal without knowledge; but we, alas, have an understanding without zeal" (ver. 2).

b. Ver. 3. Our own righteousness, and righteousness which is of God (Luke xviii. 9-14). 1. The former is proud, and leads to humiliation; 2. The latter, on the contrary, is humble, and leads to exaltation.

STARKE, LANGE: No persons are farther from God's kingdom, and more difficult to be converted, than those who, when they hear of the method of salvation, have so much of their own righteousness as to think that they have long conformed to it.

HEUBNER: They are therefore devoid of an humble recognition of their unworthiness before God, they would themselves be something, and carry weight. Where this pride and fancy exist, there is always blindness.

c. Vers. 4-11. The righteousness which is of faith is: 1. A righteousness in Christ, who is the end of the law; 2. And therefore can be obtained only by faith in Him (vers. 4-11).—The unbeliever asserts that Christ is far from and unapproachable by man; but the believer, on the contrary, knows that He is near us by the word of faith (vers. 5-9).—In order to avoid believing, men make use of empty evasions (vers. 5-9).—As the law was near to Israel, so is the gospel near to us: 1. In the mouth; 2. In the heart (ver. 8).—What do we preach? 1. Not a remote, and therefore incomprehensible word; but, 2. A near, and therefore a very easily understood word (ver. 8).—The conditions of salvation: 1. The confession of the mouth that Jesus is the Lord; 2. The belief in the heart that God has raised Him from the dead (vers. 9-11).—The inward interdependence of confession and faith: 1. There is no true confession of the mouth without faith in the heart; 2. But there is also no living faith of the heart without the confession of the mouth (vers. 9-11).—Faith in the heart must ever precede the confession of the mouth; which, unfortunately, is not always the case, and therefore so much is said of confession, and so little is inwardly believed (vers. 9-11).—The great confession of the Christian Church, as expressed: 1. In the apostolic confession of faith; 2. In the hymns of the church; 3. In its prayers; 4. In its celebration of the Lord's Supper (ver. 10).—The confessors of the Christian Church: 1. In the beginning (the time of the first persecutions); 2. In the period of the Reformation; 3. At the present time (the martyrs in Madagascar, on the South Sea Islands, in Borneo, Syria, &c.; ver. 10).

LUTHER: He who does not believe that Christ has died, and risen, in order to make us righteous from our sins, says: "Who shall ascend into heaven, and who shall descend into the deep?" But this is done by those who would be justified by works, and not by faith, when they speak thus with the mouth, but not in the heart. Emphasis est in verbo: in the heart.

STARKE: Christ is the essence of the Old Testament Scriptures also; he little understands them who does not find Christ in them. The entire life of the saints of the Old Testament is a prophecy of Christ; John v. 46 (ver. 5).—Say not, "Who has been among the dead, and has returned again, and has told us of the condition of the dead?" Stand by the gospel truth, and you will be righteous and saved; Luke xvi. 31 (ver. 7).—Be comforted, troubled soul; though you do not have the joy of faith just in the hour of temptation, you will nevertheless be saved, so long as you depend on Christ; for God, who does not lie, has often given you the assurance that you shall be saved (ver. 11).—CRAMER: The mouth and the heart cannot be separated; Ps. cxvi. 10 (ver. 9).—Faith must not grow on the tongue, but in the heart; Acts xv. 9 (ver. 10).—HEDINGER: The heart without the mouth is timidity; the mouth without the heart is hypocrisy (ver. 10).

SPENER: We read that the word is nigh us, namely, that it is declared to us; that we have it in the heart—where the Holy Spirit has impressed it; and in the mouth, by which we declare it. Therefore, it is not something concealed in heaven, or in the deep, but we have it with us, and in us. Verily, we may say that the word means not only the word itself, but also the blessings which that word presents—Christ, with all His gospel treasures. Christ's merit, grace, Spirit, and life are not far from us, and cannot first be brought down from heaven, or brought up from the deep; they are not first to be acquired, but are nigh us, and, if we will accept them, in the mouth and in the heart. Thus, though the language of the Old Testament was not on this wise, since the knowledge of grace was of a less degree, more obscure, and more difficult to be obtained, yet it is now very near to us, for it is imparted by the greater and stronger measure of grace which is now declared to us (ver. 8).

GERLACH: Christ is in so far the end of the law as He, 1. Is its final object, the one to whom it leads (Gal. iii. 24); 2. Is its fulfilment (Matt. v. 17); 3. Puts an end to the dominion of the law (Luke xvi. 16) (ver. 4).—To become acquainted with God's gracious counsel, to deprive death of its power by the manifestation of a divine and holy life in the flesh—which the carnal man was incapable of, since he knew nothing except the righteousness which is of the law—can be effected by the righteousness which is of faith, which establishes him in Christ's right, and freely gives him as his own what the Son of God is and has. The heart need only believe, and the mouth only confess in order to be righteous and saved (vers. 8-11).

LINCO: The Divine order of salvation is, therefore: Justification succeeds faith, God's assistance is obtained, and he who courageously and perseveringly confesses his faith, obtains salvation (ver. 10).—HUBNER: Righteousness is introduced as speaking, and is regarded as proffering itself. No superhuman knowledge, or profound learning, or ascending to heaven to see Christ, is necessary to convince us of Christ's resurrection and His sitting at God's right hand; neither is it necessary to descend into the kingdom of the dead, to ask whether Christ is with the dead, or risen? In short, no view of the history of Jesus Christ himself, and no laborious and learned research, are necessary for us to believe. Faith is an affair of the heart. No one can, therefore, excuse his unbelief on the ground of the difficulty or impossibility of faith (vers. 6, 7).—Paul brings out prominently the faith of the heart against hypocrites and lip-Christians; and against the faint-hearted and desponding confession—that is, the expression, the demonstration of Christianity by word and deed (vers. 9-11).

BESSER: Faith and confession are related to each other as essence and manifestation, as light and rays as fire and flame. . . . Salvation is the manifestation, the present and finite revelation of righteousness; and righteousness is salvation under cover, though the covering is transparent and fragrant, just as Christ is concealed in prophecy, and the enduring tabernacle of God in the Church on earth (ver. 10).

d. Vers. 12-17. The gospel as a saving message for all, Jews as well as Greeks: 1. It is preached to all; but, 2. It is not believed by all (vers. 12-17).—There is no difference in nations before the one Lord, who is rich unto all that call upon Him; but whosoever calleth upon Him shall be saved (vers. 12, 13).—How the calling upon the true God—who is perfectly revealed in Christ—and faith and preaching, are connected (vers. 13-16).—"Lord, who hath believed our report?" Thus Isaiah once lamented, and thus we, too, lament frequently; but we can only do it when we are conscious that we have performed our ministerial duty to the best of our knowledge and conscience; that is, if our sermons have proceeded: 1. From thoroughly searching into the Holy Scriptures; 2. From hearty prayer; 3. From a full acquaintance with the necessities of our congregations (ver. 16).—Christian preaching: 1. What does it effect? Faith. 2. By what means does it come? By the word of God (ver. 17).—Preaching stands midway between faith and God's word. 1. It produces the former; 2. It draws its supplies from the latter (ver. 17).—The appealing power of preaching (ver. 17).

STARKE: All kinds of people can have free access to God, and so pray that their petitions may be answered (ver. 12).—HEDINGER: Oh, if a man would be saved, how much depends on hearing, teaching, and calling! A beautiful chain; but what is wanting in it? Hearing is defective; proper and thorough preaching is wanting; and many thousands are needed for preaching. Dreadful harm thereby ensues, &c. (ver. 14).—CRAMER: The world ever remains the same—as in Isaiah's day, so at the time of Christ and the Apostles, and even at this very hour. What a pity that the old lamentation must still be repeated! (ver. 16).—LANGER: Preacher, see that your discourses be delivered: simplicity and Divine power

SPENKER: 1. They must call upon Christ if they would be saved; 2. But if they would call upon Him, they must believe on Him; 3. If they would believe on Him, they must hear His word; 4. But if they would hear His word, it must be preached to them; 5. But if they would have preachers, people must be sent to them for that purpose. These are the successive links in the chain of Divine beneficence (ver. 14).—ROOS: Here, as was always the case with the Apostle in his charges against the Jews, he cites passages from the Old Testament Scriptures; the first of which is Isa. xxviii. 16, where the "making waste" has the same force as "being ashamed." . . . The second passage is in Joel ii. 32, and comes down lowest to the weakness of men. Our advice to the greatest sinner who stands on the brink of hell is: "Call upon the name of the Lord, and thou shalt be saved." . . . The third passage is in Isa. lii. 7, and is a prophecy of the friendly and beautiful heralds whom the Lord, having previously spoken himself, would send out at the time of the New Testament, in order to preach peace and good-will to men. But why? Undoubtedly in order that men might lay hold of the peace declared to them, and appropriate and enjoy God's good-will toward them. But because this should take place by faith, these heralds lament, in the fourth passage, Isa. liii. 1: "Lord, who hath believed our report?" (vers. 11-16).—BENGL: Any man is worth more than the whole world.

GERLACH: God wills the salvation of all, but all do not wish the salvation of God; unbelief is the cause of the ruin of all who are lost (ver. 16).—It is God's will that all should believe; and for this reason He has sent preaching, whose import is His own word (ver. 17).

LISCO: It is Christian duty to send teachers to the heathen world; missions are necessary, and according to the Lord's will (Mark xvi. 15); and it is a glorious calling, to declare the message of Jesus, deliverance of the captives, and the new kingdom of God.—Preaching takes place by God's word; that is, by virtue of the Divine call and a doctrine revealed by God (ver. 17).

HEUBNER: Living preaching is God's chosen means of instruction (ver. 14).—God must send preachers; they cannot go of themselves (ver. 15).—All the effects of grace are connected with the word; this applies to fanatics, enthusiasts, and those who despise the word and preaching (ver. 17).

BESSER: The Divine order of salvation admits of no personal or national distinction (ver. 12).—The help of the rich Lord, as He passes by, is invited by calling upon Him, though it be not with strong faith, yet with a hearty desire to believe; by calling upon Him, though we do not pray as we ought, yet are supported by the unutterable groans of the Spirit (chap. viii. 26); by calling upon Him, if not with advanced knowledge, yet with the loud confession of Bartimeus: "Jesus, thou Son of David, have mercy on me!" (Mark x. 47) (ver. 12).—BENJ: says: "He who desires the end, will also contribute the means. God desires that all men call upon Him for salvation; therefore He wishes them to believe; therefore, to hear; and, therefore, to have preachers. Hence He has sent preachers. He has done every thing necessary for our salvation. His antecedent gracious will is universal, and is clothed with energetic power" (ver. 14).—It is not only necessary for the real preacher in God's name that the word preached be real, but also that the preacher say: "Here is the staff in my hand; the Lord has sent me" (ver. 15).

c. Vers. 18-21. The relation of the Jews and Gentiles to the preaching of the gospel: 1. The former did not wish to understand the gospel, although they could understand it; 2. But the latter although they were ignorant, have understood it, because they wished to do so.—The conclusion of the whole chapter: The Jews are themselves guilty of their wretched fate, which took such a lively hold upon the Apostle's sympathy. For, A. The gospel was: 1. Not far from them; 2. It was preached to them; 3. They could lay hold of it; but, B. They—the Jews—sought it; 1. Far off; 2. Did not like to hear it; 3. Would not understand it.

STARKE: Who will blame God that so many people remain children of Satan, and are condemned? Behold, they are themselves the cause (ver. 21).—ROOS, with reference to chaps. ix. and x.: From all this it is plain that the word grace is the most comforting and most severe, the clearest and the darkest word in the Bible. It is the most comforting word, because it assures salvation to the creature (to whom his Creator is in nowise indebted), the sinner who deserves punishment. It is also the most severe word, because it utterly prostrates pride, slays defiance, and completely destroys the notion of self-righteousness, which is so natural to man. It is the clearest word, because it needs no description; but it is also the darkest word, because its simple meaning is understood by only a few humble souls. Many men, who think that they understand this word, conceive God's grace very much as a prince's favor, which always has regard to service, and is never disconnected from utility. But God needs no service. His will alone is free. No one can recompense Him. And yet He is righteous, and acts according to knowledge. Whoso is wise, and he shall understand these things? Prudent, and he shall know them?

HEUBNER, on Ps. xix.: The gospel and creation are God's two voices that resound about us.

BESSER: Quotation of an expression of Luther who compares preaching to a stone thrown into the water. The circles ever enlarge, but the water in the middle is still.

LANGK: The intercession of Paul, who was persecuted by the Jews, for Israel.—His witness for Israel: 1. High praise; 2. Great censure.—The different forms of self-righteousness.—Self-righteousness is always opposed to God's righteousness, which is: 1. Legislative; 2. Penal; 3. Merciful, justifying; 4. Awakening to new life.—The self-testimony of the law and the gospel to the inward nature of man: 1. The law, the ideal of his life; 2. The gospel, the life of his ideal.—The twin form, faith, and confession: 1. Is positively different; yet, 2. Inseparable.—The riches of the Lord to praying hearts—to the praying, sinful world.—The universality of the gospel.—The freedom and limitation of the message of salvation: 1. It is free to all in the world who call upon the Lord; 2. It is confined to faith, because unbelief contradicts it.

[BURKITT (condensed): Christ is the end of the law: 1. As He is the scope of it; 2. As He is the accomplishment of it; 3. As He is the believer what the law would have been to him if he could have perfectly kept it—namely, righteousness and life, justification and salvation.—The natural man is a proud man: he likes to live upon his own stock he cannot stoop to a sincere and universal renunciation of his own righteousness, and to depend wholly upon the righteousness of another. It is natural to a man to choose rather to eat a brown crust, or wear a coarse garment, which he can call his own, than to feed upon the richest dainties, or wear the costliest robes, which he must receive as an alms from another.—DODDRIDGE: Let us rejoice in the spread which the gospel has already had, and let us earnestly and daily pray that the voices of those Divine messengers that proclaim it may go forth unto all the earth, and their words reach, in a literal sense, to the remotest ends of the globe.—Lord, give us any plague rather than the plague of the heart!—SCOTT: Ministers who are faithful bear the most affectionate good-will to those from whom they receive the greatest injuries; and they offer fervent and persevering prayers for the salvation of the very persons against whom they denounce the wrath of God if they persist in unbelief.—CLARKE: Salvation only by righteousness: 1. The righteousness or justification which is by faith, receives Christ as an atoning sacrifice, by which all sin is pardoned; 2. It receives continual supplies of grace from Christ by the eternal Spirit, through which man is enabled to love God with all his heart, soul, mind, and strength, and his neighbor as himself; 3. This grace is afforded in sufficient degrees, suited to all places, times, and circumstances, so that no trial can happen too great to be borne, as the grace of Christ is ever at hand to support and save to the uttermost.—HODGE: It is the first and most pressing duty of the Church to cause all men to hear the gospel. The solemn question, "How can they believe without a preacher?" should sound day and night in the ears of the churches. The gospel's want of success, or the fact that few believe our report, is only a reason for its wider extension. The more who hear, the more will be saved, even should it be but a small proportion of the whole.—J. F. H.]

THIRD SECTION.—The final gracious solution of the enigma, or the overruling of judgment for the salvation of Israel. God's judgment on Israel is not one of reprobation. God's saving economy in His Providence over Jews and Gentiles, over the election and the great majority of Israel, and over the concatenation of judgment and salvation, by virtue of which all Israel shall finally attain to faith and salvation through the fulness of the Gentiles. The universality of judgment and mercy. Doxology.

- 2 Benjamin. God hath [did] not cast away his people which he foreknew. Wot [Or know] ye not what the Scripture saith of Elias [ἐν Ἠλίᾳ, in the story of Elijah]? how he maketh intercession to [pleadeth with] God against Israel.
- 3 saying [omit saying], 'Lord,' they have killed thy prophets, and [omit and; insert they have] 'digged down thine altars; and I am left alone [the only one],'
- 4 and they seek my life. But what saith the answer of God [the divine response] unto him? I have reserved 'to myself seven thousand men, who have not [who never] bowed the knee to the image of [omit the image of] Baal.
- 5 Even so then at [ἐν, in] this present time also there is a remnant according to
- 6 the election of grace. And [Now] if by grace, then is it no more [no longer] of works: otherwise 'grace is no more [no longer becomes] grace. But 'if it be of works, then is 'it no more [longer] grace: otherwise work is no more [longer] work.'

B.

- 7 What then? Israel hath not obtained that which he seeketh for [That which Israel seeketh for, he obtained not]; but the election hath [omit hath] obtained
- 8 it, and the rest were blinded [hardened], ([omit parenthesis) According as it is written, God 'hath given [gave] them the [a] spirit of slumber [or, stupor], eyes 'that they should not see, and ears that they should not hear;)
- 9 [not hear, unto] this day. And David saith,
Let 'their table be made [become] a snare, and a trap,
And a stumbling-block, and a recompense unto them:
- 10 Let their eyes be darkened, that they may not see,
And bow down their back away."

C.

- 11 I say then, Have they stumbled that [Did they stumble in order that] they should fall? God forbid: [Let it not be!] but rather through [but by] their fall salvation is come unto the Gentiles, for to provoke [in order to excite] 12 them to jealousy [or, emulation]. Now if the fall of them [their fall] be the riches of the world, and the diminishing of them [their diminishing] the riches 13 of the Gentiles; how much more their fulness? For "I speak [I am speaking] to you Gentiles [:], inasmuch [then]" as I am the apostle of the Gentiles, 14 I magnify [glorify] mine office: If by any means I may provoke [excite] to emulation them which are [omit them which are] my [own] flesh, and might save 15 some of them. For if the casting away of them be the reconciling [reconciliation] of the world, what shall the receiving [reception] of them be, but life 16 from the dead. For [Moreover] if the first-fruit be holy, the lump is also holy [so also is the lump]: and if the root be holy, so are the branches [also].

- 17 And [But] if some of the branches be [were] broken off, and thou, being a wild olive tree, wert grafted [grafted] in among them, and with them partakest [and made fellow-partaker] of the root and "fatness of the olive tree; 18 Boast not against the branches. But if thou boast, thou bearest not the root, 19 but the root thee. Thou wilt say then, The "branches were broken off, that I 20 might be grafted [grafted] in. Well; because of unbelief they were broken 21 off, and thou standest by faith. Be not high-minded," but fear: For if God spared not the natural branches, take heed [fear] lest "he also spare not thee. 22 Behold therefore the goodness and severity of God: on them which [those who] fell, severity;" but toward thee, goodness [God's goodness]," if thou 23 continue in his goodness: otherwise thou also shalt be cut off. And they also [moreover], if they abide not still in unbelief, shall be grafted [grafted] in: for 24 God is able to graff [graft] them in again. For if thou wert cut out of the olive tree which is wild by nature, and wert grafted [grafted] contrary to nature into a good olive tree; how much more shall these, which be the natural branches, be grafted [grafted] into their own olive tree?

- 25 For I would not, brethren, that ye should be ignorant of this mystery, lest ye should be wise in your own conceits," that blindness [hardening] in part is 26 happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be [omit be] come in. And so all Israel shall be saved: as it is written," There shall come out of Sion the 27 Deliyerer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob: For this is my covenant [the covenant from me, παρ' ἐμοῦ] unto them, when I shall take away their 28 sins. As concerning [touching]" the gospel, they are enemies for your sakes: 29 but as touching the election, they are beloved for the fathers' sakes. For the 30 gifts and calling of God are without repentance. For as "ye in times past have not believed [were disobedient to]" God, yet have now obtained mercy 31 through their unbelief [the disobedience of these]: Even so have these also now not believed, that through your mercy [i. e., mercy shown to you] they also may 32 obtain mercy. For God hath concluded them all [shut up "all] in unbelief [disobedience], that [in order that] he might [may] have mercy upon all. 33 O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom [riches and wisdom] and knowledge of God! how unsearchable "are his judgments, and his ways past finding 34 out! For who hath "known the mind of the Lord? or who hath been his 35 counsellor? Or "who hath first given to him, and it shall be recompensed unto 36 him again? For of him, and through him, and to [unto] him, are all things to whom [him] be glory for ever. Amen.

may seem to be adopted. The phrase καὶ ἀποδοῖς is found in chap. xii. 16, and Prov. iii. 7 (LXX.); hence the probability of an alteration to correspond.

¹⁴ Ver. 28.—[Κατά, according to, as respects, &c. The version of Five Ang. Clergymen adopts as touching, in both clauses; Amer. Bible Union: as concerning. If a choice must be made between the two, the former is preferable although neither is altogether exact.

¹⁶ Ver. 30.—[The E. V. confounds here the nearly related ideas of unbelief and disobedience. Later revisions correct the rendering of both verb and noun. Dr. Hodge claims that the E. V. is correct; but it is only inferentially so. These remarks apply also to ἀπειθεῖαν (ver. 32).

²⁰ Ver. 36.—[“From Job xli. 3 (11, E. V.), where the LXX. (xli. 2) have τίς ἀντιθέσται μοι, κ. ὑπομνήσι; But the Hebrew is מִי יִשְׁכַּח אֶת־עֲוֹנוֹתָי, ‘who hath anticipated (i. e., by the context, conferred a benefit) on me, that I may repay him?’ And to this the Apostle alludes, using the third person” (Alford).—B.]

Summary.—A. Israel is not rejected; the kernel of it—the election—is saved; vers. 1-6. B. The great proportion of Israel, all except the essentially important remnant, the “rest,” are hardened, as was described by the Spirit in the Old Testament beforehand; but its hardness has become a condition for the conversion of the Gentiles; vers. 7-11.* C. Yet, on the other hand, the conversion of the Gentiles is in turn a means for the conversion of Israel, and thereby for the revivification of the world. The saving effect of their rejection gives ground for expecting a still more saving effect of their reception. The significance of the first-fruits and of the root; vers. 12-16. D. The very fact that the Gentiles believe, and the Jews do not believe, is largely conditional. Gentiles, as individuals, can become unbelievers; and Jews, as individuals, can become believers. For: a. The Gentiles are grafted on the stem of the Jewish theocracy among believing Jews. b. They can just as readily be cut off by unbelief, as the Jews can be grafted in by faith, because the latter have a greater historical relationship with the kingdom of God; vers. 17-24. E. The last word, or the mystery of Divine Providence in the economy of salvation. Every thing will redound to the glory of God. God’s saving economy for the world: The unbelieving Gentiles have been converted by believing Israel; unbelieving Israel shall be converted by believing Gentiles. The judgment on all, that mercy might be shown to all. Praise offered to God for His plan of salvation, for its execution, for its end, and for its ground; vers. 25-36. [Dr. Hodge divides the chapter into two parts: vers. 1-10 and 11-36. (1.) The rejection of the Jews was not total. A remnant (and a larger one than many might suppose) remained, though the mass was rejected. (2.) This rejection is not final. The restoration of the Jews is a desirable and probable event; vers. 11-24. It is one which God has determined to bring about; vers. 25-32. A sublime declaration of the unsearchable wisdom of God, manifested in all His dealings with men; vers. 33-36. So Forbea.—R.]

Vers. 1-6: Israel is not rejected. The real kernel of it is already saved.

Ver. 1. I say then [λέγω οὖν]. The οὖν may appear to be merely an inference from what was said last: All day long God stretched forth His hand. But as, in ver. 11, he makes a further assertion, designed to forestall a false conclusion, it has here the same meaning, in antithesis to the strong judgment pronounced on Israel at the conclusion of the previous chapter. Meyer maintains a more definite reference to the λέγω in vers. 10, 18, 19.

[Did God cast away his people? μή ἀπόσπαστο ὁ θεὸς τὸν λαὸν αὐτοῦ; When Reiche remarks the absence of an ἀπάντα from λαόν, and Semler an omnino from ἀπόσπαστο, they both fail to appreciate the emphasis of the expressions. The people and his people are different ones, just as an economic giving over to judgment and an etern casting away (Ps. xciv. 14; xcv. 7). Bengel: Ipse populi ejus appellatio rationem negandi continet. The Apostle repels such a thought with religious horror: μή γένοιτο.

For I also [καὶ γὰρ ἐγώ]. According to the usual acceptance, he adduces his own call as an example; but Meyer, with De Wette and Baumgarten-Crusius, on the contrary, hold that Paul, on account of his patriotic sense as a true Israelite, could not concede that casting away.* But it was just this inference from a feeling of national patriotism that was the standpoint of his opponents. A single example, it is said, can prove nothing. But by Paul’s using the καὶ, he refers to the other examples which were numerously represented by the Jewish Christians among his readers.

Am an Israelite, of the seed of Abraham, of the tribe of Benjamin [Ἰσραηλῆτις εἰμι, ἐκ σπέρματος Ἀβραάμ, φυλῆς Βενιαμίν]. The spelling Beniamin (LXX., Rec.) is poorly supported here and in Phil. iii. 5.] As a true scion of Abraham and Benjamin—the tribe which, together with Judah, constituted the real substance of the people which returned from the captivity—he is conscious that he does not belong to the election as a mere proselyte; if he would speak of a casting away of God's people, he must therefore deny himself and his faith (Phil. iii. 5). [Alford distinguishes between the popular view, and another which implies, "that if such a hypothesis were to be conceded, it would exclude from God's kingdom the writer himself, as an Israelite." This agrees, apparently, with Lange's view, but implies also that "his people" is used in the national sense, not of the spiritual Israel. See below.—R.]

* [Dr. Lange divides the text so as to include only vers. 7-10 in this paragraph, which is the usual division; but here, and in the exegesis, he adds ver. 11.—R.]

* [Wordsworth supposes that he is speaking as an Apostle: “Do not imagine (he says to the Jews) that (God cast off) His ancient people when He admitted the Gentiles to the Church. No; I, who am His chosen instrument for admitting them, am a Jew” But this is an inference rather than an interpretation. He also explains “of the tribe of Benjamin:” “the son of Israel by his beloved wife Rachel, not by Leah; & by one of their handmaids.”—R.]

Ver. 2. God did not cast away [οὐκ ἀπώσαστο ὁ θεός]. He follows with a solemn declaration founded upon the testimony of his own conscientiousness and of examples.

His people [τὸν λαὸν αὐτοῦ]. He is as definite in characterizing His people, ὃν προέγνω, as he is grand in his declaration of the not casting away. On the idea of προγινώσκω, see chap. viii. 29. Two explanations here come in conflict with each other:

1. The spiritual people of God are spoken of, the Ἰσραὴλ θεοῦ; Rom. ix. 6; Gal. vi. 16 (Origen, Augustine, Luther, Calvin [Hodge], &c.).

2. Meyer says, on the contrary: The subject of the whole chapter is not the spiritual Israel, but the fate of the nation in regard to the salvation effected by the Messiah. Tholuck and Philippi [De Wette, Stuart, Alford], are of the same view. But the idea of "people" which the Apostle presents is so very dynamical, that it might be said; to him the election is the people, and God's true people is an election. This is evidently the thought in chap. ix., and also in vers. 4 and 5 of the present chapter. But if we emphasize properly the idea of casting away, the idea of election does not any more stand in antithesis to it; that is, it is not thereby settled that there is an election. But as the defenders of view (1.) mistake the full import of the further elaboration, especially ver. 26, so do the defenders of (2.) pass too lightly over the gradations made by the Apostle. [Against the interpretation: spiritual people, it may well be urged, that all along the Apostle has been speaking of the nation; that this very chapter treats of the final salvation of Israel as a nation, and Paul says he is an Israelite, &c., of this historical (not spiritual) people. Besides, the Scriptures have suffered very much from assumptions respecting spiritual references. The only argument in favor of this meaning is the phrase: "Whom he foreknew." It is held that this defines the people as those referred to in chap. viii. 29 ff.; but may there not be a foreknowledge of a nation resulting in national privileges, such as the Jews enjoyed, as really as foreknowledge of an individual and consequent blessing? The whole current of thought in the chapter—in fact, in chaps. ix.—xi.—is against any such interpretation as shall make "His people" = His spiritual Israel, over against Israel as a nation. If any limitation be made, it should be thus expressed: the real people of God among the Jewish people, recognizing them as the pith and kernel of the nation, not as isolated individuals from out the mass. This seems to be Dr. Lange's view, and is probably that of many who are quoted in favor of (1.) We thus retain the weight of the Apostle's proof: For I also am an Israelite, and avoid weakening the main thought of the chapter, which undoubtedly is: the ultimate national restoration of the Jews. Were it not this, the whole argument of chaps. ix.—xi. ends with a non sequitur. Comp. Alford, in loco.—R.]

What is meant by God casting away His people? 1. There is an election of believers, and it is far greater than one of little faith may think. (How many Jews themselves, of all periods, would like to have been friends of Jesus!) 2. The call of the Gentiles is even designed indirectly for the conversion of Israel, and individuals can always be gained. 3. The whole Divine disposition is designed for the final salvation of all Israel. Here, therefore, the thought of the mercy controlling this whole economy, comes in contrast with the thought of the great economical judgment of hardening. If, however, the expression all Israel be urged, and were be found in individuals of it an assurance of the salvation of the empirical totality, we would have to be indifferent to the idea of election with reference to Israel as a people, and let it consist in the idea of an absolute restoration.

Which he foreknew [ὃν προέγνω]. This limits the meaning, in so far as the empirical mass of the people is not meant; but, on the other hand, the small empirical number of believing Jews is also not meant, but the people in their whole regal idea and nature. In this eternal destination of Israel, God cannot contradict himself. [Alford (so Tholuck, De Wette, Meyer) thus paraphrases: "which, in His own eternal decree before the world, He selected as the chosen nation, to be His own, the depository of His law, the vehicle of the theocracy, from its first revelation to Moses, to its completion in Christ's future kingdom." Toward this national reference later commentators generally incline. See Hodge, on the other side.—R.]

Or know ye not, &c. [Ἥ οὐκ οἴδατε ἐν Ἠλίᾳ, κ.τ.λ. H introduces a new objection to the matter impugned (Alford). Comp. chap. ix. 21; vi. 3.—R.] Tholuck: "Ἐν Ἠλίᾳ, quotation of the section treating of Elijah, as Mark xii. 26: ἐπὶ τῆς βάτου. Examples from the classics in Fritzsche, to which may be added Thucydides i. 9, and proofs from Philo, in Grossmann," &c. (see 1 Kings xix. 10, 14). Incorrect view: ἐν Ἠλίᾳ, of Elijah (Erasmus, Luther [E. V.], and others). [Upon this point all modern commentators and translators agree, though they differ about the proper word to be supplied, whether section, history, or story; the last is simplest.—R.]

Ver. 3. Lord, they have killed thy prophets, &c. [Κύριε, τοὺς προφῆτας σοὶ ἀπέκτειναν, κ.τ.λ. See Textual Note 2.] The Apostle has quoted freely the real meaning of the words of the text. It makes no difference in the thing itself that, in the complaint which Elijah makes, he understands by the μόνος* the only remaining prophet, while the present passage understands the only worshipper of God. For the prophet, in his state of mind, was not inclined to acknowledge dumb or absconding worshippers of God as God's true worshippers. But Paul, in conformity with his view, has transposed the words meaning altars and prophets. Meyer pays attention to the plural, the altars, "as the temple at Jerusalem was the only place exclusively designed for service." But even in the temple at Jerusalem there were two altars. Yet the question here is concerning the kingdom of Israel and therefore the remark of Estius is almost super-saous, that it was even blasphemy to throw down God's altars on the high places.*

Ver. 4. But what saith the Divine response unto him? ἀλλὰ τί λέγει αὐτῷ ὁ χρηματισμός; On χρηματισμός, see the Lexicons. [The substantive occurs only here in the New Testament. The cognate verb is used in Matt. x. 12, 22; Acts x. 22; Heb. viii. 5; xi. 7, in the sense: to be warned of God, as the E. V. expresses it. The obvious meaning here: Divine response, seems to have been thus derived: the word first meant business, then formal audience given to an ambassador, and then an oracular response, though this was not the classical sense. See 2 Mac. ii. 4; xi. 17.—R.]

I have reserved to myself [Κατέλιπον ἐμαυτῷ. See Textual Note *]. To myself, as my possession and for my service, over against the apostasy into idolatrous service (Meyer).—R.] The original expression: "I will leave me," has been changed by the Apostle into the past tense, without thereby altering the sense, as has been done by the LXX.

Seven thousand men [ἑπταχίλιους ἄνδρας]. It is sufficient to regard the number seven as the sacred number in relation to the services, and the number thousand as a designation of a popular assembly. Tholuck, after Kurtz (p. 591), considers the number seven as the perfect and covenant number. There are different ideas of perfection, according to which the numbers 3, 4, 7, 10, and 12, may be together regarded as numbers denoting perfection.† The Mohammedan saying, quoted by Tholuck, is interesting: that "God never allows the world to be without a remainder of seventy righteous people, for whose sake He preserves it."

[Who never bowed, οἵτινες οὐκ ἔκλυναν. Alford remarks on οἵτινες, which is a variation from the original, that it gives "the sense of the saying, as far as regards the present purpose, viz., to show that all these were faithful men; in the original text and LXX, it is implied that these were all the faithful men."—R.]

To Baal. The feminine τῇ Βάαλ has given occasion for much discussion. In the LXX, the name has sometimes the masculine and sometimes the feminine article. Why does it have the latter? As the LXX of this passage has τῇ Βάαλ, Meyer has admitted a mistake of Paul's memory; Fritzsche holds that the codex which Paul read, contained a different reading. According to Olshausen, Philippi, Meyer [Stuart, Hodge], and others, the feminine form may be explained by the fact that Baal was regarded as an androgynous deity; but this is not sufficiently proved. According to Gesenius, the feminine form was understood as a contemptuous expression of idols; which view is also favored by Tholuck. The elder critics (Erasmus, Beza, Grotius) understood the word as applying to the statue of Baal. [So E. V.] Tholuck replies to this, by saying: without analogy. But the idol is the contemptible image or statue of the false god. Yet, if we hold that Baal had no reality as god to the Jews, but merely as an idol, the whole series of feminine forms used in designating Baal becomes clear at once (1 Sam. vii. 4; Zeph. i. 4; Hosea ii. 8). Meyer is of the opinion that, in that case, it would have to read τῇ τοῦ Βάαλ; but this would fully destroy the probably designed effect of the feminine form. Tholuck observes: "In the Gothic language, Guth, as masculine, means God; but gud, as neuter, means idols;" and by this means he again approaches the explanation which, in parsing, he has rejected. He does not agree with him in his preceding remark: "In the rabbinica writings, idols are contemptuously called מִלִּימָה." On Baal,* comp. Winer, das Wörterbuch für das christliche Volk, and the Hebrew Antiquities, by De Wette, Ewald, and Keil.

Ver. 5. Even so then in this present time [οὕτως οὖν καὶ ἐν τῷ νῦν καιρῷ. Alford suggests: "even in the present time, sc., of Israel's national rejection.—R.] God, according to that example, secures for himself a certain remnant [λείμμα] of the elect, according to His constant law of election—that is, according to the election of grace [κατ' ἐκλογὴν χάριτος. Comp. chap. ix. 11. Stuart: "an election, not on the ground of merit, but of mercy.—R.]

Ver. 6. Now if by grace [εἰ δὲ χάριτι. Id logical, now.—R.] Namely, that a λείμμα existed, and always continues to exist. Grace, or the gift of grace, cannot be divided and supplemented by, or confounded with, a merit of works. Augustine: Gratia, nisi gratis sit, gratia non est.

[Then it is no longer of works: otherwise grace no longer becomes grace, οὐκ ἔτι ἐξ ἔργων, ἐπεὶ ἡ χάρις οὐκ ἔτι γίνεται χάρις.—But if it be of works, then it is no longer grace: otherwise work is no longer work, εἰ δὲ ἐξ ἔργων, οὐκ ἔτι χάρις, ἐπεὶ τὸ ἔργον οὐκ ἔτι ἔστιν ἔργον. The critical questions respecting the second clause are discussed in Textual Notes *, , and at some length below. The discussion requires us to insert the verse in full.—R.] We may now ask how we must understand the parallel clauses? The usual explanation places the following in antithesis to each other: Now if it is by grace (that remnant, or its causality, the election), then it is simply not by the merit of works, otherwise grace is no more grace.—But if it be by works, then it is no more grace, otherwise work would be no true work, but mercenary work. In connection with this antithesis, clear and significant in itself, there arise, however, three questions: 1. Why does the Apostle enlarge the first proposition by the second, since the latter seems to be quite self-evident from the former? 2. What should the γίνεται (χάρις) mean, where ἔστι should be so positively expected that the Vulgate [E. V.], and other versions, have even substituted est? 3. Why is χάρις used instead of id

* [Still with Estius, Philippi, Hodge, De Wette, and others, it must be noted that, although the erection of the altars on the high places was originally forbidden in the kingdom of Israel (where Elijah lived), they had become the only places of true worship; and neglect of these would be really neglect of Jehovah.—R.]

† [The simplest explanation is that which takes this as a definite expression for an indefinite number (Stuart, Hodge, and others), without attaching any special significance to the number seven.—R.]

* [Wordsworth combines all the explanations: "The reason why the Septuagint sometimes used the feminine, why St. Paul adopts it here, appears to be, because not only a heathen God, but a goddess also (Atarê), was worshipped under the name of Baal, and because, by this variety of gender, the reader is reminded that there was no principle of unity in this heathen worship; and thus the vanity of the worship itself is declared." The fact that the LXX uses both, seems to render the italics of the E. V. unnecessary, and to render the interpretation thus assumed very doubtful.—R.]

As far as the first point is concerned, Tholuck says: "The genuineness of the antithesis 'ἐξ ἔργων,' &c., is more than doubtful. Its oldest authorities are Cod. B., Peshito, Chrysostom, Theodoret (in the text). On the contrary, it is wanting in A. C. D. F. G., Origen (according to Rufinus), Vulgate, the Coptic Translation, and others. Yet Fritzsche has undertaken to defend this reading, and lately Reiche also, in the Comm. Crit., p. 67; Tischendorf has preserved it in the text," &c. According to Tholuck, the addition has the character of a glossarial reflection. This appearance of such a self-evident amplification could, however, have also occasioned the omission.*

The γίνεταί in the first sentence means, according to Tholuck: to result, to come out as. This explanation is just as doubtful as that of Meyer: "in its concrete appearance it ceases to be what it is by nature." [So De Wette, Alford, Philippi. The distinction between γίνεταί and ἐστίν is ignored by many commentators.—R.] The χάρις, in the second sentence, must be understood, according to the current explanation, as the effect of the χάρις in the first sentence. In addition to this, we have the question: What is the meaning of "work is no more work?" Does the Apostle regard only mercenary work as a true work? We attempt the following explanation: If it is of grace, then it is no more of works; for grace does not first exist, or is not first in process of existence by works. Grace, according to its very nature, must be complete before works. But if of works, then no further grace exists,† because the work is not yet complete, and never will be complete as meritorious work. Works, considered as meritorious, are always an incomplete infinitude. But if grace should first be the result of works,‡ it would not be present until the boundless future. If we accept this view, the literal expression is saved; and to the first declaration, that grace and the merit of works preclude each other, there is gained a second: Grace is naturally a prepared ground before the existing work, &c. (see also the continuation in ver. 7). The reading of Cod. B.: ἐξ ἔργων, οὐκ ἐστὶ χάρις, ἐπεὶ τὸ ἔργον οὐκ ἐστὶ χάρις, seems also to be a special attempt at an explanation. The real purpose of the antithesis is, that the Apostle proves that the election of the people could only consist of those who establish themselves on grace, but not in the party which establishes itself on works. If the matter were as those who rely on the righteousness of works desire, there would not be any grace; and grace would never be accomplished, because the righteousness of works is never accomplished, just as little as the tower of Babel was ever finished.‡

* [Alford well remarks: "The object being prestation, it is much more probable that the Apostle should have written both clauses in their present formal parallelism, and that the second should have been early omitted from its seeming superfluity, than that it should have been inserted from the margin." The want of exact correspondence also against the probability of an interpolation, as Fritzsche has remarked: χάρις—ἐξ ἔργων; γίνεταί χάρις—ἐστὶν ἔργων; ἔργων at the close, where ἔργα might have been expected.—R.]

† [So Wordsworth, who accepts the very weakly-supported ἐστὶ of the Rec., and accenting it thus: ἐστὶ, renders: "there is no longer any place for the existence of grace." But this is very doubtful.—R.]

‡ [The following paraphrase (abridged from Alford) may give a clearer view: "But if (the selection has been made) by grace, it is no longer (we exclude its being) of works (as

Vers. 7–11. The great body of unbelievers who have not been able to obtain grace by works, are not the real substance of the people. They are essentially an apostate remnant of hardened ones. Yet their stumbling was not designed for their ruin, but for the salvation of the Gentiles.

Ver. 7. What then. Τί οὖν. This inference, as well as the ἐπιζητεῖ, becomes quite definite, if we refer to the conclusion of the previous verse.—That which Israel seeketh for he obtained not [ἡ ἐπιζητεῖ Ἰσραὴλ, τοῦτο οὐκ ἐπέτυχεν]. The latter verb is usually followed by the genitive; rarely, in the classics, by the accusative, as here. Hence we find, in Rec. (no MSS.), τοῦτου. See Meyer for the authorities for this use of the accusative. The meaning is not: to find, but to attain to, to obtain.—R.] Israel did not obtain that which it sought to obtain by works—grace, as the end of the finished work. Like a phantom beyond the ever unfinished work, grace had to recede ever further in the distance. The ἐπιζητεῖν can, at all events, also mean zealous striving [Fritzsche, Philippi, Hodge]; but it is clear that this idea would not be in place here. [Meyer says it indicates the direction.—R.] The present properly denotes "the permanence of the effort"—the permanence of the effort to find the city of grace at the end of the long road of self-righteousness.

But the election obtained it [ἡ δὲ ἐλογγῇ ἐπέτυχεν]. The election for the elect, as the circumcision for those circumcised. Vivacious expression.—R.] Meyer says: "For they were subjects of Divine grace." Paul has already said, in other words: For the elect are distinguished by having received God's grace in faith.

And the rest were hardened [οἱ δὲ λοιποὶ ἐπωροθίσαν]. The verb is rendered blinded in the E. V., here, and 2 Cor. iii. 14; in other places, hardened, which is decidedly preferable.—R.] Israel is divided into two parts. One part is the ἐλογγῇ, although it is the minority; the other is the λοιποὶ, the τινὲς, although they are the majority. Meyer says, they were hardened by God. [So Hodge, Stuart, Philippi (with a reservation), and Tholuck, in later editions; comp. chap. ix. 18. The passive certainly includes this thought.—R.] Paul says, they have been hardened by a reciprocal process between their unbelief and God's judgments. The sense undoubtedly is, that those who remain for the incalculable periods of judgment have become, "in understanding and will, insusceptible of the appropriation of salvation in Christ" (Meyer), and insusceptible, above all, in their heart and spirit; because the last sparks of the spiritual life in them, which alone can understand the gospel of the Spirit, have expired; just as a sapless plant is no more supported by the sunshine, but is reduced to a dried-up stalk.

Ver. 8. According as it is written. [Stuart is disposed to find in καθὼς (κ. B., Tregelles: καθ' ὅτι) γέγραπτα, a declaration of analogy its source]; for (in that case) grace no longer becomes (loses its efficacy as) grace (the freedom of the act is lost, it having been prompted from without); but if of works (as the cause and source of the selection), no longer is it (the act of selection) grace; for (in that case) work is no longer work (work being, that which earns reward, its character is contradicted). The same author remarks, that this point is stated so fully just here, because the Apostle was to enter upon such an exposition of the Divine dealings as rendered it necessary to show that their severity did not contradict their general character of grace and love—R.]

rather than a citation of prophecy. So Tholuck; but Fritzsche, Meyer, and others, hold the latter view. "The perspective of prophecy, in stating such cases, embraces all the analogous ones, especially that great one, in which the words are most prominently fulfilled" (Alford). See below, note on ver. 10. On the free citation, see Textual Notes "B.—R."] The citation is freely collated from Isa. xxix. 10; Isa. vi. 9; Deut. xxix. 4. Meyer denies that Isa. vi. 9 is taken into consideration; but if we compare the two other passages, they do not suffice for Paul's citation, since the assertion in Deut. xxix. 4 contains merely negations.

God gave them. By no means a mere permission (Chrysostom), but likewise not simply activity, without something further. The ground of the judgment of a spirit of slumber [πνεῦμα κατανύξεως], or of deep sleep (רֵדוּת בְּרִדְוֹת), on Israel, is definitely declared, in Isa. xxix. 10, to be the guilt of the people; ver. 18 ff.—But the passage in Isa. vi. 9 ff., which constitutes the principal part of the present quotation, is explained immediately afterward in the conduct of Ahas, in chap. vii. The third passage from Deuteronomy brings out more definitely the negative element in this hardening process: "Yet the Lord hath not given you a heart to perceive," &c. On the meaning and interpretations of κατανύξεως, see Meyer, p. 420; Tholuck, p. 596.—[Unto this day; to be joined with what immediately precedes, since they are substantially from Deut. xxix. 4. So modern editors and commentators generally.—R.]

Ver. 9. And David saith. The second passage is taken freely from Ps. lxxix. 22 (LXX.). Meyer says: "David is not the author of this Psalm (against Hengstenberg), which must be judged analogously to the expression in Matt. xxii. 43." Comp. on that passage the Commentary on Matthew, p. 404. First of all, it is quite easy to prove that the sufferings of the people in exile could not have been in mind in writing either the lamentations of Psalm lxxix., or the "imprecations" on enemies. First, the theocratic exiles did not say that they had to suffer for the Lord's sake (ver. 7), and for zeal for His house (ver. 9). But they said just the contrary (see Ps. cvi.; Isa. lxxiv.; Dan. ix.). And though the exile could also invoke God's wrath on the heathen, and wish them evil (Ps. lxxix. 6; cxxxvii. 9), the prophetic imprecations are very different, for they portray the judgments of blindness that are invoked on the spiritual adversaries of the theocratic faith, and of the house and name of the Lord, who proved their enmity by persecuting God's servant. Comp., in this respect, Ps. lix.; lxxiv.; lxxix. 22-28; cix. In such Psalms, either the personal, collective, or ideal † David chiefly speaks, because David has become the type of God's suffering servant. We therefore hold, with Luther, Rosenmüller, and others, that the concluding words (from ver. 32) are a later addition.†

* (Fritzsche has an Excursus on this word, pp. 585 ff. He makes it = stupor, numbness, as from stupefying wine. Only here, and not in the classics. Incorrect, according to this view; Calvin: spiritus compunctionis; Luther: einen geschüttelten Geist.—R.)

† [Philippi (following Keil) says that the subject in this Psalm is "not the ideal, but the concrete person of the righteous." Hengstenberg (so J. A. Alexander) adopts the other view.—R.]

‡ [The Psalm purports to be written by David. Dr. Lange's remarks are in support of this view of the authorship, though he finds it necessary, in order to sustain it by

The imprecations themselves are a prophetic-ethical view, clad in the sombre drapery of the Old Testament. [Dr. J. Add. Alexander remarks, on this verse of Ps. lxxix.: "The imprecations in this verse, and those following it, are revolting only when considered as the expression of malignant selfishness. If uttered by God, they shock no reader's sensibilities; nor should they, when considered as the language of an ideal person, representing the whole class of righteous sufferers, and particularly Him who, though He prayed for His murderers while dying (Luke xxiii. 34), had before applied the words of this very passage to the unbelieving Jews (Matt. xxiii. 38), as Paul did afterwards."—R.]

Let their table become a snare [Γίγνηθὶ τὸ ἑστῶν αὐτῶν εἰς παγίδα]. Philippi, with Origen, Tholuck, and others, has referred the table to the law and its works. But when Melancthon says: doctrina ipsorum, the latter must be very carefully distinguished from the law itself. Chrysostom: their enjoyments; Michaelis, and others: the Jewish passover meal, at which the Jews were besieged, and which was followed by the destruction of Jerusalem; Grotius: the altar in the temple itself. The point of the figure becomes blunted, if we hold, with Tholuck, that table is mentioned, because it is at the table that surprise by an enemy is most dangerous. Rather, the table, or the enjoyment of life by the ungodly, becomes itself their snare, &c. Now this table can be something different at different times; generally, it is the symbol of comfortable banqueting in wicked security over the ungodly enjoyment of life (see Matt. xxiv. 38). With the Jews of the Apostle's day, this table was their statutes, and, above all, their illusion that the earthly glory of the kingdom of Israel would be manifested by triumph over the Romans. It is a fact that the table, the ungodly enjoyment of life, becomes a snare for the ruin of the adversaries of the Holy One; just as the pious man's table becomes a sign of blessing and victory (Ps. xxiii.). While they think they are consuming the spoils of their earthly sense, they become themselves a spoil to every form of retribution; just as the bird is led into the snare, and the deer is hunted, or perishes by a stumbling-block—that is, a trap.

[And a trap, and a stumbling-block, and a recompense unto them, καὶ εἰς θήραν καὶ εἰς σκάνδαλον καὶ ἀταπόδομα αὐτοῖς. See Textual Notes "B.—R."] Paul has freely elaborated the original forms still further, by inserting καὶ εἰς θήραν. Likewise σκάνδαλον follows ἀταπόδοτος in the LXX. The Vulgate interprets θήρα by captio; Fritzsche and Meyer adopt the same, while Tholuck and Philippi prefer the instrument [Ewald, Alford: net] of hunting, which applies to both the other means of capture, and not merely as a "hunting-spear." Meyer is incorrect in saying that this ruin is explained in what follows. For the following words describe the inward relations of the judgment of the ungodly, in antithesis to the judgment in the outward relations of life, which have been described by the foregoing words.

Ver. 10. Let their eyes be darkened, that they may not see [σκοτισθήτωσαν οἱ internal evidence, to admit the later addition of the concluding verses. The question of authorship does not, indeed, affect the question of the propriety of the phrase: David saith; but when it is so likely that David did write the Psalm, inventing theories to prove that he did not seems to be useless ingenuity.—R.]

ἁποκλεισμοὶ αὐτῶν τοῦ μὴ βλέπειν]. Spiritual blindness is one form of the inward judgment, and total dependency of spirit is the other.

And bow down their back always [καὶ τὸν ὥτον αὐτῶν διὰ παντός σύγκαμνον. See Textual Note *.—R.] The LXX. has translated the words of the original text, "and make their loins continually to shake," by: "make their back: crooked always;" a change to which the Apostle adheres, probably because it gives the expression of permanent dejection a somewhat more general character.—By bowed-down backs, Meyer understands spiritual slavery, while the early expositors understood Roman slavery. Yet this would be an important deviation from the original text. But, in reality, the bowed-down backs should mean the same thing as shaking or tottering loins.

Tholuck and Philippi have correctly observed, against Fritzsche, and others, that in ver. 8 (and the same thing applies also to ver. 9) the question is not the citation of a prophecy, according to which the unbelief of the Jews at the time of Christ must be a necessary result. Yet this remark does not suffice to show that the quotation takes place as in the citations in Matt. xiii. 14; John xii. 40; Acts xxviii. 26; which "refer, vi analogia, to the classical passage for the unbelieving conduct of Israel toward God, in Isa. vi." The most direct practical purpose of these citations in the New Testament is to prove to the Jews, from their own Holy Scriptures and history, that there was always in Israel an inclination to apostasy; and that it is therefore not contrary to faith in prophecy to charge the present Israel with apostasy (see the defence of Stephen). But then a really typical prophecy also underlies this purpose; yet it is not a fatalistic prophecy, but the idea of the consequence of ruin even to its historical consummation (see Matt. xxiii. 32 ff.).

Ver. 11. I say then, Did they stumble in order that they should fall? [λέγω οὖν, μὴ ἵπταισαν ἵνα πείσωσιν;] A qualification to guard against a false conclusion. They have certainly stumbled and fallen; but the purpose of their guilty stumbling and falling under the previously described judgment of hardness was not that they should fall, in the absolute sense, into the ruin of the ἀπώλεια. Their falling is economically limited, and economically turned and applied, to the salvation of the Gentiles (see chap. ix. 17, 23). The stumbling of the λαοὶ took place against the stone of offence (chap. ix. 32, 33; x. 11). The ἵνα denotes the final purpose of the Divine judicial government, and is not merely ἐκβατικῶς, as Chrysostom, Augustine, and others, would have it.* Tholuck makes the noteworthy remark, that πείσω, to stumble (which must not be referred, with De Wette, and others, to the σκάνδαλον mentioned in ver. 9, but rather to the λίθος προσκόμματος in chap. ix. 38), has the sense of moral stumbling; James ii. 10; iii. 2; and that πείπτω, on the contrary, has this ethically figurative sense neither in the Hebrew, nor Greek, nor Latin, but only the sense of yielding to, sinking under.

But by their fall [ἀλλὰ τῷ αὐτῶν πα-

ραπτώματι. On παράπτωμα, see p. 184, Dr Schaff's note.—R.] Meyer has no ground for not finding in παραπτ. the meaning of falling, but only the delictum (Vulgate) [so Alford], for they have really fallen, yet that was not the object (see also Tholuck, p. 600). Tholuck properly opposes, also, the view that here the principal thought is, that Israel should be restored, although an intimation of the restitution of Israel is included in the words. It is evident that the conversion of the Gentiles is primarily designated as the final object of Israel's fall; with this final object there is, indeed, again associated the final object of the preliminarily isolated and of the finally total conversion of Israel. The παραπτ. here can as little mean a mere "passing away," as a mere infortunium, which Reiche and Rückert, with others, would render it.*

Salvation is come. Ἡ σωτηρία. Γέγονε must be supplied, according to the connection. The Apostle cannot have regarded this tragical condition as an absolute necessity; but he may very well have considered it an historical one. Israel, having been placed in its existing condition by its own guilt, did not desire the Gentiles, under the most favorable circumstances, to participate in the messianic salvation, except as proselytes of the Jews; and still more did it indulge the thought of vengeance on, and dominion over, the Gentiles; but it was impossible for Christianity, as Jewish Christianity, to become universal in the Gentile world. In addition to this came the experience of the Apostle, that he was always driven more decidedly to missionary labors among the Gentiles by the unbelief of the Jews; Matt. xxi. 43; Acts xiii. 46; xxviii. 28. The negative condition of this transition was apostolic preaching, and especially that of Paul.

In order to excite them to jealousy [εἰς τὸ παραζηλῶσαι αὐτοὺς]. Instead of jealousy, we may substitute emulation, as the word is not used in a bad sense (Hodge). The clause is telic; the purpose was not the total fall, but that their moral fall might be used to further the salvation of the Gentiles, and this, in turn, bring about their own salvation as a nation.—R.] This purpose was associated from the outset, and the mention of it is here in place for the removal of the fatalistic thought, that their fall was decreed for their ruin.

Vers. 12–16. As the unbelief of the Jews has been the means of effecting the conversion of the Gentiles, so shall the conversion of the Gentiles be still more not only the means of effecting the belief of the Jews, but, with this return of Israel, still greater things shall occur.

Now if their fall . . . and their diminishing the riches of the Gentiles [εἰ δὲ τὸ παράπτωμα αὐτῶν . . . τὸ ἥττημα αὐτῶν πλοῦτος ἐθῶν]. In order to explain this difficult verse, we must start with the ἥττημα in Isa. xxxi. 8, which does not occur in classical language, but is there represented by ἥττα [Attic for ἥσσα, a defeat], the contrary of νίκη. In the passage cited, ἥττημα means not merely the being overcome, but the military diminution which is the result of defeat. At all events, it is to be taken here as diminution in captivity, according to the original text, for menial servitude. Likewise, in 1 Cor. vi. 7, the word means a moral loss, a diminution of the power of believers in opposition to the world. We therefore hold that the expression ἥττημα places the two other ideas in a more definite light, and that the whole expression alludes to the scene of a routed army. Even in military affairs, the dynamical antithesis of broken power and of the full sense of power is connected with the ideas of numerical diminution and numerical fulness; as, in the present instance, the weakening is connected with the loss of men, and full power with the complete number. Tholuck bases his explanation on the meaning of πλήρωμα in ver. 25.

Explanations of the ἥττημα: diminutio (Vulgate); minority, defectus (Chrysostom, and most commentators); injury, loss, fall (De Wette, and others). De Wette brings this explanation in exclusive antithesis to the first, with reference to 2 Cor. xii. 13. Fritzsche: Diminution of messianic salvation. Philippi: The damage to God's kingdom by their falling away. But Meyer remarks, with good reason, that the thrice-repeated αὐτῶν is in the same relation, the subjective genitive. Tholuck: Reduced state.* According to Tholuck, Meyer's explanation is: the minority; but Meyer himself pronounces against this explanation, and understands the word to mean, sinking and ruin. Ufilas has interpreted the word, which means at the same time the loss of men and the weakening, by the deficiency. There is a real difference made by the reference to the believing Jews as the minority of believers (paucitas Judaeorum credentium; Grotius), and the antithetical body of unbelievers, the moral field of the dead, or the captured, those subjected to slavery. But here, too, both parts cannot be separated. The αἰτοί are the whole people; the believers are the sound remainder of the army; while the unbelievers, the same as the fallen, or captives, are its ἥττημα.

How much more their fulness [πόσω μᾶλλον τὸ πλήρωμα αὐτῶν]. The πλήρωμα. Explanations: The whole body (Tholuck); the full number (Meyer); the restoration of Israel to its proper position (Rückert, Köllner); [Hodge: their full restoration or blessedness; Alford: their replenishment.—R.] Philippi: the filling up of the gap caused in God's kingdom by their unbelief. The latter view, which was first set forth by Origen, is discussed at length by Tholuck, p. 606 ff. But this view confounds in a twofold way: 1. The idea of the full number of God's eternal community in general, and the idea of material fulness (πλήρωμα), the whole number of the Jewish people; 2. The idea of the economic completeness in the present passage, and that of ontic completeness.†

Tholuck very properly calls attention to the apparent tautology in πλοῦτος κόσμος, πλοῦτος ἰσχυρῶν, which has been very much neglected by expositors. In κόσμος, he says, there seems to be comprised the idea of the whole extent of humanity and in πλοῦρ. ἰσχυρῶν there appears the more concrete designation: "The reduction of the chosen people turned to an enrichment of the profane nations." The former definition regards the qualitative, intensive, and teleological relation in an altogether universal sense: The fall of the historical Israel redounded to the advantage of the world, even including the ideal Israel. The latter definition describes the quantitative and extensive character of the historical course. Jewish tribes, or Jewish communities, drop out of the people, while, on the other hand, whole heathen nations are gained. But if their fall has thus been a gain to the world, how much more their fulness—that is, a believing Israel!

* [So Hodge, Alford: their impoverishment. The numerical idea is quite objectionable, although Dr. Lange seems to think it is included also. The whole verse, according to this view, means: "If their unbelief (i. e., of one part of them) is the world's wealth, and their small number (i. e., of believers, the other part of them) the wealth of the Gentiles, how much more their full (restored) number?" This arbitrarily changes the reference of αὐτῶν, puts a forced meaning on ἥττημα, and really weakens the force of the argument, which is: if their sin has done so much, how much more their conversion!—R.]

† [The numerical idea is lexically admissible in πλήρωμα, whence it has been transferred to ἥττημα, but even here it is not the prominent one. It is, however, to be understood, that the spiritual fulness will necessarily include the cor version of the nation as a whole.—R.]

Ver. 18. For I am speaking to you Gentiles [ὑμῖν δὲ λέγω τοῖς ἔθνεσιν]. The sense is the same whether we read γὰρ or δι. A colon should follow this clause; the pointing of the E. V. obscures the proper connection.—R.] The declared prospect of the full conversion of Israel leads him to the further explanation, that he regards even the conversion of the Gentiles, though an object in itself, as a means for accomplishing the object of Israel's conversion. [According to Alford, this verse answers the question: "Why make it appear as if the treatment of God's chosen people were regulated not by a consideration of them, but of the less favored Gentiles?"—R.]—You Gentiles; that is, Gentile Christians.—[Inasmuch then ἵνα ὅσον μὲν οὖν. See Textual Note 14. The corresponding δι is wanting, as often in the Apostle's writings.—R.] Ἐφ' ὅσον, not quamdiu (Origen, Vulgate, Luther).

I glorify mine office [τὴν διακονίαν μου δοξάζω]. Not: I praise my office (Luther, Grotius, and Reiche); but: I strive to glorify my office by its faithful discharge (De Wette, Meyer, and others); in which, indeed, he also says, that he esteems his office as a glorious one.*

Ver. 14. My own flesh [μου τὴν σάρκα]. On μου in this peculiar position, see Meyer. D. F. put it after the noun. It is sufficiently emphatic to justify the emendation, my own flesh.—R.] An expression of inward participation with Israel in natural descent. Theodoret: The word leads us to understand the denial of spiritual participation. Ver. 28 proves that this antithesis is not very remote; yet the inward attachment to his people here appears in the foreground.

Ver. 15. For if the casting away of them [εἰ γὰρ ἀποβολὴ αὐτῶν]. Ἀποβολή, throwing away, an antithesis to πρόσληψις; see ver. 17. Therefore not their diminution (Vulgate, Luther). [So Bengel, Philippi, who find here also an allusion to the loss in numbers sustained by the kingdom of God.—R.] Tholuck alludes to the use of language in the LXX., and the Church (ἀποβολή, expulsion).

Be the reconciliation of the world [καταλλαγὴ κόσμου]. Not as causality, but as condition, without which the word of reconciliation did not reach the Gentiles without obstruction. [It

* [Meyer thus paraphrases: "I seek, indeed, inasmuch as I am he, who has the apostolic mission to the Gentiles (notice the emphatic ἐγώ), to do honor to mine office, but purpose therewith to excite my kinsmen," &c. This brings out the force of μέν, and the connection of thought.—R.]

perhaps to express this shade of thought that the E. V. renders: reconciling; but reconciliation is more literal, and shows how important Paul deemed the fact in question, which could thus be characterized.—R.] In this free use of language Paul also says οὖν, in ver. 14, because he is the herald of εὐαγγέλιον.

What shall the reception of them be [τίς ἡ πρόσληψις]. Reception to salvation, and to participation in salvation by their conversion.

But life from the dead? [εἰ μὴ ζωὴ ἐκ νεκρῶν]. It is clear that the Apostle awaits a boundless effect of blessing on the world from the future conversion of the Jews. We ask, What is it? We must first look at the antithesis: Their casting away became the reconciling of the world; that is, only conditionally, therefore as if, and indirectly. Thus, we continue, the conversion of the whole people of Israel will also be conditionally, as if, and indirectly, a life from the dead. With the appropriated κατάλληλῃ, there now begins, first, the spiritual resurrection, which is succeeded, second, by the future bodily resurrection. Hence different explanations:

1. Figurative expression of the new spiritual life (Augustine, Calvin, and others) of the Gentile world, or of the world in general, but not of the Jews (as Cocceius, Bengel, and others, explain), since the new life of the latter is regarded as an antecedent means. But this new life is also regarded in different senses: The further extension of God's kingdom, and the new subjective vivification (Philippi, and others), increase, and advance of piety (Bucer, Bengel). "A new life in the higher charismatic fullness of the Spirit shall extend from God's people to the nations of the world, compared with which the previous life of the nations must be considered dead;" Auberlen (calculated to mislead, and overdrawn, so far as the Christian life of the previous world is meant). Other modifications: Highest joy [Grotius, Hodge apparently], highest blessedness. [Stuart: something great, wonderful, surprising, like to what a general resurrection of the dead would be. He thinks it probable Paul had in mind Ezekiel's vision of the dry bones.—R.]

2. The literal view: The resurrection of the dead is meant—the oldest ecclesiastical explanation (Origen, Chrysostom, Rückert, Tholuck, Meyer, De Wette, &c.). Tholuck says that the meaning of this view is, that the conversion of Israel is regarded as the final act in the world's drama; but then he makes the objection, that ζωὴ ἐκ νεκρῶν nowhere stands in the New Testament for the ἀνάστασις, and thus the expositor finds himself compelled to prefer the metaphorical exposition.

But it has not been sufficiently considered how very conditional the first proposition in the comparison is: for if the casting away of them be the reconciliation of the world. As this is a fact which is realized first up to and in the conversion of the Pleroma of the Gentiles, and then of the Jews, so is the consequence of their acceptance a fact which is continued from the higher spiritual new life of the world to its consummation, particularly in the first resurrection. To the Apostle, the ideas of spiritual resurrection and bodily resurrection do not lie so far apart (see chap. viii. 11) as to our expositors; therefore Olshausen is right in applying the word to a spiritual resurrection, which takes place in the bodily resurrection. [Alford also combines the two views. "Standing as it does, it must be quali- tative, implying some further blessed state of the reconciled world, over and above the mere reconciliation. This might well be designated 'life from the dead,' and in it may be implied the glories of the first resurrection, and deliverance from the bondage of corruption, without supposing the words to be = the resurrection from the dead."—R.]

Ver. 16. Moreover, if the first-fruit be holy, so also is the lump [εἰ δὲ ἡ ἀπαρχὴ ἁγία, καὶ τὸ ὅλον]. Lange: das Erstlingsbrot, the bread of the first-fruits—i. e., the portion of the dough taken as a heave-offering.—R. After the Apostle has disclosed his prospect of the glorious results of Israel's conversion, he returns to the grounds for the hope of this conversion itself. He uses two similes. The first is taken from the significance of the bread of the first-fruit (Num. xv. 19–21). Ἀπαρχή can, indeed, denote the first-fruit, as well as the bread of the first-fruit; but it receives this meaning from the corresponding idea of the harvest; while, on the other hand, the baking of the first-fruit must correspond to the ῥίψιμα, the kneaded dough. Therefore the expression here can neither mean first-fruit (Estius, Olshausen, and others), nor the grain for the bread of the first-fruit (Grotius). But the ἀπαρχή in general denotes the representative offering by which the whole mass, to which ἀπαρχή belongs, is consecrated to God. Thus is the consecration of the first-born to the priesthood (with which Levi was charged), the consecration of the people; the consecration of the first-fruit is the consecration of the harvest; and the consecration of the bread of the first-fruit is the consecration of the whole lump, which was afterwards prepared. [So Stuart, Hodge, Alford, De Wette, Tholuck, Meyer. Ἀπαρχή is necessarily defined by its correlative term ῥίψιμα, the mass of dough for baking.—R.]

And if the root be holy, so are the branches also [καὶ εἰ ἡ ῥίζα ἁγία, καὶ οἱ κλάδοι]. This second simile is clear in itself: The branches correspond to the root (anomalous exceptions to this agreement, which may be found in nature, do not here come into consideration). The general fundamental thought of both figures is, undoubtedly, as Reiche holds, that the whole people is designated as good by its first-fruits as well as by its root. Interpretation of the particular parts:

1. Both figures mean the same thing. The ἀπαρχή are the patriarchs (Abraham, &c.); τὸ ῥίψιμα, is the whole body of the people. The same relation applies to root and branches (the Greek fathers, Erasmus, Calvin, Tholuck, Meyer [Stuart, Hodge, Alford], &c.).

2. The figures are different. The second figure undoubtedly applies to the patriarchs and their posterity; but the first, by ἀπαρχή, describes the believing Jews, and, by ῥίψιμα, the rest (Toletus, Cramer, and others. [So Wordsworth, who understands, by ῥίψιμα, the whole mass of the world which is to be converted.—R.] Also, in reference to the first figure, Ambrosius, and others). Modifications: According to Origen and Theodoret, ἀπαρχή means Christ himself, and ῥίψιμα, Christians. Meyer has two objections to the different rendering of the figures. First, it is contrary to the parallelism of the two passages. But apart from the fact that Paul's prose is not subject to the rules of the poetical parallelism of the Old Testament, this reasoning betrays a defective idea of the Old Testament parallelism itself. His second reason.

that the Apostle elaborates the second figure only, is of just as little force; for, with the further resumption of the second figure, there is presented a perfectly new thought. The most untenable explanation is, that ῥίζα means the original Christian Church, and κλάδοι are the individual believing Jews.

We hold that the antithesis is very decided. From what follows, it is clear that the ideal theocracy, though represented by the patriarchs, yet not identical with them (see Isa. xi. 1, 10; Rev. v. 5; xii. 16), must be regarded as the root of Israel. In fact, from the foregoing citations, the same Christ is certainly the root of the old theocracy, as He is the ἀρχή in the ἀπαρχή of the new Jewish believing Church, and the causa efficiens of the sanctification of both. But according to the antithesis here presented, ῥίζα is the patriarchal foundation of the theocracy as the natural disposition consecrated to God; while the ἀπαρχή, on the contrary, is the first Jewish body of believers prepared by God as the bread of the first-fruit for the first harvest festival of the time of fulfilment, the Christian Pentecost. The present passage is related to Rom. ix. 5, the fathers being regarded as the root, and Christ as the miraculous fruit of the branches.

[It is evident, from Dr. Lange's note, how difficult it is to support the twofold sense of the verse. As Tholuck remarks, the ἀγιότης is the point of comparison. Holy here means not only as consecrated to God, but as actually pure. If a distinction must be made between the two figures, it seems natural to find these two ideas of holiness given prominence in each respectively. Those certainly miss the point of both figures, and the argument of the Apostle as well, who do not find here, in "lump" and "branches," a reference to Israel, considered as the people of God. Alford: "As Abraham himself had an outer and an inner life, so have the branches. They have an outer life, derived from Abraham by physical descent. Of this no cutting off can deprive them. But they have, while they remain in the tree, an inner life, nourished by the circulating sap, by virtue of which they are constituted living parts of the tree. It is of this life that their severance from the tree deprives them; it is this life which they will reacquire if grafted in again." This obviates some difficulties, and is, on the whole, the simplest explanation.—R.]

Vers. 17-24. The conditionality of the new antithesis of believing Gentiles and unbelieving Jews. The figure of the wild and the good olive tree. Warning for the Gentiles, and hope for the Jews.

Ver. 17. But if some of the branches were broken off [εἰ δὲ τινες τῶν κλάδων ἐξ-ελάσθησαν]. The E. V. is too conditional in its form.—R.] Although there were many of them, they were nevertheless a small minority, compared with the incorruptible tree of God's kingdom. With this fact, the heathen should also prize the value of the theocratic institution itself.

And thou being a wild olive tree [συ δὲ ἄγροῦ δένδρον ὢν]. As the expression ἄγροῦ δένδρον can mean, as a substantive, the wild olive tree itself, but, as an adjective, the belonging to the wild olive tree, we prefer, with Fritzsche and Meyer, this latter view to the former, which is defended by Luther, Philippi, and Tholuck, with this explanation: The address, "thou being a wild olive tree," views the individual Gentiles as a collective person.* Meyer objects to this, by saying, that "not whole trees, and also not quite young ones (against De Wette), are grafted in." Against this we may remark: 1. That the wild olive tree of the Gentile world is destined to be transferred, in all its branches, to the good olive tree; 2. This has already taken place incipiently by Paul's mission to the Gentiles. Meanwhile, the Apostle was as far from supposing a total apostasy of the Gentile Church, as from admitting the possibility of a total apostasy of the Jews. Likewise, he speaks of a being grafted in having already occurred, with reference to the probable boasting of Gentile Christians over Jewish Christians. Besides, the Apostle considers the wild olive tree to be converted in all its branches just as little as in the case of the good olive tree. Likewise, ver. 24 must be kept in mind, where the same subject is not the wild olive tree itself, but only one branch of it. On the wild olive tree, or oleaster, comp. Natural History of the Bible, and the Dictionaries. Pareus: oleaster habet quidem formam oleæ, sed caret succo generoso et fructibus.

On the Oriental custom of strengthening olive trees that had become weak by grafting them with the wild olive, comp. the citations in Tholuck, p. 617; in Meyer, p. 848. Now, if this custom were frequent, and occurred in various ways, there would be apparently an incongruity in the figure, in so far as the cuttings of the wild olive are designed to strengthen the olive tree; but the question here is a communication of the sap of the good olive tree to the branch of the wild olive. Therefore Tholuck remarks: "Paul was either not acquainted with the arboricultural relation of the matter, or—which is more probable, when we look at the triviality of this notice—he designed to say, that has here taken place by grace, which otherwise is contrary to nature."† But, in our opinion, this does not settle the question. First, the tertium comparationis does not lie in the breaking off and grafting in of the branches. In relation to this point, the figure is of perfect application. Secondly, though the branches of the wild olive tree communicate to the good olive tree a new and fresher life, and a vegetative vital nourishment (such as, for example, the Germans, at the time of the Reformation, gave to the Christian Church), this does not preclude the necessity of their receiving from the root and stem of the olive tree the good sap and productive power which produce the olive fruit.

Wert grafted in among them [ἐν τῷ αἵματι ἐν αὐτοῖς]. The ἐν αὐτοῖς is differently rendered. The most simple rendering is: among them. [So Meyer, Alford, and most. Stuart, De Wette, Olshausen: in place of them. The

* [There is a lexical objection to taking ἄγροῦ δένδρον as an adjective, since, when thus used, it means: made out of the wood of the olive (Alford). The reason for adopting this view is to escape from the thought that the whole Gentile world, as such, was grafted in. This is done quite as properly by supposing the whole tree here put for a branch of it. The tree, moreover, is introduced to recognize the fact of a distinctively Gentile life existing as a whole.—R.]

† [This last view is that of the majority of the best commentators, and is so natural and obvious, that nothing is gained by departing from it. Meyer intimates that the Apostle's illustration must be taken in accordance with the fact—i. e., the fact respecting the coming in of the Gentiles—which was undoubtedly the grafting of wild branches on a good tree, to partake of the life and bear the fruit of that good tree. Furthermore, as a fact, there was no new and fresher life imparted by the Gentiles at that time, as Dr. Lange intimates. The Roman and Greek civilization, continually decaying, was only preserved so long by the new religious life from the patriarchal root.—R.]

former is preferable on account of συγκοινωνός.—R.]

And made fellow-partaker of the root and fatness [καὶ συγκοινωνός τῆς ῥίζης καὶ τῆς πλοῦτος. See Textual Note "—R.] Not ἐν δὲ διότη (Grotius, and others). The communication with the root secures participation in the good sap.

Ver. 18. Boast not against the branches [μὴ κατακαυχῶ τῶν κλάδων]. The Jews in general were the branches of the olive tree; thus Jewish Christians are as much meant as the unbelieving Jews; not the latter alone (according to Chrysostom [Alford, Stuart, De Wette], and others), but rather the former principally, as is indicated by the ἐν αἰτοῖς. [Meyer: the Jews in general. He rightly adds, that not all Jews, who were not converts as yet, were to be regarded as broken off; only those who had rejected Christ.—R.]

But if thou boast [εἰ δὲ κατακαυχῶσαι]. The verb, occurring twice in this verse, is unusual.—R.] Meyer: Triumphant against them. According to the assumed figure of the wild olive tree, they could be tempted to boast that the members of the Jewish believing Church had received new life through heathenism, just as the boast has been made that Germanism, and especially Lutheranism, has reformed Christianity itself; while Christianity, operating from its very foundation, has reformed, and still reforms, its phenomenal forms. [Mutatis mutandis, of special application everywhere.—R.]

Thou bearest not the root [οὐ σὺ τῆς ῥίζης βαστάεις. Supply: know that, or, let this humble thee, that. See Winer, p. 575.—R.] Thou, as a grafted branch, standest in no more favorable relation to the root than those which are broken off and remain standing. Thou remainest thoroughly conditioned by an inward fellowship with the root, which must be confirmed in the humble knowledge of this dependence, and in inward union with the natural branches. The brief explanation is strengthened by the fact that it forms an immediate conclusion. Tholuck remarks: Such a presumption toward the branches could not be without presumption toward the root.

Ver. 19. Thou wilt say then, The branches were broken off, &c. [ἐπεὶ οὖν ἔτεκλασθησαν [εἰ] κλάδοι, &c. See Textual Note "]. The genuineness of the article οἱ is rendered very probable by the intention of the Gentile speaking. After this religious warning, he will appeal to a religious decree, to a fait accompli of predestination. He accordingly abuses the truth which the Apostle himself has taught, by saying, negatively: the fate of the branches is irrevocably settled—there is no more salvation for the Jewish people; but he also abuses it, positively, by believing that he himself stands firm through the privilege which he presumes he has acquired. Here, then, we clearly see how the Apostle dismisses such a predestinarian presumption.

Ver. 20. Well [καλῶς]. Ironical, as it ne would say: a fine application of the doctrine of Divine predestination, by overleaping the ethical elements brought into the account by it! [With Stuart, Hodge, Meyer, Alford, and others, it must be held that the Apostle, here admits the purpose in the breaking off, as stated in ver. 19; but he admits it only to protest against the wrong use made of it.—R.]

Because of unbelief they were broken off [τῇ ἀπιστίᾳ ἐτεκλάσθησαν]. On the dative, see Tholuck and Alford in loco. The latter suggests their unbelief, thy faith (so Amer. Bible Union), but it seems better to take the noun as abstract.—R.] The earnest declaration. That is, because of unbelief, expressed in strengthened form by the dative. That, therefore, is the decisive cause of their h'rt, the real hindrance to their salvation.

[And thou standest by faith, οἱ δὲ τῇ πίστει ἵστησας.] And thus thou also standest and endurest only by faith. The standing means here the being grafted in, and not, standing in the absolute sense, as Meyer correctly observes, against Tholuck, and others. For the opposite of it is not falling, but the being cut off. Essentially, the idea certainly coincides with standing and falling.

[Be not high-minded, μὴ ὑψηλοφρόνεις. See Textual Note "—R.] Be not therefore proud of an imaginary privilege, but fear [ἀλλὰ φοβῶν]; that is, be all the more afraid of falling, because thou art inclined to boast. Bengel: timor opponitur non fiducia, sed supercilio et securitati.

Ver. 21. For if God spared not the natural branches [εἰ γὰρ ὁ Θεὸς τῶν κατὰ φύσιν κλάδων οὐκ ἐφείλατο]. Nature here evidently denotes the elevated, consecrated, and ennobled nature of the Abrahamic race.—Least he also spare not thee [μήπως οὐδὲ σὺ ἐφείσται. See Textual Note "]. Supply fear, or, it is to be feared. See Winer, pp. 442, 470, 554. On the future, Buttman, N. T. Gram., p. 303.—R.] Thou at least hast no claim to this genealogical nobility of Israel. Meyer: "The future is more definite and certain than the conjunctive."

Ver. 22. Behold therefore the goodness and severity of God [ἴδε οὖν χρηστότητα καὶ ἀποτομίαν Θεοῦ]. The usual predestinarian system would say: The grace and justice of God. Paul says something quite different. The period [E. V., colon] gives grammatical support to the reading ἀποτομία, &c., accepted by Lachmann.

On those. Ἐπὶ μὲν τοῖς. The goodness, as well as the severity or sharpness of God in continual movement, corresponds to human conduct.—[Severity, ἀποτομία. See Textual Note "—R.]

[But toward thee, God's goodness, ἐπὶ δὲ σὺ χρηστότης Θεοῦ. See Textual Note "]. The nominatives give an elliptical construction: there is severity, there is the goodness of God.—R.]—If thou continue in his goodness [ἐὰν ἐπιμένῃς τῇ χρηστότητι]. That goodness. Alford: If thou abide by.—R.] On the living ground of God's free grace and mercy. Meyer: Will have continued. Should the goodness have first begun then?—Otherwise thou also shalt be [ἐπὶ καὶ σὺ ἐκκεπήσῃ. Comp. ver. 6. The E. V. conveys the correct meaning of ἐπὶ.—R.] Meyer very appropriately calls attention to the stronger expression: ἐκκεπήσῃ.

Ver. 23. [And they moreover, καὶ οὗτοι δέ. This is the reading adopted by Griesbach,

* [Both datives are rendered: church, by Dr. Lange. The E. V., however, varies from because of to by. Alford has the following discriminating note: "'Through' indicates better the prompting cause of a definite act—'by' the sustaining condition of a continued state. Thus we should always say that we are justified through, not by, faith; but that we stand by, not through, faith." Hence the propriety of the rendering of this verse in the E. V.—R.]

Scholz, Lachmann, Tischendorf, and critical editors generally, on the authority of A. A. B. C. D. F. The rendering is that of Alford, who is unusually happy in expressing the exact force of δι.—R.] —For God is able to graft them in again [δυνατός γάρ ἐστιν, κ.τ.λ.]. He will not apply His power to compel unbelievers to believe; but if they only do not continue in unbelief, He will graft them in again. He is not wanting in power, and certainly He will not be wanting in the application of it. The becoming strong for faith, and in faith, as well as the being planted in again, is exercised by the power of Divine grace.*

Ver. 24. For if thou wert cut out. The γάρ serves to establish the δυνατός γάρ (Meyer). Likewise the stronger expression here: ἐξέκοπης. —Of the olive tree which is wild by nature. This is the idea of the oleaster, or wild olive. —And wert grafted contrary to nature [καὶ παρὰ φύσιν ἐντετρισθῆς]. We doubt the propriety of translating παρὰ φύσιν exactly by against nature (contra naturam; Vulgate). Comp. chap. i. 26, p. 87. There exists no absolute opposition between the oleaster and the good olive tree; otherwise the grafting in would have no result. The application is clear.†

How much more. Nevertheless, a greater natural relation exists between the branches which are cut out of the good olive tree, and this olive tree as peculiar to them; so that they, after all, can be grafted more easily into them than the branches of the wild olive are grafted into it. The difficulty which arises from the consideration that the (Jewish) obduratio is more difficult to be overcome than the (Gentile) ignorantia, is removed by Tholuck, when he says that he regards the γάρ of the present verse as coördinate with the δυνατός γάρ, so that it would relate to the ἐντετρισθῆσονται (ver. 23). But this changes the matter very little; the Apostle's supposition is, that the economy of God's government will accomplish the dissolution of the Jewish obduratio.

[Alford clearly defines the meaning: In the case of the Gentile, the Apostle sets the fact of natural growth over against that of engrafted growth; here, the fact of congruity of nature (τῇ ἰδίᾳ ἑλπίδι) is set against incongruity, as making the reingrafting more probable. Hodge: "The simple meaning of this verse is, that the future restoration of the Jews is, in itself, a more probable event than the introduction of the Gentiles into the Church of God." —R.]

Ver. 25-26. The last word, or the mystery of the Divine government.

Ver. 25. For I would not, brethren. The γάρ confirms the previous πότερ μᾶλλον; according to Tholuck, the address, "brethren," is directed this time to the Gentile Christians. But why not to all? Οὐ . . . ἀγνοεῖτε, Rom. i. 13 [p. 70], &c. An announcement of an important communication.

* [As Stuart well remarks, this verse speaks of what can be done; the next, of what will be done. It is greatly to be doubted whether the verse has any bearing on the questions of perseverance, conversio resistibilis, &c., which Meyer, and others, find involved here.—R.]

† [There seems no good ground for departing from the common rendering. Dr. Lange's idea about real fresh life in the branches is not admissible. For, although fresh physical and intellectual life has again and again come into the Church from new races, it has always been, for a time, at the expense of spiritual vigor. Not until the new spiritual life, contrary to nature, had been felt, was there any gain by such grafting.—R.]

Of this mystery. Τὸ μυστήριον τοῦτο [See Tholuck and Alford in loco on the word mystery.—R.] On the basis of the general mystery of the Christian ἐκκλησία, 1 Tim. iii. 16, revealed to Christians by their becoming believers, there are displayed the individual mysteries which concern the development of Christian life in the world, particularly the universal development of Christianity. In regard to these, the Apostles are illuminated in advance by revelation, in order to communicate them to the Church. Thus Paul communicates, in many ways, to believers, the mystery that the Gentiles shall be joint-heirs of life, without legal conditions, Eph. iii. 6; also the mystery that, in the last times, the transformation of persons still living will take place, 1 Cor. xv. 51; and so here he communicates the mystery of the Divine economy in relation to the results of the conversion of Jews and Gentiles, and especially of the final, universal conversion of Israel.

Lest ye should be wise in your own conceits [ἵνα μὴ ᾗτε ἐν ἑαυτοῖς φρόνιμοι. See Textual Note 1.—R.] Meyer: According to your own judgment. The Apostle foresees that, in the Gentile Christian Church, there will arise respecting Israel's future contemptuous decisions of the unilluminated and self-sufficient judgment. [Calvin, Beza, Stuart, refer it to pride in their own position, but Meyer, De Wette, Hodge, and most, agree, with Dr. Lange, in applying it to a wrong view of the exclusion of the Jews.—R.]

That hardening in part is happened to Israel [ὅτι πῶρως ἀπὸ μέρους τῷ Ἰσραὴλ γέγονεν. On πῶρως, see ver. 7.—R.] Ἀπὸ μέρους; according to Calvin, qualitative, quodammodo, and not total hardening; yet it evidently refers to the unbelieving portion of Israel. [De Wette, Meyer, Hodge, join it with γέγονεν, not with πῶρως; or τῷ Ἰσραὴλ (Estius, Fritzsche): Hardening has happened in part. Most commentators now adopt the extensive, rather than the intensive signification.—R.] This hardening of a part has befallen all Israel.

Until the fulness of the Gentiles [ἄχρις οὗ τὸ πλήρωμα τῶν ἐθνῶν]. For then the hardening shall cease. Meyer: "Calvin's ita ut is alleged, in spite of the language, to remove the thought of a final object; on which account Calovius, and most, elaborate here a good deal, in order to bring out the sense that partial blindness, and therefore partial conversion, will last until the end of the world." [With Tholuck, Hodge, Alford, and others, we must insist that a terminus ad quem is here affirmed.—R.]

The fulness of the Gentiles. Interpretations: 1. The completion of the Israelitish people of God by believing Gentiles (Michaelis, Olshausen, and others); 2. The great majority of the Gentiles (Fritzsche) [Stuart, Hodge: the multitude of the Gentiles.—R.]; 3. Meyer, strikingly: "The filling up of the Gentiles—that is, that by which the body of the Gentiles (only a part of whom have as yet been converted) is full—the fulness of the Gentiles." [So De Wette. This makes it = πλήρωσις.—R.] As the Apostle could not have meant an indefinite mass of Gentiles, nor yet all the Gentiles down to the last man, he evidently had in view an organically dynamic totality of the heathen world, in which he unquestionably bethought himself of the conversion of the Gentile world. [Alford: The totality of the Gentiles, as nations, not as individuals. This is substantially the view of Lange, and differs but little from that of Meyer. "The idea of an elect number, however true in itself, does not seem to belong to this passage." Wordsworth is not likely to favor a predestinarian view, and yet he finds in πλήρωμα the notion of the complement of a ship's crew—i. e., of the Church, the Ark of Salvation!—R.]

Come in [ἔισιλον]. Shall have come in (Noyes). In the absolute sense; therefore, into the kingdom of God (Matt. vii. 18, &c.). Meyer says, oddly enough: "The kingdom of the Messiah, the establishment of which is later, is not yet in question." [Meyer refers to the personal reign of the Messiah, beginning with the Second Advent. This period, on which he lays great stress in his commentary, will come in, he thinks, after the event here predicted.—R.]

Ver. 28. And so. Οὕτως, in this order and succession, and in this mode of accomplishment; after the conversion of the Gentiles, and by means of it.

All Israel [πᾶς Ἰσραὴλ]. This is not spoken of all Israel in isolated examples, nor of the "totality" without exception. The former supposition, for example, that only the elect part, the true λείμμα, is meant (Bengel, Olshausen, and others), or only the greater number and mass (Rückert and Fritzsche), does not arrive at the idea of the nation, which here, in its totality, as all Israel, comes just in antithesis to the mere λείμμα. The latter supposition (Gennadius, Meyer, and others) transcends the idea of the Pleroma, which will suffice here in the case of the Jews as in that of the Gentiles.

This simple apostolic prophecy, pronounced directly in the future, has been much criticized, and much fanaticism has played about it.

Definitions narrowing the meaning: (1.) The spiritual Israel of the elect, from Jews and Gentiles (Augustine, Theodoret, Calvin, Bengel, Olshausen [Wordsworth], &c.); (2.) An election from Israel will be saved in the millennial kingdom (Baldwin, Bengel). "The one hundred and forty-four thousand of Rev. vii. 4, in which the number is literally interpreted as the principal citizens of the city of Jerusalem;" (3.) Israel will be able to be saved (Episcopius, Semler, and others); (4.) The prophecy has already been fulfilled by the myriads of Jews, of whom Eusebius speaks, chap. iii. 35 (Wetstein, and others); (5.) Luther, as Jerome before him, has fallen into glaring contradictions in relation to this question (see Tholuck, pp. 629, 630, and the quotation in Meyer, note, on p. 439); and on this point Melancthon has proved, by his vacillations, his fear of Luther's decisive declarations on the hopelessness of the Jews (Tholuck, p. 630). On the further shape which Lutheran exegesis has taken on this point, see the same. With Spener there came a change.

In opposition to all these, there are definitions exaggerating the meaning: (1.) The πᾶς must be so much emphasized, as to lead us to suppose that Israel, dying in unbelief, will be raised from the dead for the realization of this hope (Petersen, Mystische Posanne; see Tholuck, p. 628). (2.) We do not include here the idea of a return of the main part of the Israelites, as a nation, to Palestine, but the ideas that a special Jewish Church will again arise—that a temple will be built in Jerusalem, in which a sort of restitution of the Israelitish worship will take place, and that then the Jewish people will stand as the preferred priestly and noble people z. the midst of the believing Gentile world (comp. Tholuck's quotations, p. 625, in addition to which many others might be easily collected).

These fanatical apostologists for Judaism should not forget that Israel has fallen so deeply, just because of such aristocratic and priestly claims to the messianic sphere of salvation, and that the only help for it is to acquiesce modestly in the glory of the New Testament spirit of Christ, and to take its place among the Gentile Christian nations as a fully authorized Christian nation, without legal privileges, but full of an humble sense of its long apostasy, yet in the power and demonstration of the Spirit, which will then be imparted to it according to its gift—that is, according to its great natural state transformed by grace. The scholastics Abelard, Thomas Aquinas, and others, had in view the proper mean, a conversion of the collective tribes, or tribal fragment, of the nation, but not the conversion of each individual, which is qualified as such by free self-determination. The hope of Israel's conversion has been warmly defended in the Reformed Church; first by Beza. See Tholuck, p. 629 ff.*

The question of the source from which Paul drew this μυστήριον has engaged much attention. Tholuck, following in the wake of others, properly calls attention to the fact that the Apostle's quotations from the prophets were given by him as a warrant of his hope, but not as its ground; p. 625 ff. Paul, as an Apostle, was also a prophet, apart from the consideration that he could already find the germs of this prophecy in the gospel tradition (see Matt. xxiii. 39; John xii. 32). However, we take for granted that he could have drawn his warrants from the Old Testament as freely as he desired, though Tholuck raises the question why he did not do this, but contented himself with citing two passages not belonging to that class, and of doubtful relevancy (the declarations cited by Auberlen, p. 625). We must here refer to biblical theology, as well as to the writings which have treated especially on this eschatological part of the theology of the Old Testament.†

There shall come out of Zion, &c. [Ἡ ἐξ ἱερουσαλὴμ, κ.τ.λ. See Textual Note ²², and below. Forbes makes the four lines of the quotations correspond alternately: covenant-promise—removal of sin.—R.] The two connected quotations are from Isa. lix. 20 and xxvii. 9; not (according to Calvin [Stuart], and others) from Jer. xxxi. 33, although there is a kindred sense.‡ They are freely

* [The view now generally adopted, and supported by Beza, Estius, Koppe, Reiche, Köllner, Meyer, Tholuck, De Wette, Hodge, Stuart, Alford, and a host of others, is: that the ancient people of God (so marvellously preserved in their distinctive life, as if in earnest of this) shall be restored, as a nation, to God's favor. With all the modifications of this view from other passages, we have not to do. Thus much ought to be admitted by all fair rules of exegesis.—R.]

† [The literature on this subject is very extensive. The passages bearing on this particular point are grouped by Demarest and Gordon, Christocracy, pp. 234 ff. Comp. Meyer, pp. 443 f.—R.]

treated, and joined together (from the LXX.). Yet, in reality, they perfectly answer to their application. We must not forget that the armor of deliverance which the Lord puts on, according to chap. lix. 17 ff., is a further enlargement of the armor of the Messiah in Isa. xi. 5 ff. Now, if we adhere to the position that prophecy makes no retrograde movement—that therefore Jehovah, instead of the Messiah, must denote a progress—the passage cannot be understood merely to denote the first appearance of the Messiah, as Isa. xi., but, in any case, the eschatological appearance of Jehovah is also conjoined in the Messiah. This is favored by the grand expression in ver. 19. The Apostle, with his usual masterly skill, therefore makes use of the proper passage here, similarly to the exegesis of Christ, which has also been a subject of surprise to many expositors.

The original text (Isa. lix. 20, 21) reads: "And the God (Redeemer) shall come to Zion, and unto them that turn from transgression (ΣΕΠ) in Jacob, saith the Lord. As for me (on my side), this is my covenant with them, saith the Lord: My Spirit," &c. The Septuagint: καὶ ἤξει ἐνενεὶν Ζιών ὁ ῥυόμενος, καὶ ἀποστρέψει ἀσέβειας ἀπὸ Ἰακώβ, εἶπεν κύριος. Καὶ αὕτη αὐτοῖς ἡ παρ' ἐμοῦ διαθήκη, εἶπεν κύριος, τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἐμόν, κ.τ.λ. Chap. xvii. also treats of the restoration of Israel. Ver. 6 gives the more definite starting-point. The sense of ver. 8 is: God punishes Israel with moderation. The form of this punishment is hardening, and being carried off as by an east-wind storm. Then we read: "Therefore (by this means) shall the iniquity of Jacob be purged; and this is all the fruit (the use) to take away his sin." The LXX.: ἀπὸ τοῦτο ἀπαριθήσεται ἡ ἀνομία Ἰακώβ, καὶ τοῦτο ἔσται ἡ εὐλογία αὐτοῦ, ὅταν ἀφίλωμαι αὐτοῦ τὴν ἀμαρτίαν. Paul took into consideration three modifications: (1.) From Zion, instead of for Zion, in which we must not forget that also in Isaiah Jehovah must come from Zion for Zion; (2.) The original text assumes conversion at the announced redemption; with the Apostle it was self-evident that the redemption precedes the conversion; (3.) The Apostle describes the new covenant with Israel, by inserting the passage from Isa. xxix.; that is, he here describes the purging and taking away of Jacob's sin as the essential part of the covenant, instead of the promise of the impartation of the Spirit, in Isa. lix., because he knows that both are indissolubly connected. Yet these modifications of form do not prevent the citation from being a proof, as Tholuck supposes. See, on the further exposition of this passage, Tholuck, p. 681.

[Tholuck: "How came the Apostle, if he wished only to express the general thought that the Messiah was come for Israel, to choose just this citation, consisting of two combined passages, when the same is expressed more directly in other passages of the Old Testament? I believe that the ἤξει gave occasion for the quotation: if he did not refer this directly to the second coming of the Messiah, yet it admitted of being indirectly applied to it."—R.]

Ver. 28. As touching the gospel, they are enemies [κατὰ μὲν τὸ εὐαγγέλιον ἐχθροί]. As enemies, they are said, by Meyer and Tholuck, to be hostilely treated by God [Alford, Hodge] (Tholuck: inimici deo). But it is difficult to establish the antithesis, that they can be simultaneously odious to, and beloved by, God, except in different relations. See the Exeg. Notes on chap. v. 10

[p. 165]. Other explanations: regarded by Paul as enemies (Grotius, Luther); enemies of God (Thomas Aquinas, Bengel). According to the gospel—that is according to the relation of the gospel to believers and unbelievers—they are enemies; this means not merely that they are adversaries of the gospel (Chrysostom, and others), but that, as adversaries of the gospel, they are regarded by God as adversaries, and then by His messengers also—for your sakes [δι' ὑμᾶς]: from the ground of the saving economy already set forth.

But as touching the election, they are beloved [κατὰ δὲ τὴν ἐκλογὴν ἀγαπῶται]. We would here also protest against the favorite division: beloved of God, or of the Apostle, or of Christians. They are enemies in their falling out with the gospel, yet they are favorites according to the election, but simply for the sake of their connection with the fathers.—For the fathers' sakes [διὰ τοὺς πατέρας]. Meyer says: in favor of the patriarchs; the sense is, because they are included in general in the election of the fathers; according to ver. 28, are made partakers in the gifts of the fathers, in the call of Israel.*

Ver. 29. Without repentance [ἀμεταμέλητα]. The reference here is evidently national, not individual, though the proposition is general in its form and force.—R.]. Unrepented. Irrevocable in the sense of a Divine, ethical, and self-conditional result (see 2 Cor. vii. 10).

Ver. 30. For as ye, &c. [ὥσπερ γὰρ ὑμεῖς. See Textual Notes *]. The Gentiles.—Formerly disobedient. The ἀπείθεια is ἀπειθεῖα toward God's word, which was promulgated to the Gentiles by the creation (Rom. i. 21). [Forbes finds, in vers. 30-32, a six-lined stanza, two lines in each verse, with the alternating thoughts: Disobedience—mercy, recurring three times.—R.]

Ver. 31. That through the mercy shown to you they also may obtain mercy [τῷ ὑμετέρῳ ἐλέει ἵνα καὶ αὐτοὶ ἐλεηθῶσιν]. We accept (with E. V., Hodge, Meyer, De Wette, Alford, and most) a trajection of the ἵνα.—R.] Meyer would join τῷ ὑμετέρῳ ἐλέει to what follows: "In order that, by the mercy manifested to you (which mercy provokes them to jealousy of your faith; ver. 11), mercy might be shown to them." This construction must be rejected outright, because by it the Apostle would say to the Gentiles what is both ill-bred and untruthful, namely, that their conversion was merely a means for the purpose of the further conversion of the Jews.† The opposite construction: non crediderunt in vestram misericordiam (Vulgate), emphasizes the conversion of the Gentiles as an end in itself, and then makes the further purpose of the conversion of the Jews, thereby brought about, to follow.

* [The obvious meaning is, that the election of Israel as the people of God involves such a hope of blessing to the children of Abraham, that the mercy will at last come, even after "thousands of generations." If the Abrahamic covenant is abrogated, the Apostle's words have little force.—R.]

† [Notwithstanding this very strong assertion of Dr. Lange, on the ground of the parallelism, as well as on account of the general thought of the whole passage, the construction of Meyer is to be preferred. The trajection gives emphasis to τῷ ὑμ. ἐλ. The other views are: They are disobedient through the mercy, &c. (Calvin, and others); they have not believed on the mercy shown to you, &c. (Luther, Estius, Lange). But to these there is the same grammatical objection. Tholuck says: with the same mercy; which obviates Dr. Lange's difficulty, but is against the parallelism.—R.]

Ver. 32. For God hath shut up all under disobedience [ἀνέκδικασεν γὰρ ὁ θεὸς τοὺς πάντας εἰς ἀπειθείαν]. On the verb, comp. Gal. iii. 22, 23, *Textual Note, and below.—R.] That is, the Jews as well as the Gentiles. According to Meyer, all and every Gentile and Jew are meant, and not merely the masses of both (according to Tholuck, and others). True, the masses are, in a certain sense, the all-concluding; yet, strictly emphasized, all and every one cannot be spoken of, because the question is not simply the fall of man, but the generic consequences of the fall (Vulgate and Luther have the neuter). [The neuter is probably borrowed from Gal. iii. 22. The sense is the same, whether we accept the view of Meyer or that of Tholuck; but by pressing the former in the second clause, a conclusion might be inserted, which Meyer himself does not accept, viz., the actual exercise of saving mercy in the case of every individual.—R.]

But what does shut up mean? Meyer would explain it, according to the peculiarity of the later Greek: to give over to, or under, the effective power, but not merely a declarative (Chrysostom, and others), or permissive power (Origen, and others). [Meyer, Alford, and others, remark that the syn in composition strengthens the simple verb, without, however, introducing the idea of shutting up together.—R.] The real explanation of the expression is contained in Rom. v. 12 and Gal. iii. 22. The state of the totality of men (their being shut up under disobedience) is based on the organic (generic, social, political, and sympathetic) connection. By the organic connection, all men are shut up in the consequences of the fall. Then, by the organic connection, the Gentiles are first shut up in the process of unbelief (see chap. i.); and in the same way are the Jews also shut up by means of this organic connection (chap. ii.). In the collective character of the history of the world, this makes a collective conclusion [Zusammengeschlossenheit]. Thus the Jews, by their organic connection (according to Gal. iii. 22), were shut up under the law, as it were, in a prison or place of custody* (ἐρπουροῖς μεθὰ συγκυκλισμένοι); although, after the confinement was abolished, it turned out that they consisted of two parts, the children of the bondwoman and the children of the freewoman. Thus it could only come to pass, by the fearful power of the connection of the universal currents, that sin should be consummated in unbelief under God's judgment, in order that sinners might become receptive of Divine mercy (Rom. v. 20; vii. 13).

In order that he may have mercy upon all [ἵνα τοὺς πάντας ἐλέησῃ]. The purpose of this authoritative judgment of God (that is, of this Divine hardening, which was carried constantly further by the reciprocal action with human guilt) was, first, that fulfilment in the ancient time, when the heathen world was ripe for mercy, and will be hereafter the fulfilment of the New Testament time, when Israel shall be ripe for mercy.

[Alford remarks on τοὺς πάντας in the two clauses: "Are they the same? And, if so, is any support given to the notion of an ἀποκατάστασις of all men? Certainly they are identical, and signify all men, without limitation. But the ultimate difference between the all men who are shut up under disobedience, and the all men upon whom the mercy is shown, is, that by all men this mercy is not accepted, and so men become self-excluded from the salvation of God. God's act remains the same, equally gracious, equally universal, whether men accept His mercy or not. This contingency is here not in view, but simply God's act itself. We can hardly understand the οἱ πάντες nationally. The marked universality of the expression recalls the beginning of the Epistle, and makes it a solemn conclusion to the argumentative portion, after which the Apostle, overpowered with the view of the Divine mercy and wisdom, breaks forth into the sublimest apostrophe existing even in the pages of Inspiration itself." Comp. Doctr. Note 21.—R.]

Ver. 33. Oh the depth of the riches, and wisdom, &c. [ὅ βάθος πλοῦτος καὶ σοφίας, κ.τ.λ.]. In the English, that interpretation has been followed which regards the three genitives, πλοῦτος, σοφίας, γνώσις, as coördinate. Θεοῦ is joined with all three.—R.] Constructions:

B. What a depth of riches: 1. Of wisdom; 2. Of knowledge (Luther, Calvin, Reiche).^{*} Meyer says, in favor of the first construction: "As vers. 33 and 34 portray the σοφία and γνώσις, but vers. 35 and 36 the πλοῦτος θεοῦ, the former construction is preferable." Besides, the depth of the riches would be, in a certain measure, tautological. But βάθος can also not (according to the same writer) mean "the great fulness and superabundance," because there would merely result such a tautology. The depth, whose outward figure is the ocean, is also a spiritual depth (see the quotations in Meyer). There is also another sort of fulness, as a rich and fruitful plain. Here God's miracles are obscured by a holy darkness. But the riches of God are not merely God's riches of grace in the special sense, for the fulness of creation and the treasures of redemption constitute a more general unity in the all-sufficiency of God. This is the entire ontological and soteriological foundation of God's kingdom. If, now, σοφία be defined as the exercise of God's designing attribute, the idea also usually includes the knowledge and choice of means; here, however (according to Meyer, for example), γνώσις denotes the knowledge of means. Proof: αἱ ὁδοὶ αὐτοῦ, His measures, must be referred to the latter. But the ways have just as decided a relation to the starting-points as to the final points, and we would here also hold to the distinction: γνώσις relates chiefly to the ἀρχαὶ and its consequences, and σοφία chiefly to τέλη and their premises.†

How unsearchable, &c. [ὥς ἀνεξερεύνητα, κ.τ.λ.]. See Textual Note†. Meyer refers αἱ ὁδοὶ αὐτοῦ to γνώσις, τὰ κριματά αὐτοῦ to σοφία; the former in the sense of His modes of dealing, His economies, the latter, His judicial decisions (as ver. 32). So Tholuck, but the distinctions are very subtle. See below.—R.] The most unsearchable character of God's judgments consists in His causing redeeming acts to arise from them (Gen. iii.: the flood; the Egyptian plagues; the Babylonian captivity; the cross of Christ); and the peculiarity of His ways as past finding out, consists in His leading the minds which He has created through byways, circuitous paths, apparently contrary roads, and even impassable roads, safely to their object (see Job v. 9; ix. 10; xxxiv. 24).

* Reiche's arguments, and the answers given by Tholuck, will be found in Alford in loco.—R.]

* [Comp. Lange's Comm. Galatians, p. 85 ff.—R.]

Ver. 34. For who hath known the mind of the Lord? &c. [τίς γὰρ ἔγνω νοῦν κυρίου; κ.τ.λ.] Isa. xl. 13, "almost exactly" from the LXX. The mind took knowledge of the object; the counsel took knowledge of the ways. Or, the former word applies to the γνώσις, the latter to the σοφία (Theodoret, and others). In wisdom He is exalted even above the understanding of man ("My thoughts are not your thoughts"), with respect to His counsel, above the necessity of man's being a counsellor with Him; finally, with respect to His riches, no one has enriched Him or given to Him so that He had to recompense unto him again; He is the absolute source of all good things.

Ver. 35. Or who hath first given to him, and it shall be recompensed unto him again? [ἢ τίς προέδωκεν αὐτῷ καὶ ἀνταποδοθήσεται αὐτῷ; See *Textual Note, for the text of the Hebrew and LXX.—R.] From the original text of Job xli. 11. No gift must be regarded as a recompensing of God.

Ver. 36. For of him, and through him [ἐκ αὐτοῦ καὶ δι' αὐτοῦ]. The negation of the previous proposition is carried out positively in the completion of the doxology. All things are of Him. He is the original fountain, original ground and author.—Through Him. Preservation, government, redemption.

And unto him [καὶ εἰς αὐτόν]. Toward Him as end. That He may become all in all (1 Cor. xv. 28); He is glorified in all, and all is glorified in Him. Meyer says: "In so far as every thing serves God's purposes (not merely God's honor, as many would have it)." But every thing always serves God's purpose. Yet the final, absolute glorification of God cannot be separated from the purpose of the revelation of His δόξα in Christ, and by Him in His children, His inheritance.

Ambrose, Hilary, Olshausen, Philippi, and others, have regarded this passage as an expression of the relation of Father, Son, and Spirit.* Meyer opposes this, by urging that neither Chrysostom, Ecumenius, Theophylact, Calvin, nor Beza, have referred to the Trinity in their expositions. The context speaks simply of God the Father. Yet it cannot be doubted, if we take into consideration other passages of the Apostle (for example, 1 Cor. xv.; Col. i.), that Paul here had in mind at least the difference of the revelations of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit. It is certain that the view of God's absolute unity predominates here, but not therefore in the exclusive, doctrinal definiteness of God the Father. The Trinitarian relation lies beyond subordinationism.

* [Alford, who is unusually happy in his comments on this chapter, remarks: "If this be rightly understood—not of a formal allusion to the three Persons in the Holy Trinity, but of an implicit reference (as Tholuck) to the three attributes of Jehovah, respectively manifested to us by the three coequal and coeternal Persons—there can hardly be a doubt of its correctness." "Only those who are dogmatically prejudiced can miss seeing that, though St. Paul has never definitively expressed the doctrine of the Holy Trinity in a definite formula, yet he was conscious of it as a living reality."—R.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. While the whole of Paul's Epistle to the Romans has been called a "christological philosophy of the history of the world and of salvation," the term applies more specially to the section chap. ix.-xi., and preëminently to chap. xi.

2. God has not cast away His people: Proofs (1.) The public history of Israel: Paul and his Jewish companions in faith; (2.) Israel's concealed history, disclosed by God's declaration to Elijah; (3.) The teleology of the partial blindness of Israel a. a condition for the conversion of the Gentiles, b. then this a condition for the conversion of the Jews; c. then this, finally, a condition for the completion of God's saving work on earth; (4.) God's exercise of judgment on all humanity has always a merciful purpose—that is, deliverance and restoration. The history of proselytes proves that the attraction of the Jews to faith is constantly fulfilled in the individual.

3. The history of the seven thousand hidden worshippers of God at the time of Elijah, a type of similar cases in all ages. Not merely the heroic witnesses for God's honor are His people, but all who do not bow the knee to idols. The kingdom of God has not merely its lions, but also its doves. The mildness of the Divine judgment on the remnant of piety on earth, in antithesis to the severity and indignation of the human zeal of the well-meaning servants of God.

4. God preserves at all periods, even in the worst, a λεῖμμα κατ' ἐκλογὴν χάριτος. When the enemies of the gospel think that Christianity will soon decline, they miscalculate, especially on two or three points: (1.) They do not observe that the blight of division is unavoidable in their own camp; (2.) That a new Divine seed of Divinely chosen children, of sincere adversaries converted and led by God, and of courageous witnesses for God, are in His plan; (3.) That every direction which apostasy takes, leads to a dispersion and taint like that of the Jews, while the deep current of the world's history takes its course with God's kingdom. This confidence is resplendent even throughout the Old Testament, and especially in the prophets.

5. Vers. 6, 7. The unanswerable syllogism of the evangelical Church against the decree of the Council of Trent (see Exeg. Notes). To seek grace beyond works is an ἐπιζητεῖν, comprising in itself a self-contradiction.

6. Vers. 8-11. The twofold judgment of blindness: a. By external, seeming happiness (see chap. ii. 4); b. By inward disobedience, whose fundamental characteristics are presumptuous blindness and inconsolable, cowardly despondency in relation to the highest good.—On the process of hardening as a continual reciprocity between human offence and God's sovereign judgment, see Exeg. Notes on chap. ix. On Jelaledin Rumi's doctrine of predestination, see Tholuck, p. 595.

7. From the fact that judgments on unbelievers are remedial judgments, which are the means of producing faith in the elect, there follows the expectation that the judgments are not of an æonic, but of an economic nature. God always seeks, through the believers, indirectly to reach again the unbelievers. Therefore the messengers of salvation must shake the dust from their feet when they are not received. That is, they must go farther and farther! The gospel went from Mesopotamia to Jerusalem, from Jerusalem to Rome, from Rome to Wittenberg and Geneva; and in roundabout ways and circles it again goes from New York to Jerusalem and Mesopotamia. Nearness and farness in God's kingdom are not determined by geographical and national proximity and remoteness, but by the relations of spiritual life.

8. The idea of the temporary filling up of the reaches made by the unbelief of the Jews by means of the heathen, has penetrated, though in obscure form, even the Talmud (see Tholuck, p. 600).

9. On the reflection of the truth of the historical character of the Acts of the Apostles, in ver. 11, see Tholuck, against Baur, p. 602. See the same, p. 606, for Origen's view that the number of saints is definite; which, indeed, only has an incidental importance for the question before us (see Exeg. Notes).

10. The tragical fate of the Jews. Their fall the riches of the world, notwithstanding they number among them the richest people; their casting away the reconciling of the world. This latter thought refers to the crucifixion of Christ. Such a tragical judicial fate is such a profound enigma of Divine sovereignty, that not only the whole course of the world, but also the future world and eternity, belong to its full glorification in the light of Divine mercy.

11. As the wild olive tree enters into a relation of exchange with the good olive tree by giving to it earthly nutriment, or nutriment for development and for strengthening the stock, while, on its part, its branches are made good, so have the nations brought new organs to Christianity, in order to receive from it the Divine spirit of life. Germany may exult, in a special sense, in having done this, but nothing further. If we arrogantly identify German Christianity with Lutheranism,* the boast has a German Catholic sound; it is a boast of the branches—of only the grafted branches against those branches previously standing—yes, against the root itself.

12. The figure of the relation between the root and the branches condemns that entire theory of the development of Christianity, which the school of Baur has colored according to the Hegelian principles of history.

13. Vers. 20, 21. Tholuck: The predestinarian view here becomes involved in difficulty, in so far as it traces not only faith, but also unbelief, to the Divine causality. Evidently, the exclusion of the Jews is here designated as the result of their own guilt, &c.

14. On the possibility of falling from grace, see Meyer, p. 435, on ver. 23. Sealed believers are not here specially spoken of, but, in a general way, the called, the awakened.

15. There subsists not only an antithesis and a relation of degree between the wild olive tree and the good olive tree, but also a natural affinity, which, as well as the heterogeneity, comes into consideration in the application of the figure.

16. On the discussions of recent theology respecting the relation of the Old Testament to the prophecy of the Apostle about the restoration of Israel, see Tholuck, p. 625.

17. In spite of the Apostle's warning, the grafted branches have in many ways boasted against the natural branches. Under this head belong the conduct of Christians toward the Jews, the judgments passed upon the capability of the Jews for conversion, and, finally, the opinion pronounced on converted Jews. Here belong also the predestinarian appeals to God's decree, under a disregard of the ethical conditions.

18. The mystery. Tholuck: "According to the ecclesiastical definition, res captum humanæ rationis tum regenita quum irrogenita transcendens (Quenstedt, i. 44). According to the later expositors, on the contrary, it means, at least in Paul, unknown truths, hitherto concealed from humanity, and only known by revelation (Rückert, Fritzsche, Meyer, and Philippi)." The latter, or formal idea of the mystery, underlies the former, the material one. This is proved by 1 Tim. iii. 16. But it is clear, from ver. 33, that a mystery, in the material sense, is so called because it is of unfathomable depth; not because it merely extends beyond the human understanding in the abstract sense—or, in other words, because it is not attainable by the understanding—but only by the believing intellectual perception, because it ever reveals itself, in its Divine depth, in infinitum, but not because it should remain in infinitum an unsolved enigma.

19. Meyer acknowledges that the conversion of all Israel has not yet taken place; but he adds, that it lies in a very distant time, although the Apostle has regarded the matter as already near at hand; p. 442. This is the usual misconception arising from the failure to distinguish between the religious and chronological idea of the nearness and remoteness of time!

20. On the different renderings of χάρισμα and κλήσις, see Tholuck, p. 633. A series of insufficient explanations of the συνέλευσις in ver. 32, is on p. 635; and discussions on the meaning of τοῖς πάσιν, on p. 637.

21. It is worthy of note, that the usual doctrine of predestination, as well as the doctrine of restoration, has been connected with the present chapter, particularly with ver. 33. This contradiction is adjusted, if, with Schleiermacher, we regard predestination as economical, and restoration as eschatological. True, even in that case, the consequence of the former idea is strongly affected by the reference to faith and unbelief as ethical motives for the Divine sovereignty. Against the latter idea, viz., the usual doctrine of the ἀποκατάστασις, Meyer observes, that the universality of the Divine intention does not preclude the partially finite non-realization of it through the guilt of human individuals. But this observation applies also to yesterday and to-day. Important weight rests upon the fact that the συνέλευσις, which is similar to fate in the organic connection of men (for example, a Jewish child, born in a Jewish alley, &c.), should be removed by God's sovereign grace; yes, that the currents of unbelief should give place to a current of faith. Judas has proved that a false individual can, at all events, swim against the stream of salvation. The ecna of God and the freedom of man tower above the usual ideas of the apocatastasis, as well as above the usual ideas of eternal endless condemnation.*

* [Lutherism; Lutherism, rather than Lutheranism. There is no thought of the Lutheran Church, as such, but of that spirit which traces all evangelical Christianity to the great reformer and his associates. If the figure of the Apostle has any special application now, it is against that illogical ultra-Protestantism, which, on the one hand, boasts itself against the mediæval Christianity, and, on the other, denies that any advance can be made beyond the theological thought of the seventeenth century.—R.]

* [A comparison of ver. 32 with Ga' iii. 23 will assist us.

23. The anthology of distinctions between σοφία and γνῶσις, see Tholuck, p. 641. The former (Abe-lard) constitutes just the reverse of ours: sapientia quantum ad praescientiam ipsius scientia quantum ad ipsius operis effectum, &c. Tholuck defines the σοφία, according to Proverbs, as the economic and architectural wisdom of God, and the γνῶσις as the knowledge of the nature of the universe. He, in opposition to Meyer, refers the κρίματα to the γνῶσις, and the ὁδοὶ to the σοφία. On the latter point, we must coincide with Meyer. The ideas: κρίματα and the essence of things, and ὁδοὶ and architectural dispositions, do not fit very well together. The κρίματα refer to final points; the ὁδοὶ are at least connected with starting-points. See Exeg. Notes. We must also refer, in reference to ver. 36, to Tholuck's instructive statements.

23. Rom. xi. 36; comp. 1 Cor. viii. 6; Col. i. 16; Heb. ii. 10; also the doxologies in the New Testament, and especially those in Revelation. [Stuart: "Such is the conclusion of the doctrinal part of our Epistle; a powerful expression of profound wonder, reverence, and adoration, in regard to the unsearchable ways of God in His dealings with men; and an assertion of the highest intensity respecting His sovereign right to control all things so as to accomplish His own designs. A doctrine truly humbling to the proud and towering hopes and claims of self-justifying men; a stumbling-block to haughty Jews, and foolishness to unhumiliated Greeks. I scarcely know of any thing in the whole Bible which strikes deeper at the root of human pride than vers. 53-56.—But sovereignty in God does not imply what is arbitrary, nor that He does any thing without the best of reasons. It only implies that those reasons are unknown to us.—And if our hearts are ever tempted to rise up against the distinctions which God has made, either in a temporal or spiritual respect, in the bestowment of His favors, let us bow them down to the dust, as well as silence and satisfy them, with the humbling, consoling, animating, glorious truth, that 'of God, and through Him, and for Him, are all things.' To Him, then, be the glory forever and ever! Amen."—R.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

A. Vers. 1-6. Has God cast away His people? God forbid! 1. The thought is intolerable to the in arriving at a correct explanation of its meaning. It expresses a bold, genial, and comprehensive thought, and contains the key to the understanding of the fall, as well as of the whole history of the world. The profound mystery of sin is here solved in the lustre of the Divine wisdom and love. The temporary abasement and neglect of countless individuals, of whole races and nations, is here subordinated to a more profound and exalted plan for general blessing. The Apostle, here and in Gal. iii. 22, teaches a universality of sin and disobedience, and a universality of Divine grace (so also Rom. v. 12 ff.; 1 Cor. xv. 22), and so places them in bold contrast, that the former must subserve the latter. This universality of grace refers: (1.) To the internal power and capability; (2.) To the purpose and design; (3.) To the proffering of the opportunity, or the calling. God can and will have mercy upon all men, and gives to all (at some period) this opportunity. But further than this we cannot go. Pa. 4-6a not teach a universality of actual redemption to all men. The acceptance or rejection of grace is made dependent on belief or unbelief. Hence, in Gal. iii. 22, he does not say, in the second clause, that the promise might be given to all, but to believers. For redemption is no natural process, no work of necessity, but a free act of God in Christ, and must be apprehended and appropriated in a free moral manner by each individual subject.—P. 8.)

Apostle as a true Israelite. 2. He repudiates the fact in the most positive manner; because, a. God has provided for His people beforehand; b. In times of great apostasy He has preserved His remnant of seven thousand who did not bow the knee to Baal. c. He will deal likewise with those who have been reserved through grace.—Paul, as a model of truly national feeling. 1. He was a Christian with all his heart; 2. But he was also an Israelite with all his heart (vers. 1, 2).—The example of the Apostle Paul shows how Christianity and national feeling not only do not preclude each other, but agree very well together.—I also am an Israelite! An expression: 1. Full of manly power; 2. Full of Christian love (vers. 1, 2).—The example of Elijah. 1. His complaint against Israel; 2. God's answer for Israel (vers. 2-4).—God still has His seven thousand who have not bowed their knee to Baal (vers. 4-6).—Let the apostasy be never so great, God never wholly casts away His people (vers. 4-6).

LUTHER: Not all are God's people who are called God's people; therefore not all will be cast away, though the greater portion be cast away.

STARKE: God's children often make unnecessary complaints, and if the Lord should answer them, He would not reply in any other way than: "Ye know not what ye should pray for as ye ought" (ver. 2).—God can permit no such confusion of ideas, as that we are to be saved partly through grace and partly through merit; chap. iii. 28 (ver. 6).—HARDING: God has more saints in the world than we often imagine. Much of the good seed lies under the ground; in the Spring, when the right time comes, it germinates. Be comforted by this truth, ye faithful teachers; Isa. xlix. 1; 1 Kings xix. 4f (vers. 1-3).—NOVA BIBL. TIB.: God does not cast us away, if we have not previously cast Him away (ver. 1).—You regard that church and congregation as the best one to which the most belong, which the great men in the world honor, and which, therefore, has the most splendor, show, and consideration. Oh, no; it is the small and insignificant number which God has preserved for salvation according to the election. "Fear not, little flock; for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom" (ver. 5).—SPENER: God looks with other eyes than men's, and perceives those who were imperceptible to others. Yet such persons did not exist by their own strength, but the Lord has reserved them (ver. 4).

LISCO: The fall of Israel is neither altogether universal nor perpetual. The Gentiles' becoming God's people, and participants in His kingdom, is a fulfilment of Gen. ix. 27, that Japheth shall dwell in the tents of Shem.—As surely as unbelief, according to chap. x., is an offence, so sure is the better disposition of these better ones among the people not any work of theirs, but a work of Divine grace (vers. 5, 6).

HEUBNER: There is a divine casting away, the most terrible penal judgment of God, in which He takes His Holy Spirit from man, and quenches the spark of good within him, so that he morally dies out, is without the feeling and power for good, and, shut out from heaven, must bear misery and torment.—This is what pious people since the fall have been anxiously praying God to ward off; Pa. II. (ver. 1).—Elijah believed that he was the only one left. How often does many a pious person believe himself alone! This is a divine trial; but in such hours there also comes equal consolation (ver. 3).—

There is a seed of good people which never dies out. (Indefectibilitas ecclesie.)

B. Vers. 7-10. The judgment of hardening on the Israelites not belonging to the election. 1. Why is this judgment inflicted upon them? a. Not because it was determined from eternity against them; but : Because they, according to chap. ix. 30 ff., sought righteousness by works and not by faith, and, accordingly, became guilty themselves. 2. In what does this judgment consist? God fulfils in them what He, a. Has said by Isaiah; b. By David.

Nova Bibl. Tüb. : The terrible judgment of hardening! They have hell, who are smitten and do not feel it; who have eyes, and do not see; who have ears, and do not hear; who have poison and death instead of the bread of life; who have ruin, punishment, and condemnation, instead of strength, joy, and comfort; who have darkness instead of light, and earth instead of heaven.—CRAMER : O God, Thou beautiful and clear light, Thou wouldst blind no one; and Thou only dost it as a righteous Judge after one has blinded himself in the power of the devil; 2 Cor. iv. 4 (ver. 10).—ROOS : When the table (where they concoct mischievous devices), where they usually sit unconcernedly and eat good things, becomes a rope, a trap, ruin, and a recompense for the unfaithfulness and violence which they have exercised against others, it is a symbol of all the means by which men unexpectedly become involved in dangers by their words, or, by their deception or power, are led into the hands of their enemies, and sustain real injury (ver. 9).

LISCO : The burdens of age—dim-sightedness and crookedness—are likewise a symbol of ruin (ver. 10).

HEUBNER : God has given them such a spirit; that is, He has permitted it to visit them as a necessary consequence, as a righteous punishment, because they made such resistance to the strivings of the Divine Spirit (ver. 8). Comp. Acts ii. 37; vii. 51.—Man, both the individual and the people, declines into wretched slavery by apostasy from God (ver. 10).

C. Vers. 11, 12. The fall of the Jews is the salvation of the Gentiles. 1. No dark fatality rules here; but, 2. The loving providence of God, which continually turns every thing evil to a good purpose.—Nothing is so bad that God cannot make it serve a good purpose.—Providential sovereignty : i. It is mysterious, in so far as we often cannot understand why it permits evil; 2. It is clear and plain, in so far as it always causes good to come from evil. Comp. Gen. i. 20.

STARKE, HEDINGER : What a great Artificer is God! He makes good out of evil, medicine out of poison, and something out of nothing.—ROOS : Has God brought nothing good out of this evil? God forbid! From their fall there has taken place the salvation of the nations, to which the gospel was directed after it had been scorned by the Jews (Matt. xxi. 43; Acts xiii. 46-48; xxii. 18-21; xxviii. 27, 28) that the latter might be provoked to jealousy by the former.

GERLACH, CALVIN : "As a wife who has been cast away from her husband because of her guilt is so inflamed by jealousy that she feels herself impelled by it to become reconciled again to her husband, so shall it now come to pass that the Jews, having seen the Gentiles taking their place, and being pained by their being cast away, shall strive after reconciliation with God;" comp. Eph. v. 25-33.

LISCO : God's wisdom brings good out of Israel's perversity. Paul does not say that the individual unbelieving Israelite cannot be lost; but there is quite a difference between the individual and the people (ver. 11).

D. Vers. 13-28. How does Paul wish to be regarded by the Gentiles? 1. By all means as their Apostle, who magnifies this his office; 2. But yet, at the same time, as a true friend of his lineal kindred, who wishes to be the means of saving some of them, because they are destined for life (vers. 13-16).—The rich mercy shown to Israel; perceptible, 1. From its rejection, which is the reconciling of the world; 2. From its reception, which is life from the dead (vers. 13-15).—The figure of the first-fruits as related to the justification of infant baptism; comp. 1 Cor. vii. 14 (ver. 16).—Likewise the figure of the root and the branches. (Comp. also the Zurich Catechism, Question 73, b.) The figure of the olive tree. 1. The Apostle warns the Gentile Christians against pernicious presumption (vers. 17, 18); 2. He takes away the strength from such a possible and proud objection on their part (vers. 19-21); 3. He exhorts them to behold God's goodness and severity (ver. 22); 4. He also declares to them his joyous hope of the future conversion of Israel (vers. 23, 24).—The branches do not bear the root, but the root bears the branches. Application : 1. To the relation of children and parents; 2. To the unconfirmed and the Church (ver. 18).—Do you stand by faith? Then do not be proud, but fear (ver. 20).—God's goodness and severity (ver. 22).—God can graft them in again; as this was the Apostle's hope for the children of Israel, so is it ours (ver. 24).—The future conversion of all Israel. 1. When will it take place? When the fullness of the Gentiles is come into the kingdom of God, and the time of the blindness in part of Israel is past. 2. Why will it take place? a. Because God has promised it by the prophets; b. Because God has once chosen His people; c. Because He does not repent His gifts and call (vers. 25-29).—The future conversion of Israel is a mystery, in the sense of Matt. xiii. 11; 1 Cor. xv. 51.—The entrance of the fullness of the Gentiles into God's kingdom. 1. It will be effected by the preaching of the gospel among them; 2. It will take place amid praise and thanksgiving (ver. 25).

STARKE : It is part of a teacher's wisdom to address himself especially to every class of men in an assembly (ver. 18).—One often falls, and yet by his fall another rises; oh, wonderful and yet holy government of God (ver. 15)!—A whole church, a whole ministry, a whole community, and a whole generation, must not be rejected on account of a few fools (ver. 16).—The living of the Jews among us in a dispersed way can be of use to us, for the frequent sight of a Jew, and his intercourse with us, remind us frequently of this Pauline admonition (ver. 21).—Why should you trouble yourself if you are not remembered in any earthly will as an inheritor of corruptible goods? If you stand in God's covenant of grace, you are more than rich (ver. 27).—CRAMER : Let no one forget his origin, for that will teach him to be humble (ver. 17).—The human heart is guilty of two sins: it is deceitful, and desperately wicked; Jer. xvii. 9. Therefore God must oppose it by goodness and righteousness (ver. 22).—HEDINGER : Do not cast away so soon what does not please you. Many sin by doing this. God has many ways to souls. Your neighbor is guilty, and so are you. Shall the Lord cast both away? Bear and forbear. Time produces roses even from thorn-bushes (ver. 17).—Oh, how I wish that no one would sin against the poor Jews! Are they not Abraham's seed, and the lineal kindred of the Church? O God, take compassion on these hardened ones, and remember thy covenant!—The Jews, you say, only steal and cheat; they are a frivolous people! Are you better than they? Cannot God convert them? They hear the word, and so do you; neither you nor they are pious. Which has the greater condemnation—you, or these who are under a judgment? The same blindness will come over you, if you do not turn to Christ (ver. 23).—If it is a mystery, who would be so daring as to desire to fathom it? If it is a revealed mystery, who will deny the conversion of the Jews? Though you cannot imagine how it will come to pass, neither can I imagine how those who were formerly Gentiles and servants of the devil, shall now be God's children and the temple of His Spirit (ver. 25).—Nova Bibl. Tüb.: Every thing which God does must be regarded as for our improvement; His judgments to lead us to it, and His mercy and grace to keep us to it, even to the end. Because thy loving-kindness is better than life, my lips shall praise thee; Ps. lxxiii. 3 (ver. 22).—QUEENEL: Let no sinner despair! There is no abyss of sin from which God cannot rescue him. He who returns to Him with faith and confidence, will find His bosom open to him (ver. 23).

SPENER, on ver. 23: We have here the clear testimony that the poor castaway people shall hereafter be received to grace, and be converted to their Saviour; and the promises once given them repeatedly in the prophets, shall be fulfilled in them. From the beginning of the Christian Church down to the present time, this has been taught and believed by its dearest teachers, from many passages of the Old and New Testament Scriptures; and we, too, have no ground of departing from it, or looking more at the hardness of those hearts which appear impossible to be converted, than at God's promise. Yet the time and manner of God's effecting the work we should as well commit to Divine wisdom, as rejoice with thanksgiving for Divine grace because of the thing itself; and when such a result is effected, we hope for all the more blessed condition of the Church, but meanwhile heartily pray for the fulfilment of such hope.

GERLACH, on ver. 16: The first figure says, the part has the nature of the whole; the second, the derived has the nature of its origin. The Apostle lays greatest stress upon the latter figure, for he dwells upon it afterward, and portrays it in clearer colors.—The Apostle purposely uses here a very striking figure, from a transaction which did not in reality occur—the grafting of the branch of a wild olive tree on a good stock—in order to show that the Gentiles, in a higher sense than the Jews, are called to salvation “contrary to nature” (ver. 24)—that is, by supernatural grace overcoming their nature; comp. Luke xii. 37 (ver. 18).—Paul calls every thing mystery which man cannot know of himself, and can only perceive by Divine revelation. Previously it was the call of the Gentiles (chap. xvi. 26; Eph. iii. 3), but now it is that of the Jews. Comp. Col. ii. 2; 1 Cor. xv. 51 (ver. 25).—The continued existence of the Israelites among all the remaining nations—this perfectly isolated phenomenon in history—is therefore designed by God to glorify hereafter His covenant faithfulness by a future total conversion of the people (ver. 26).

LISCO: Under what conditions we become and remain participants of God's grace (vers. 22-24).

HEUBNER, on ver. 16: Honorable forefathers as earnest admonition to their posterity (ver. 16).—Nothing more clearly proves the strict righteousness of God, than His judgment on the fallen angels and the unbelieving people of Israel. This should inspire every one with awe, and with solicitude for himself (ver. 21).—It is very necessary to bear in mind both God's severity and goodness; His severity, in order to be preserved from indulgence, false security, and backsliding; and His goodness, in order to be encouraged, and to hope for forgiveness and improvement. God has revealed both. With out the two together there would be no training of men (ver. 22).—Israel is without God, because it is without Christ; God has disappeared from the synagogue. He who would find God, must be converted to Christ (ver. 26).—The true deliverance of Israel does not take place by civil, but by spiritual, emancipation—the mercy of God. Mercy is the object of the reception of the Jews into the Christian Church (ver. 27).—God's friendship with the patriarchs endures eternally (ver. 28).

BESSER: It is with Mary, with the shepherds, with Simeon, with the first-called disciples, with the Galilean women, with the Apostles, and with the pentecostal Church of Jerusalem, and not without or separated from them, that thou, Gentile, hast a share in the root and sap of the olive tree. “Paul loves the little word ‘with,’” says Bengel, in speaking of the Gentiles; chap. xv. 10; Eph. ii. 19, 22; iii. 6 (vers. 17, 18).—See that you are not led into the folly of planting the top of the tree in the earth, and imagining that you bear the root, and that first from you, German blood, the good sap of the olive tree has really received strength and impulse (ver. 18).

DEICHERT (vers. 11-21): What serves for the fall of some, must serve for the support of others. 1. Corroboration of this experience generally and particularly; 2. For what should it serve both the fallen and the raised?

E. Vers. 29-36. God's general compassion on all. 1. On the Gentiles, who formerly did not believe, but now believe; 2. On the Jews, who do not believe, but shall hereafter believe (vers. 29-32).—All concluded in unbelief. 1. How far? 2. To what end? (ver. 32).—The universality of Divine grace (ver. 32).—An apostolical song of praise: 1. For God's fulness of grace; 2. For His wisdom; 3. For His knowledge (vers. 33-36).—Every thing is of, through, and in (to) God (ver. 36).—To God alone be the honor (ver. 36)!

LUTHKE, on ver. 32: Observe this principal declaration, which condemns all righteousness of man and of works, and praises only God's compassion in our obtaining it by faith.—STRASSE: God must be the beginning, the middle, and the end of all things (ver. 36).—HEDINGER: How audacious not only to look upon God's council-chamber, but to become master of it! Men do not allow their political follies to be known; should we blind ones, then—we who are of yesterday and know nothing—invalidate God's wisdom? Job viii. 9. O man, be acute with the Scriptures, but not on and beside the Scriptures. Hypocrites mount high, and fall low; and it all amounts to nothing with the Divine Being (ver. 38).

SPENER: The loftiness of the divine Majesty

(vers. 33-36).—ROOS: What Paul has called the election, he immediately afterward divides into two ideas, gifts and calling, and says that God does not repent them. God has chosen Israel, and remains firm to it. He has from the beginning shown great mercy to this people; and He does not repent of all this. Single branches can, indeed, be cut off, and individual Jews can be lost in great numbers; but the whole tree will not be cut off, the whole people cannot be cast away (ver. 29).

GERLACH: God's purposes for Israel will continue uninterruptedly until the end of the present course of the world; as the fulfilment of all the promises, there is yet to take place a great popular conversion, and a mighty activity within the Church itself. But from all this we cannot conclude that there will be an external restoration of the Jews to a people in the political sense, and their return to the land of Canaan (ver. 29).—The survey of the wonderfully glorious saving purpose of God, as He gradually unfolded it in the foregoing verses to the eyes of the Apostle, leads the latter to make, from the bottom of his heart, this exclamation of amazed and adoring wonder. The wisdom of God comprehended the purpose which His love had prompted; and God's knowledge marked out the way, defined the measure, and ordered the course for its execution. His judgments even on His own children, when they wish to set up their own righteousness, and the ways in which He draws the most remote Gentiles and most hardened Pharisees to himself, are unsearchable; but they are not absolutely and eternally concealed, but the light of revelation is disclosed to man by the Spirit, which searcheth after the deep things of God, and reveals them to those who love God (vers. 33-36).

SCHLEIERMACHER: The contemplation of the order of salvation, that God has concluded all in unbelief, is also necessary to us for wonder at Divine wisdom. 1. God's concluding all in unbelief, constitutes the nature of this Divine order of salvation and of redemption through Christ. 2. In this, Divine wisdom is most to be perceived and admired (vers. 32, 33).—SCHWIZER: The unfathomable depth of God's wisdom. 1. We represent this unfathomable depth to ourselves in humility; 2. We lift ourselves up in faith, since therein the ways of Divine wisdom are concealed (ver. 33).

THE PERICOPÉ for the Sunday after Trinity (vers. 33-36).—WOLF: How our reflection should be directed to the unsearchable purposes of God. We see, 1. From whence it should proceed; and, 2. To what it must lead.—RANKE: How one can learn to submit to God's incomprehensible ways: 1. By being humble; 2. By being confident.—PETRI: How should we act in regard to the incomprehensibility of God? 1. We should be discreet in our opinions; 2. We should be humble in our disposition; 3. We should be faithful in our work.—KAPFF: The Holy Trinity: 1. An unfathomable depth; 2. But an inexhaustible fountain of life.—FLOREY: Our inability to comprehend God is a reminder that should lead us to a careful reflection. It is: 1. A reminder of the narrowness of our mind, that we should be warned by it against useless subtleties; 2. A reminder respecting the Scriptures, that we should be moved thereby to hold fast to God's revealed word; 3. A reminder of eternity, that we should thereby think of the perfect knowledge which awaits us in the future world.—SCHULTZ: The Lord's ways: 1. How God glorifies them before our eyes; 2. To what end God's glory, which is declared in His ways, summons us.

[BISHOP HALL: On Divine severity. With how envious eyes did the Jews look upon those first heralds of the gospel, who carried the glad tidings of salvation to the despised Gentiles! What cruel storms of persecution did they raise against those blessed messengers, whose fate deserved to be beautiful! wherein their obstinate unbelief turned to our advantage; for, after they had made themselves unworthy of that gospel of peace, that blessing was instantly derived upon us Gentiles, and we happily changed conditions with them.—The Jews were once the children, and we the dogs under the table: the crumbs were our lot, the bread was theirs. Now is the case, through their wilful incredulity, altered: they are the dogs, and we the children; we sit at a full table, while their hunger is not satisfied with scraps.—On the necessity of a living faith in Christ. If ever, therefore, we look for any consolation in Christ, or to have any part in this beautiful union, it must be the main care of our hearts to make sure of a lively faith in the Lord Jesus; to lay fast hold upon Him; to clasp Him close to us; yea, to receive Him inwardly into our bosoms, and so to make Him ours, and ourselves His, that we may be joined to Him as our Head, espoused to Him as our Husband, incorporated into Him as our Nourishment, engrafted in Him as our Stock, and laid upon Him as a sure Foundation.—On the incomprehensibility of Divine wisdom. It is unfitting for the vulgar mind to attempt with profane foot to ascend the highest pinnacles of heaven, and there to scrutinize with presumptuous eyes the holy innermost places of God, and to pronounce an opinion on the most profound secrets of the Divine wisdom!—Shall we dare to measure the depths of the Divine law with the diminutive standard of our intellect? Shall we trample on things which even the angels gaze on with awe? But in this respect I do not so much blame the people as the teachers themselves, who have so inopportunately supplied the ears and minds of the multitude with these subjects.

[FARINDON: What better spectacle for the Church than the synagogue, in whose ruins and desolation she may read the dangerous effects of spiritual pride and haughtiness of mind, and thence learn not to insult, but tremble?—Take virtue in its own shape, and it seems to call for fear and trembling, and to bespeak us to be careful and watchful that we forfeit not so fair an estate for false riches; but take it, as from the devil's forge, and then, contrary to its own nature, it helps to blind and hoodwink us, that we see not the danger we are in, how that not only the way, but our feet, are slippery. It unfortunately occasions its own ruin, whilst we, with Nero in Tacitus, spend riotously upon presumption of treasure.—LEIGHTON: Our only way to know that our names are not in that black line, and to be persuaded that He hath chosen us to be saved by His Son, is this, to find that we have chosen Him, and are built on Him by faith, which is the fruit of His love who first chooseth us, and which we may read in our esteem of Him.

[CHARNOCK: On regeneration. The increasing the perfection of one species, can never mount the thing so increased, to the perfection of another species. If you could vastly increase the heat of fire, you could never make it ascend to the perfection of a star. If you could increase mere moral works to the highest pitch they are capable of, they can never make you gracious, because grace is another species, and the nature of them must be changed to make them of another kind. All the moral actions in the world will never make our hearts of themselves of another kind than moral. Works make not the heart good, but a good heart makes the works good. It is not our walking in God's statutes materially, which procures us a new heart, but a new heart is necessary before walking in God's statutes.—On the misery of unbelief. Some humbled souls think God is not so merciful as He declares; He swears to expel their doubts. Presumptuous persons think God is not so just; He swears to expel their vain conceits. This sin ties up, as it were, the hands of an omnipotent mercy from saving such a one.

[TILLOTSON: We are apt to attribute all things to the next and immediate agent, and to look no higher than second causes; not considering that all the motions of natural causes are directly subordinate to the first cause, and all the actions of free creatures are under the government of God's wise providence, so that nothing happens to us besides the design and intention of God.—If God be the last end of all, let us make Him our last end, and refer all our actions to His glory. This is that which is due to Him, as He is the first cause, and therefore He does most reasonably require it of us.

[HOPKINS: Fear God, lest at any time, through any neglect or miscarriage of yours, He should be provoked to suspend His influence, and withdraw His grace from you, and to leave you to your own weakness and impotency, upon whose influence all your obedience doth depend.

[HENRY: The best evidence of integrity is a freedom from the present prevailing corruptions of the times and places that we live in; to swim against the stream when it is strong. Those God will own for His faithful witnesses that are bold in bearing their testimony to the present truth. This is thank-worthy: not to bow to Baal when every body bows. Sober singularity is commonly the badge of true sincerity.

[J. WESLEY: God always reserved a seed for himself; a few that worshipped Him in spirit and in truth. I have often doubted whether these were not the very persons whom the rich and honorable Christians, who will always have number as well as power on their side, did not stigmatize, from time to time, with the title of heretics. Perhaps it was chiefly by this artifice of the devil and his children, that the good which was in them being evil spoken of, they were prevented from being so extensively useful as otherwise they might have been. Nay, I have doubted whether that arch-heretic, Montanus, was not one of the holiest men in the second century.

[CLARKE: The designs are the offspring of infinite wisdom, and therefore they are all right; the means are the most proper, as being the choice of an infinite knowledge that cannot err: we may safely credit the goodness of the design, founded in infinite wisdom; we may rely on the due accomplishment of the end, because the means are chosen and applied by infinite knowledge and skill.

[BARNES, on ver. 14: We may see here, 1. That it is the earnest wish of the ministry to save the souls of men; 2. That they should urge every argument and appeal with reference to this; 3. That even the most awful and humbling truths may have this tendency; 4. It is right to use all the means in our power, not absolutely wicked, to save men. Paul was full of devices; and much of the success of the ministry will depend on a wise use of plans, that may, by the Divine blessing, arrest and save the souls of men.—J. F. H.]

PART SECOND.

The Practical Theme: The calling of the Roman Christians, on the ground of their accomplished redemption, or the UNIVERSAL MERCY of God (which will be extended to all), to represent the living worship of God in the completion of the real burnt-offering, and to form a universal Christian church-life for the realization of the call of all nations to PRAISE AND GLORIFY GOD, so that they too may recognize and sustain the universal call of the Apostle. In correspondence with this is the recommendation of his companions, assistants, and friends, in sending his greetings to them; in contrast with which is his warning against Judaizing and paganizing false teachers; chap. xii. 1-xvi. 20.—Conclusion. Salutations of friends. Amen (vers. 21-27).

LITERATURE.—BORGER, Dissertatio de parte epistolæ ad Romanos paranetica. Lugd. Bat., 1810.

FIRST DIVISION.

THE CALLING OF THE ROMAN CHURCH TO A UNIVERSAL CHRISTIAN DEPORTMENT

CHAP. XII. 1-XV. 13.

FIRST SECTION.—The practical theme (chap. xii. 1, 2). The proper conduct of Christians toward the fellowship of the brethren for the establishment of a harmonious church-life (vers. 3-8).

CHAP. XII. 1-8.

- 1 I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye [to]¹ present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable [well-pleasing] unto God,
- 2 which is your reasonable [rational] service. [.] And be not [And not to be]² conformed to this world: but be ye transformed [but to be transfigured]³ by the renewing of your mind, that ye may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God [or, what is the will of God, what is good, and well-pleasing, and perfect].⁴
- 3 For I say, through the grace given unto me, to every man that is among you, not to think of himself more highly than he ought to think; but to think soberly [or, not to be high-minded above what he ought to be minded, but to be so minded as to be sober-minded],⁵ according as God hath dealt to every man
- 4 the measure of faith. For as we have many members in one body, and all
- 5 members have not the same office: So we, being many, are one body in Christ,
- 6 and every one's members one of another. Having then gifts differing according to the grace that is given to us, whether prophecy, *let us prophesy*⁶ according
- 7 to the proportion of faith; Or ministry, let us wait on our ministering; or he
- 8 that teacheth, on teaching; Or he that exhorteth, on exhortation: he that giveth, let him do it with simplicity; he that ruleth, with diligence; he that sheweth mercy, with cheerfulness.

TEXTUAL.

² Ver. 2.—[The Rec. (with N. B¹. L., many versions and fathers) reads: οὐ συγκριθεῖσθε, which is adopted by Wordsworth and Tregelles. The majority of modern editors and commentators (Lachmann, Tischendorf, Tholuck, De Wette, Meyer, Alford, Lange) accept the infinitive; so A. B. D. F. Most of these support προσευχᾷ (ceōhai, rather than εὐχῇ). Meyer says: "It is quite as likely that the imperative was written, to make ver. 2 an independent sentence, as that the infinitive was substituted for the sake of conformity with ver. 1." Accepting the infinitive, we place a comma at the close of ver. 1, and amend as above.

⁴ Ver. 2.—[This emendation accords with Dr. Lange's exegesis. It is taken from Noyes; the Amer. Bible Union gives a similar rendering.

⁷ Ver. 6.—[The difficulties of construction are discussed fully in the Eng. Notes. The R. V. has so happily filled out the elliptical clauses, and preserved the force of the original, that it is not necessary to make any alterations. The clause: let us wait on our ministering (ver. 7), might perhaps be improved; yet, on the whole, it presents the correct meaning.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Summary.—The practical theme controlling the whole of the second part. The proper conduct of Christians, or the calling of (Roman) Christians to the living worship (service) of God,* vers. 1, 2; a. The proper conduct toward the fellowship of believing brethren, the Church (ecclesiastical duties), vers. 3-8; b. The proper conduct of Christians in all personal relations, vers. 9-21; c. Toward civil authorities (duties toward the government), chap. xiii. 1-6; d. Toward the world in general. Recognition of the rights of the world, and of legal fellowship with it. Separation, on the contrary, from the ungodliness of the world, vers. 7-14; e. The proper practice of the living worship of God, and its universality in the removing of the differences between the "weak" and the "strong," chap. xiv. 1-xv. 4; f. Exhortation to unanimity of all the members of the Church to the praise of God, on the ground of God's grace, for realizing the destination of all nations to glorify God, chap. xv. 5-18.

See also the headings of the sections. Meyer: "General exhortation to holiness." But this "general" exhortation is very characteristically defined according to the characteristic, fundamental thought of the whole Epistle, in its essential as well as in its personal reference. According to the essential reference, the Apostle has shown, in the first part, that the corruption of the world consists in its having fallen from the living worship of God, and that therefore redemption is a restoration of the fundamental principles of this living worship. The entire holiness of Christians is, accordingly, portrayed as the development of a living spiritual worship. But in the personal reference, the Apostle shows how the Roman Christian congregation should be developed into a congregation of living worship, in order to be the instrument of its extension to all the world, to serve as a central organ for the Apostle, who has perceived his calling in the extension of this worship into all the world.

1. The practical theme (vers. 1, 2). A summons to develop the service restored by redemption. [Comp. here the third part of the Heidelberg Catechism, On Thankfulness to God for Redemption.—P. S.]

* [The word Gottesdienst, used here, and frequently throughout this section, means, literally: Service of God; but, technically: public service, Divine service, public worship. Dr. Lange seems to combine both meanings, for he implies that all the duties here set forth form not only a service of God, but the best, truest worship, the real liturgy of the New Testament Church.—R.]

Ver. 1. I beseech you therefore, brethren [Παρακαλῶ οὖν ὑμᾶς, ἀδελφοί]. According to Meyer and Tholuck, the οὖν does not introduce an inference from the whole of the previous didactic part (as Calvin, Bengel, De Wette, Philippi, and others, would have it), but from chap. xi. 35, 36. But it must be observed, that the conclusion of chap. xi. constitutes the organic apex of the entire doctrinal division; this is especially true of ver. 32, with which Rückert, and others, would connect this verse. Tholuck fails to perceive the Apostle's practical theme, in saying: "The Apostle was accustomed to make some exhortations follow the chief, and therefore the didactic, contents."

By the mercedes of God [διὰ τῶν οἰκτιρημάτων τοῦ Θεοῦ] (chap. xv. 30; 1 Cor. i. 10; 2 Cor. x. 1). The objective ground of Divine mercy in their experience of salvation, is made the subjective ground of his admonition. He refers to the experience of Divine mercy, its consequence, and its light and right, as if he said, by the name of Divine mercy. The only difference is, that, in the asseveration διὰ, by, the speaker allows the subject of his asseveration itself to speak as motive and motor. The plural οἰκτιρμοί corresponds to the Hebrew רחמים; but the Apostle has also, instituted, in the foregoing, a threefold gradation of the Divine demonstration of grace.

To present, παραστήσαι. The expression, which was used of placing the sacrificial beast before the altar, conveys the thought of the complete resignation and readiness which, on the one hand, does not in the least hesitate, but, on the other, makes no intrusion by an arbitrary slaying of the offering.

Your bodies [τὰ σώματα ὑμῶν]. The holding of the body in readiness for an offering well-pleasing to God, is the expression for the highest measure of the renunciation of every thing earthly and temporal. Explanations:

1. Figurative designation of personality itself, according to the figure of the offering (Beza, De Wette, and Philippi [Stuart, Hodge]).

2. The bodies in the real sense, as the holiness of the vois is added in the second verse (Fritzsche, Meyer).

3. The sensuous nature of man, which leads him to sin (Köllner, and others).

Against (1.): The Apostle speaks, according to the apostolic standard, to believers, who, according to chap. vi., have already given their personal life to death. But the body is the organ and symbol of all the individual parts, which must be offered in consequence of this principal offering. Against

(2.), Cocceius: Non possumus offerre corpus sine anima. The real service performed in making the offering is, indeed, finished with the shedding of blood, or with the resignation of the body. But the heart, or the life of the spirit, is given to God as an expression that the body is offered. Against (8.) Whatever is sinful is not fit, as such, for an offering.—The body is the organ and symbol of the present life in all its relations and parts. Comp. chap. vi. 12, 13, where the question under consideration is the active consecration of all the members of the body.*

Sacrifice. Θυσία. We hold that the Apostle has in mind the symbol of the central offering—that is, of the burnt-offering (comp. Tholuck, p. 651). But the burnt-offering was a symbol that the whole life, with all its powers, should be consumed in the fire of God's sovereignty, for His service and glory. The predicates, living, ζῶσαν, &c., particularly the first, which the Apostle ascribes to this θυσία, are thought, by Meyer, to denote the antithesis of this New Testament offering to that of the Old Testament: "as an offering which lives (antithesis to the real offerings which lose their life)." Tholuck, on the other hand, says with propriety: "the thought that in the Old Testament only dead offerings were brought to God, is neither Jewish nor Pauline; to present not only dead offerings, but even sic ones, was an abomination before the Lord; Mal. i. 8." Yet this applies only to Meyer's expression; his distinction in itself is well founded. The predicates, holy [ἁγία] and well-pleasing to God [εὐάρεστον τῷ Θεῷ], do not in themselves fully constitute an antithesis to the Old Testament. The antithesis is comprised: (1.) In the designation, your bodies, human bodies; which is necessary to the idea of a spiritual offering; (2.) In the emphasis on the presenting and holding in readiness for the Lord, as the Finisher of the real offering; in which all their own external self-offering on the part of the Roman Christians is absolutely precluded. By this means the predicates acquire a stronger meaning. The higher and real newness of life, the holiness of, and Divine pleasure in, the life of faith given up to the service of God, take the place of the symbolical newness of life, holiness of, and legal Divine pleasure in, the offering of the beast. Estius, Bengel, and others, have connected the τῷ Θεῷ with παράσῃσθαι; this is correctly opposed by Meyer and Tholuck (see Phil. iv. 18; comp. Rom. vi. 13; 1 Peter ii. 5).

Which is your rational service. [Dr. Lange: Euer vernünftiger (geistiger) Gottesdienst.] The accusative τὴν λογικὴν λατρείαν is in apposition with the foregoing clause, characterizing more specifically what has been said, according to the New Testament conception of offering, in antithesis to that of the Old Testament. The λατρεία, service, worship, which, in its central idea, is everywhere an offering (see John xvi. 2). But this sacrificial worship of believers should be λογική (see John iv. 21; Rom. i. 9; 1 Peter ii. 5). The λογικόν denotes that which is inspired by reason, in harmony with real reason, and consequently spiritual, real; in antithesis to merely external symbolical service (Melancthon, cultus mentis),* but not in antithesis to the ῥῶα ἄλογα (Theodoret, Grotius, and others); for, as Meyer observes, the question here is λατρεία, but not θυσία. Indirectly, indeed, the λογικὴ λατρεία is also an antithesis to the cultus commentitii; for if the symbolical service would establish itself beyond its time, against the real service, it would then become cultus commentitius.

Ver. 2. And not to be conformed. On the difference of the readings, see Textual Note†. The infinitives must be referred to the παράκαλῶ. The συνσχηματίζεσθαι is passive, with a reflexive meaning, in eandem formam redigi, se conformare. Philippi: "The original difference between σχῆμα and μορφή may be, that the latter denotes rather the organic form, while the former denotes more the mechanical form, the external and adventitious habitus (σχῆμα from ἔχω, εἶναι); comp. 1 Cor. vii. 31. Hence σχῆμα is also the external semblance, the pompa, and σχηματίζεσθαι, synonymous with προσποιεῖσθαι, to assume a form, a seeming shape, to appear, to take the shape of; comp. the passages cited by Wetstein; μορφή also the beautiful form, forma; comp. formosus. Thus μορφή more fitly designates the real inward form, while σχῆμα denotes rather the external and accidental appearance." Comp. Phil. ii. 6-8. See also Tholuck, p. 652. Meyer holds [as the E. V. assumes], that the antithesis of both verbs is comprised only in the prepositions; these, indeed, increase it. The σύν denotes the torpidity of the external form of the Church by uniformity with the world, worldliness; the μετά denotes the organic change and transformation of the organic shape, according to the new inward form. Meyer: "The present infinitives denote a continued action, while παράσῃσθαι represents the presenting of the offering as a completed act."

To this world [τῷ αἰῶνι τούτῳ]. ἐν τῷ. The pre-messianic and relatively anti-messianic form of the world in its perverted course. [Comp. Lange's Comm., Gal. i. 4, p. 13.—R.]

But to be transfigured [ἀλλὰ μεταμορφοῦσθαι]. The difference in preposition and verb is better preserved by transfigured, which also conveys the distinctions suggested above. See Five Anglican Clergymen.—R.] The μεταμ. is reflexive, as συνασ.

By the renewing of your mind; chap. vii. 24; Eph. iv. 23. The καινότης πνεύματος (Rom. vii. 6; comp. chap. vi. 4), as an impelling principle, results in the ἀνακαινώσις of the νοῦς; for the νοῦς, the conscious, thoughtful, or reflective moral and religious spiritual life (disposition) is constantly renewed, in part restored, and in part developed, in its mastery over the natural part of life. The transformation and shaping of the life of the Christian are determined not by external worldly forms, but by this inward renewing, or renewing ascending to the whole of the external life (ἀνακαινώσις) through the productive power of the Spirit. The νοῦς, as such, does not then receive the new μορφή (Tholuck), but rather the whole Christian life from the νοῦς outward.†

* [So Tholuck. While it must be admitted that we are hidden to present our entire selves, the choice of the word "bodies" is probably "an indication that the sanctification of Christian life is to extend to that part of man's nature which is most completely under the bondage of sin" (Alford). This view is not open to the objection urged above by Dr. Lange, and accords with Paul's use of σώμα.—R.]

* [So Hodge, Stuart, and most. Rational is preferable to reasonable, because the latter conveys ordinarily the idea of something for which a good reason can be given, rather than the exact idea of λογικόν, rational, vernünftig.—R.]

† [The mind is renewed in the newness of the Spirit, and from within the transforming impulse proceeds to

That ye may prove. Literally: εἰς τὸ δοκιμάζειν. [Infinitive clause of design (Meyer).—R.] The Christian life should not receive its development by means of an external legislation, but by the inward one, which is directed by spiritual proving and self-determination (see Gal. vi. 4; Eph. v. 10; Phil. i. 10, and other passages). Meyer appropriately says: "In the unrenewed man this proving is altogether foreign to the activity of his conscience. Comp. Eph. v. 10." But with this there is also connected the being able to prove (Rückert, Köllner [Hodge, apparently]), although the actual proving is conjoined with it. Meyer: "The regenerate one proves by the verdict of his conscience, aroused and illuminated by the Spirit." The νόμος of the Spirit, the Christian principle of life, is an infinitude, whose explanation and concrete application to life is committed to the proving of Christian illumination and wisdom.*

The will of God [τὸ θέλημα τοῦ Θεοῦ]. That which is willed by God in every relation of life. The reference of the definitions τὸ ἀγαθόν, καὶ εὐάριστον καὶ τίσις, as adjectives, to God's will (Vulgate, Chrysostom, the most of the early expositors, Luther, Rückert, &c.), is opposed, first of all, by the εὐάριστον, but, in general, by the tautology that would be contained in the expression. Therefore Erasmus, Castalio, Tholuck, Meyer, and the most of the early commentators, have regarded the additions as a substantive apposition.

What is good, &c. We may ask whether a climax of three members is designed [Meyer], or whether we should render explicit that double relation of the good, by which, on the one hand, it is that which is well-pleasing to God, and, on the other, that which is perfect in itself, because it arises from the righteousness of faith, the principle of perfection. We prefer the latter rendering. The repetition of the article would, of course, not be necessary with the first interpretation.†

2. The proper conduct of Christians toward the community of brethren for the establishment of a harmonious church-life (vers. 3-8). Tholuck is correct in finding, in what follows, a reference to the different spheres of activity in the Church. Meyer speaks only of an exhortation to individual duties.‡

Ver. 3. For I say (say definitely). The γάρ is rendered namely, by Tholuck and Meyer. [Alford also takes it as resumptive.] First of all, namely appears as inappropriate as for. If it is the matter of the self-proving and self-determination of believers, how they should act toward each other, how can the Apostle lay down his precepts immediately afterward? The answer lies in the fact, that their subjective judgment should be subordinated to the known objective will of God. This requirement, that they should be certain as to whether their conduct corresponds to God's perfect will, is so great, that it causes the Apostle to lay down regulations for it. Therefore we may also translate the γάρ by for. The λίγιν is used in the sense of injunction.

Through the grace, &c. [διὰ τῆς χάριτος, κ.τ.λ.] Even here διὰ. He will not prescribe for them by virtue of his subjective opinion or authority, but by virtue of the grace which is given to him (see chap. i. 5), which establishes his office, and is at the same time the element of life common to his office and their church-life (see chap. xv. 15; 1 Cor. iii. 10; Eph. iii. 7, 8).

To every man that is among you [παντὶ τῷ ὄντι ἐν ὑμῖν. Alford: "A strong bringing out of the individual application of the precept."—R.] This would therefore have applied to Peter also, if he had been in Rome, or Paul would not have spoken thus, or, indeed, would not have written to them at all.

Not to think of himself [μὴ ὑπερθεομενεῖν. See the text, and Textual Note.—R.] Tholuck: εἰσενεῖν is here not "to strive after," and also not "to be disposed, to think," but "to think (of himself)" (see p. 654).

Soberly, σωφρονεῖν. It is wise conduct or good behavior, especially as moderation.—Proper self-knowledge and esteem, apart from over-estimation, should, by modesty, come to proper and wise moderation in the reciprocity of the personal life with the society. Meyer understands εἰσενεῖν as to be disposed, and explains the details accordingly; the Vulgate, Calvin, and others, interpret in the same way. The mode of thinking and feeling is undoubtedly connected here with the holding and demeaning, which is proved by the σωφρονεῖν.

According as God hath dealt to every man [ἐκάστω ὡς ὁ θεὸς ἐπέδωκεν]. The ἐκάστω is dependent on ἐμύρσει: According as God hath dealt to every man, &c., is therefore made antecedent by inversion (see 1 Cor. iii. 5).—The idea of a different distribution of the measure of faith leads to the idea of the gift (ver. 6). No one should apply more than the gift of grace, for what lies beyond this is presumption; but the whole of the gift of grace should be applied, for if this be not done, something would be withheld from the society which is designed for it. Comp. 1 Cor. xii. 4-6, 11; Heb. ii. 4.

The measure of faith [μέτρον πίστεως]. When Meyer maintains that faith here means only faith in the ordinary sense, he overlooks the fact that the measure of faith is spoken of in concrete unity; or rather, he interprets this measure erroneously, by understanding only different degrees of the strength of faith, and, accordingly, he not only rejects the reference of the expression to Christian knowledge (Beza, and others), or to the power of working miracles (Theophylact), but also to the gift of grace (Chrysostom, and most other commentators). The purely Divine element in the gift is undoubtedly emphasized here, for what is not of faith is sin. [Alford explains the phrase: "The receptivity of χάρισμα, itself no inherent congruity. It is, in fact, the subjective designation of 'the grace that is given unto us,' ver. 6." He rightly distinguishes it from the gifts and graces themselves. So Philippi in substance. The objective sense of "faith" which is implied in the view of Beza, is open to decided objection.—R.]

Ver. 4. For as we have many members in one body [καθ' ἑαυτὴν γὰρ ἐν ἑνὶ σώματι transfigure the whole life. This seems to be Dr. Lange's meaning.—R.]

* [The verb occurring here is rendered discern (Amer. Bible Union), approve (Erasmus, and others); but prove, test by actual experience, is to be preferred (so Meyer, De Wette, Alford, and others). Wordsworth: assay the value of.—R.]

† [The non-repetition of the article, which is urged against the "substantive apposition," is readily explained. It shows that all three refer to one thing. See Winer, p. 120.—R.]

πολλὰ μίλη ἔχουμεν]. Establishment of the foregoing. The individual Christian is only a member of Christ's body, and should conduct himself as a member, avow himself as a member, and should permit himself to be strengthened as a member; Christ alone is the Head.* "On the commonness of the parallels between a human body and a corpus sociale (1 Cor. xii.), even among the ancients, see Grotius and Wetstein in loco;" Meyer.

Ver. 6. So we, being many. In antithesis to the unity of the body.

In Christ. The head is the organic vital centre of the whole, in which (not to which) every thing in respect to dominion and glory is comprised (Eph. i. 22, and other passages).

And every one. Τὸ δὲ καθ' ἑξῆς is a solecism of the later Greek, instead of τὸ δὲ καθ' ἑνα; Mark xiv. 19; John viii. 9, and other passages.

Ver. 6. Having then gifts differing according to the grace [ἔχοντες δὲ χάρισματα κατὰ τὴν χάριν τὴν δοθεῖσαν ἡμῖν διάφορα]. Different constructions here enter into consideration.

1. With ἔχοντες a new sentence begins, which continues in a succession of elliptical exhortations (Beza, Olshausen, Philippi, and others). Meyer: "The elliptical expression after κατὰ τὴν ἀναλ. τ. πίστ. may be supplied by προφητεῖαι; by ὡμεν after ἐν τῇ διακονίᾳ; by ἔστω after ἐν τῇ διδασκαλίᾳ; by the same after ἐν τῇ παρακλήσει; and, finally, by the imperatives of the corresponding verbs (μεταδίδω, &c.) after the three following parts, ἐν ἀπλότητι, &c. [So E. V., Hodge, &c.] Comp. the analogous mode of expression in 1 Peter iv. 10 f.

2. The ἔχοντες is connected with the foregoing, but in such a way that the following clauses are, according to Meyer, all ellipses (Erasmus, and others). Meyer also places Tholuck here, but Tholuck declares now for (1.).

3. The ἔχοντες δὲ is joined with ἔσμεν (ver. 5), in appositional meaning, and the following clauses are, at the outset, not hortatory, but descriptive, yet pass over into the hortatory (Reiche, Rückert, De Wette, Lachmann). We accept this construction with the modification, that we construe the ἔσμεν emphatically in the meaning of to have and to hold fast, to put into practice, to exercise. Comp. Rom. i. 28. With the gifts, as with every thing spiritual, we must bear especially in mind that they cannot be possessed aright without exercising them. Thus the hortatory character under the descriptive form lies in the force of the ἔσμεν, and in the added δὲ. [This δὲ is rendered by Alford: "and not only so, but."—R.]

As for the apparent fluctuations in the construction, they resolve themselves into regular forms, if we observe the subdivisions.† The Apostle distinguishes, first of all, two principal categories: α.

* [Alford: "γὰρ, elucidating the fact that God appoints variously to various persons: because the Christian community is like a body, with many members, having various duties."—R.]

† [Tholuck: "The first two accusatives are grammatically dependent on ἔσμεν: by degrees the Apostle loses sight of this construction, and continues with the concrete δὲ διδόντες, which he still binds on to the foregoing with αἷ; but, at δὲ μεταδίδους, omits this also, and, at ver. 9, introduces the abstract ἡ ἀγάπη." This view or that of Dr. Lange will be preferred, as one does or does not seek definiteness of arrangement in the verses.—R.]

προφητεία; δ. διακονία. The δανονία is then divided into the διδόντων and the παρακαλῶν; this latter is again divided into the μεταδίδους, the προϊστάμενος, and the ἐλεῶν. This is proved by the forms:

1. The antithesis of the abstract nouns, προφητεία and διακονία. The latter, in its broader meaning, was evidently a church office; while, on the other hand, the προφητεία was, in the fullest sense, also an office.

2. εἴτε ὁ διδόνων, εἴτε ὁ παρακαλῶν. This παρακαλῶν must, at all events, be regarded as a superintendent of the society, presbyter, or man having the gifts of the presbyter, whether, as ὁ μεταδίδους, he devoted himself to the care of the poor; as ὁ προϊστάμενος, to the κυβερνήσεως in the narrower sense; or, as ὁ ἐλεῶν, to the healing of the sick and casting out of devils.*—Gifts differing according to the grace. Gifts; that is, modifications of the one Divine grace in the differences of the human individual talent (see 1 Cor. xii. 4 ff.).

Whether prophecy. Prophecy, in the Old Testament as well as in the New, is the gift and calling to declare, by the prompting and communication of God's Spirit, what is new—that which concerns the future, and the development of God's kingdom; in order, like the compass, to direct aright, in the present, the ship of the kingdom. The reason why it appears more in the foreground in the Old Testament than in the New, is, that the former was the time of expectation and longing, and the latter the time of fulfilment and satisfaction.†

According to the proportion (harmony) of faith [κατὰ τὴν ἀναλογίαν τῆς πίστεως]. The expression defines exactly: according to the relation, the proportion, or harmony of faith; that is, according to the proportion defined by faith. Explanations:

1. Subjective faith, including the measure of faith, is meant (the early commentators; Origen, Chrysostom, Ambrose, and others; Bengel and Meyer [Alford, De Wette]. Tholuck: "The prophet keeps within the limits of his prophetic gift, assigned him by his individuality").

2. The objective rule of faith (Abelard, Aquinas, Hervæus, &c.; Flatt, Klee, Philippi, and others). Tholuck, on the contrary, observes, that we may ask whether Paul could have appealed already to such a regula fidei. But, in reality, Moses has already established the features of the analogia fidei, Deut. xviii. 18 ff. It is well known that the

* [Dr. Lange's classification is ingenious, and perhaps the most satisfactory one, if all seven terms be referred to official positions. Meyer, Alford, and others, refer the last three (in ver. 8) to persons endowed with certain charisms, without any special official position. The reason for this change in application is found in the omission of αἷ, the difficulty of referring these to official persons and functions, the change in the admonitions, which do not define the sphere, as before, but the mode. Besides, as the Apostle (ver. 4) has been speaking of "all members," he would naturally allude to others than official persons. See further in the notes on the separate clauses.—R.]

† ["Prophecy" undoubtedly includes more than the prediction of future events, yet the tendency has been to identify the New Testament prophet with the preacher. Dr. Hodge remarks: "The gift of which Paul here speaks, is . . . that of immediate occasional inspiration, leading the recipient to deliver, as the mouth of God, the particular communication which he had received." This view, which is undoubtedly correct, removes this office out of the discussions respecting Church polity and offices at the present day. It belongs to the extraordinary gifts of the apostolic age.—R.]

Jews crucified Christ by a false application of this rule; but it is equally well known that the New Testament proofs of faith from the Old Testament, which first introduced Christianity into the Jewish world, have only been a living application of this rule. At all events, Paul could not yet appeal to ecclesiastical confessions, but he could appeal to a fundamental canon of truth; see Gal. i. 8; vi. 16; Phil. iii. 16; 2 Tim. iii. 15, 16, &c. However, Tholuck has other grounds for preferring the explanation, that the prophet keeps within the sphere of his calling; namely, because the deacon should remain within the sphere of his diaconate, &c. But is the sphere of the prophet described by the measure of his subjective faith, or would not this be here rather a nugatory generality? The sphere of the prophet, who reveals what is new for the enlargement of the old revelation, is just the real character of the revelation itself, harmonizing with itself through all the stages of development. Yet the Apostle does not say ἀποκαλύψας, but πίστις, because the faith of the Church is also called to the office of watchman, in order that the development of the truth be not corrupted by false prophets. The application of this rule to the exposition of the Scriptures in the early period (see Tholuck, p. 664) is not explicatio, but applicatio; but it cannot be denied that this applicatio itself is made κατὰ τὴν ἀνάλογον τῆς πίστεως.

Ver. 7. Or ministry [εἴτε διακονίαν, das Dienstamt (Lange). Governed by ἔχοντες, like the preceding accusative]. A threefold idea of the διακονία can be distinguished in the New Testament. 1. The most comprehensive idea understands by διακονία the ecclesiastical office in general; see 1 Cor. xii. 5. There, prophecy is designated as a diaconate; here, it is distinguished from it. 2. Therefore, the special office for a definite congregation. So here. [Dr. Lange apparently includes here all the permanent offices in a single church, as he makes διακονία a category, under which the five following terms fall. If, however, it be considered as coordinate with what follows, then the still more restricted view must be adopted.—R.] 3. The diaconate, in distinction from the presbyterial episcopacy, 1 Tim. iii. 8. At the time when this Epistle was written, the ecclesiastical distinctions were less developed than when the First Epistle to Timothy was written, but yet more so than in the First Epistle to the Corinthians.

Let us wait on our ministering [ἐν τῇ διακονίᾳ. We must supply an imperative, either let us be in, remain in, or wait on (as E. V.). The sense is the same.—R.] Meyer thus explains the ἐν: The one who was "diaconally endowed" shall not wish to be of authority beyond the sphere assigned him by this endowment, but to be active within it. But it is not necessary to understand the εἶναι ἐν quantitatively; it can also be understood qualitatively. And since all the apostolic functions of the Church were diaconal, qualitative ministering is undoubtedly the meaning. The proof of the true office is, that it consists simply in service; just as, inversely, pure divine service becomes the true office, even if it had no human official seal. With the positive filling of his sphere, it is always supposed that he does not commit improprieties beyond his sphere.

Or he that teacheth, on teaching [εἴτε ὁ διδάσκων, ἐν τῇ διδασκαλίᾳ]. According to Meyer, Paul should have continued uniformly, εἴτε διδασκαλίαν (sc. ἔχοντες), "as [Cod.] A. actually has." We have seen, in the arrangement of the gifts (see above), what grounds he had for not thus continuing.* Thus he has his gift in his labors as teacher. This appears self-evident; but how many, who would be deemed teachers, are mere babblers!

Ver. 8. Or he that exhorteth, on exhortation [ὁ παρακαλῶν, ἐν τῇ παρακλήσει]. As the παρακαλῶν here is definitely distinguished from the διδάσκων, nothing else can be understood by it than a fraction within the more general presbyterate. Evidently the more definite distinction, in 1 Tim. v. 17, between presbyters who devote themselves to teaching, and ruling presbyters, thus begins to take shape; while, on the other hand, the diaconate is developed in a presbyterate from the date of Acts xi. 30, and has not yet positively been separated from it. The exhorter, according to what follows, comprises the different sides of the subsequently developed presbyterial office; he is undoubtedly synonymous with the pastors, Eph. iv. 11. The division of his office appears in the following statements.†

He that giveth [ὁ μεταδίδους]. According to Meyer, the official functions to the Church cease with the εἶτε. We have, on the contrary, laid down further subdivisions here. Every Christian is indeed a μεταδίδους, and not less an ἐλὼν; but as here there stands midway between the two a προϊστάμενος, which not every one can be, special functions recognized by the Church are evidently meant. Meyer argues against such functions, by observing: a. The diaconal gift could not be thus analyzed; b. The position of the προϊστάμενος as the presbyter between two diaconal employments, would be inappropriate. Instead, therefore, of bearing in mind the growing relations, he does violence to them by preconceived opinions; a presbyter is a presbyter, a deacon is a deacon, &c.; and then, ac-

† [Meyer confines the charisms of exclusively official significance to the four terms already discussed, though he thinks these four are examples chosen out of a larger number: (1.) The gift of thronus; i.e. discourse, prophecy. (2.) The gift of oversight of the external affairs of the Church, diaconate. (3.) The gift of teaching by ordinary methods, not yet limited to any special office. (4.) The gift of exhortation, i.e., of encouraging or admonitory remarks upon the passage of Scripture read after the usage of the synagoga. This last differs from the teaching, in being directed to the heart and will; while teaching was directed to the understanding. Philippi, whose notes are very full and valuable, agrees with him in the main, but differs from him in regard to what follows.—R.]

* [Alford (with most modern commentators) defends the subjective view of "faith," from the context, "which aims at showing that the measure of faith, itself the gift of God, is the receptive faculty for all spiritual gifts, which are therefore not to be boasted of, nor pushed beyond their province, but humbly exercised within their own limits." Besides, there is very little warrant for the objective sense of πίστις; it was unknown to the early Greek fathers (Meyer), and cannot be established as a New Testament usus; comp. Lange's Comm. Gal. i. 23, p. 27; Lightfoot, Gala. i. pp. 152 ff. It would seem, then, that the technical theological phrase: analogy of faith, has a meaning not strictly in accordance with Paul's use of the phrase. Certainly the application is quite different—here, to the extraordinary gift of prophecy; theologically, to a regula fidei. Dr. Lange seems to take middle ground.—R.]

With simplicity. This term is characteristic of the penetration of the Apostle, since accessory views might be easily connected with all exercise of beneficence.†

He that ruleth, προϊστάμενος. According to Meyer, the presbyter, but not the presbyter exclusively. See 1 Cor. xii. 28. The order there laid down by the apostles is as follows: 1. Prophets; 2. Teachers; 3. Miraculous powers; then healing of the sick, then bestowals of help, then υπερηγᾶντες, and finally γεννη γλωσσῶν. Therefore the bestowals of help would thus fall under the rubric of the present παρακαλῶν, and especially of the μεταδίδους. Undoubtedly the υπερηγᾶντες there stands in the same line with the προϊστάμενος here. The ones concerned as having care of the external affairs of the Church, had, at the beginning, no great things to manage. We then find the parallel of the ἐλεῶν in the gift of specific miracles: the healing of those possessed with devils, and the restoration of the sick.‡

With diligence. Σπουδή may mean haste, zeal, or diligence. But the latter idea is most definite; zeal was a common duty of all.

With cheerfulness [ἐν ἡλαρότητι, i. e., hilarity]. "With gladness and friendliness," says Meyer, "the opposite of unwilling and ill-humored behavior." But the question here is not a conventional good conduct, but that cheerfulness from heaven which, in a despondent world, among other duties, must conquer and banish the demons of sadness.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On chap. xii. 1 ff. As man's ideal destination was to perceive God aright in His works, and to praise and glorify Him, and, accordingly, the fall consisted in the omission of this living worship, according to Rom. i. 20, 21; then, as human corruption consisted fundamentally in the false worship of heathen idolatry and of Jewish zeal for the letter, according to chaps. i. and ii.; as, further, redemption was instituted that God might effect and manifest the real atonement in Christ as the mercy-seat of the Holy of Holies sprinkled with His own blood, according to chap. iii. 25; as then, consequently, also Christian saving faith consisted (according to chap. v. 1, 2) of free access to God into the Holy of Holies, and is developed in the most varied features of a New Testament call to worship; so, according to the practical part of this Epistle, should believers begin the development of their worship (chap. xii. 1), by finishing the real burnt-offering by the pure presentation of their own bodily life to God's service. On the passages of heathen and Jewish wise men relating to the moral consecration to God as a self-offering, quoted in Wetstein and Koppe, see Meyer, p. 453. See the same author on the "rational service," p. 453; Tholuck, p. 651 ff.: Philippi, p. 500. It is noteworthy that the "rational service" is recommended to the Roman Church. On the συναρμολογῆσαι and μεταμορφοῦσθαι, see the Exeg. Notes. On ἀλὼν οὐτος, see Philippi, p. 202.

2. Just as the First Epistle of Peter appears as an evangelical prophecy, in opposition to the later false image of Peter, so is it with the Epistle to the Romans; and especially does the expression of the living offering and the reasonable service stand in opposition to the later picture of the life of the Romish Church. The same assertion holds good of the expression with which Paul prescribes for all Christians in Rome, that every one should not think too highly of himself, that we are all members one of another, &c.

3. The first application which the Christian has to make of the principle of his new life is, that he should not arrogantly abuse his charism [gift] in a hierarchical or sectarian way, but should exercise it purely for the service of the Church, by adapting himself to the requirements of the community, and yet preserve his evangelical freedom. The rule is: (1.) The whole gift for the Church; (2.) Nothing but the gift; see 1 Cor. xii. On the idea of the charism, see the Exeg. Notes; also Tholuck, p. 655 ff.; p. 661.—The difference between the ἐλεῶν and him that giveth, applies to an early period in the Church. The support of the poor brethren in the first period was not the alms of charity. On the disposition and character of the increasing offices in the Church, see the Exeg. Notes. For fuller information on the gifts, see my Gesch. des apostol. Zeitalters, p. 555 ff.; and on the offices, p. 535 ff.

4. The defective understanding, which is still apparent in many ways, in reference to the rule that prophecy is according to the measure of faith, arises from the want of perception of the lawfulness of organic development in the department of spiritual as well as of natural life. With the lawfulness of development there is combined the development of lawfulness in all the spheres of life. But in the ecclesiastical department of faith, many will know nothing of the development expressed in prophecy, and, in contrast to them, many will know nothing of the lawfulness expressed by the measure of faith. Hence arise such foolish, noisy decisions of the day as this: The confessions of the Church are no longer obligatory! Every one must know what is obligatory for him, according to his own conscience and calling. But no one has any right to deny the validity of what the Church of God, in its real development of life, regards as its duty. At all events, it follows most from the Apostle's rule, that the mean

* (Meyer guards against this position, by making the gift a general one, not exclusively that of presbyter or ἐπισκοπος. Hodge and Philippi, however, refer the first and third to Christians generally, and the second to the ecclesiastical rulers. The latter defends such a promiscuous arrangement as warranted by the Apostle's purpose. It may be observed, that διδόντες would better express official beneficence, while μεταδίδους, it is claimed by many, refers to private giving of one's own substance.—R.)

† (Tholuck and Alford render: with liberality; but this seems to be but poorly supported. Dr. Hodge retains the common meaning in the case of the deacons, and adds: "Considered in reference to private Christians, this clause may be rendered, he that giveth, with liberality." But this is only an inference. The Apostle says: with simplicity, which is as difficult in the case of private as of official beneficence.—R.)

ing of confessions is thoroughly dependent on the meaning of the Holy Scriptures. But then it may be asked, whether a legal development has been committed to the Church in its essential and substantial life, or whether the custom of declaiming against the boundless culpability of the Church, now in doctrine and now in life, has arisen because the tradition of bishops' caps and doctors' hats is regarded as the most exact history of the Church.

[5 On church polity, as taught in this section. The most remarkable fact is, that so little is said. The doctrines of grace are fully treated; the practical theme is distinctly announced. Then, after an exhortation to humility, comes an exhortation apparently to church officers, yet so indistinct in its distinctions that nothing definite as to the usages of the Roman Church can be based upon it. A warning against the hierarchy of Rome can readily be found in it; but is it not also suggestive of a certain "freedom of adaptation" in the external polity of Christ's Church? To one who has puzzled over this and parallel passages with the honest purpose of finding out what is the form of church government given jure divino, and failed to discover, in any present form, the counterpart of the apostolic Church, it gives a happy relief from perplexity to conclude that church polity was purposely sketched by the apostles only in "silhouette;" that the details are to be of ecclesiastical rather than of Divine enactment; that, while despotism and anarchy are excluded, both by the nature of the case and the hints given in the New Testament, the external form of the Church of the future may be as different from any organization at present existing, as its spirit will transcend that of mere ecclesiasticism. Mayhap, when the Church shall return to the apostolical spirit, it will find in its outward form the true exegesis of these disputed passages. He who reads preface here, reads through colored glasses; and he who finds ruling elders alluded to, must first derive his knowledge of their existence from other sources, and then make his exegesis correspond. If, however, any will not be satisfied until a jure divino form is found, a search into later Epistles will be more profitable; yet that fact of itself admits development in the apostolic age, and who shall say when that development shall cease? HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Vers. 1, 2. Our thank-offering for God's mercy. 1. What sort of a sacrifice should it be? a. Living; b. Holy; c. Well-pleasing to God. 2. With what disposition should it be presented? a. Not so that we should conform to the world, and therefore not with unconverted hearts; but, b. That our minds should be renewed, that we may continually perceive God's will aright.—Our rational service. 1. The sacrifice which is presented, is not the sacrifice of slain beasts, but the living sacrifice of our bodies. 2. The vancuary is not the tabernacle or temple, but the Church of our Lord Jesus Christ. 3. The priests are not Levites, but all believing Christians whose mind is renewed.—The restoration of rational service was a prime advantage conferred by our Reformers.—How rational service, in conformity with its nature, should not be limited to the celebration of Sundays and holy days, but should embrace the whole life.—The exhortation to rational service is still necessary. 1. In opposition to the Catholic Church; 2. In opposition to certain sects.—Paul exhorts to reasonable worship, but not to the worship of reason.—Reasonable service is not subtilizing service. 1. The former is living and inspiring; 2. The latter, dead and cold.

LUTHER: St. Paul here calls all offerings, works, and worship, unreasonable, when performed without faith and the knowledge of God.—The law has a sacrifice of many kinds of irrational beasts, all of which are combined in one sacrifice, in order that we ourselves may become reasonable men.

STARKE: Nothing so urges us to what is good as the sense of God's sweet grace and mercy.—The death of the old man is the life of the new man; where Adam's wrath ceases, Christ's meekness begins; and where Adam's pride goes down, Christ's humility rises.—CRAMER: The Christians of the New Testament are spiritual priests, and bound to sacrifices, but they should sacrifice themselves: laying their obedience (1 Sam. xv. 22), their lips (Hosea xiv. 3), faith (Phil. ii. 17), alms (Phil. iv. 18), mercy (Hosea vi. 6), and all such things, on Jesus Christ, the golden altar, God will accept them.

SPENCER: It is not enough to do good and leave evil undone, but the Christian must present himself a complete sacrifice to God.—If, in short, we would know at what we should aim in Christianity, it is the Divine will, and therefore the Divine word. Whatever this forbids must be evil, though even the whole world should permit and praise it; and whatever it enjoins is good, though it should be displeasing to every one.—BENGEL: They very improperly shrink from this perfect will who are always in search of what they, as they think, are at liberty to do without sin. But their course is just like that of a voyager, who, having lost his reckoning, is constantly in search of the most distant shore (ver. 2).

ROOS: God wills every thing that is good, every thing that is well-pleasing to Him, and every thing that is perfect. That is good which harmonizes with God's commandments; and it is good (καλόν) in so far as it is well-pleasing to Him; and it is perfect if presented to the extent of our capacity (ver. 2).

GERLACH: The Apostle compares the worship of Christians in spirit and in truth (John iv. 24), which he accordingly calls reasonable (comp. 1 Peter ii. 2), with the typical and figurative sacrificial worship of the Old Testament (vers. 1, 2).

HEUBNER: The love and mercy of God should be the incentive and source of the Christian sense. This constitutes the characteristic difference between Christian piety and every other kind: it flows from faith and the experience of Divine love in Christ.—The mutual devotedness of God and pious people.—The holiness of the first commandment.—Christian faith is the foundation of Christian piety (ver. 1).—Mastery over the fashion of the world: love for God, and the wish to have only His grace, conquers.—Proper and improper accommodation to circumstances.—Christian life must be something in motion, otherwise it will stink. Accipiunt vitium, si moventur, aqua.

a daily offering, when he, 1. Crucifies that which impedes the spirit willing for God's service; 2. When he offers all the powers of his body and soul for God's honor and his neighbor's good (ver. 1).—Our service is reasonable ("logical") when it consists in Christian self-sacrifice, because this service is worthy of God, and well-pleasing to Him; just as the pure milk of the gospel (1 Peter ii. 2) is called reasonable (sincere) because it is the proper nourishment for God's children.—PAUL SPERATUS preached at Vienna, from this apostolical text, his powerful Reformation sermon on "The Glory of the reasonable Gospel Worship, and the Punishment of the unreasonable Popish Worship" (ver. 1).—We should flee from conformity to the world (ver. 2).

Vers. 3-8. Humility as the fundamental law of reasonable service in the Church. 1. It should show itself in no one's thinking too highly of himself, but in every one's thinking soberly of himself. 2. It should be manifested by patient consecration of gifts to the service of the Church (vers. 3-8).—True Christian humility: 1. Its nature; 2. Its source (ver. 3).—The figure of the body and the members; comp. 1 Cor. xii. (vers. 4, 5).—Healthy church-life. To this belong two things: 1. Unity in Christ; 2. Diversity of gifts (vers. 4-8).—Proof of the necessary connection of unity and diversity in the Church. 1. Unity without diversity is death; 2. Diversity without unity is disorder (vers. 4-8).—The gift of prophecy. 1. In what does it consist? 2. What purpose should it serve? Comp. 1 Cor. xiv. 3 (ver. 7).—Has any one an office, let him wait on his office. This is said, first of all, of the special care of the poor (διακονία); but then it applies to every office (ver. 7).—What belongs to waiting on our teaching? 1. The appropriation of the material for teaching. 2. Observation of the proper mode of teaching (method). 3. The consecration of our own persons (ver. 7).—We should give with simplicity—that is: 1. From an unselfish heart; 2. With a single eye (Matt. vi. 22); 3. With a pure hand (ver. 8).—Proper care in government. 1. It protects order; 2. It regards freedom (ver. 8).—Christian mercy. 1. Its nature; 2. Its exercise (ver. 8).

LUTHER: However precious be all prophecy which leads to works, and not simply to Christ, as our comfort, it is nevertheless not like faith; since those who practise it seek the revelation of hobgoblins, and masses, pilgrimages, fasts, and the worship of saints (ver. 7).—Let those be taught who do not know it, and those be admonished who know it already (vers. 7, 8).

STARKE: Man—a little world; such a glorious, artistic masterpiece of the Almighty Creator, that it cannot be too much contemplated and wondered at (ver. 4).—If you are appointed to the office of preacher, take your hand from the oxen, from the plough, and from your worldly business! Every one to the work to which God has assigned him! Sirach xxxviii. 25 (ver. 8).—CRAMER: Let no one think that he knows, and can do, every thing alone. If that had been designed, God would only have created one member to the body; Prov. xxii. 2 (ver. 4).—The proper touchstone of all exposition of the Holy Scriptures, is the constant and impregnable harmony of the writings of the prophets and apostles; Acts xxvi. 22 (ver. 7).—HEBINGER: Not out of the nest! How will you fly without feathers, judge without understanding, boast without a reason, be called pious without proof, be skilful without God? God does every thing, and you nothing.

ing. Therefore glorify Him, but not yourself. Be still and humble (ver. 3).—Listen! You are your neighbor's servant. Happy he, who, as the servant of his neighbor, lives in love (ver. 4).—Many rules, little work. What may it be? Great cry, little wool. Perform your office well, and regard yourself as unworthy of praise and reward (ver. 7).—MÜLLER. Teaching instructs and lays the foundation, exhortation builds upon the foundation (ver. 8).

SPENER: God has given one kind of faith to all—that is, as far as the matter itself is concerned. Therefore Peter says: They who have obtained lik (ἰσότητος) precious faith with us (2 Peter i. 7). Therefore we must regard ourselves, mutually, as members of one body (ver. 8).—On ver. 7: Here belong preaching and catechetical instruction (characteristic of SPENER).

ROOS: Every one should act according to the proportion of his faith, and especially deliver Divine truths—that is, prophecy. That which is beyond them is the work of nature, and is worth nothing (ver. 4).—To the words, "he that teacheth," and "he that exhorteth," &c., we must mentally add, "because he has received his gift to do it from the Lord." Now he should exercise himself in this employment (vers. 7-9).

GERLACH: True humility is, to be conscious of what God gives to it; and it is not a self-acquired possession, but a free gift, and therefore is most intimately one with sobriety and clearness of spirit; while false patience, with an apparently deep self-humiliation, gives man a sullen look at his own heart, and in his gloom it increases the dark spirit of selfishness and pride (ver. 8).—The gift of prophecy should not draw the Christian into the sphere of obscure feelings, where he can no longer distinguish the truth revealed by God from the imaginations of his own mind, but should have a guiding star and rule of conduct for common Christian faith (ver. 7).

HEUBNER: God has given us, in the human body, an eloquent picture of human society, and of the inward union of all men. [Comp. the address of Menenius Agrippa to the people in monte sacro, Livy ii. 32] (vers. 4-6).—The sense of ver. 7 is: Let no one manifest or affect more fervency or enthusiasm than he has, according to the measure of his faith, according to the degree of his strength and religious conviction. How common it is for one to wish to appear more than he is, or can be! Even religion is brought out for a show, and perverted to a desire to please (ver. 7).—Nothing beyond the Christian's office is required of him; that is the first thing for him.—Christian fidelity to office as the fruit of faith (ver. 7).

BESSER: It is very important to distinguish the measure of faith, and yet not to separate from the measure of gifts (ver. 3).—To prophecy, means to declare God's mysteries, impelled by the Holy Spirit (ver. 7).—The prophecy of an unbelieving preacher and expositor can, indeed, resemble faith; but we pray the Lord for prophets whose measure of faith holds the rule of faith alive within them, who preach with hearts believing according to the received measure of faith, the faith which the Church confesses (ver. 7).

THE PERICOPES. Vers. 1-6 for the first Sunday after Epiphany. HEUBNER: The sacred obligations of the Christian as a member of a holy community.—Every Christian should be a minister. 1. Proof; 2. Blessing.—Christian piety. 1. Its nature 2. Its effects.—BUDEUS: The real fruits of faith

They are shown : 1. In true service, or proper conduct toward God ; 2. In proper conduct toward the world ; and, 3. In proper conduct toward ourselves. —KAPPY : What is necessary for the offering of a sacrifice well-pleasing to God ? 1. That we should no longer seek salvation in ourselves or in the world ; 2. That we should fully appropriate Christ as the perfect sacrifice ; 3. That we should wholly surrender ourselves to the perfect will of God. —STANDT : How far a true Christian must alienate himself from the world. 1. As a sacrifice on the Lord's altar ; 2. As a work of the Lord's hand ; 3. As a member of the Lord's body. —BURK : The Christian's life a daily priestly service. 1. In the feeling which pervades him ; 2. In the denial which he exercises ; 3. In the service which he renders.

[BISHOP HALL, on ver. 2 : Sermon on the fashions of the world. Outline : I. The world. II. The forbidden fashions. 1. The head. 2. The eyes : (1.) The adulterous eye ; (2.) The covetous eye ; (3.) The proud eye ; (4.) The envious eye. 3. The forehead—the seat of impudence. 4. The ear : (1.) The deaf ear ; (2.) The itching ear. 5. The tongue : (1.) The false tongue ; (2.) The malicious tongue ; (3.) The ribaldrous tongue. 6. The palate, or belly. 7. The back. 8. The neck and shoulders. 9. The heart. 10. The hands and feet. III. The ugliness and disgustiveness of worldly fashions in God's sight.

[FARINDON, on ver. 6 : On the proportion of faith. Plato, when asked what God does in heaven, how He busies and employs himself there, how He passes away eternity, answered : "He works geometrically." So is the "proportion of faith," as St. Paul calls it, also geometrical ; where we must not compare sum with sum, as they do in a market, or value the gift more or less by telling it ; but argue thus : "As what He bestows is in proportion to his estate, so is what I bestow unto mine." And in this sense, the widow's two mites were recorded as a more bountiful and a larger present than if Solomon had thrown the wealth of his kingdom into the treasury. It was the faith, therefore, from which their liberality proceeded, which cheered the Apostle in all his distresses ; not the gift itself.

[LEIGHTON, on ver. 1 : On the sacrifice of the godly. The children of God delight in offering sacrifices to Him ; but if they might not know that they were well taken at their hands, it would discourage them much. How often do the godly find it their experience, that, when they come to pray, He welcomes them, and gives them such evidence of His love as they would not exchange for all worldly pleasures ! And when this doth not appear as at other times, they ought to believe it. He accepts themselves and their ways when offered in sincerity, though never so mean ; though they sometimes have no more than a sigh or a groan, it is most properly a spiritual sacrifice.

[JEREMY TAYLOR : Religion teaches us to present to God our bodies as well as our souls ; for God is the Lord of both ; and if the body serves the soul in actions natural, and civil, and intellectual, it must not be eased in the only offices of religion, unless the body shall expect no portion of the rewards of religion, such as are resurrection, reunion, and glorification.

[CHARNOCK, on ver. 1 : God, who requires of us a reasonable service, would work upon us by a reasonable operation. God therefore works by way of a spiritual illumination of the understanding, in propounding the creature's happiness by arguments and reasons, and in a way of a spiritual impression upon the will, moving it sweetly to the embracing that happiness, and the means to it, which He proposes : and, indeed, without this work preceding, the motion of the will could never be regular.

[J. HOWE, on ver. 1 : Sermon on self-dedication. I. Explanation of the terms in the text. II. How the act enjoined must be performed. 1. With knowledge and understanding ; 2. With serious consideration ; 3. With a determined judgment that it ought to be done ; 4. With liberty of spirit ; 5. With full bent of heart and will ; 6. With concomitant acceptance of God ; 7. With explicit reference to Christ ; 8. With deep humility and self-abasement ; 9. With joy and gladness of heart ; 10. With candor and simplicity ; 11. With full surrender to God ; 12. With solemnity. III. Inducements to self-dedication.

[BISHOP HOPKINS, on ver. 2 : On God's will. This is all contained in the Holy Scriptures, which are a perfect system of precepts given us for the government of our lives here, and for the attaining of eternal life hereafter ; and therefore it is likewise called His revealed will ; whereas the other, namely, the will of purpose, is God's secret will, until it be manifested unto us by the events and effects of it.—To be governed by our own or other men's wills, is usually to be led by passion, and blind, headlong affections ; but to give up ourselves wholly to the will of God, is to be governed by the highest reason in the world ; for His will cannot but be good, since it is the measure and rule of goodness itself ; for things are said to be good because God wills them. And whatsoever He requires of us is pure and equitable, and most agreeable to the dictates of right and illuminated reason ; so that we act most like men when we act most like Christians, and show ourselves most rational when we show ourselves most religious.—J. F. H.]

SECOND SECTION.—The proper conduct of Christians in all their personal relations: to the brethren in their own life; to the needy; to guests; to every body, even toward enemies.

CHAP. XII. 9-21.

9 Let love be without dissimulation [your love be unfeigned]. Abhor¹ that 10 which is evil; cleave to that which is good. Be kindly affectioned one to

If thine enemy hunger, feed him;
If he thirst, give him drink:
For in [by] so doing
Thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head.

TEXTUAL.

² Ver. 10.—[The E. V. has inverted the Greek order in these brief clauses. The datives stand first, and their equivalents should occupy the same position in English. So Five Ang. Clergymen, Amer. Bible Union, &c.]

³ Ver. 11.—[The Rec., with K. A. B. D² L., most fathers, reads: καρπίζετε; adopted by Beza, Lachmann, Scholz, Tischendorf, De Wette, Philippi, Alford, Tregelles. Dr. Lange, however, follows Griesbach, Mill, Fritzsche, and Meyer, who adopt καρπίζετε, on the authority of D¹ F. G., Latin fathers (so Luther). Yet Meyer himself acknowledges that the other reading is better supported; he rejects it on account of the critical difficulty of accounting for the variation, were καρπίζετε genuine, especially as the phrase: serve the Lord, is so common with Paul. Dr. Lange says: "Such a general summons to serve the Lord, looks like an interruption in the midst of general directions. The reading, as Meyer observes, is readily explained by the fact that a prejudiced moral feeling would easily stumble at the principle: καρπίζετε δουλεύετε." It would seem that Dr. Lange is governed rather by a desire to preserve certain exegetical correspondences, than by the results of critical investigation. See Alford in favor of the received reading. He contends that, besides the weight of external authorities, the internal probabilities sustain it. "The present subject is, the character of our seal for God." "The command, καρπίζετε δουλεύετε, would surely come in very inopportune in the midst of exhortations to the seal service of God." Dr. Wette, indeed, doubts the propriety of the expression, remarking that Christians may employ καρπίζετε, but not serve it. On the whole, I feel constrained to differ from Dr. Lange, and to retain the reading of the Rec. See further in the Exeg. Notes.]

⁸ Ver. 20.—[An exact quotation from the LXX., Prov. xxv. 21, 22. There is, however, a variation in the opening words. The Rec., with D² L., some versions and fathers, reads: ἐάν οὖν (éán alone is from the LXX.); adopted by De Wette, Philippi, Wordsworth, and Lange (Hodge and Stuart accept it without remark). D¹ F., and other authorities, have ἐάν alone; so Tischendorf. K. A. B.: ἀλλὰ ἐάν (Lachmann, Meyer, Alford). Other variations occur in the fathers. It is difficult to decide. Probably οὖν was the original reading, then rejected because the inference was not understood, or to conform to the LXX.; then ἀλλὰ substituted, as a connecting particle was deemed necessary. Certainly ἐάν οὖν is lectio difficilior. Even Alford seems inclined to adopt it.—R]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Σύμνησις.—The remark, that the expression ἡ ἀγάπη ἀνυπόκριτος serves as an inscription to all the following participles, has induced us, after the example of Meyer, and others, to begin the new section with ver. 9.* It may be doubted whether the Apostle has mentally supplied ἔστω or ἐστί. The latter view is favored by the idea of Christian love, not merely "toward others," but in a universal relation; see ver. 11. The first construction is favored by the hortatory form appearing more strongly toward the end. Our earlier division was based on the fact that vers. 9 and 10 treat of conduct toward companions in faith within the Church. The Apostle, however, makes use of a long series of participles, as if he would urge not so much a Christian course of conduct, as to set up a typical rule of conduct for believers, according to unfeigned love.

[De Wette, Olshausen, and others, supply ἔστω, thus making these verses descriptive, not hortatory. They urge that the use of the participle for the imperative is very rare. That is true; but in ver. 14 we have the imperative, followed by an infinitive in ver. 15, and then by participles, vers. 18-19; all of these latter clauses being of a hortatory character. With most commentators (so E. V.), we prefer to supply ἔστω with the first clause of ver. 9, and ἐστί with the following participles, since ver. 8 is of a hortatory character. Meyer, Philippi, Tischendorf, Lachmann, larger edition, declare for this; the editors by their punctuation, which is the same in the main as that of the E. V. Lachmann also favors (smaller edition) joining the participles with the imperative in ver. 14, and thus obtaining the hortatory force; this, however, is not only singular, but contrary to the thought, which will not permit these participles to modify the imperative, bless. Fritzsche takes the participles as corresponding to the personal subjects of "love unfeigned," as 2 Cor. i. 7; but this is unnecessary.—R.]

Ver. 9. Let your love be unfeigned] ἡ ἀγάπη ἀνυπόκριτος. We are justified in strengthening ἡ ἀγάπη into your love, in English. But the Apostle means love absolutely, not merely love to the brethren (which is spoken of afterwards), nor love to God. The adjective need not be paraphrased, as in E. V.—R.] See 2 Cor. vi. 6; 1 Peter i. 22. Meyer well says: "As love, so also must faith, its root, be;" 1 Tim. i. 5; 2 Tim. i. 8. Undissembled love is therefore the inscription for the whole series of prescriptions which the Apostle lays down in parallelisms of two and of three members.

Abhor that which is evil. ἀποστρεφόμενοι. Strictly, repelling with repugnance. This first grand antithesis says, that believers should turn away with utter abhorrence from that which is evil, in order to cleave to the good with inseparable attachment, as with bridal affection. This antithesis constitutes the practice of heaven and heavenly life, and its realization is the life of our Lord. Its breaking off and turning away, as well as its connecting and uniting, constitute the fundamental moral law of God's kingdom. The second antithesis unites with this.

* [In the first edition, vers. 9 and 10 were added to the previous section. The present division has the support of the best modern commentators, and must be deemed a happy alteration.—R.]

Ver. 10. In brotherly love. φιλαδέλφεια [The dative is that of reference: as respects brotherly love.—R.] Specific brotherly love for fellow Christians; 1 Thess. iv. 9; Heb. xiii. 1; 1 Peter i. 22; 2 Peter i. 7.—[Be affectionate one to another, εἰς ἀλλήλους] φιλόστοργοι. Be lovers as toward these related in blood.

In honour. Τιμῇ, esteem. The antithesis here is the equalization in confiding brotherly love, and the subordination of our own personality to our esteem for others.

Preferring one another. Προηγούμενοι. The explanations: excelling (Chrysostom, and others), obliging (Theophylact, Luther, and others), and esteeming higher (Theodoret, Grotius; see Tholuck), are intimately connected therewith. [Stuart: "In giving honor, anticipating one another." Meyer: "Going before as guides; i. e., with conduct inciting others to follow." These explanations, however, do not seem to suit τιμῇ; hence Alford, and most, prefer the meaning given in the Vulgate: in vicem praevenientes. Hodge: "Instead of waiting for others to honor us, we should be beforehand with them in the manifestation of respect."—R.]

Ver. 11. In diligence, not slothful, &c. [τῇ σπουδῇ μὴ ὀκνηροί, κ.τ.λ.] This clause, which has three members, defines proper activity in reference to temporal affairs, just as the following clause, which also has three members, defines proper passivity in these affairs. Both verses define the personal conduct of the Christian in relation to himself, according to his situation in time.* The principal rule of the first clause is: not to shrink half-heartedly from the whole work of time, but to work with persevering enthusiasm. To this belongs the polar conduct of remaining warm in spirit (seething and boiling like a hot spring), and overcoming the time (see Acts xviii. 25), while in one's daily task adapting one's self to the moment, to the will of the κρίσις in the καιρός, so that He is served by observing its full meaning. Δουλ. τῷ καιρῷ, tempori servire (Cicero), and similar expressions; see Meyer, p. 463. The expression was usual in the bad sense (of unprincipled accommodation), as in the good (to accommodate one's self to the time). But here it reads: controlling the time by serving the Lord; Eph. v. 16; see Tholuck, pp. 669 ff., who gives the preference to the reading κρίσις.

[Serving the Lord, τῷ κυρίῳ δουλεύοντες. On the readings, see Textual Notes. The adoption of the reading καιρῷ, which is not so well sustained as that of the Rec., has influenced the exegesis of Dr. Lange throughout the verse. Philippi urges against καιρῷ its equivocal meaning, and the fact that Paul always represents the Christian as free, a servant only to God, or Christ, or righteousness—never of the time. In fact, the injunction seems scarcely to differ from one of worldly wisdom, if that reading be accepted. Eph. v. 16; Col. iv. 5, will not justify the expression. Fritzsche in love admits an interchange of κρίσις and καιρός in other places.—Dr. Hodge explains: "Influenced in our activity and zeal by a desire to serve Christ. This member of the sentence, thus understood, describes the motive from which zeal and diligence should proceed." The common interpretation, derived from the E. V., is: not slothful in temporal affairs, yet of an earnest religious spirit, because all is done in the service of the Lord. If the first clause be extended so as to include "whatever our hand finds to do," this is sufficiently correct. The second member derives its appropriateness from the fact—never more noticeable than in these bustling days, when even religious duty partakes somewhat of the spirit of the age—that zeal and diligence may become a habit and passion, a mere activity, lacking the genuine fervor of the spirit. The last term does not, indeed, refer to the Holy Spirit, but, in an exhortation to Christians, may well be taken as meaning the human spirit under the influence of the Holy Spirit.—[R.] This is followed by a trichotomy as the proper passivity in temporal relations.

Ver. 12. In hope, rejoicing [τῇ ἐλπίδι χαίροντες. Stuart thinks the datives in this verse also are datives of reference: as respects hope, rejoicing, &c. But the regularity has been broken in upon by the τῷ κυρίῳ of the preceding verse; we are therefore warranted in adopting a different view here, especially as the datives in this verse seem not to be parallel to each other. The verb χαίρειν may indeed govern the dative, but the hope is rather the ground than the object of rejoicing (so Meyer, Alford). De Wette, Philippi: vermöge der Hoffnung; Hodge: on account of hope. The hope is objective, and to be taken more generally than Dr. Lange suggests. His view results from reading κυρίῳ above.—[R.] The antithesis shows that here the ἐλπίς, as formerly the σπουδή, must be regarded as prevalently objective. In the time bestowing hope. It is in harmony with the childlike character of faith to rejoice gratefully over every good token; but it is also in harmony with manliness to be patient in tribulation.

In tribulation, patient; in prayer, persevering [τῇ θλίψει ὑπομένοντες τῇ προσευχῇ προσκαρτεροῦντες. Alford: τῇ θλίψει, the state in which the ὑπομονή is found. Philippi, De Wette, Meyer, &c., think ἐν was omitted on account of the parallelism of construction, though the verb governs the dative (more usually the accusative, however). On the second clause, comp. Col. iv. 2; Acts i. 14.—[R.] The harmonization of the great contrasts of life lies in the persevering life of prayer. Similar harmonizations, see James i. 9, 10: chap. v. 13. Bengel: Gaudium non modo est affectus, sed etiam officium christianorum. Tholuck and Meyer would regard the hope here quite universally, as the foundation of Christian joy. This is not favored by the antithesis τῇ θλίψει. Meyer here reads the dative: standing out against tribulation. But Paul will not consider tribulation as an adversary. We also prefer being patient to being steadfast, as continued steadfastness is placed here finally in the life of prayer.*

* (The idea of ὑπομένειν is patient continuance, or steadfastness, although, at times, the idea of patience may be the prominent one. It may be doubted whether the other thought is not equally prominent here. So Philippi; in der Drangsal beständig.—Accepting the wider reference of the verse, Dr. Hodge says: "This hope of salvation is the most effectual means of producing patience under present afflictions." "Intercourse with God, however, is necessary to the exercise of this, and all other virtues, and therefore the Apostle immediately adds: continuing instant in prayer." He finds in this expression two attributes of

Ver. 13. Communicating to the necessities of saints [ταῖς χρείαις τῶν ἁγίων κοινωοῦντες. See Textual Note.—R.] The belief naturally comes from his own necessity to the necessity of his brethren. Ταῖς χρείαις. The meaning of the verb κοινω: distributing to, is opposed by Meyer and Tholuck. It is sufficient here that holding fellowship with is the fuller and stronger expression, yet not fellowship "in the necessities" of fellow-Christians, but with them; or, in other words: to participate in their necessities (Chrysostom, Theodoret).—Given to hospitality [τὴν φιλοξενίαν διώκοντες, literally, pursuing hospitality].—[R.] In ancient times, hospitality was also a highly important work of love, for the relief of necessity; Heb. xiii. 2; 1 Peter iv. 9.

Ver. 14. Bless those who persecute you, &c. [ἐὐλογεῖτε τοὺς διώκοντας ὑμᾶς, κ.τ.λ.] Here the hortatory form becomes distinct; see Matt. v. 44. Probably the expression of Jesus has reached Paul by the tradition of the Church. Tholuck: "It is just from the Sermon on the Mount that we find the most reminiscences; 1 Cor. vii. 10; James iv. 9; v. 12; 1 Peter iii. 9; iv. 14." Tholuck, very strangely, supposes here a so-called lexical connection—i. e., that ver. 14 is accidentally called forth by the word διώκοντες.† But it is incorrect to suppose that the exhortation of ver. 14 interrupts such exhortations as vera. 13 and 15, which relate to the mutual conduct of Christians; ver. 15 has been too generally regarded as favoring this view.

Ver. 15. Rejoice with those who rejoice, &c. [χαίρειν μετὰ χαίρόντων, κ.τ.λ. On the infinitive as imperative, see Winer, p. 296. Meyer fills out the sentence thus: χαίρειν ὑμᾶς δι. —[R.] Χαίρειν, the infinitive as an imperative, to be supplemented mentally by a corresponding verb; see Sirach vii. 33, 34. Ver. 14 defines the proper conduct in relation to personal antipathy; ver. 15, the proper conduct in relation to personal sympathy.

Ver. 16. Be of the same mind one toward another [τὸ αὐτὸ εἰς ἀλλήλους φρονοῦντες]. The participles in ver. 16 have been variously construed; now with the preceding imperative χαίρειν, κλαιν, ver. 16, and now with the following μὴ γίνεσθε; see Philippi. Because of the great difficulties of such connections, commentators prefer to supply ἐστε (Philippi, Meyer).‡

acceptable prayer—perseverance and favor—both implying faith in God.—[R.]

* [Meyer paraphrases: "having fellowship in the necessities of the saints; i. e., conducting yourselves as though the necessities of your fellow-Christians were your own, and thus seeking to meet them." Stuart: "In respect to the wants of the saints, be sympathetic;" but the dative is hardly a dative of reference. The intransitive meaning of the verb must be insisted upon (Tholuck, Meyer, and most). Even in Gal. vi. 6, the transitive meaning must be given up. (Comp. Lange's Comm. in loco, p. 150.)—[R.]

† [Wordsworth finds a happy play upon the words, διώκοντες (ver. 13), διώκοντας (ver. 14). "It would seem as if the Apostle's mind, strained by the pressure of the argument with which it had been laboring, now gracefully and playfully relaxed itself in Christian cheerfulness. In his conciliatory courtesy, he would show his readers what he had said severely concerning them in the former parts of his Epistle, had been spoken in love. So he now says, in a tone of lively affection: Even we Christians, whom the world persecutes, ought to be persecutors; we ought to follow with our blessings and our prayers those who pursue us with rancor and disdain."—On the spirit of this injunction, see Hodge in loco, especially the extract from Calvin which he gives.—[R.]

‡ [We retain the imperative form of the E. V. It might

The attempt at the proper construction would be best favored by returning to ver. 15, and reading this injunction as a fundamental thought, controlling what follows, clothed in figurative expression and made explicit by the beginning of ver. 16. On this wise:

First trichotomy: Rejoice with them that do rejoice, and weep with them that weep: being of the same mind one toward another.

Second trichotomy: Mind not high things, but condescend to the lowly. Addition: Be not wise in your own conceits (in seclusion).

Third trichotomy: Recompense to no man evil for evil; provide things honest in the sight of all men; if it be possible, as much as lieth in you, live peaceably with all men.

Fourth trichotomy: Dearly beloved, avenge not yourselves, but rather give place unto wrath; for it is written, &c. All this follows from the conduct of Christians toward each other. But then the whole glory of this reciprocal feeling is elaborated in the Christian love of enemies, which conquers evil by good; vers. 20, 21.

The same. Τὸ αὐτό; see chap. xv. 5; Phil. ii. 2; iv. 2; 2 Cor. xiii. 7. They should adhere to the same, what is equal, what is common, in their intercourse with each other, or in the intercourse of one toward others; reminder of the Golden Rule. According to Phil. ii. 4, τὸ αὐτὸ φρονεῖν proceeds from the τὸ ἓν φρονεῖν. Adherence to one results in adhering to the same; then, this results in unity, which, however, is only a special fruit of that general conduct. Likewise Tholuck. [Dr. Hodge thinks concord of feeling is the prominent thought.] Chrysostom's view is different: not to regard one's self better than others, and similarly.

Mind not high things [μὴ τὰ ὑψηλὰ φρονοῦντες]. Not merely "high-aspiring selfishness," but also self-complacent fancies; for example, Novatian, puritanic, aristocratic, or humanistic fancies injure, or even tear asunder, the bond of communion, of Christian fellowship with the Church, and of humane fellowship with the world.

But condescend to men of low estate. Τοῖς ταπεινοῖς. Construed as masculine by Chrysostom, Erasmus, Luther [Alford, Wordsworth], and others. (Various definitions: Christians should count themselves among the lowly; should suffer with the oppressed; should remain in fellowship with the lowly, with publicans and sinners.) But Fritzsche, Reiche, De Wette [Stuart], and many others, have declared in favor of the neuter. Meyer: Subjecting yourselves to the lower situations and occupations of life. The antithesis τὰ ὑψηλὰ is urged. But the antithesis is modified by the change of the verb into συναπαγόμενοι. The latter verb denotes, to be carried off, to be taken along with, or, to allow one's self to be carried off, to be misled, to be taken along with (see Tholuck, p. 678). This may apply as a duty toward the brethren in low estate, who, in opposition to high things, represent the real essence of humanity in the form of a servant; but it cannot apply to trivial and low things. We should take small things into consideration in the light of duties, but not to permit ourselves to be carried off by them. But of small men, who are great in God's eyes, it is said with propriety: that we should devote ourselves to them perhaps be changed to the participial, as is done in the revision by Five Ang. Clergymen; but this would render a change in punctuation necessary.—R.]

through suffering to glory. Imprisoned and hung with the lowly, but not with the bad!

The neuter construction is thus explained by Calvin, and others: humilibus rebus obscundentes (about: to be true in small things): while (Grotius, and others, thus explain the masculine construction: modestissimorum exempla sectantes.

[On the whole, the masculine is preferable; for in no other case in the New Testament is the adjective ταπεινός used of things. Nor does the Apostle's antithesis require the neuter meaning. Alford: "In τὰ ὑψηλὰ φρονοῦντες, the ὑψηλὰ are necessarily subjective—the lofty thoughts of the man. But in τοῖς ταπεινοῖς συναπ. the adjective is necessarily objective—some outward objects, with which the persons exhorted are συναπαγόμεθα. And those outward objects are defined, if I mistake not, by the εἰς ἁλλήλους." Dr. Hodge, and many others, do not decide between the two views.—R.]

Be not wise, &c. Μὴ γίνεσθε, κ.τ.λ. See chap. xi. 25. But there the conceit of one's own wisdom constitutes an antithesis to God's revelation, while here it constitutes an antithesis to the fellowship of men (not merely of Christians in a good sense).

Ver. 17. Recompense to no man evil for evil [μηδενὶ κακὸν ἀπὸ κακοῦ ἀποδοῦντες]. Alford: "The Apostle now proceeds to exhort respecting conduct to those without." There is, however, no warrant for this limitation in the language, and certainly the temptation to render evil for evil to Christians is frequent enough.—R.] Meyer: "The principle itself, and how it stood opposed to heathendom and pharisaism!"

[Have a care for things honourable, προσοοῦμενοι καλὰ. Lange: Seid auf das Edle bedacht. Have careful regard to what is noble, &c. Dr. Hodge finds here a motive for the injunction which precedes, and objects to the period after "evil" in the E. V., as well as to the translation "honest," which undoubtedly conveys to the ordinary reader the thought that we are bidden to provide for ourselves and families in an honest way. The clause much resembles Prov. iii. 4 (LXX.) hence the variations.—R.]

In the sight of all men [ἐνώπιον πάντων ἀνθρώπων]. See Textual Note 6. Meyer: Before the eyes of all men. We regard the term as an expression of the relation to the most diverse men. However, the other construction also makes good sense; for Christians could often expose individuals to danger, by giving them cause for offence; Prov. iii. 4; 2 Cor. viii. 21.

Ver. 18. If it be possible, &c. Εἰ δυνατόν is referred by Erasmus, Bengel, and others, to what precedes [but this is objectionable]. The clause: as much as dependeth on you, explains the εἰ δυνατόν. It may be outwardly impossible to us to live at peace with every body; but inwardly we should be peaceably disposed, prepared for peace, toward every body. [The εἰ δυνατόν is objective (Tholuck, De Wette, Meyer, Alford), not, "if you can," but, if it be possible, if others will allow it. "All your part is to be peace: whether you actually live peaceably or not, will depend, then, solely on how others behave toward you" (Alford). That this is often impossible, the Apostle's life plainly shows.—R.]

Ver. 19. Avenge not yourselves, dearly beloved. The additional ἀγαπητοί, loving pressure. [The address becomes more affectionate as the duty becomes more difficult (so Tholuck).—R.]

Give place unto the wrath [δοτε τόπον τῇ ὀργῇ]. Make way for Divine wrath; do not anticipate it; do not get in its way; let it rule. This is the explanation of most commentators, from Chrysostom and Augustine down to Tholuck, De Wette, Meyer, and Philippi. [So Hodge.]—Second explanation: Let not your own wrath break forth (Du Dieu, Semler [Stuart], and others). Meyer, on the contrary: The Latin usage of non ira spatium dare harmonizes very well with this, but the Greek usage of τόπον δίδωαι does not. [Jowett says this explanation "is equally indefensible on grounds of language and sense. It is only as a translation of a Latinism we can suppose the phrase to have any meaning at all; and the meaning thus obtained, 'defer your wrath,' is out of place." See his remarks in defence of the next explanation.—R.]—Third explanation: To give place to the wrath of your enemy (Schöttgen, Morus, and others). Meyer: This would be only a prudential measure.* The first explanation is raised above all doubt by the addition: Vengeance is mine.†

For it is written, Deut. xxiii. 35.—Addition: λέγει κύριος; see Heb. x. 30.

Ver. 20. Therefore if thine enemy, &c. [εἰν οὖν πεινῶ, κ.τ.λ. See Textual Note *]. The οὖν, which is omitted by most Codd., probably on account of difficulty, follows from the antithesis. One cannot conform to the negative: not to hate an enemy, without obeying the affirmative. [Hodge: "The expressions are obviously not to be confined to their literal meaning, nor even to the discharge of the common offices of humanity; they are figurative expressions for all the duties of benevolence. It is not enough, therefore, that we preserve an enemy from perishing; we must treat him with all affection and kindness."—R.] The words are from the LXX. of Prov. xxv. 21.

Thou shalt heap coals of fire, &c. [ἄνθρακας πυρὸς σωρεύσεις, κ.τ.λ.] The burning of fiery coals is an Oriental figure of constantly burning pain. Explanations:

1. Thou wilt draw down upon him severe Divine

* [Dr. Lange quotes Meyer's objection to one single phase of this explanation, and that not the one most prominently urged. Ewald, Jowett, Wordsworth, understand by this view, which they defend, not getting out of the way of the wrath of another, but, allowing it to spend itself upon you, "let your enemy have his way." So far from deeming this a prudential step, Jowett defends it from the objection, that "common prudence requires that we should defend ourselves against our enemies," by urging that the gospel does not always give "counsels of prudence, but of perfection." Meyer, however, opposes the real explanation of these authors, by saying that such a meaning has too little positive moral character; and further, that the prohibition of revenge by no means implies that the personal object is an angry one. These objections are valid ones.—R.]

† [The first explanation is the most natural one; but Alford suggests another, viz.: "Anger, generally; proceed not to execute it hastily, but leave it for its legitimate time, when He whose it is to avenge will execute it: make not the wrath your own, but leave it for God." Wordsworth, in defence of the third explanation, objects to the first: "It could hardly be presented as a Christian duty—to make room for the Divine wrath to work against an enemy." He furthermore defends the ambiguous rendering of the E. V., as excellent from its ambiguity, from not saying too much, and thus inviting study, using this opportunity for opposing a revision. "I ever held it a kind of honest spiritual thrift, when there are two senses given of one place, both agreeable to the analogy of faith and manners, to make use of both" (Bishop Sanderson). Dr. Wordsworth approves this rule for expositors. His own practice of this "spiritual thrift" may lead to spiritual wealth, but certainly seems to tend to exceptional poverty.—R.] wrath (with reference to 4 Ezra xvi. 54: Chrysostom, Theodoret, &c., Zwingli, Beza, &c., Stolz, Hengstenberg, &c.).

2. Thou wilt prepare him for the pain of penitence (Augustine, Jerome [Tholuck, De Wette, Meyer], Luther, and many others). Origen has opposed the former view, which was continually under 'the necessity of being established in the Church, because of the propensity to wrath. On Hengstenberg's explanation of Prov. xxiv. 18, see Tholuck, p. 675 ff. Ver. 21, as well as the spirit of the passage, pronounces in favor of explanation (2.). No one could gladly requite evil with good, if he knew of a certainty that he would thereby be exposed to Divine wrath. Finally, this explanation is favored by the whole spirit of Christianity. Yet it must be observed, that penitence cannot be designated as an infallible effect of the love of enemies, and of its expressions. The most immediate effect of such expressions is burning shame, a religious and moral crisis. He will bend his head as if fiery coals lay on it. The rule, as well as the purpose, of this crisis, is penitence and conversion; but there are frequent instances of false adversaries, like Judas, becoming hardened by kindness.

[3. Slightly different from (2.) is that adopted by Hodge: "You will take the most effectual means of subduing him." Kindness is as effectual as coals of fire. So Alford: "You will be taking the most effectual vengeance." Similarly Jowett. This view, which excludes even the pain of penitence, is favored by the connection with ver. 21.—R.] For other unimportant explanations, see the Note in Meyer, p. 468.* On the figure of fiery coals, see Tholuck, p. 675.

Ver. 21. [Be not overcome, &c. μὴ νικῶ, κ.τ.λ. "A comprehensive summary of vera. 19, 20. Be not overcome (led to revenge) by evil (which is done to you), but overcome by the good (which you show to your enemy) evil (by causing your enemy, ashamed by your noble spirit, to cease doing evil to you, and to become your friend);" Meyer. Seneca, De Benef., 7, 31: Vincit malos pertinax bonitas.—R.] The purpose of all these manifestations of love is that of Christ on the cross: to overcome evil with good.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The proper conduct in personal intercourse, particularly with the brethren, is love without disimulation; as the proper conduct toward the Church, previously described, is love without self-boasting. The conduct toward civil authorities (which follows in chap. xiii.) is love without fear; and, finally, the proper conduct toward the world is love without despising the rights of the world, and without mingling with the immorality of the world.

2. The root of brotherly love is reverence for the appearing image of Christ; and its development and consummation are types of the most inward consanguinity.

3. The proper conduct toward different individuals begins with proper conduct toward ourselves; portrayed in ver. 11. To this there belongs, first of all, fresh spiritual life; zealous and enthusiastic work, embracing eternity as the blessing of the

* [Among these, the reference to the softening by burning coals (Glückler), the inflaming to love (Calovius), the red blush of shame live-glowing coals (Sanctius).—R.]

Spirit; calm ardor in communion with God, and in the consciousness of its being sent by God; but regarding the moment of time as the moment of eternity in time. In this place belongs Solomon's Ecclesiastes, this much-mistaken pearl of the Old Testament—a writing whose fundamental thought is, that every thing is regarded vain in consequence of desisting eternity in time.

4. The Apostle's pen gives a festive expression even to Christian ethics; as is proved by the beautiful parallelisms, mostly in the form of trilogies, in this chapter, together with 1 Cor. xiii. [Comp. Erasmus on this chapter: "Comparibus membris et incisio, similiter cadentibus ac desinentibus sic totus sermo modulatus est, ut nulla cautio possit esse jucundior."—R.] Christian life should also be a worship. But the worship is festive, free from common weariness.

5. All Christianity is a conquest of evil by good, which Christ has established, and already decided in principle, on His cross. All the single rules of conduct toward individuals concentrate in this last and highest one.

STARKE: True Christianity does not make lazy people and sluggards, but industrious ones; for the more pious the Christian is, the more industrious laborer he is (ver. 11).—Dear Christian, you present a gift to strange beggars, though you do not know whether they are holy or not—indeed, the most are

Where things go very sleepily, we may well apprehend that, because there is no fire, there is no zeal, and that there is also no work of the Spirit, but only of nature. Yet there should be a fervency and zeal of the spirit. For the flesh has also its blind zeal, which is the more dangerous the greater it is (ver. 11).—Accommodate yourselves to the time. But this must not be in such a way as to join in with the world, as every period brings with it that which the Apostle (ver. 2) has already forbidden—conformity to this world. But Christians should not lose the opportunity of doing good which God constantly presents to them; and they should always give due care to all circumstances—to what is best now to be done according to the Divine rule. Moreover, they should always give due attention to the condition in which they are situated, so that they may act just as God now requires of them (ver. 11).—In prosperity and adversity, prayer is the best means for our support (ver. 12).

Good Christian deportment is always likewise fidelity to calling; 2. The discharge of one's calling is true when it is done with simplicity, with care, and with pleasure; 3. This fidelity to calling arises alone from true love; 4. But true love arises alone from the humility of Christian faith.—JASPIS: True Christians are also the most faithful laborers. 1. They regard their lifetime as a very gracious gift; 2. They act continually from holy motives; 3. They feel inwardly united with their fellow-men; 4. They have too serious a reverence for their Eternal Judge to discharge their calling unconscientiously.—KREHL: Strengthening of patience in tribulation by: 1. Wise hope; 2. Pious reflection; 3. KAPFF: What belongs to true culture: 1. Modesty and humility; 2. Universal philanthropy; 3. Truth and purity of heart.—BRANDT: Christianity is the way to a peaceful and blessed life; for it: 1. Opposes our own conceits; 2. Forbids all revenge; 3. Recommends honesty; 4. Loves peacefulness; 5. Enjoins magnanimity; 6. And always desires the conquest of all evil.

[HOPKINS: On revenge (ver. 15). Revenge is a wild, untamed passion, that knows no bounds nor measures. And if we were permitted to carve it out for ourselves, we should certainly exceed all limits and moderation; for self-love, which is an immoderate affection, would be made the whole rule of our vengeance: and because we love ourselves abundantly too well, we should revenge every imaginary wrong done us with too much bitterness and severity: and, therefore, God would not trust the righting of ourselves in our own hands, knowing we would be too partial to our own interests and concerns, but hath assumed it to himself as the prerogative of His crown.—On ver. 20: On kindness toward enemies. This is all the revenge which the gospel permits; this is that excellent doctrine which our Saviour came to preach, which He hath given us commission to declare and publish to the world, to guide our feet into the way of peace; that we might all be united, as by faith and obedience unto God, so in love and charity one to another.

The extent of it—to all men. III. The difficulty of practising it. IV. The best helps to the practice of this duty: (1.) To regulate our passions; (2.) To moderate our desires, and shorten our designs, with regard to the good things of life; (3.) To have a watchful eye upon ourselves in our first entrance upon any contest; (4.) Always to guard against the intemperance of our tongue, especially in relation to that natural proneness it has toward publishing the faults of others; (5.) To keep ourselves from embarking in parties and factions; (6.) To study to be quiet, by doing our own business in our proper profession or calling; (7.) Add prayer to the Author of peace and Lover of concord, for the fruits of His Spirit.

[BUCKITT: What it is to be overcome of evil. 1. When we dwell in our thoughts too much, too often, and too long, upon the injuries and unkindness we have met with; this is as if a man that war to take down a bitter pill, should be continually champing of it, and rolling it under his tongue. 2. We are overcome of evil when we are brought over to commit the same evil, by studying to make spiteful returns, in a way of revenge, for the injuries we have received.—Wherein consists the duty and excellency of overcoming evil with good? 1. It renders us like God, who does good to us daily though we do evil against Him continually; 2. We imitate God in one of the choicest perfections of His divine nature; 3. We overcome ourselves; 4. We overcome our enemies, and make them become our friends.

[HENRY: Bless them who persecute you: 1. Speak well of them. If there be any thing in them commendable and praiseworthy, take notice of it, and mention it to their honor; 2. Speak respectfully to them, according as their place is; 3. Wish well to them, and desire their good, so far from seeking any revenge; 4. Offer up that desire to God, by prayer for them.

[CLARKE, on ver. 16: There have not been wanting, in all ages of the Church, persons who, losing the savor of divine things from their own souls by drinking into a worldly spirit, have endeavored to shun the reproach of the cross, by renouncing the company of the godly, speaking evil of the way of life, and, perhaps, sitting down in the chair of the scorner with apostates like themselves. And yet, strange to tell, these men will keep up a form of godliness! for a decent outside is often necessary to enable them to secure the ends of their ambition.]

[HODGE, on vers. 20, 21: Nothing is so powerful as goodness; it is the most efficacious means to subdue enemies and put down opposition. Men whose minds can withstand argument, and whose hearts rebel against threats, are not proof against the persuasive influence of unfeigned love; there is, therefore, no more important collateral reason for being good, than that it increases our power to do good.]

[BARNES, on ver. 11: The tendency of the Christian religion is to promote industry. 1. It teaches the value of time; 2. Presents numerous and important things to be done; 3. It inclines men to be conscientious in the improvement of each moment; 4. And it takes away the mind from those pleasures and pursuits which generate and promote indolence.—J. F. H.]

¹ Ver. 1.—[The word ἡγεμονία, rendered power in the E. V., has, as its German equivalent: Obrigkeit. Dr. Lange expands ἡγεμονίας ἐξουσιῶν into den Obrigkeiten, den den überragenden Mächten. The rendering above is partly from Noyes, partly from the revision of Five Ang. Clergymen. Both of these versions substitute throughout, authority for power (E. V., Amer. Bible Union). The change is a happy one, since authority has both an abstract and a personal force, corresponding to that of ἡγεμονία. Civil authority is, of course, intended.]

⁶ Ver. 6.—[The E. V. has here, God's ministers, and in ver. 4, the minister of God. The expressions are altered in both verses in the version of Five Ang. Clergymen, which I have followed, for this reason, that, in ver. 4, the idea of serving on behalf of God is implied in δούλος; while here, that of serving or ministering to God, on behalf of the people (Ἀποστολῶν θεοῦ) seems to be included also. It were perhaps still better to render δούλος, servant, and reinsert the word minister for this verse, as Noyes has done. "We could not vary the English rendering of δούλος and ἀποστολῶν, except by introducing some word like 'officer,' which would have had an awkward sound" (Five Ang. Clergymen).—E.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

General Remarks.—As, in chap. xii., ecclesiastical duties are supplemented by personal duties, so here, in chap. xiii., civil duties are supplemented by duties toward the world in general.—According to Tholuck, the passive conduct in relation to private injuries, in chap. xii. 19-21, has led to this exhortation. Yet this would be too accidental an occasion. The thought of the transition is, that, even in the heathen State, evil must be overcome with good. But the possibility of this conquest lies in the necessity of the Christian's recognizing something good even in the large State, as well as in the personal opponent. Chrysostom held that this section has the apologetical design of showing that Christianity does not lead to the dissolution of the State, and of the social legal relations (comp. 1 Tim. ii. 1; Titus iii. 1; 1 Peter ii. 13, 14). According to Calvin, and others, the occasion lay in the fact that the Jews were inclined to resistance to heathen government, and that also the Jewish Christians often became subject, with them, to suspicions of the same disposition.* As might be expected, Baur finds the key for the solution of this question also in the Clementines. On these and other hypotheses, particularly those of Neander and Baumgarten-Crusius, see further details in Tholuck, pp. 678 ff. The same author says: "If the Epistle was written in the year 58, then it follows that Nero's five mild years terminated in the following year." In view of the universal character of this Epistle, even on its practical side, the Apostle must have felt the necessity of defining, from his principle, the relation of duty in which Christians stood to the State, without his having been led to it by this or that circumstance.

Ver. 1. Let every soul, πᾶσα ψυχὴ. Every man; yet with reference to the life of the soul, whose emotions in relation to the government come into special consideration (Acts ii. 43; iii. 23;

* [This exhortation was probably occasioned by the turbulent spirit of the Jews in Rome, who had been on this account banished from the city for a time by the Emperor Claudius (A. D. 51). Their messianic expectations assumed a carnal and political character, and were directed chiefly toward the external emancipation from the odious yoke of the heathen Romans. A few years after the date of the Epistle to the Romans, the spirit of revolt burst forth in open war, which ended in the destruction of Jerusalem (A. D. 70). The Jewish, and even the Gentile Christians, might readily be led away by this fanaticism, since the gospel proffered liberty, and they might not understand that it was mainly spiritual—moral freedom from the slavery of sin, out of which, by degrees, in the appointed way, a reformation and transformation of civil relations should proceed. Such mistakes have been common; e. g., the Peasant's war, the Anabaptist tumults in the time of the Reformation, and many revolutions since the latter part of the last century. The attitude of Christ, His Apostles, and His Church down to the time of Constantine, toward the civil government, is truly sublime. They recognised in it an ordinance of God, despite its degeneracy, yielding to it, in all legitimate affairs, a ready obedience, despite the fact that they were persecuted by it with fire and sword. It should be remembered that this exhortation was addressed to the Romans, when the cruelties and crimes of a Tiberius, Caligula, and Claudius were in yet fresh remembrance, and when the monster Nero sat on the imperial throne—the same Nero who, a few years later, wantonly and mercilessly persecuted the Christians, condemning the Apostles Paul and Peter to a martyr's death. It was, however, by just such Christian conduct, in contrast with such cruelty, that Christ's Church won the moral victory over the Roman Empire and heathendom. Under the influence of such precepts, the early Church was "great in deeds, greater in sufferings, greatest in death, for the honor of Christ and the benefit of generations to come;" thus she was enabled to "overcome evil with good."—P. 8.]

Rev. xvi. 3).—Submit himself, ὑποτασσέσθω. Voluntarily subjecting himself to authority. [The reflexive form describes the obedience as of a rational, voluntary, principled character, in distinction from blind, servile subjection.—P. 8.]—To the authorities which are over him [ἐξουσίαις ὑπερχοῦσαις]. In ἐξουσία are comprised both the magistracy and their power (potestas). Υπερχοῦσαι, Vulgate: sublimiores. Tholuck: The high, those high in authority, with a reference to 1 Tim. ii. 2. [Philippi and Meyer refer to the German phrase: Die hohe Obrigkeit, but there seems to be no reference to the higher grade of rulers. The rendering given above is sufficiently explicit.—It must be noticed how general the injunction is—every soul, and whatever powers are set over him. Wordsworth: He does not say obey, but submit. On the limitations, see below, and Doctr. Notes.—R.]

Except from God [ἐκ μὴ ἀπὸ Θεοῦ] See Textual Note². The proposition is universal, its application follows. Wordsworth remarks that δυνάμεις, force, does not occur throughout.—R.] God's sovereignty is, in the general sense (ἀπὸ Θεοῦ), the causality of magisterial power.

Those which exist [αἱ δὲ οὐσαι]. See Textual Note³. According to Erasmus and Schmidt, the Apostle understands by the αἱ δὲ οὐσαι, the rightful powers; with reference to John x. 12, ὁ ποιμὴν, qui verus pastor est. According to Meyer and Tholuck, there is no difference whatever. [The words mean simply this: all existing civil authorities, de facto governments. This doubtless includes temporary and revolutionary governments, although nothing is said on this point. Of course, there has been much casuistry in the discussions as to what constitutes the existence, οὐσα, of the authority.—R.]

The general definition, ἀπὸ Θεοῦ, for which Codd. A. B., and others, would read ὑπὸ Θεοῦ, is "more specifically defined by the ὑπὸ Θεοῦ τεταγμένα ἑστί," have been ordained by God, which denotes Divine appointment." The

* [Without anticipating the discussion in the Doctrinal Notes, it may be well to remark here, that while this phrase has been used very frequently in the interest of the divine right of kings, such an application is rather an accident than a necessary inference from the Apostle's proposition. The theologians of Germany are apt to turn this against the revolutionary tendencies of Europe, &c.; but should the government under which they live in any way become republican, or ultra-democratic, then consistency must lead them to concede to such authorities also the jus divinum. The simple, pellucid meaning of the Apostle is, that civil government is necessary, and of Divine appointment. We infer that anarchy is as godless as it is inhuman; that magistrates are not "the servants of the people," nor do they derive their authority from the people, but from God, even though chosen by the people; that republican officials, no less than the hereditary monarchs, can subscribe themselves, "by the grace of God." Unless the principle be of universal application, anarchy will be justified somewhere. This principle, moreover, respects the office, not the character of the magistrate; not the abstract authority, indeed, but the concrete rulers, whatever their character. If it be deemed too sweeping, then its self-imposed limitation has been overlooked. For as the obedience is demanded because of God's appointment, then it is not demanded in matters contrary to God's appointment. When the civil power contradicts God's Word and His voice in our conscience, then it contradicts and subverts its own authority. Herein the superior wisdom of Christian ethics is manifest. Human self-will leads to anarchy, human power to despotism; but obedience to de facto rulers as Christian duty has led, and must lead, to true civil freedom, since it alone makes the individual truly free, and, by asserting the higher law as the basis of the lower authority, ever elevates the lower authority nearer the Divine Apostle, however, seems desirous of making a distinction, yet not between the rightful and illegal authorities, but between the actual appearance of the authorities and their ideal and essential ground of life, whose validity should also undoubtedly be recognized in the actual authorities, because of their permanent destination. In harmony with this distinction, Chrysostom, and others, have distinguished between the magisterial office itself and its accidental incumbents. Yet we must hold that the Apostle not only enjoins obedience toward the ideal institution of the authorities, but also toward their empirical appearance. But he will establish the requirement of this obedience by reference to the ideal institution and design of the authorities. This arises clearly from what follows.

Ver. 2. So that he who setteth himself against, &c. [ὅστις ὁ ἀντιτάσσόμενος, κ.τ.λ. Notice the recurrence of τάσσω in various forms and combinations.—R.] Whoever becomes ἀντιτάσσόμενος against the actual authorities, becomes also the resister of the ordinance of God. The ἀντιτάσσεισθαι denotes, primarily, military opposition, the array of a hostile order of battle; but it has also a more general sense. Its meaning, over against the authorities, in every case must be that of resistance; and Tholuck makes an arbitrary limitation when he says: "Neither the armed opposition of the individual, nor of many, as in insurrection, is meant here; it rather appears, from ver. 7, what kind of opposition is meant, namely, that of refusal to pay taxes." Besides, ver. 7 is the beginning of another section. [The more general sense is usually accepted, as in the above rendering: He who setteth himself against, which is adopted to bring out the reflexive force of the original.—R.] As related to the Divine appointment (διαταγή, here = δράγμα), this resistance becomes a spiritual resistance. This is the rule; and, according to this rule, it is said of those who resist the Divine ordinance:

Those who resist shall receive to themselves condemnation [οἱ δὲ ἀντισηκότες ἑαυτοὺς κήρυμα λήμψονται]. Meyer properly remarks, that "a condemnation by God is meant, as it is produced by their resistance of God's ordinance, but that the ἀρχαί are regarded as executing this sentence; therefore Paul does not mean eternal (according to Reiche, and most commentators), but temporal punishment." Yet these executioners are not always the ἀρχαί; for it is well known that revolution very often "devours its own children," and that the sorest punishments come from anarchy. [The next verse seems to point to the rulers as the instruments in inflicting the Divine punishment (Tholuck, Alford), yet there is no necessity for this limitation, in the face of the fact that punishment often comes by other hands. Though the punishment comes from God, condemnation is preferable to damnation, since the latter refers now to eternal punishment alone, which is not the meaning here.—On vers. 1, 2, Dr. Hodge remarks: "The extent of this obedience is to be determined from the nature of the case. They are to be obeyed as magistrates, in the exercise of their lawful authority. This passage, therefore, affords a very slight foundation for the doctrine of passive obedience."—R.]

Ver. 3. For rulers are not [οἱ γὰρ ἀρχαί τες οὐκ εἰσίν]. It may be asked here, what the γὰρ is designed to establish? According to Meyer, it explains the modality of the condemnation: they shall receive condemnation in so far as the civil authority is its executioner. But Tholuck and Philippi very properly suggest, that the κατὰ ἔργα in ver. 3 cannot mean merely resistance to civil authority. If the civil authority exists merely for the quelling of resistance, the whole State would be a mere circle, or the civil authority would be an absolute despotism. According to Calvin and Bucer, ver. 3 should connect with ver. 1, and prove the utilitas of the Divine ordinance of civil authority.* But the γὰρ refers simply to the idea of absolute punishment in the condemnation in ver. 2. In Tholuck there is a similar, and perhaps somewhat more general, reference to ver. 2. God punishes insurrection, because it is designed to shake a legal ordinance, existing for the protection of the good and the punishment of the bad. All those are guilty of this misconception of all the moral powers of existing order, who, in their abstract worship of a pure fancy, oppose the best form of government, and therefore finish their labors by perverting existing order to a moral chaos. Now, the limitation of the strict requirements of the Apostle lies in the definition of the civil authority, which he gives in this and the following verses.

A terror, φόβος. For terror, formidandi. Princes are not formidable to the good work, but to the evil.—[To the good work, but to the evil, τῷ ἀγαθῷ ἔργῳ, ἀλλὰ τῷ κακῷ. See Textual Note.—R.]

Doest thou then wish not to be afraid of the authority? [θέλεις δὲ μὴ φοβέσθαι τὴν ἐξουσίαν;] Although it is not necessary to retain the interrogative form, yet it will express sufficiently the hypothetical force, which most commentators find here.—R.] These words are a hypothetical premise, and not a question, as Griesbach, and others, would construe them.—Thou shalt have praise [ἐξέεις ἔπαινον]. Commendations by the magistrates, in opposition to punishments, were common even in ancient times. Origen, on the contrary, says, that it is not the custom of rulers to praise the non peccantes. To this, Pelagius says: Damnatio malorum laus est bonorum. Meyer says: "Grotius, moreover, properly says: 'Cum hac scriberet Paulus, non scribebatur Roma in Christianos?' It was still the better period of Nero's government." Tholuck's view is similar. Yet the written words of the Apostle have been of perfect application subsequently, even down to the present day. The Apostle sets up an ideal, by which the ruler also can and shall be judged. We must hold:

1. That he portrays obedience to authority as an obedience for the Lord's sake (comp. Eph. vi. 5, 6). This secures the sphere: "Render to God the things that are God's;" bondage under religious and conscientious despotism is excluded.

2. The definition of what is good works and what

Law. For, as Alford observes of the duty here laid down: "To obtain, by lawful means, the removal or alteration of an unjust or unreasonable law, is another part of this duty; for all powers among men must be in accord with the highest power, the moral sense." And the elevation of the moral sense of individuals will accomplish more than revolutions, however justifiable and necessary.—R.]

are evil works, abides by the decision of God's word, of Christian faith, and of conscience, but is not dependent on the ruler.

3. This also indicates that every power shall become weakness, when the poles of sword-bearing shall be so absolutely transposed that the sword becomes a terror to good works; but that it is a matter of the Divine government to prove that weakness, which lies in the fact that an actual government has absolutely dropped off from the idea of its design.*

Ver. 4. For he is God's minister [Θεοῦ γὰρ διάκονός ἐστιν]. The γὰρ of ver. 4 brings out the ground of the declaration in ver. 3. The rule of the magistracy as a terror to the evil, and for the praise and encouragement of those who do good, is explained by its character, its essential design, to be God's servant.—[To thee for good, σοὶ εἰς τὸ ἀγαθόν.] But he is God's minister for the good of man; see Book of Wisdom vi. 4. [While rulers are of God, it is for the benefit of the ruled. A repetition of what precedes, and suggesting the same limitations.—R.]

He weareth not the sword in vain [οὐ γὰρ εἰς ἥ τὴν μάχασιν φορεῖ]. He wear-eth it (φορεῖ is stronger than φορεῖ) as the symbolical token, insignia, of his governing and judicial sovereignty; but he does not wear it merely as a symbol, without reason, and for show. He makes use of it because he is God's minister, as the punitive executioner of His wrath. The addition: for wrath, εἰς ὀργήν, expresses the fact that even in the State and municipal court there is the authority of something higher than merely human justice, namely, the Divine retribution of wrath upon offenders.

On the different antiquarian interpretations of the μάχασιν, particularly as the dagger which the Emperor carried at his side, see Tholuck, p. 690. Tholuck and Meyer decide for the sword, because μάχ. in the New Testament always means this, and because everywhere in the provinces it was borne by the highest officers of military and criminal affairs, as the sign of the jus gladii. Nevertheless, the dagger of the Emperor, and of his representative, the Præfectus Prætoris, belongs under the symbolical description. After all, in an abstract and real direction, we would otherwise have to think only of the executioner's sword. [It requires some ingenuity to escape the conviction that this passage implies a New Testament sanction of the right of capital punishment. At all events, the theory of civil penalties here set forth is in direct opposition to that so constantly upheld nowadays, that the end is simply the reformation of the offender. See Doctr. Note 6.—R.]

* [In thus presenting an ideal of civil government (as most commentators suppose), the Apostle gives both the reason for obedience to rightful authority, and makes room for resistance to rulers who utterly and entirely depart from this ideal. Wordsworth, however, takes decided ground against any right of insurrection, and adds: "But even suppose a Nero, and a Nero persecuting the Church; yet even then you may have praise therefrom. You may overcome his evil by your good; you may be more than conqueror—you may derive glory from it. For though it is unjust and condemns you, yet God is just and will reward you. He will crown you for acting justly, and for suffering unjustly. Therefore hold fast your justice, and whether the power acquits or condemns you, you will reap praise from it. If you die for the faith from his hand, you will reap glory from its fury. Augustine (Serm. xiii. 302). Yet even this author admits that the Apostle "charitably presumes rulers to be what, being God's ministers, they ought to be." This is virtually the presentation of an ideal, the non-realisation of which implies certain limitations to absolute submission.—R.]

Ver. 5. Wherefore ye must needs, &c. δὲ ἀνάγκη, κ.τ.λ.] For the reason stated, it was not merely the duty of prudence, but also a religious and moral duty of conscience, to be subject. When the Apostle says, not only because of the wrath, but also for conscience' sake, he denotes thereby the antithesis of the servile fear of the external infliction of punishment, and of inward and free obedience, in the knowledge and reverence of the Divine order in the civil affairs of men.* Comp. 1 Peter ii. 13.

Ver. 6. For, for this cause ye pay tribute also [διὰ τοῦτο γὰρ καὶ φόρους τελεῖτε]. The question of connection has been much discussed. Calvin, De Wette, Alford, and many others, make διὰ τοῦτο parallel with διό (ver. 5), as another inference from vers. 1-4. Meyer, however, connects immediately with ver. 5, finding here an inference from the necessity there described, as well as a confirmation of it. He thinks the other construction passes over ver. 5 arbitrarily. But if the verses are taken as parallel, this difficulty is not of much weight. See his notes for other views; Stuart takes διὰ τοῦτο γὰρ as a strengthened causal particle, and the verb as imperative.—R.] The τελεῖτε must not be read as imperative (Heumann, Morus [Stuart, Hodge], and others); but the γὰρ [οὖν] with the imperative would have been more natural] and the imperative in ver. 7 are against this. The payment of tribute declares a recognition of the State, also according to our Lord's own declaration (Matt. xxii. 21). But by means of paying tribute, the subject himself takes part in the government of the magistracy. He actually takes part in the support of the administration, which, consciously or unconsciously, is, in the highest sense, a servant of the kingdom, and, in the widest sense, is a servant [Liturgy] of God, analogously to the servant of the temple. Olshausen, and others, erroneously construe προσκαρτεροῦντες as subject.

[For they are the ministers of God, λειτουργοὶ γὰρ Θεοῦ εἰσιν. See Textual Note⁶. The subject is ἀρχοῦς (supplied in thought); λειτουργοὶ is predicate (Meyer, Philippi, and most). See Philippi on the distinction between λειτουργός and διάκονος. He bases upon the former, which, he claims, applies to one engaged in a practical, external service, as well as on the concrete plural (instead of the abstract ἔξουσία), the reference to the collection of tribute in εἰς αὐτὸ τοῦτο. But it is better, with Tholuck, Wordsworth, and others, to find here the idea of servants ministering to God in representation of the people.—R.]

Attending continually upon this very thing [εἰς αὐτὸ τοῦτο προσκαρτεροῦντες]. Philippi† explains εἰς αὐτὸ τοῦτο: for this very purpose, viz., the payment of tribute. But then that would mean: they receive taxes in order that they may exact more taxes. The purpose is the fundamental thought of the whole section: The

* [Melancthon thus strongly puts the case: Nulla potentia humana, nulli exercitus magis munit imperia, quam hæc acerrimissima lex Dei: necesse est obediri propter conscientiam.—R.]

† [The original says Meyer, but gives the very words of Philippi; while Meyer (4th ed., without any indication of change of view) defends the wider reference, among other reasons, because the verb, which includes a moral idea, would be inapplicable to the mere collection of taxes. The great thought, ministers of God, seems to be the controlling one. Stuart, Hodge, and the older commentators, press the other reference which, perhaps, to a certain extent, implies this.—R.]

State is the State of the police, of rectitude, and of civilization. Therefore the λειτουργίαν τῷ Θεῷ is undoubtedly meant (Tholuck, and others) in the very sense in which the section has described it.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. As chap. xii. has defined the conduct of Christians toward the Church and the personal departments of life, so does chap. xiii. define their conduct toward the State and the world. The Apostle has therefore very forcibly regarded the sphere of personal life as the atmosphere of the Church, and then the sphere of the world as the atmosphere of the State.*

2. In reference to the civil authority, the Apostle evidently makes the following distinctions: (1.) The actual existence of the civil powers, which are in every case an ordinance of God's providence [not of a social contract, nor simply by the will of the people.—R.]; and the ideal and real existence of the civil power, which is not merely providentially ἀπὸ Θεοῦ, but is also, by creation and institution, fundamentally an ordinance ὑπὸ τοῦ Θεοῦ τεταγμένα. (2.) He distinguishes between social opposition to the civil power, and the spiritual opposition to God's institution which is comprised therein. (3.) He also distinguishes between the power of the State itself and its incumbents, the rulers, by which designation he expresses the possibility of different political forms.† (4.) He finally distinguishes between the actual appearance and its ideal destination, according to which the ἐξουσία should be a δουλοῦ and administrator of Divine right, and the ἀρχαὶ should prove themselves as λειτουργοὶ Θεοῦ.

3. The following distinctions with reference to duty toward the State clearly appear:

A. The submission is of necessity (ἀνάγκη), ver. 5; (1.) Because of the wrath. Since Divine providence has its wise purposes even in raising up, and permitting to exist, severe and despotic powers, so long as they are really State powers, ὑποτάσσασθαι, so, in this relation, is the ἀνταρραστήσθαι a sin against wisdom; the revoler draws upon himself the κρίμα for his want of judgment, his presumption, and his wicked encroachment and invasion. The same ὀργή which makes the State pass over from an institution of Divine mercy to a phenomenon of Divine wrath, and which makes use of the despotic tool as an axe to be cast aside in due season (Isa. x. 15), and which oppresses a people to its own chastisement, crushes, first of all, the individual anarchical despots of revolution, who, in excessive self-estimation, would cure the relative evil of despotism by the absolute evil of anarchy. (2.) Although this folly itself must be avoided for conscience' sake, there is added a specific obedience for conscience' sake, which is unfettered respect for the ideal splendor of the Divine institution, joy at an existence protected by the laws and civilization of the State, gratitude for the moral blessings which humanity possesses in civil life; but, in one word, the knowledge of the Divine, which shines clearly enough even through the imperfect phenomenon of civil life.

B. The "submitting," ὑποτάσσασθαι, excludes the resisting, ἀνταρραστήσθαι; but it by no means excludes it from God's word and from conscience, nor from judgment (dependent on an existing power) on what is good and what is evil, and what is just and what is unjust; for it is only in consequence of this judgment that there can be a candid conviction that the higher powers, really as God's servant, exercise the right of the sword for a terror to evil works and protection to good works. Consequently, judgment on the actions of the State within the purely ethical department, and the limits and legality of wisdom, is also unfettered.

C. According to the Apostle, the mark of voluntary obedience consists in not fearing the civil powers, in assuming their existence according to the idea in vers. 3 and 4, and not according to their accidental errors. This fearlessness may not only be united with the respect required by ver. 7, but is inseparably connected with it (see Tholuck, p. 692). As one has the right and duty to expect of the Christian that he will act in a Christian way, so has one the right and duty to expect of the State that it be clothed with the ideal principles of the State.

D. The Apostle says: "Render therefore to all their dues; tribute to whom tribute is due;" as if he would say that, by this voluntary act, you participate in the civil government, and pledge your obedience to it. But, in ver. 7, he characterizes the same act as indebtedness. The solution of this apparent antinomy has been given by our Lord himself, Matt. xxii. 21 (see the Commentary on Matthew, pp. 396, 397). The individual has the right to emigrate when an extraneous power arises. But if, with the use of the coin of the country, he enjoys the profit, protection, and authority of the country, there arises the duty of paying the tribute required by the united life and necessities of the State. And he who pays tribute—that is, renders allegiance—with one hand, but with the other rises in revolution, is not only guilty of resistance, but also of self-delusion and self-contradiction.—These are the principal features; they may also be found in Eph. vi. 5; 1 Tim. ii. 2; 1 Peter ii. 13. The application of them to the individual cases and questions arising here, has been committed by God's word to the development of the Christian spirit. We are convinced that this spirit, and its foundation, can be misapplied by impure minds, when, on the one hand, Byzantine adulterers make the gospel of truth a gospel of absolute despotism, and, on the other, fanatical and hierarchical mutineers make it a gospel of revolutionary terrorism, as was the case with the Jewish Zealots, and appears now as secret political justice [Vehmjustiz] (practised in Westphalia in early times), now as brigandage, and now as Fenianism. In both respects the Old Testament is a commentary, rich in illustrations, on the sense of the New. Neither Pharaoh nor Korah's company, neither Rehoboam nor Jeroboam, neither Nebuchadnezzar nor the adversaries of Jeremiah, escaped the condemnatory judgment of the Spirit recorded on the pages of Holy Writ. But in the Jewish war, when the fanaticism of power and the fanaticism of an enthusiastic fancy for freedom contended together for the Holy City, the Christians emigrated to Pella. The light and right of the Christian consist in the incapacity of any earthly power to intervene between his heavenly King and his conscience. When it is therefore imputed to him that his conscience is stained by falsehood, injustice, cowardice, or partiality, and that he has become faithless to his heavenly King, he knows—for he must know—that his inward life stands or falls with his fidelity to his Lord, it matters not from what side the imputation may come. He must likewise refute the imputation that he employs his whole life in political law questions; for there are other things to be attended to in religious, ecclesiastical, moral, and social life, than contending for the most perfect political and social forms. The same fanatical externalization, which in the Middle Ages took pleasure in absolute ecclesiasticism, can become absolute politicalism in modern society. But if conditions arise in the life of nations in which the Apostle's definition is not of absolute application to the civil power, when the sword is a terror to the good, then does the definition cease to be of application at its time to ἐν τη πόλει. But even in such a case God could make a Russian winter do more for Germany, than man, alienated from God, could do for France by a series of revolutions. Of course, freedom never takes place without enthusiastic liberators, who know how to distinguish God's fiery sign from human incendiarism. But every one must know for himself what his duty is in his particular calling. [The positions of Dr. Lange are justly taken, but may require some modification for a region where the civil power is more directly formed and sustained by the individual members of the State. In that case, the personal responsibility in political affairs is, of course, largely augmented; to the duty of obedience and tribute, that of political knowledge and prudence is added. The ideal must be formed by Christian reflection, and by Christian effort we must seek to make it a reality. The abstract right of revolution, which Dr. Lange himself does not deny, will be the more an abstraction as lawful means are at hand to alter the organic law of the State. Thus popular government, when, and only when, the people are permeated by Christian principle, contains in itself the preventive of revolutionary excess. How insupportable it can become when this condition is wanting, history tells plainly enough.—R.]

* [Jowett escapes all the difficulties of this section, by intimating that the Apostle's exhortation has a reference only to the Roman Christians in their then circumstances. He thinks many a scriptural precept is abused because not thus limited, and adds, respecting the Apostle: "It never occurred to him that the hidden life, which he thought of only as to be absorbed in the glory of the sons of God, was one day to be the governing principle of the civilised world." It is not likely to be so long, if all its professed possessors pare down the scriptural precepts in this fashion.—R.]

† [From the expression, "God's minister to thee for good," the relative excellence of the different forms of government must be determined, since this is the only rule laid down, and an empirical one at best. So long as a popular government best fulfils this Divine purpose, so long will men gladly lay down their lives, that "the government of the people, by the people, and for the people, shall not perish from the earth" (Pres. Lincoln at Gettysburg Cemetery.—R.)]

4. From the experience through which the Apostle had previously passed, he had been often protected by the sword of the Roman authorities against the mutinies of Jewish fanaticism. Learned people have observed, that he has written these exhortations to Rome although Nero was Emperor there. Other scholars have remarked, on the other hand, that the five good years of Nero's reign had not yet come to an end. But it is certain that, in the ordinance of the State for posterity, as well as in the institution of the Church, the Apostle perceives the historical opposition to the germinating antichristianity in the world, according to 2 Thess. ii. But he did not regard his liberty of judgment thereby bound (see 2 Tim. iv. 17).

5. To what extent is the State a Divine institution? Elaborate discussions on this question are summed up and deliberated upon by Tholuck, pp. 681-689. According to the principles of Romanism, the State is merely a human ordinance (see Tholuck, p. 684; Gieseler, Kirchengesch., ii. 2, pp. 7, 108).—The germ of the Divine institution of the State lies in the Divine institution of the family, in the authority of the head of the family in particular, as well as in the substantial relations of humanity. But as the Old Testament gift of the law is the institution of a theocracy, which still embraces in common the twin-offspring of State and Church, so is there contained also in the Old Testament a Divine sanction of the State—a sanction which pledges the future sanctified State to reciprocity with the future Church. And this presages that it is just as destructive to make the State the servant of the Church, as to make the Church the bondswoman of the State.

[The Scylla and Charybdis of European Christianity, as related to the State, are: Romanism, which subordinates the State to the Church, and Erastianism, which subordinates the Church to the State. The American theory is: that both are coördinate, the State protecting the Church in civil rights, the Church sustaining the State by its moral influence. Yet even here it is questioned whether this is the correct theory. It is an experiment, fraught with great blessings indeed, but, as yet, only an experiment. The dangers here are similar: (1.) Romanism, which would make its Church the State; in a popular government, as really as in a despotism, and even more fatally, since the genius of the Church must then become that of the State—what that is, is obvious. (2.) On the other hand, we find the theocratic tendency of Puritanism manifesting itself continually. This would identify Church and State, rather by making the State the Church, pressing upon it the duty of legislating men into morality, and even holiness. Here we must class the politico-religionism, which has become so common during the last ten years.—Still, the constant tendency of Christendom to make a practical synthesis of Church and State, is an unconscious prophecy of an era when both shall be united in a christocracy.—R.]

6. On the right of the death-penalty with reference to the sword of authority, see Tholuck, p. 691. We must, of course, distinguish between the right of using the sword and the duty of its use. [Admitting that the Apostle is describing an ideal of civil government, we still find here the right of capital punishment. Of course, just in so far as the actual government has been below this ideal, has this right been abused. Still, the right remains justified by the theory of punishment here advanced, by the necessities of self-preservation on the part of society represented by the punishing power. The right to punish also implies the right to pardon; and the measure of the right (i. e., the conformity to the ideal here presented) will be also the measure of the sense of responsibility, both as to the punishing and pardoning power. The usual objections to capital punishment misapprehend (a.) the nature of punishment in general; (b.) the Divine authority in civil government.—R.]

Obedience toward the powers that be is every Christian's duty. 1. Without difference of pos-

sions; 2. Of position; 3. Of culture; 4. And of confession (ver. 1).—In how far are there no powers that are not ordained by God? 1. So far as God himself is a God of order, who will therefore have order in civil affairs; 2. So far as God is also a God of love, who designs to do good for us by the powers which He has ordained (vera. 1-4).—Resistance to the powers that be, regarded as resistance to God's ordinance (ver. 2).—To do good is the best protection against all fear of civil authority (ver. 3).—Praise from the civil magistrates. 1. Who shall obtain it? Every one who does good—that is, every one who, a. does not submit slavishly; but, b. obeys the laws of the country by voluntary obedience. 2. In what should it consist? a. Not so much in showy medals and ribbons, for which many are so eager, as, b. in the simple recognition of the faithfully discharged duty of the citizen (ver. 3).—The civil authorities should likewise serve: 1. God; 2. Men (ver. 4).—The holy judicial office of the magistracy. 1. From whom is it derived? From God, who is a righteous God, and to whom no wicked person is pleasing (Ps. v. 4). 2. What belongs to it? The exercise of penal judgment, and, above all, the right of life and death. 3. How should they exercise it? In the ennobling, but also humiliating, consciousness that they are God's ministers (ver. 4).

LUTHER: Worldly power is for the sake of temporal peace; therefore the conscience is bound, by dutiful love, to be subject to it (ver. 5).—See how good it is to pay taxes and be obedient; for you thereby help to protect the pious and punish the wicked. Therefore do not be provoked at it (ver. 6).

STARKE: If persons in authority would attract their subjects to obedience, they should administer their office well, and, to that end, should remember: 1. That they are by nature no better than other men; 2. That they will therefore die, just as all others; 3. That they will have to give a far greater account than their subjects before God's judgment-bar, because of their official prerogatives and government (ver. 1).—LANGE: When those in authority read and hear that their station is from God, they should examine themselves as to whether they are to their subjects what the head is to the body and its members (ver. 1).—HEDINGER: The powers that be, God's minister! How much is expressed by this! Therefore there are no masters above God. He will hereafter hold to account, and throw aside, all titles of honor (ver. 4).—Ye subjects, give freely your possessions and blood, but not your conscience (ver. 6).

GERLACH: Though the office be divine, the incumbent may possess it illegally, and abuse it (ver. 1).—"Needs" here means not external compulsion, but the inward necessity of being obedient to God (ver. 5).

LISCO: The believer's holy love is the fulfilment of the law; first of all, in relation to the powers that be (vera. 1 ff.).—Obedience is a matter of conscience with the Christian; it is an inward and sincere obedience (ver. 5).

HEUBNER: The Christian attitude toward the authorities (vera. 1 ff.).—The limits of obedience toward the powers that be are defined by conscience, faith, and God's commandment; Acts v. 29 (ver. 1).—The Christian mode of obedience is free, pure, conscientious, and not from compulsion or fear (ver. 5).

SCHLEIERMACHER: On the proper relation of the Christian to his ruler. 1. How utterly improper it is for the Christian to be subject merely to avoid punishment; 2. How natural and necessary it is for him to be subject for conscience' sake (preached in January, 1809); vera. 1-5.

HENRY: Magistrates act as God's ministers: 1. In the administration of public justice; 2. The determining of quarrels; 3. The protecting of the innocent; 4. The righting of the wronged; 5. The punishing of offenders; 6. And the preserving of national peace and order, that every man may not do right in his own eyes.—WATERLAND: It is the duty of those in authority: 1. To correct those that needlessly and causelessly disturb the public tranquillity; 2. To remove those that libel the established religion, without offering any better, or an equivalent; 3. To curb the insolence and humble the pride of such as fly in the face of authority, and pretend, without commission or qualifications, to instruct, and, under that color, to insult their superiors.—SCOTT: As to the efforts which are anywhere made by those on whom trusts constitutionally devolve, to preserve, increase, or assist the real liberty of mankind, personal, civil, or religious, or to check the career of despotism or oppression over men of any climate, complexion, or religion: let us zealously forward them with our prayers, and by every mean consistent with the peace and good order of the community; and, if we would enjoy the blessing of good government, we should pray earnestly and constantly for our rulers, and all in authority; else we have no just cause to complain of any real or supposed grievances to which we may be subjected by them.—CLARKE: When a ruler governs according to the constitution of his country, and has his heart and life governed by the laws of God, he is a double blessing to his people; while he is ruling carefully according to the laws, his pious example is a great means of extending and confirming the reign of pure morality among those whom he governs.—J. F. H.

FOURTH SECTION.—Proper conduct toward the world in general. Legal fellowship with the world. Recognition of the rights of the world in the justice and also in the strength of love for our neighbor. Separation from the ungodliness of the ancient world (the darkness of heathenism). Universalism and its sanctification through true separationism.

³ Ver. 9.—[B. E. omit ἐν τῷ. It is found in N. A. D. L.; adopted by many editors, bracketted by Lachmann, Alford, Tregelles. It might easily have been omitted as unnecessary, hence to be retained.—Rec., with A. L.: ἐν τοῖς τῷ λόγῳ; N. B. D. F., Lachmann, Tischendorf, Tregelles, and most: ἐν τῷ λόγῳ τούτῳ.

⁷ Ver. 12.—[The Rec. (with N^o. C^o. D^o F. L., and fathers) reads καὶ before ἐνδύσασθε. A. B. C^o. D^o., versions and fathers: ἐνδύσθε. N^o. omits the conjunction altogether. Lachmann, Tischendorf, De Wette, Alford, Wordsworth, Tregelles, accept ἐνδύσθε, since καὶ might be substituted on account of the failure to recognise the contrast. Philippi and Meyer accept καὶ, because ἐνδύσθε might have been inserted from the previous part of the verse, or to correspond with it. No change is required in the E. V., to express the slightly contrastive force of ἐνδύσθε.

⁹ Ver. 14.—[Dr. Lange's view would be thus expressed: Do not make such provision for the flesh as to satisfy its lusts. Noyes: Think not about satisfying the lusts of the flesh. Alford: Take not (any) forethought for the flesh, to fulfil its lusts. See the Eng. Notes.—E.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL

Preliminary Remark.—This section is connected by ver 7 with the preceding. While the previous section defines the relation of Christians to the State to which they belong as citizens, the present section, on the other hand, regulates their relation to the world in general, in its friendly and hostile side, in fellowship and repulsion; and ver. 7 treats of their relation to authorities in the world in general. We have not merely to do with our own civil authorities and our own State, but also with foreign States and dignitaries. The traveller does not have to pay tribute to a foreign State, but he has to pay duty; in all cases we should exhibit becoming honor and respect toward every one. According to Tholuck, ver. 7 contains "a summary of the various duties toward all kinds of authorities; first of all, toward the subordinate tax-officers, then to judges and magistrates."

[The view of Tholuck, which is that of Meyer, Philippi, Alford, and most, implies that ver. 7 belongs to the preceding section. At first sight this division seems correct; but, really, ver. 7 is both a hortatory summing up of what precedes, and a transition to the more general admonitions which follow. If οὐν be read (see Textual Note), the former becomes more prominent; if omitted, the latter.—R.]

Ver. 7. Render to all their dues [ἀπόδοτε πᾶσιν τὰς ὀφείλας]. Πᾶσιν. According to Estius, Klee, and others, this refers to all men; according to Meyer [Philippi, and many others], it refers merely to magistrates, as if our respect were due to them alone! The antithesis is: Owe no man any thing.

Tribute to whom tribute is due [τῷ τὸν φόρον τὸν φόρον]. Tholuck, Meyer, and others, would supplement ἀπόδοτε by ἀπαντοίωτε. But the addition is already indicated in the τὰς ὀφείλας, and ὀφείλετε follows immediately afterward. Fear and honor are asked from nobody, not even by magistrates, in the form of paying tribute and duty; and even with tribute and duty we should not wait until compelled to pay them. Grotius has supplied ὀφείλεται; Köllner, ὀφείλετε; against which Meyer observes, that it is philologically incorrect, because τῷ does not stand for ᾧ. But were ᾧ the reading, the idea of an organic distribution would easily arise; this was avoided by the Apostle's placing τῷ contractively for τοῖς. According to Grotius, simply the Art. præpositivus is placed for the subjunctivus, which is reversed in chap. xiv. 2-6.*

Custom [τὸ τέλος]. Grotius: Vestigialia pro mercibus dantur, tributa pro solo aut capite. We must, at all events, understand here, by custom, the Roman internal tax on goods. [As tribute was due to home authorities, while custom, duties, &c., are due to foreign authorities as well, there seems to be an extension of thought beyond the obligations referred to in vers. 1-6. Bengel is quite incorrect in making φόρος the genus, and τέλος the species.—R.]

[Fear, τὸν φόβον; honor, τὴν τιμὴν. Those who confine the reference to magistrates, apply the former word to the proper sentiment and conduct toward the higher magistrates, especially judges, the latter to magistrates in general (Meyer, Philippi). De Wette, however, refers the former to judges, the latter to magistrates in general, especially the higher ones; while Alford refers "φόβος to those set over us and having power; τιμὴν, to those, but likewise to all on whom the State has conferred distinction." If the wider view of the verse be accepted, then (with Hodge, Webster and Wilkinson, and others) the one means the reverence paid to superiors, the other, the courtesy due to equals.—R.]

Ver. 8. Owe no man any thing [μηδενὶ μηδὲν ὀφείλετε]. Dr. Lange renders: Bleibt Niemand und Nichts schuldig, which he considers an improvement of the old version: Niemand nichts.—R.] The four preceding categories are here generalized to the idea of the universal duty to our neighbor. Tholuck is doubly inexact when he says: "The Apostle proceeds from the duties of subjects to universal Christian duties." [De Wette: "The Apostle proceeds at once from the vestibule of morality into her very domain."—R.]

Except to love one another [ἐκ μὴ τοῦ ἀλλήλους ἀγαπᾶν]. Philippi: "A Pauline argute dictum or acumen."—R.] In relation to the definite discharges of duty, the Christian should strive to perfectly discharge, and to keep discharged, his duty in every direction; in relation to love, as the source of duties, he should, on the other hand, be conscious, and constantly be more so, of an infinite and permanent indebtedness. The duties are externally a finitum, but the duty of loving our neighbor remains an infinitum. And the more clear the Christian becomes on one, the more clear he becomes on the other. [Bengel: "AMARE, debitum immortale. Si anabatis, nō debetis, nam amor implet legem. Amare, libertas est." So most commentators from the times of Chrysostom. Augustine: "Semper DEBEO charitatem quæ sola etiam reddita retinet debitorem" (Ep. 62).—R.]

"ὀφείλετε is not indicative (Reiche, and others), but imperative,* by which the sentence, "except to love one another," must be understood thus: except that which you cannot pay as a debt. Meyer emphasizes the subjective rendering: Consider yourselves as debtors of love. Even in the "Owe no man any thing" there is undoubtedly an appeal made to the consciousness and its method of action.

Hath fulfilled the law. [Ἦν πληροῦναι]. [Perfect of completed action (Meyer).—R.] It is by love that the fulfilment of the law is fundamentally decided; chap. xiv. 18. Reiche, and others: Id quod in lege summum est. Instead of this, we must place: Quod legis principium est. That no justification is here implied, is plain, first, from the fact that the Apostle regards this loving as possible only on the ground of justification; and second, from the fact that he lays down this loving, emphatically construed, as an ideal which has not been reached so long as we are still universal debtors in individual matters.

[Although ver. 9 shows that the Mosaic law is meant, yet it is to be doubted whether there is any "apologetic reference to the upholders of the law" (Alford). When De Wette says: "He who practises love, the higher duty, has, even before he does this, fulfilled the law, the lower," he seems to ignore the true position of the law in the Christian dispensation. "The law, as a rule of gratitude, is completely fulfilled by love," seems a better view. For the former part of the verse implies that we never attain to this, but still "owe" this love increasingly. Hence the reference here is to the completed ideal. "The expression implies more than a simple performance of the precepts of the law; true love does more than this: it adds a completeness to the performance. It reaches those lesser courtesies and sympathies which cannot be digested into a code and reduced to rule. To the bare framework of law, which is as the bones and sinews, it adds the flesh which fills it, and the life which actuates it" (Webster and Wilkinson).—R.]

Ver. 9. For this, Thou shalt not, &c. [τὸ γὰρ οὗ, κ.τ.λ.] It is self-evident that the Apostle does not take the negative commandments of the Decalogue in a merely literal sense. This is clear also from the prominence which he gives to the last: Thou shalt not covet (Luther: Covet nothing; an emphasizing of the object; chap. vii. 7 is against this). It also follows, from the fact that this perfect negative conduct is not conceivable without a corresponding positive conduct. Tholuck: "In the enumeration of the commandments in ver. 9, 'not' respecting adultery precedes the one respecting murder. There is the same order in Codd. Alex. LXX., Exod. vi.; the same in Philo, and in the New Testament, James ii. 11; Mark x. 19; Luke xviii. 20. Philo establishes it, by saying: adultery is the most heinous crime." For further particulars, see Tholuck, p. 694.

Briefly comprehended. Λαλεῖται οὖν; see Eph. i. 10. In the expression there is comprised the idea, that all which is explained from the principle (for example, the Ten Commandments from the law of love) is again summed up in the fulfilment of the principle. Therefore not merely συγτόμως ἀπαρτίζεται (Chrysostom). [So Meyer, Tholuck, Philippi: recapitulated; De Wette, Alford: brought under one head. Dr. Lange includes both ideas. Briefly might be omitted from the E. V. with propriety.—R.]

Ver. 10. Love worketh no ill to his neighbor. [Philippi remarks that the Greeks usually write ἐργάζεσθαι τινά τι, while Paul here has: τὸ πλῆστον κακὸν οὐκ ἐργάζεται.—R.] The Apostle's maxim, in the form of an oxymoron, substantiates what has already been said, since love appears as the great positive fulfilment of the law, because it worketh no ill to the neighbor. The perfection (defined, in the main, negatively) of the Decalogue becomes the measure of the perfection (defined, in the main, positively) of the gospel.

[Love therefore is the fulfilment of the law, πλήρωμα οὖν νόμου ἡ ἀγάπη. Fulfilment, rather than "fulfilling," which would be the proper rendering of πλήρωσις. Meyer: "In the love to one's neighbor, that takes place by means of which the law is fulfilled." He further adds, that, in 1 Cor. xiii. 4-7, Paul gives a commentary on love's working no ill, &c. Comp. Gal. v. 14, Lange's Comm., pp. 185 ff.—R.]

Ver. 11. And this, knowing the time [καὶ τοῦτο εἰδότες τὸν καιρὸν]. Dr. Lange: "And knowing this, we know also the time," &c. See below.—R.] According to Bengel, καὶ τοῦτο must be supplemented by ποιεῖτε; according to Estius, by agere debemus (Tholuck, ποιῶμεν). Meyer goes back to the precept in ver. 8: μηδενὶ μηδὲν ὀφείλετε. Yet not only is that precept quite remote, but there is also here a change from the second person to the first. If we look at the actual connection, the Apostle cannot simply say: Let us do that—love our neighbor as ourselves. The more direct thought is: Let us discharge all our obligations, for we know that the end is nigh. But the Apostle does not say: "the end is nigh," but, "the day of salvation is nigh." Therefore it is advisable to accept an ellipsis: καὶ τοῦτο εἰδότες τὸν καιρὸν ὀφθαμν, or, εἰδότες, ἴσμεν. Because we know that love, which fulfils the law, is present, we know the importance of the time, namely, that the time of perfect salvation is nigh. To what extent? Because, by love, the works of night must vanish—adultery, murder, theft, covetousness; therefore the day of the complete righteousness of life must dawn. If this combination be deemed doubtful, Meyer's construction should then be preferred.

[Dr. Lange's view is indeed doubtful. On the whole, it seems unnecessary to supply any thing, but rather (with Hodge, Meyer, Philippi, and many others) to take καὶ as = et quidem, and indeed, the rather, and to refer τοῦτο to what precedes—i. e., to the injunction of ver. 8, as afterwards expanded. This is classical usage, though ταῦτα is more common in such cases than τοῦτο. The demonstrative pronoun is thus used "to mark the importance of the connection between two circumstances for the case in hand" (Hodge). Luther and Glückler confuse the construction, by joining τοῦτο with εἰδότες. The participle is not = considering (Grotius, Hodge, and others), but is causal, since ye know.—The time. This is explained by the next clause, that it is high time.—R.]

To awake out of sleep [εἰς ὕπνου ἐγερθῆναι]. Dr. Lange paraphrases thus in his text: "to fully arise, or, that we should immediately have arisen."—R.] How very metaphorical a meaning the Apostle gives to the word, as a designation of the sleep of sin, and of the darkness and bondage of the judgment of conscience by the blindness of sin, is plain from his subsequently describing just this excited, external watching, as works of darkness. According to Reiche, ὕπνος is an image of the Christian's condition on earth; this is opposed by Meyer, p. 481. [This condition of sleep is that of Christians also, as the verse obviously implies, but only relatively so (Philippi, De Wette, and others).—R.]

For now is our salvation nearer [γὰρ ἐγγύτερον ἡμῶν ἡ σωτηρία]. With Luther, and most commentators, we refer the ἡμῶν to ἡ σωτηρία, and not, with Meyer, to ἐγγύτερον; because it would not be like Paul to say that salvation, absolutely considered, is already brought nearer to us believers. Σωτηρία is here the completion of the redemptive salvation of the messianic kingdom. Therefore Meyer says: "This kingdom begins by means of the second coming of Christ, which Paul regarded near (Usteri, Lehrbegriff, p. 385). It was by not recognizing this—although Paul brings so impressively into the calculation the short time from his conversion to the period of his writing—that men have been induced to accept very preposterous interpretations; for example, that salvation by death is meant (Photius, and others), or the destruction of Jerusalem, which was of good results for Christianity (according to the earlier commentators, and also Michaelis), or the inward σωτηρία, the spiritual salvation of Christianity (Morus, and others)."

According to Tholuck, we can only grant that Paul indulged the hope of the speedy coming of Christ—perhaps even to live to see it—but yet that he had no fixed period of time for it. According to Meyer's rude view, we would have to imagine, with the Ebionites, a twofold σωτηρία; one of which, the spiritual salvation, has already happened; the other, the second coming of Christ, is near at hand, while between the two there is to be a gloomy period. But this is not the view of the Apostle. Rather, the first or principal σωτηρία, which is already the saving possession of Christians, is in the course of permanent and full development toward the final, peripheral salvation. There is a daily progress from συνεργία to συνεργία. And, particularly with Paul, a new era of the development of συνεργία will come, after Christianity shall have spread from Rome throughout the whole West, which, according to the purpose of the Epistle, is near at hand; and, with this Christianization of the Roman world, the completed συνεργία will be brought nearer. These great, vital, and dynamic views of the Apostle are very different from the modern assumptions of the Parousia imputed to him. Tholuck: "The period from the appearance of the regnum gloriae, when compared with its glory, is described as a nocturnal period. Spiritual sleep will be shaken off when the regnum gratiae comes to men (Col. i. 12, 13); and how much more will this be the fact when the regnum gloriae approaches!"

[Stuart, Hodge, Webster and Wilkinson, and a large class of commentators, understand by συνεργία, the consummation of salvation in eternity—deliverance from the present evil world. Dr. Hodge objects at some length to the reference to the second coming of Christ. On the other hand, most modern German commentators defend this reference. Olshausen, De Wette, Philippi, Meyer, and others, think no other view in the least degree tenable; and Dr. Lange, while careful to guard against extreme theories on this point, denies the reference to eternal blessedness, and admits that the Parousia is intended. This opinion gains ground among Anglo-Saxon exegetes. The main objection to it is thus met by Dean Alford: "Without denying the legitimacy of an individual application of this truth, and the importance of its consideration for all Christians of all ages, a fair exegesis of this passage can hardly fail to recognize the fact that the Apostle, here as well as elsewhere (1 Thess. iv. 17; 1 Cor. xv. 51), speaks of the coming of the Lord as rapidly approaching." As to this being inconsistent with inspiration, he refers to Mark xiii. 32: "Of that day and hour knoweth no man," &c. "The fact that the nearness or distance of that day was unknown to the Apostles, in no way affects the prophetic announcements of God's Spirit by them, concerning its preceding and accompanying circumstances. The 'day and hour' formed no part of their inspiration; the details of the event did. And this distinction has singularly and providentially turned out to the edification of all subsequent ages. While the prophetic declarations of the events of that time remain to instruct us, the eager expectation of the time, which they expressed in their day, has also remained, a token of the true frame of mind in which each succeeding age (and each succeeding age a fortiori) should contemplate the ever-approaching coming of the Lord. On the certainly of the event, our faith is grounded; by the uncertainty of the time, our hope is stimulated and our watchfulness aroused." This ignorance of the time of the coming of Christ Dr. Hodge himself brings forward, yet not to account for the expectation so much as to deny it. It is difficult for an unlettered believer to read the New Testament and not find this expectation, while even the most learned commentators now find it.—R.]

Than when we believed. (Calvin, and others), Luther says incorrectly: Than when we believed &c. [The aorist refers to the definite time, when we first believed. So 1 Cor. iii. 5; xv. 2, &c.—R.]

Ver. 12. The night is far spent, &c. [ἡ νύξ περὶ οὐκ ἔστι, &c.] According to Meyer, the night would be the time before the second coming of Christ; and the near day, on the other hand, the second coming itself. Certainly we do not read "The night is gone, but the day is come." But it does not follow from this that Paul supposed that the day would not break until the second coming. The day will break a hundred times, in ever greater potencies, between the first and the second coming of Christ. Consequently, a chronological antithesis is not here in question. The night is the spiritual condition of heathen Rome; the breaking day is the future of Christian Rome. [Ἡ νύξ προέκκεινται.] [The sense of the passage in itself considered is perfectly plain; but the precise reference is determined by the view taken of ver. 11. Admitting such recurring daybreaks as Dr. Lange suggests, they are still only preludes to "that day" when there shall be "no night"—R.]

Let us therefore cast off the works of darkness [ἀποθώμεθα οὖν τὰ ἔργα τοῦ σκότους]. The verb should be rendered: put off, if the figure of clothing be admitted; put away, if Dr. Lange's view be accepted.—R.] Meyer: "As one lays off his clothing. This view (against Fritzsche) corresponds to the correlative ἐνδύσθε &c.; comp. on Eph. iv. 22." [So De Wette, Philippi, Harless, Hodge, Alford, Webster and Wilkinson, Jowett, and most.—R.] But the works of darkness are not the same as the clothing of night. There is a difference between nocturnal revels and nocturnal clothing. The moral side of the heathen, and especially the Roman, night-life, moves before the Apostle, and he makes it designate evil works in moral darkness in general. The Roman of that time, giving himself up to dissolute nocturnal feasts and works of debauchery, but, on the return of day, assuming the favorite Roman costume of arms—a very perceptible contrast to these Roman Christians—is presented to them by the Apostle as a picture of a moral and religious contrast.

And let us put on the armour of light [ἐνδύσθε δὲ τὰ ὅπλα τοῦ φωτός]. See Textual Note [1]. Not instruments (Morus), clothes (Beza, and others), shining arms (Grotius), but the armor which the Roman wears by day, as a figure of the spiritual means of conflict, and of the conflicts which belong to the light; they are presented by it, and wielded in its element (see Eph. vi. 18). The light is the master from whom, for whom, and with whom, this armor is.—Ἐνδύσθε. Tholuck: "The figure of most intimate union with Christ, as the garment with the body; Gal. iii. 27; Eph. iv. 24; Col. iii. 10. Also in the classics, see Wetstein."

Ver. 13. Let us walk seemly, as in the day [ὡς ἐν ἡμέρᾳ εὐσχημόνως περιπατήσωμεν]. As if that day had already come, when it will be a characteristic of public respectability to live a moral Christian life, and therefore to live decorously. Εὐσχημόνως [referring to the moral decorum of the conduct (Meyer).—R.], 1 Thess. iv. 12; 1 Cor. vii. 35; xiv. 40, because that day is already breaking.

Not in rioting, &c. [Webster and Wilkinson: "Three classes of sins are specified, to each of which two words are appropriated, viz., intemperance, impurity, discord: the first, public or social vice; the second, private and secret vice; the third, ecclesiastico-political vice, the vice infecting communities even Christian." To this must be added Meyer's remark, that the three members stand in the internal relation of cause and effect. Comp. Gal. v. 19-21 (Lange's Comm., p. 138), where five of the six words are found.—R.]—Κῶμοις, carousals.^{*} Meyer translates, "with nocturnal riotings," by regarding the following dative as the dative of manner. This will not apply well to περιπατεῖν. [Philippi takes the datives as local, which seems the simplest view. Fritzsche, dat. commodi.—R.]—Chambering, κοίταις [congressibus veneris], feasts of debauchery, rendevous, chambers and houses of debauchery, works of debauchery itself.—[Wantonness, ἀσελγείαις. On this word, see Tittmann, Syn., p. 151. The plural shows that the various manifestations of wantonness are referred to.—R.]—*Ἐνvyi*ng, ζήλῳ, jealousy. The reverse side of nocturnal lusts and pleasures is nocturnal quarrels, especially matters of jealousy, and the forms still prevailing among the works of darkness in our day, especially in Italy and Spain.

Ver. 14. But put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ. Ἐνδύσθε, Gal. iii. 27; Eph. iv. 24; Col. iii. 10. [Hodge: "To be intimately united to Him, so that He, and not we, may appear." So De Wette, Philippi, &c.—R.] Tholuck: "Christ was already put on at baptism, Gal. iii. 27; but this ἐνδύσθε, just as the being light, must also be continually renewed. Besides, we must take into consideration the aorist form: The putting on as a garment denotes the entrance of the most intimate communion." Meyer: "Even in the classics, ἐνδύσθαι τινα denotes assuming somebody's manner of thought and action."

And make not provision for the flesh, &c. [καὶ τῆς σαρκὸς πρόνοιαν μὴ ποιεῖσθε εἰς ἐπιθυμίαν. Dr. Lange: Und die Pflege des Fleisches macht euch nicht zur pflege der Lüste; and of the care of the flesh do not make for yourselves a care of its lusts. The order of the Greek seems to favor this, but this implies a proper care of the flesh; so that this can only be a tenable view provided σάρξ does not have an ethical sense here. On this point, see below.—R.] Luther's translation is doubly incorrect: Take care of the body, yet so that, &c. First, the sentence is not divided into a positive and negative precept; second, the question is concerning the σάρξ, and not concerning the σῶμα. The sentence contains the expression of the moral limitation of the external perception of a self-evident duty. The duty is πρόνοια τῆς σαρκὸς; the enjoined limitation is the μὴ εἰς ἐπιθ. According to Fritzsche, σάρξ can only be understood as caro libidinosa, and therefore the whole sentence is a prohibition. Tholuck and Meyer, on the other hand, observe that the σάρξ, understood in this sense as sensual lust, should even be crucified; Gal. v. 24. Meyer describes the σάρξ, as it is here understood, as the lower animal part of man, the fountain and seat of sensual and sinful desires, in antithesis to the πνεῦμα. His calling σάρξ the material of the σῶμα, is better. [Philippi: "σάρξ has here a purely physiological sense."—R.] Tholuck cites Galen's medical usus loquendi to prove that the πρόνοια must be understood as care sensu bono; but Eph. v. 29 and 1 Cor. xii. 23 are of special application here. The distinction between what is vicious in the true care of the flesh, as is shown particularly in respectable clothing—to which the antithesis, "put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ," specially refers—is not merely expressed by the μὴ εἰς ἐπιθυμίαν: not so that the ἐπιθυμίαι arise from it; but also by the middle: ποιεῖσθε, make for yourselves, in which reference is made to the subjective self-deception, the πράξις τοῦ σώματος in the gratification of sensuous necessities.

[The view given above is, in the main, that of De Wette, Philippi, and many others. It opposes Luther's limitation of the negative to εἰς ἐπιθυμίαν, but does not take the whole passage as prohibitory. Hodge, Stuart, Alford, and others, render (as in E. V.): Make no provision (whatever) for the flesh (the carnal nature, in the ethical sense) to fulfil its lusts (so as to fulfil them, and also, because such provision would fulfil them; the result and object blended in the thought). The objections to this view are, that πρόνοια is used generally in a good sense; that the prohibition is too mild, if flesh were used in the ethical sense, &c. But the ethical sense has been the prevalent one in the Epistle. The grammatical difficulty is very slight, since μὴ has suffered a slight trajection. Besides, the order seems to have been chosen to give prominence and emphasis to σαρκός; such emphasis is altogether unnecessary, unless it has its ethical force. Its prominent position brings it into obvious contrast with Ἰησοῦν Χριστόν; this contrast of itself seems to determine the meaning. These latter considerations seem to have escaped the German commentators. Comp. Alford also, who claims that the order would have been different had Paul designed to convey the meaning defended by Meyer, &c.—R.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The debt of love denotes the duty of love for our neighbor, as, according to the law, it is a requirement of infinite force; and, according to the believer's new principle of life, it is an infinitely impulsive power. The unity of this debt divides itself into the differently formed obligations of various duties to our neighbor.

2. Love is the fulfilment of the law: (1.) So far as the whole law is only an outline of love to be filled up. (2.) So far as it precludes every transgression of the law. (3.) On the other hand, every commandment is realized as a vital principle in the new life. It is as love that God has given the law as our call to our destination. It is as love that Christ has fulfilled the law for our reconciliation. It is as love that the law of the Spirit lives in our faith, and, by the fellowship of Christ, supplies the defects of our deeds, so that, in the imitation of Christ, that fellowship may ever be elevated higher and higher.

3. The new era of love, a dayspring of the new era of light, with which the completion of salvation approaches.

4. If we would define more specifically the relation of Paul, as well as of all the apostles, to the second coming of Christ, we must distinguish: (1.) Between the religious measure [Zeitmass, measure of time] of God's kingdom, and the chronological measure of the world; (2.) Between the apostolical prospect of a future of glory which will be unfolded every day in new morning periods, and the meagre ness of the Ebionitic idea, which has only a marvelous meteor of the Parousia, on the one hand, far behind it, and, on the other, far before it, while it finds itself placed in a troublous period and an ordinary course of the world. The present age in principle ceased at the death and resurrection of Christ, and the future age is already present in the heart of the Church and in the world's great crisis of development, though everywhere still externally surrounded by the nocturnal shades of the old age. And because it has been long present in principle, and in power breaks forth every day more gloriously, our full salvation is brought continually nearer, particularly in all the great epochs of the extensive and intensive enlargement of God's kingdom—all of which are presages of the Parousia, which is infinitely near to religious anticipation, and yet, chronologically, is indeterminably remote. All that must still precede that external Parousia, Paul indicates in Rom. xi. and 2 Thess. ii., and John elaborately describes in figures in the Book of Revelation.

5. The very fact that wickedness seeks the veil of night, is a witness for God's word; and as night is an image of spiritual darkness, and day is an image of spiritual and heavenly light, so are the works of night—sleep, on the one hand, and sinful nocturnal deeds on the other—images of different forms of spiritual corruption, the gross sins, which, indeed, are not only figures, but also phenomena, of spiritual corruptions. On the other hand, the putting on of the day, the armor of the day, have their spiritual meaning. The armor was a very striking figure to the Romans in particular.

6. The two great antitheses of nocturnal life: Lust and strife, pleasure and murder.

7. With the salvation of Christianity to the believer there has also broken for humanity the morning of morality, of good manners, and of true decorum.

8. The 13th verse is an imperishable reminder of Augustine's conversion (see Conf. viii. 12, 28).

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 7. To every one his due! The Christian's royal motto: 1. In reference to his relation to the civil authority; 2. In his intercourse with every man.

HEUBNER: The respect which we, as Christians, owe to the civil authorities, is more than the external fulfilment of duty.

Vers 8-10. Perseverance in love. It is: 1. In respect to our neighbor a debt, which never can be paid; 2. In respect to the law, it is its fulfilment (vers. 8-10).—The debt of love toward our neighbor. 1. It is a very great debt; a. because there are so many creditors; b. because their demands constitute a very important total; c. because it can never be completely cancelled. 2. But it is nevertheless a sweet debt; a. because it is not thoughtlessly paid; b. because it harmonizes with God's commandment; c. because even the attempt to discharge it makes the heart very happy (vers. 8-10).—The debt of love is the only debt of the Christian toward his neighbor which is not only permissible, but even commanded (ver. 8).—The commandment of love toward our neighbor as the substance of all the commandments of the second table (ver. 9).—Why does love work no ill to the neighbor? 1. Because it proceeds from the root of God's eternal love for men; 2. Because it will serve God in the neighbor (ver. 10).—Love the fulfilment of the law 1. The truth of this apostolic sentiment; 2. The importance of it (ver. 10).

STARKE: The heart is known by its behavior just as the sun is by its beams (ver. 9).—Christ's garden not only produces no injurious trees, but even no useless ones (ver. 10).—HEDINGER: The eternal debt of love! Be not weary, brethren! He who loves, will be loved in return; though it be not by the thankless world, it will be by God (ver. 8).—Let no one excuse himself on the ground of ignorance; let no one say, "Who would know the many commandments and prohibitions?" The whole law is contained in the one word love; Micah vi. 8 (ver. 9).

SPENER: There is one debt which we all owe—to love one another; that is such a debt, that, if we should daily count it up, it would always remain just as great as it had been (ver. 8).—Though a thing may sometimes appear to be forbidden, if love requires it, it is not forbidden, but rather commanded; on the other hand, sometimes something may appear to be commanded, but if it is in conflict with love, it is not commanded (ver. 10).

GERLACH: The debt of love is never wholly payable; its fulfilment increases the demands made upon it, for it makes love warmer (ver. 8).

LISCO: The believer's holy love fulfils its obligations even toward every body without exception (vers. 8-10).—The one requirement of love is divided into two chief commandments, in Matt. xxii. 37-40.—HEUBNER: The magnitude of the commandment of love (vers. 8-10).—The harmonizing of the Divine should and the human would can only take place by love; by it, compulsion is transformed into freedom (ver. 9).—Every wicked thing is invariably an unkindness (ver. 10).

BESSER: He who shows love to another in order to get clear of him, has not love (ver. 8).

SCHWEIZER: Love, the fulfilment of the law, or, love performs what the law cannot obtain. The law does not deliver us: 1. Because it is a multiplicity of commandments and prohibitions, which perplex us; 2. Because it pronounces a curse on every one who transgresses a single point; 3. Because it is presented to us as an external power issuing its commands to us; 4. Because it takes refuge in threats and promises. Christian love is the contrary of all this.

Vers. 8-10. THE PERICOPHE for the Fourth Sunday after Epiphany.—THYM: The royal law of love toward our neighbor: 1. Its great necessity; 2. Its inward nature; 3. Its indescribable blessing.—HARLESS: Love is the fulfilment of the law. 1. The law, a. which makes love for us an indebtedness; b. and therefore proves it to be our debt. 2. Love, a. which knows no indebtedness except to love; b. and therefore does not come from the law, but from faith.—HEUBNER: The simplicity of Christian virtue: 1. It proceeds from one spirit of humility and love; 2. All its effects harmonize in one—the manifestation of love.

Vers. 1-14. The decided breach of believing Christians with darkness: 1. Wherefore should we break off from it? a. because it is time to do it; b. because it is high time. 2. In what should this breach consist? a. in laying off the works of darkness; a. gross, sensual sins; b. subtle, inward sins; b. in putting on the armor of light; a. in walking honestly as in the day; b. in putting on the Lord Jesus Christ (or, α . civil righteousness; β . righteousness of faith).

LUTHER: Do not torture the body excessively by the intolerable holiness of watching, fasting, and freezing, as the hypocrites do (ver. 14).

STARKE: I must show outwardly what I am inwardly. Those who are inwardly good, must also have a good form and color (ver. 13).—QUESNEL: Time passes by, and eternity presses on (ver. 11).—MÜLLER: There is many a thing and idea comprised in putting on Christ; our Christianity is not a stagnant existence, but a growth; it is no leap, but a walk (ver. 12).—The armor of light well becomes a Christian. We must either clothe ourselves with darkness or with light (ver. 12).

SPENER: Let us put on the Lord Jesus Christ. But we put Him on once by the belief that we receive, as our possession, His righteousness and merit, which He has imparted to us, and that we shall appear in them alone, before God's throne. We afterward put Him on also by godly imitation, in walking as Christ has walked (ver. 14).

LISCO: The one care for the body, in bestowing upon it what is necessary, is natural; the other is sinful, when the lusts and desires of the body are provided for (ver. 14).

HEUBNER: Christian watchfulness (vers. 11–14). Christian knowledge of the time. The time of Christianity is a time of salvation (ver. 11).—There are many awakening voices: Public services—preachers—every stroke of the bell—the Bible (ver. 11).—The Christian is not a night-walker, a nocturnal rioter, but a walker by day (ver. 13).—Temperance, chastity, love—three great prime virtues (ver. 13).—SCHWEIZER: Blissful joy at the Reformation as a rising light (Sermon on the Anniversary Day of the Reformation).

Vers. 11–14. THE PERICOPHE for the First Sunday of Advent.—HEUBNER: The call of Christianity is a call to awake from spiritual sleep.—The appeal of Christian watchmen: 1. It is day; the sun is risen! 2. Awake, arise! 3. Be purified to new life! 4. Put on Christ!—NAGEL: The awakening voice with which the Church appeals to us on its holy-days, tells us: 1. What time it is; 2. What it is high time to do.—KAPFF: The advent message: 1. As a message of salvation and joy; 2. As a message for penitence and renewal.—FLOREY: The advent season is a holy morning-time of the heart and life.—HARLESS: The festal ornament well-pleasing to Christ: 1. A watchful eye, to see the night that covers the earth; 2. An enlightened eye, to behold the day which has come; 3. A willing heart, to do what the day requires.—PETRI: What time is it for us? 1. To arise from sleep; 2. To put on the armor of light.—RAUTENBERG: What belongs to rising from sleep? 1. To open the eyes aright; 2. To put on the right garment; 3. To take up the right armor.—THYM: Paul's vigorous advent preaching: 1. On the advent time; 2. On the advent duties; 3. On the advent blessing.

[FARINDON, on ver. 14: Look into Christ's wardrobe, and you will find no torn or ragged apparel. Christ had the robe of righteousness, the garment of innocency, the spotless coat of temperance and chastity, and with these He went about doing good. Out of this wardrobe we must make up our wedding garment. We must be conformable to Christ. In the rule of our obedience, we must not wear a garment of our own fancying, an irregular, an unprescribed devotion; in the ends of it, we must glorify

God on the earth; and in the parts of it, we must not have a parcel-garment. This garment must fit every part, and be universal.

[LEIGHTON: He that truly loves his neighbor as himself, will be as loth to wrong him as to wrong himself, either in that honor and respect that is due to him, or in his life, or chastity, or goods, or good name, or to lodge so much as an unjust desire or thought, because that is the beginning and conception of real injury. In a word, the great disorder and crookedness of the corrupt heart of man consists in self-love; it is the very root of all sin both against God and man; for no man commits any offence, but it is in some way to profit or please himself. It was a high enormity of self-love that brought forth the very first sin of mankind. That was the bait which took, more than either the color or the taste of the apple—that it was desirable for knowledge.

[JOHN HOWE, on ver. 10: Would it not make a happy world, if we all so loved our neighbor: 1. That we would no more hurt him than we would ourselves; 2. Would no more cheat him than we would ourselves; 3. No more oppress and crush him than we would ourselves.—What a spring of mischief and misery in the world would be shut up, dried up, if that proneness to hard, harsh, and frequently unjust thoughts, were, by the workings of such a spirit of love, erased out of the minds and hearts of men!

[BURKITT, on ver. 14: This implies: 1. That the soul of man, since the fall, is in a naked state, destitute of those divine graces of the Holy Spirit which were its original clothing in the day of undefiled innocency; 2. That Jesus Christ is our spiritual clothing; a. in His righteousness, to pardon and justify us, He is our clothing, to cover the guilt of sin out of God's sight; b. In His grace, to sanctify us, by which He cleanses us from our sins, pollution, and filthiness; c. that Jesus Christ, in order to our spiritual clothing, must be put on by faith: an unapplied Christ justifies none, saves none. It was not sufficient, under the law, that the blood of the sacrifice was shed, but it was also to be sprinkled, in order to the expiation of guilt.

[DODDRIDGE, on ver. 14: By putting on the Lord Jesus: 1. We make the gospel day yet brighter in the eyes of all around us; 2. We anticipate, while here in this world of comparative darkness, the lustre with which we hope, through Christ's in fluence and grace, to shine forth in the celestial kingdom of our Father.

[JOHN WESLEY: The whole law under which we now are, is fulfilled by love. Faith, working or animated by love, is all that God now requires of man. He has substituted, not sincerity, but love, for angelic perfection.—Very excellent things are spoken of love—it is the essence, the spirit, the life of all virtue. It is not only the first and great command, but all the commands in one.

[RICHARD WATSON, Sermon on the Armor of Light (ver. 12): I. What the armor of light is, with which the Apostle exhorts us to invest ourselves. II. Why it has the appellation of "armor of light:" (1.) Because of its heavenly origin; (2.) Because it is only found where Christianity exists and exerts its proper influence; (3.) Because it corresponds to the character of our dispensation, which is a dispensation of light. III. The motives which should induce us, in compliance with the exhortation, to array ourselves with it: (1.) From a consideration of the degraded state of man, who is not invested with this armor; (2.) The moral elevation which this armor gives to every one who is invested with it; (3.) We must either conquer or be conquered.

[Hobbes, on ver. 14: All Christian duty is included in putting on the Lord Jesus; in being like Him, having that similarity of temper and conduct which results from being intimately united to Him by the Holy Spirit.—J. F. H.]

FIFTH SECTION.—The true practice of the living worship of God in the management and adjustment of differences between the scrupulous and weak (the captives under the law), and the strong (those inclined to laziness and freedom). The Christian universalism of social life (TO TAKE NO OFFENCE, TO GIVE NO OFFENCE).

CHAP. XIV. 1-XV. 4.

- A. Reciprocal regard, forbearance, and recognition, between the weak and the strong; of taking offence and judging. Chap. xiv. 1-13.
- B. Of giving offence and despising. Chap. xiv. 13-xv. 1.
- 7. Reciprocal edification by self-denial, after the example of Christ. Chap. xv. 2-4

A. Chap. xiv. 1-13.

1 Him that is weak in the faith receive ye, but not to doubtful disputations
 2 [judgments of thoughts].¹ For one believeth that he may eat all things:
 3 another, [but he] who is weak, eateth herbs. Let not him that eateth [or, the eater] despise him that eateth not [or, the abstainer]; and let not him which eateth not [or, the abstainer]² judge him that eateth [or, the eater]: for God 4 hath received him. Who art thou that judgest another man's servant? to his own master he standeth or falleth; yea, he shall be holden up [made to stand]:
 5 for God [the Lord]³ is able⁴ to make him stand. One man esteemeth one day above another: another esteemeth every day alike. Let every man be fully 6 persuaded in his own mind. He that [who] regardeth the day, regardeth it unto the Lord; and he that regardeth not the day, to the Lord he doth not regard it [omit this clause].⁵ He that [And⁶ he who] eateth, eateth to the Lord, for he giveth God thanks [thanks unto God]; and he that [who] eateth not, to 7 the Lord he eateth not, and giveth God thanks [thanks unto God]. For none 8 of us liveth to himself, and no man [none] dieth to himself. For whether we live, we live unto the Lord; and whether we die, we die⁷ unto the Lord:
 9 whether we live therefore, or die, we are the Lord's. For to this end Christ both died, and rose, and revived [Christ died and lived again],⁸ that he might 10 be Lord both of the dead and [the] living. But why dost thou judge thy brother? or why dost thou set at nought thy brother? for we shall all stand 11 before the judgment-seat of Christ [God].⁹ For it is written,¹⁰ As I live, saith the Lord, every knee shall bow to me, and every tongue shall confess [give 12 praise] to God. So then every one of us shall give¹¹ account of himself to 13 God. Let us not therefore judge one another any more:

B. Chap. xiv. 13-xv. 1.

13 But judge this rather, that no man [not to] put a stumbling-block or an 14 occasion to fall [of falling] in his [a] brother's way. I know, and am persuaded by [in] the Lord Jesus, that there is nothing [that nothing is] unclean of itself:¹² but to him that esteemeth any thing to be [accounteth any thing] 15 unclean, to him it is unclean. But [For]¹³ if thy brother be grieved with thy meat [if because of thy meat thy brother is grieved], now walkest thou not charitably [thou art no longer walking according to love]. Destroy not him 16 with thy meat, [Destroy not by thy meat him] for whom Christ died. Let not 17 then your¹⁴ good be evil spoken of: For the kingdom of God is not meat and drink [eating and drinking]; but righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy

- 18 Ghost. For he that [who] in these things [herein]¹ serveth Christ is accep² 19 able [well-pleasing] to God, and approved of men. Let us therefore follow³ after the things which make for peace [the things of peace], and things where with one may edify another [the things which pertain to mutual edification], 20 For meat destroy not the work of God. All things indeed are pure [clean];
 21 but it is evil for that [the] man who eateth with [through] offence. It is good neither [not] to eat flesh, nor to drink wine, nor [to do] any thing whereby [wherein] thy brother stumbleth, or is offended,⁴ or is made [omitted made] weak.
 22 Hast thou faith?⁵ have it to thyself before God. Happy [Blessed] is he that condemneth [who judgeth] not himself in that thing [omitted thing] which he 23 alloweth. And [But] he that [who] doubteth is damned [condemned] if he eat, because he eateth [it is] not of faith: for [and] whatsoever is not of faith is sin.

Chap. xv. 1 We then [Now we who] that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak, and not to please ourselves.

C. Chap. xv. 2-4.

- 2 Let⁶ every one of us⁷ please his neighbour for his good [with a view] to 3 edification. For even Christ pleased not himself; but, as it is written,⁸ The 4 reproaches of them that reproached thee fell on me. For whatsoever things were written aforetime were written⁹ for our learning [instruction], that we through [the]¹⁰ patience and [the] comfort of the Scriptures might have [our] hope.

⁵ Ver. 6.—The clause: καὶ ὁ μὲν ὁρῶν τὴν ἡμέραν, κυρίῳ οὐ φρονεῖ, is omitted in N. B. C¹ D. F., Vulgate, Coptic, by Augustine, Jerome, Rufinus, Pelagius, Hilary, Mill, Lachmann, Meyer, Tregelles (in the versions of the Amer. Bible Union and of Five Ang. Clergymen). It is found in (Rec.) C² L., Peshito, in Chrysostom and Theodoret; retained by Reiche, De Wette, Fritzsche, Philippi, Stuart, Wordsworth, Lange. Tischendorf varies in his different editions; Alford brackets it. The usual explanation of those who retain it is, that the omission was occasioned by the similar ending (φρονεῖ) in both clauses having misled some of the early copyists. To this Dr. Lange adds: "The fear that the clause might be used to support a disregard of Christian holidays." Alford thinks it may have been omitted in the interest of the observance of the Lord's Day. His own view on this subject probably leads him to bracket the clause. The usual authority is so strongly against it, and the want of completeness in the antitheses might so easily have led to its insertion, that there need be but little hesitation in omitting it. Dr. Hodge is silent respecting the whole matter.

⁹ Ver. 10.—[Instead of Χριστῷ (Rec. N¹ L., many versions and fathers), Θεῷ is found in N¹ A. B. C¹ D. F. some fathers. The latter is supported by Fritzsche, Lachmann, Tischendorf, Meyer, Alford, Wordsworth, Tregelles, Lange; the former by the older critics, Tholuck, De Wette, Philippi. Dr. Hodge says the latter "is retained by most critical editors;" but the current of criticism now sets against it; and what was true at the date of his first edition (1835), was scarcely correct at the appearance of the edition of 1866. Χριστῷ was probably inserted to correspond with ver. 6 (or from 2 Cor. v. 10), though it is also claimed that Θεῷ was substituted to correspond with vers. 11, 12. Much has been said on both sides, but the MS. authority seems decisive in favor of Θεῷ.]

¹⁴ Ver. 15.—[N. A. B. C. D. F. G., Vulgate, and fathers: εἰ γὰρ; adopted by Griesbach, Lachmann, Tischendorf, Tholuck, Meyer, Alford, Wordsworth, Jowett, Tregelles, Lange. Rec. (with no uncial authorities) some versions: εἰ δέ; adopted by Philippi, Hodge, De Wette, and the older editors. Dr. Hodge, in his new edition, states the exegetical ground for the latter reading, but is hardly justified in adding: "the majority of commentators and editors retain the common text." Certainly the better supported reading is the more difficult one, hence doubly preferable on critical grounds. See the Exeg. Notes. Stuart says the sense seems to require γὰρ, but takes no notice of the fact that it is read in the uncial MSS.

²⁴ Ver. 4.—[N. A. B. C. D. L., repeat δὶ before τῆς παρακλήσεως. Omitted in Rec., D. F., versions and fathers. It is adopted by Griesbach, Bengel, Lachmann, De Wette, Alford, Wordsworth, Tregelles; rejected by Hodge, Philippi, Meyer, because the transcriber might so readily repeat it before τῆς occurring a second time. Still, the most careful editors retain it. Dr. Hodge says, in his first and last editions: "The preponderance of evidence is greatly against it;" and yet, in citing the authorities in favor of it, omits B. and N., the two most important uncials, both of which had been collated carefully before his last edition appeared.—B.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

General Preliminary Remarks.—After the Apostle has described the duties of Christians, especially of the Christians at Rome, in their various general, fundamental relations: (1.) As duties toward the Church; (2.) In all personal relations; (3.) Toward the State; and, (4.) Toward the world, he proceeds to lay down the universal deportment of the Roman Church, by establishing the proper reciprocal conduct between the strong (δυνατοί) and the weak (ἀδυνατοί, chap. xv. 1; ἀσθενεῖς, chap. xiv. 1).

In the first place, it is manifest that such a difference existed. This is especially evident from chap. xv. 7-9. Second, it is likewise evident that the one tendency springing from Judaism was a legally punctilious tendency; while the other, being connected with heathen culture and freedom, was more liberal. This is supported in a very general way by the connection of this opposition with the forms of opposition which the Apostle treats in his Epistles to the Corinthians, Galatians, Colossians, &c. There is the following characteristic of the antithesis as it appears here: Some are weak in regard to faith, the freedom of faith, while others are strong in this respect (chap. xiv. 21, 22). Some lay stress on their (under conditions which are not stated) eating no meat, drinking no wine (ver. 21), and keeping certain holy-days. The others know that they are free in this respect, and, proud of their freedom, and regardless of the consequence, seem inclined to use it at the expense of fellowship and unanimity. It is therefore the contrast of the punctilious and the large-hearted and liberal consciences (that is, decisions of conscience). Hence it is also characteristic of the former class, that they are inclined to judge, to take offence; and of the others, that they are inclined to despise, and thus to give offence. This contrast is so definite, that we deem it best to divide the section accordingly. Further, it follows from this that the more liberal party—we might even say the Pauline—was decidedly in the ascendancy (particularly according to chaps. xiv. 1 and xv. 1), since it was necessary to make the repeated admonition, not to break off fellowship with the others. Though the Jewish-Christian element in the Church was a numerous one, it does not follow that the element of punctilious believers was equally so.

Finally, it is absolutely necessary to distinguish the standpoint of these punctilious believers as well from the very marked (alike in degree, but in fact divided) standpoints of the Galatian and Colossian false teachers, as from the not less marked but yet already schismatic standpoint of the Petrine party of Corinth. The Apostle designates the Galatian false teachers, in chap. ii. 4, as false brethren; he conditionally excludes them from communion, in so far as they persist in their doctrinally false gospel, and would make circumcision (which is at the same time the requirement of the legal standpoint) a necessary condition of Christian salvation. By these Ebionites there can only be meant Pharisaic, purely Jewish, people.* The Colossian false teachers are, in degree, not less false brethren, because they likewise adulterate the ground of salvation by dogmatic confidence; but their characteristic plainly leads to the supposition of Essenic Ebionites, for their worship of angels and their asceticism indicate an infusion of heathen elements into Judaism.† There were also such false brethren elsewhere (2 Cor. xi. 26); and the false apostles in 2 Cor. xi. 13 were, undoubtedly, actually connected with the Galatian false teachers. The Petrine party itself, however, which does not seem, in the first place, to have extended beyond ethical, liturgical, and ascetic peculiarities and inclinations to separation, must be distinguished from these agitators, who furthered the doctrinal adulteration of the law.

Yet the case stood still better with the weak brethren in Rome. The Apostle treats them so gently, that we can evidently not take them for decidedly Ebionitic Christians, nor according to the degree and manner of the Galatian and Colossian false teachers, nor according to the intimates of Ebionitism in the Corinthian church. He forbids them only from pronouncing sentence, from their own conscientious standpoint, upon their more liberal brethren; whereas, he even takes their right of conscience against the more liberal brethren under his protection; and there is nothing said of an anathema, as in the Epistle to the Galatians, nor of a warning, as in the Epistle to the Colossians, nor of a censure, as in the Epistles to the Corinthians, to say nothing of the severe criticisms in the Pastoral Epistles. If the Apostle could have expressed such different opinions on the same Ebionitic phantom of Dr. Baur, his character itself would be to us a phantom; that is, all theology would itself have to be gradually transformed into a phantom.

By regarding the mild † judgment expressed by the Apostle on the weak brethren in the Church at Rome, we are therefore aided in finding out the character of their standpoint. Various suppositions:

† [Comp. Lange's Comm. Colossians, Introd., p. 7, where the character of these false teachers is discussed. The effort to define them by means of the nomenclature of subsequent heresies has led to the greatest variety of opinions. (Even the Ebionites do not date back of the destruction of Jerusalem.) They were ascetics, undoubtedly; their views might be called Ebionitic; yet, when we recall the Phrygian character and consider the large Jewish element in that region, we see the seeds which were then just springing up, to bear fruit in the heresies so prolific in that region. Phrygian Ebionitism in the germ, is, perhaps, the best definition.—R.]

‡ [The rebuke was mild indeed then, but how pregnant its meaning as we regard it to-day. Where could one repeat more appropriately than in Rome these words: "Who art thou that judgest another man's servant?" He who is strongest in the Roman Church of to-day, is "weak," according to the Apostle's judgment.—R.]

1. They were Jewish Christians, who wished to retain the law, and also the legal holy-days, sabbaths, new-moon feasts (the early commentators, Chrysostom, Ambrose, &c., Calvin, and others). Origen's rejoinder: "Meat and wine were not forbidden in the law." Tholuck observes, that Paul speaks in quite a different tone against such Judaists. The laying down of this category becomes justifiable, if we distinguish between doctrinal and ethical legality, in reference to the laws on food and purification. For the reason given above, the question here cannot be concerning a doctrinal statute.

2. Jewish-Christian ascetics. For examples of them, see Tholuck, p. 699. But pure Judaism is a stranger to all strictly doctrinal forms of asceticism, and is acquainted only with an ethical form: (1.) That of the Nazarites for the whole life; (2.) That of the Nazaritic vow for a limited time; (3.) The theocratic general and special ordinance of fasts; (4.) The personal fasting of individuals in special states of life. But there can be nothing said here of all this, and just as little of the doctrinal asceticism of Christians of Essenic prejudices,* on whom the Apostle has expressed himself in Col. ii. Thus the view of Baur, and others, falls to the ground. On the abundant confusion arising from the supposition that heathen motives are connected with the motives of the weak brethren here, see Tholuck's quotations on the Neo-Platonists, the Pythagoreans, and the Gnostic Ebionites, pp. 699 ff. These do not belong here with the cited examples of Jewish Nazarites, because the latter never thought of compelling others to adopt their manner of life.

3. Ethical and social motives, arising from fear of mingling with the heathen sacrificial customs. Tholuck says: "According to Augustine, reference is here made to the same persons as in 1 Cor. viii. the reference here being to those who, because they, in buying food at the market, could not sufficiently distinguish the meat offered to idols, preferred to abstain altogether from eating meat. This explanation is implied by Cocceius, and has recently been defended by Michaelis, Philippi, and especially by Neander, and certainly has by far the strongest grounds in its favor." The weak brethren, therefore, were not influenced by doctrinal but by ethical motives: (1.) Fear of eating meat offered to idols; (2.) Of drinking the wine of the heathen drink-offerings (Deut. xxxii. 38; (3.) In addition to this was their necessity of still retaining as a pious custom the Jewish holy-days, for it is well known that the Sabbath, which was observed together with Sunday, gradually died out in the Church as a day of rest.† As examples of the abstinence named, Tho-

* [Meyer, and others, adopt the opinion Dr. Lange here rejects. Dr. Hodge seems to incline to this view; but he is not decided in his preference of it, for he adds: "There is nothing inconsistent with the assumption that the weak brethren here spoken of were scrupulous Jewish Christians."—R.]

† [Dean Alford (following De Wette) presents a modification of this view: "The over-scrupulous Jew became an ascetic by compulsion. He was afraid of pollution by eating meats sacrificed or wine poured to idols; or even by being brought into contact, in foreign countries, with casual and undiscoverable uncleanness, which in his own land he knew the articles offered for food would be sure not to have incurred. He therefore abstained from all prepared food, and confined himself to that which he could trace from natural growth to his own use." "All difficulty, then, is removed, by supposing that of these over-scrupulous Jews some had become converts to the gospel, and with neither the obstinacy of legal Judaists, nor the pride of ascetics (for these are not hinted at here), but in weakness of faith, and the scruples of an over-tender conscience, retained their habits book cites Daniel (chap. i. 8, 12, 16), Esther (chap. iv. 16), Tobias (chap. i. 12), and the Maccabees (2 Macc. v. 27). The gradations (cited by Tholuck) of this scrupulousness on the part of the punctilious Jews, do not here come into consideration, as the weak brethren, according to Philippi's observation, did not withdraw from eating with the Gentiles (?) and the Gentile Christians. Likewise, the decree in Acts xv. is justifiably cited in favor of the view presented. Tholuck, with Philippi, is right in not admitting that, because of an adherence to special holidays, there were two parties among the weak brethren.

4. Various views. According to Erasmus, and others, both the tradition of laws respecting food and the fear of eating meat offered to idols, were motives. According to Chrysostom, and others, they would refrain from all meat, to escape blame, in consequence of the Jewish disdain of swine-meat. According to Eichhorn, these people were generally Gentile-Christian ascetics, who entertained philosophic and ascetic principles, especially the Neo-Pythagorean. Meyer supposes the "influence of Essenic principles," yet so that they are not led into conflict with justification by faith; however, he opposes Baur's view, that the people were Ebionitic Christians, because abstinence from wine by the Ebionites has been nowhere certified. He asserts, against view (3.), that the Apostle did not speak, as in 1 Cor. viii. 10, of the sacrificial character of meat and wine—as if this had been necessary in the presence of the well-known variance in the Church at Rome! After all, the object of the scrupulousness here was not the principal thing, but the laying down of the canon by which "the weak and the strong" in a church specially called to universality have to preserve their unanimity—the one class, by not taking offence in a Pharisaic, censorious spirit, and the other, by not giving offence in a reckless arrogance of freedom.

A. Chap. xiv. 1-18: Reciprocal regard, forbearance, and recognition between the weak and the strong. Especially of the taking offence and judging on the part of the weak. Meyer, on vers. 1-12: "Fraternal behavior toward the weak asked for (ver. 1). The first point of difference between the two classes, and the encouragement because of it (ver. 5). The proper point of view for both in their differences (ver. 6), and its establishment (vers. 7-9); censure and impermissibility of the opposite course of conduct (vers. 10-12)."

Ver. 1. Him that is weak in the faith [τὸν δὲ ἀσθενέστερον τῇ πίστει]. The δὲ connects with the foregoing; chap. xiii. 14. After the Apostle has expressed the recognition of physical necessities, and the necessity of limiting the provision for them, he finds himself induced, first of all, to admonish those more freely disposed in this respect to be forbearing toward the weak (Meyer, Philippi). This applies to the formal connection; * but, according to the real connection, he must come, at any rate, to this difference between Jewish Christianity and Gentile Christianity (De Wette), although only the first elements of it were present in the Roman Church.

Weak in the faith. The feeble in respect to faith, the standpoint of faith and its consequences. Since each party reciprocally held the other as the weaker in faith, we might think that in this sense the general exhortation applies to both parts in the sense of: him who appears to you as weak in the faith. But Paul does not deny his standpoint; he immediately afterward calls one who is scrupulous respecting food: ὁ ἀσθενῶν. And this is important; it proves that the Apostle does not design to deprive the strong of the liberty, which he himself takes, of frankly expressing his judgment on the differences. The strong should therefore stand to their conviction; but they should not make any such application of it as would be against brotherly love and fellowship. According to Tholuck, his reason for addressing the strong first (yet not "altogether," though "chiefly") was, not that the Gentile Christians constituted the great majority of the Church, but, on the principle stated by Chrysostom, that the weaker part stands in continual need of most care. Yet the Christians of Pauline tendencies, who must not be identified strictly with Gentile Christians, constitute the body of the Church.

As the two parties were not at all separated, the προσλαμβάνεσθαι cannot mean exactly receive; at least not in the sense of strict communion (Erasmus, Grotius, Luther, and others), nor receive him to yourselves (Olshausen [Hodge, Stuart], and others), according to Acts xxviii. 2. Between these there lies the idea of reception in the emphatic sense, to draw into an inward, friendly intercourse. [Alford: "Give him your hand," as Syr. (Tholuck): 'count him one of you,' opposed to rejecting or discouraging him."—R.] In such relations of difference, the relative danger of intolerance always lies on the stronger side; therefore the case was very different in Rome from what it was in Galatia. Yet the Apostle does not fail to point out the intolerance on the part of those who are punctilious.—Explanations of the πίστει:

1. The religious belief of the ecclesiastical doctrine (Origen, Augustine, Aquinas, Luther, Calvin, Beza; Luther: the Lutheran theologians in part).

2. Moral conviction in reference to what is permissible (Este, Bellarmine, Erasmus, some of the older Protestant theologians, Arminians, Socinians). [So Stuart, Hodge.]

3. Accommodating explanations: The practical application of faith (Chrysostom, and others); knowledge (Grotius, Semler).

Against (1.) it must be said (apart from the fact that a difference still exists between the doctrine of faith, as such, and the vital energy of justifying faith), that the Apostle does not here emphasize the antithesis of truth and error, but that of confidence and doubt. Against (2.) it may be said, that the reference cannot be, absolutely, to a merely subjective ideal fidelity to conviction without the objective basis of truth. It is clear from ver. 6, that the Apostle ascribes to both parties religious faith as well as fidelity to conviction; that the weaker brother holds, in a certain sense, most inflexibly to his conviction, follows from the fact that he is of the party that judges, while the other is of the party that despises. Ver. 23 says, that he can even sin against his faith by eating in doubt; and the context says, as well, that the less careful brother can of abstinence and observation of days." But in a Church which was metropolitan, and hence cosmopolitan, other peculiarities might sharpen the distinction between the weak and the strong. Such divisions are the result of temperament, as well as of nationality and education.—R.]

sin against his faith by an uncharitable abuse of his freedom. Thus both parties have and exercise faith, being true to their conviction of faith; but the weak in faith show their weakness by not venturing, in the traditional scrupulousness of their legal conscience, to draw the full conclusion from their justifying faith, in order to break through their religious prejudices and prepossessions.

The Apostle proves that he does not recognize this weakness as a permanent rule for their life, by the candidly expressed conviction of his standpoint, as well as by his doctrine, in ver. 14; but he does not wish that the free development of their consistency of faith should be affected by the strong giving them offence, either to make them more scrupulous, or to mislead to a frivolous transgression of their conscientious limits. As, therefore, faith in 1 Cor. xii. 9 is a vigorous faith in reference to performing miracles, so here, in reference to the practical development of life; in both cases there is the full consequence of world-conquering confidence—there, in overcoming the force of the disturbed states of body and soul, and here, in conquering the power of legal misconceptions and prejudices. Tholuck is correct in observing, that the two explanations (of religious faith and fidelity to conviction) do not conflict with each other. The religious Christian faith, according to its practical form in the developing stage of the dictate of conscience, comprises both elements; as even the early expositors, who explained πίστις by saving faith, have generally placed the certitudo conscientiae along with it (see Tholuck, p. 705); while, on the other hand, it is made emphatic in many ways, that reference here is to the moral conviction of those who believe in Christ on the ground of this faith (Meyer). [Philippi, Tholuck, Meyer, and most German commentators, together with Alford, and others, have carefully guarded against the purely subjective meaning: moral conviction, adopted by Stuart and Hodge. At the same time, they very properly reject the purely objective sense of πίστις, Christian doctrine—a sense which the word rarely, if ever, has in the New Testament. Hence the correct rendering is not: weak in faith, or as to faith (Hodge), for thus the article is ignored, nor yet: weak in his faith, which is too subjective, but (as in E. V.): weak in the faith. Alford: “Holding the faith imperfectly—i. e., not being able to receive the faith in its strength, so as to be above such prejudices.”—R.]

But not to judgments of thoughts [μη εἰς διακρίσεις διαλογισμῶν]. Dr. Lange: Doch nicht zur Aburtheilung von Beweggründen. See below.—R.] Διακρίσεις means, in 1 Cor. xii. 10 and Heb. v. 14, to pronounce judgment, sentence. Διαλογισμοί generally denotes thoughts, but, regarded as moral (or often immoral) motives, imaginations (Rom. i. 21; 1 Cor. iii. 20), or even doubts (Phil. ii. 14; 1 Tim. ii. 8). Accordingly, the connection leads to the explanation: Not to the judicial decision of motives. Do not keep frequent company with them for the object, or even to such an issue of the matter, that the mutual motives or differences shall be concluded by premature decision, that a fault-finding of the different tendencies can arise from it. It is evident that the expression cannot mean: “Not for criticizing scrupulous niceties,” as an exhortation to the strong (Tholuck).* For the Apostle himself has criticized the scrupulous niceties of the weak sufficiently plainly, by characterizing them as weak, and not yielding their point theoretically. Philippi is right when he observes that, throughout the present chapter, the Apostle ascribes the κρίνειν to the weak, but the ἐκουθισαίν to the strong. Yet he arrives at the explanation: Receive them affectionately, so that no mental doubts arise in them. But this is something quite different from Luther's expression: Do not perplex their consciences. Mental doubts must needs arise in them, and even be awakened, if one would aid them to a more liberal standpoint. But, in their theoretical treatment, they must not be forced beyond the measure of their weakness, but such a premature decision should not also arise on their side. Paul could well exact of the strong, that they should not eat meat for the sake of the weak, &c.; but not, that they should hypocritically deny their more liberal view in mental intercourse with them, or allow it to be overcome and judged. This submission of many a more discerning one to the harsh judgment of the narrow-minded has ever been a source of serious injury. But the measure of possibility should be, to treat the differences as non-essential peculiarities, on the common ground of being the measure of a truly hearty, but also very careful, intercourse (comp. chap. xvi. 17, 18). This premature decision of what the development of spiritual life can harmonize only in time, is therefore forbidden to both parties. The strong are, however, chiefly recommended to deport themselves according to their difficult task, just because the others are chiefly inclined to judge. This view becomes still stronger, if εἰς be taken in the sense of result.

If we distinguish candidly the two views: 1. Receive them, but not so that a reciprocal mental judgment is the result of it; 2. Receive them, but not to pronounce judgment on their scruples (Grotius, and others), we must urge against (2.), that the stress lies on the modality, on the manner in which the strong should be accustomed to cultivate intercourse with the weak.* Therefore Reiche is right in referring the prohibition to both parties, and Chrysostom was not incorrect in attributing criticizing to the weak. That διακρίσεις may also mean doubt (Theophylact), does not come further into consideration. Erasmus, Beza, Er. Schmid, have accepted the classical meaning of “doubt” for διαλογισμοί, and “conflict” for διακρίσεις. [So E. V.] Therefore disputations. But these have ever been unavoidable, and even Paul has not avoided them.

Ver. 2. For one believeth, &c. [ὅς μὲν πιστεύει, κ.τ.λ.] The explanation: He is convinced that he can eat every thing (πιστεῖν ἐξέναι; Tholuck, Reiche, and others), makes faith a subjective opinion. But it rather means: He has a confidence of faith, according to which he can eat every thing (ὥστε φαγεῖν πάντα; Fritzsche, Meyer, Philippi).

But he who is weak [ὁ δὲ ἀσθενῶν].

* [So Alford: “In order to settle the points on which he has scruples.” Hodge: “Not presuming to sit in judgment on the opinions of your brethren.”—R.]

* [Fritzsche, Tholuck, Meyer, De Wette, Alford, and most, apply this added clause (caution; Meyer) of the exhortation to the strong alone. Notwithstanding Dr. Lange's objection, it seems the preferable view; for certainly the first part of the verse is addressed to the strong exclusively, and the διακρίσεις, which means “power of distinguishing between” (Alford), is more applicable to them. Besides, in ver. 4 the exhortation comes in turn to the weak, &c. The word διαλογισμῶν means thoughts, generally in malam partem, in the New Testament. It is referred by the authors above named to the scrupulous thoughts cherished by the weak. The idea of doubt enters only in connection with this reference.—R.]

The E. V. assumes a strict antithesis here, but the τὸν ἀσθενήσαντα (ver. 1) is resumed; hence it is not necessary to find any other special reason for the anacoluthon, though another may be allowable.—R.] The Apostle does not continue with ὁ δὲ, because he will first take the weak into special consideration.—Eateth herbs. Λάχαρα. The expression is pressed by Meyer, but something symbolical or hyperbolical will nevertheless have to be allowed to his explanation; for example, the joint designation of bread, of vegetable food in general.* And it would follow from his view, that this eating of vegetables is an essential characteristic of the weak one, which can be urged with as little literalness as that the strong one is addicted to the eating of all kinds of food. His characteristic is the eating of meat, free from all ordinances. Therefore Fritzsche, Philippi, and others, would not regard the expression as an unconditional preclusion from all enjoyment of meat, as Meyer does. Philippi: "Some would only absolutely refrain from eating meat in order the more easily to overcome temptation in special cases, and others only in those special cases, particularly in the social meals, where their conduct was marked in the church as surprising; and, finally, others would only do so at the social meals, where they were certain that the meat placed before them was meat offered to idols, or, at any rate, were uncertain whether or not it was meat offered to idols. But all these could be very well designated as λαχανοφάγοι."

Ver. 3. Let not him who eateth despise, &c. The ἐξουθενεῖν is the specifically improper conduct of him who, occupying a more liberal point of view, in his own wisdom pleases himself (Tholuck: "The conceit of illuminism, which was found even among the Gentile Christians, as 1 Cor. viii.")—Judge. On the other hand, the κρίνειν is the specifically improper conduct of the legal believer, and it is not correct to suppose that (according to Tholuck) the ἐξουθενεῖν belongs as a species under this κρίνειν. That the Apostle, in the present section, has, first of all, to do with the one judging, the one taking offence, is plain, as well from the construction of the foregoing verse as from the succeeding fourth verse. It is also clear from the additional:

For God hath received him [ὁ Θεὸς γὰρ αὐτὸν προσελάβετο]. He has been received into the communion of God and Christ, and thou wilt excommunicate him? This should always be perceived by believers relying on the letter, in relation to Christians who are established upon the real ground of faith. [Stuart and Hodge (following Calvin) apply this clause to both classes, but this is forbidden both by the context and by the fact that the strong are not disposed to reject but to despise the weak; while the weak are ever for excommunicating the strong, withdrawing from fellowship, &c. Hence the pertinence of the clause to this class. So Meyer, De Wette, Philippi, Alford, and most.—R.] The mark of this reception is rather the peace and light of fellowship with God, than reception into the Church. Yet this also comprises the fact, that God has received him into His service as a servant (Vatabl.), but only indirectly.

* That he does not mention bread, but vegetables, can be of service in the exegesis. Even bread first passed through the hands of many people; he could more easily have vegetables from the first hand. In this sense it was the shibboleth of the weak one. Therefore his motive was the careful avoidance of contamination from fellowship with the heathen.

Ver. 4. Who art thou? &c. [σὺ τίς εἶ, x.t.λ. Comp. chap. ix. 30.] Tholuck is here quite beyond the connection (in consequence of the supposition that ἐξουθενεῖν is only a species of κρίνειν), when he questions whether the weak one here judging is addressed. The σὺ is claimed to belong to both parts (also according to Reiche and Chrysostom) [Stuart, Hodge]; while Meyer and Philippi, on the contrary, properly find in it an address to the weak one judging.

Another man's servant [ἀλλότριον οἰκέτην]. Paul uses οἰκέτης only here, and it occurs in the New Testament but rarely (Luke xvi. 13; Acts x. 7; 1 Peter ii. 18). It means a house-servant, who is more closely connected with the family than the other slaves (Meyer).—R.] We must not pass lightly over the ἀλλότριον. It means not merely another, but a strange one. Meyer, and others: "He who is not in thy service, but in the service of another. But the one who judges is also in the service of this other one. That which causes him to judge, is not chiefly the notion that he is the master of this servant, but that the servant conducts himself in his service as an ἀλλότριος, who has in him much that is in itself surprising. The weak one fails to find in him the manner of the οἰκέτιος."

To his own master [τῷ ἰδίῳ κυρίῳ]. The κύριος is still chiefly figurative, the master of the strange servant. In order to understand the thought to its fullest extent, we must first consider the figure. It is the figure of a master who takes many kinds of servants in his service. Now, if he has one from a foreign country who makes himself a surprising exception, the matter belongs to the master alone, who has become "his own master"—that is, the exclusive master.

Standeth or falleth [στήκει ἢ πίπτει]. The standing and falling, as an expression of God's judgment (Ps. i. 5; Luke xxi. 36, &c.), has therefore also the further figurative meaning of standing or not standing in the household judgment. But this figure is from the beginning a clear designation of the relation in which Jewish and Gentile Christians stand to Christ. Christ is the Master; see vers. 8, 9; comp. 1 Cor. vi. 20; 1 Peter ii. 9. The dative may be regarded as dative comm., even if the master himself is the judge, because it is his loss or gain if the servant falls or stands. Explanations:

1. The standing or falling is judicially understood as God's judgment (Calvin, Grotius, and many others).

2. The continuance or non-continuance in true Christian life is meant (Vatabl., Semler, De Wette, Maier, Meyer).

The opposition of these two views has no well-justified meaning, since, in a religious sense, God's judgment is executed through the life.* Meyer, indeed, says, in favor of (2.): "To make stand in the judgment (to abide), is not the work of Divine power, but of grace." But besides the fact that power and grace do not lie so far asunder, there comes into consideration the further fact, that the question here is not concerning a making to stand chiefly in God's judgment, but in the univerted judgment of men (Ebionitism, hierarchism, &c.).

He shall be made to stand [σταθήσεται].

* [If, however, the judgment be confined to the final and future one, there is an opposition, and (1.) must be rejected. Alford: "Remains in the place and estimation of a Christian, from which those would eject him." This is simplest and best.—R.]

§2]. Here the Apostle completely withdraws the figurative veil from the thought. The strong man will remain standing in his freedom of faith.*

For the Lord is able to make him stand [δυνατεὶ γὰρ ὁ κύριος στήσαι αὐτόν. See Textual Notes† and †.—R.] Christ supports the believer. If the reading κύριος were regarded as an exegetical correction, we would have to consider, in the reading Θεός, the universal historical, spiritual, and external protection which God has bestowed upon the more liberal heathen Christianity, in opposition to the narrow Jewish Christianity, and to the pure religion of faith in opposition to legally weakened faith. Meyer: "He does not say it as one who gives security, but who hopes." This is against Reiche, who says that Paul could not go security for the perseverance for the strong one in faith, with his liberal views, and hence the reference must be to the being supported in the judgment.† Grotius says, better: est bene ominantia. It must be observed, that the Apostle speaks of the future of the strong man in genere, but not of that of each individual, for he had early experienced that individual men, reputed to be strong, lapsed into anti-nomianism.

Ver. 5. One man esteemeth one day above another [ὅς μιν κρίνει ἡμέραν παρ' ἡμέραν]. He distinguishes one day from another, and selects it as a holy-day. Κρίνειν = probare. The second point of difference. Selections for feast-days, and not for fast-days, are spoken of (Chrysostom, Augustine, Fritzsche). In harmony with the explanation of fast-days, ἡμέραν παρ' ἡμέραν has also been explained by alternis diebus (the Vulgate: judicat diem inter diem; Bengel: the appointment of days for distributing alms). [It has also been referred to the usage in regard to abstinence from meat, &c.—R.] Tholuck: "As from the commandments on food, so also from the Jewish holy-days (Col. ii. 16), particularly the Sabbath, the Jewish Christian could not wean himself, for we find the observance of the Sabbath even in the fifth century of the Church, also in Const. Ap. 25." The same author correctly observes, that the holy-days, among the Jews, were not just the same as fast-days (see also Gal. iv. 10).‡

* [Dr. Hodge, who applies ver. 3 to both weak and strong, although admitting that the admonition is chiefly addressed to the weak, in his comments on this verse, makes a special application about treating the weak in faith with forbearance. This is altogether contrary to the context.—R.]

† [Alford thinks this clause is inapplicable, if standing and falling at the great day are meant. He adds: "Notice, this argument is entirely directed to the weak, who uncharitably judges the strong; not vice-versa. The weak imagines that the strong cannot be a true servant of God, nor retain his steadfastness amidst such temptation. To this the Apostle answers: (1) That such judgment belongs only to Christ, whose servant he is; (2) That the Lord's almighty power is able to keep him up, and will do so." That this expression is not to be taken as absolutely true of individuals, is evident; yet it must not be made too general.—R.]

‡ [Dean Alford argues from this verse against the recognition of the Divine obligation of one day in seven by the Apostle. "The obvious inference from his strain of argument is, that he knew of no such obligation, but believed all times and days to be, to the Christian strong in faith, alike." "It must be carefully remembered, that this inference does not concern the question of the observance of the Lord's Day as an institution of the Christian Church, analogous to the ancient Sabbath, binding on us from considerations of humanity and religious expediency, and by the rules of that branch of the Church in which Providence has placed us, but not in any way inheriting the Divine-appointed obligation of the other, or the strict prohibitions

Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind [ἑκαστος ἐν τῷ ἰδίῳ νοὶ πλήρως πεπεισθῶ]. The Apostle does not decide in a dogmatical way, although he has sufficiently indicated his point of view. But he lays down a rule which infallibly leads to reconciliation. We cannot here translate νοῖς: in his disposition (De Wette), for every one of both these parties would be thus assured in disposition. Rather, every one should seek to change his conviction of feeling—as it is connected with faith in authority, party influence, &c.—into his inmost, spiritually effected conviction. We could therefore here translate νοῖς: in his understanding, his self-reflection, his practical reason, his mediated self-consciousness; the same thought is comprised in the expression: self-understanding, regarded as the conscious and reflecting spiritual life, by which the νοῖς constitutes an antithesis to the immediateness of the νοῦμα (see 1 Cor. xiv. 14, 15). In this tendency the rationalist must become free from the dogma of deistical or pantheistical illuminism, and arrive at true rationality; in this tendency, the one who is bound to ordinances must learn to distinguish between the law of the Spirit and the law of the letter; in this tendency, both parties must become free from prejudice, fanaticism, and phraseology, so as to know how to be tolerant, and then to be in peace.*

Ver. 6. He who regardeth the day [ὁ φρονῶν τὴν ἡμέραν]. This verse is a guiding-star, according to which every one, in his spiritual life, should become certain in his conviction. The more one seeks to sanctify his opinion religiously, to bring it before the Lord, and to change it to thanksgiving, so much the more must he distinguish the true and the false in the light of God.

Regardeth it unto the Lord [κρίνειν ἐφ' ἑαυτοῦ]. The dative is dat. commodi. The κύριος is Christ (Meyer, Philippi, and others); referred by many to God, against which is ver. 9; Meyer: unto the Lord's service. Yet, at all events, a service in a wider sense is meant: for the honor of his Lord (see 1 Cor. x. 31).—[And he that regardeth not, &c. See Textual Note†.—R.]

by which its sanctity was defended." But the presence of the fourth commandment in the Decalogue, the recognition (and explanation) of the obligation to keep the Sabbath by our Lord, as well as a true conception of the relation of the Law to the Christian Dispensation, is against this sweeping view. To make of the Lord's Day a merely ecclesiastical institution, is to deprive it of all sanctity under a free government. Alford, too, assumes that there is a difference of opinion implied here, respecting the observance of the Lord's Day, and infers then, from the language of ver. 6, that the Apostle could not have recognised the obligation, or he would not have commended the man who did not regard the day. But there is no hint anywhere of a difference of opinion in regard to the observance of the Lord's Day, though we may admit that such observance was not yet universal; besides, the text of ver. 6 is disputed. Comp. Lange's Comm. Matthew, vii. 8, p. 217; Galatians, iv. 10, pp. 106, 109; Colossians, ii. 16, pp. 53, 55; Haldane, Romans, pp. 688-721.—Also the literature of the Sabbath question, as published by the N. Y. * [The use of νοῖς, not νῦμα, shows that reflection, judgment, and all the proper exercises of the practical reason, are called for in the decision of questions of personal duty. It is not the intuition of the νῦμα in any sense, but the full conviction of an educated conscience, which is here referred to.—Wordsworth has a quaint fancy respecting the verb καταπορεύομαι: "Let him sail on quietly, as it were, with a fair wind of persuasion filling the sails of his own mind." He adds: "There may be a καταπορεία, a strong wind of persuasion, which will not wait a man to the harbor of Truth, but wreck him on the quicksands of Error."—R.]

[εὐχαριστοῦν γὰρ τῷ Θεῷ]. The thanksgiving at the table (Matt. xv. 36; xxvi. 26, &c.) is a proof that, with pious feeling and a good conscience, he consecrates his food and his enjoyment to God as a thank-offering. [Alford: "Adduced as a practice of both parties, this shows the universality among the early Christians of thanking God at meals."—R.] —And he who eateth not. He who abstains from eating meat. Even he is thankful for his scanty meal.

Ver. 7. For none of us liveth to himself [οὐδείς γὰρ ἑμῶν ἑαυτῷ ζῇ]. The Apostle designates the universal basis of the thought, that the Christian eats or does not eat to the Lord. This rests upon the fact that we exist here, that we live and die, to the Lord. Meyer says, correctly: The dative must be taken in the ethico-telic sense. This telic εἰς αὐτόν is, indeed, always connected with a δι' αὐτοῦ and ἐξ αὐτοῦ; although the objective dependence on Christ (Rückert, Reiche) is not directly meant, and, in an absolute sense, all these terms apply, through Christ, to God.

Ver. 8. We die unto the Lord [τῷ κυρίῳ ἀποθνήσκουσιν]. See Textual Note 1. Even the Christian's dying is an act of consecration to the glory of Christ (Bengel: eadem ars moriendi, qua vivendi).

Whether we live, therefore, or die, &c. [ἐάν τε οὖν ζῶμεν ἐάν τε ἀποθνήσκωμεν, κ.τ.λ.] This proposition does not merely serve to establish the foregoing (we eat or do not eat), but to explain and elucidate it. The stronger form, the stronger antithesis of living and dying, underlies the eating and not eating. But both coincide in our being the Lord's (belonging to Him). [Alford: "We are, under all circumstances, living or dying (and a fortiori eating or abstaining, observing days or not observing them), Christ's: His property."—Meyer: "In the thrice-repeated and emphatic τῷ κυρίῳ (τοῦ κυρίου) notice the divina Christi majestas et potestas (Bengel), to which the Christian knows himself to be entirely devoted."—R.]

Ver. 9. For to this end Christ died and lived again [εἰς τοῦτο γὰρ Χρῆστος ἀπέθανεν καὶ ἠγέρθη]. See Textual Note 1. The telic definition of the death and resurrection of Christ serves, on the other hand, to establish our living and dying to the Lord. The ἠγέρθη here, as in Rev. ii. 8, designates Christ's return to eternal life, hence the ἀνάστη is passed over. Olshausen would understand the ἠγέρθη to be the earthly life of Jesus (therefore taken as a Hysteron proteron). Thereby a uniformity would, at all events, be constituted by the statement: we live or we die, but a dissimilarity would be called forth in relation to what follows. Meyer properly brings out also the fact that the κυριότης of the Lord is established on His death and resurrection. But it is in harmony with the telic definition of Christ's dominion that the antithesis in this life—the living and the dead—recedes behind the antithesis in the future life, the dead (in the act of dying and in Sheol) and the living, by whom it is conditionally established.

Both of the dead and the living. According to Meyer's suggestion, the purpose is not to refer the effects of Christ's death and return to life (as sundered) to the dead and to the living respectively (see his note on p. 497).

Ver. 10. But why dost thou judge. The εἰ is here opposed to the dominion of Christ over the dead and the living, as above, to another man's servant; but the latter is now denoted brother.

Or why dost thou set at nought thy brother? The Apostle, having spoken of the weaker one, now speaks these words to the stronger, in order to maintain his harmonizing position. Here, as well as in the supporting of him who stands, ver. 4, and in the thanksgiving in ver. 8, the Apostle goes back to the highest causality (see Textual Note 5).

For we shall all stand before the judgment-seat of God [πάντες γὰρ παραστήσονται τῷ βήματι τοῦ Θεοῦ]. We must appear before the judgment-seat of God himself, which Christ shall administer as Lord (chap. ii. 16; Acts xvii. 31; comp. Matt. xxv. 33; Acts xxvi. 6). The judging of one's brother, therefore, first, encroaches upon Christ's office as ruler, and, second, anticipates the judgment-bar of God.

Ver. 11. For it is written. Isa. xlv. 23. On the free form of the citation from memory, and from the LXX., see Philippi, p. 571. [See also Textual Note 1.—R.] On ἐξομολογισθαι, with the dative, meaning to praise (Rom. xv. 9; Matt. xi. 25, &c.), see Tholuck, p. 719; Meyer, p. 498. [Meyer says the verb with the dative always means: to praise; with the accusative of the object: to confess (Matt. iii. 6, &c.).—R.] That special kind of praise, however, is meant, which occurs after a finished act of Divine Providence according to a Divine decision (see Phil. ii. 11). Tholuck says: "Isa. xlv. 23 does not speak of the appearance of Christians before the judgment-seat of God, but of mankind's universal and humble confession of dependence upon God." But this unwarrantably removes the element of future time, the eschatological element, which is, at all events, also comprised in the passage in Isaiah. Meyer says, somewhat better: "In Isaiah God makes the assurance by an oath, that all men (even the heathen) shall reverently swear allegiance to Him. Paul here regards this Divine declaration which promises messianic victory, because it promises the universal victory of the theocracy, according to the special and final fulfilment that it shall have in the general judgment."*—That even the prophetic passage itself comprises, with Christ's saving advent, also the eschatological references, follows from the definite prospect that every knee shall bow before Jehovah, &c. (see Phil. ii. 10, 11).

Ver. 12. So then every one, &c. [See Textual Note 1.] Meyer puts the emphasis on ἕκαστος, Philippi on τῷ Θεῷ, others on περὶ ἑαυτοῦ. The first is preferable.—R.] In this lies the ground of the following exhortation (ver. 13): Let us not therefore judge one another any more [μηκέτι οὖν ἀλλήλους κρίνωμεν]. The Apostle here comprises both parts, and thereby makes his transition to the following admonition to the strong.

B. Chap. xiv. 13-xv. 1. On giving offence and despising. "Exhortation to the strong" in particular.

Ver. 13. But judge this rather [ἀλλὰ

* ["With the reading τοῦ Χριστοῦ (ver. 10), Theodore, Luther, Calvin, and many others, so Philippi, have found in τῷ Θεῷ a proof of the divinity of Christ. But the fundamental idea is rather, that it is God, whose judgment Christ holds; which thought is contained in the reading τοῦ Θεοῦ (ver. 10) also;"] Meyer. It is quite unnecessary to found arguments on disputed readings, when so many other passages are at hand. Most of those who thus do, are naturally influenced in their critical judgment by their doctrinal positions.—R.]

τοῦτο κρίναι· μᾶλλον]. The κρίναι. The Apostle uses the same word in a changed meaning, in order to emphasize more particularly, by this antanacsis, the antithesis of judging. The consideration of the future judgment should move believers in particular to so conduct themselves as to give offence to no one (Matt. xviii. 6 ff.). Meyer: "Let that be your judgment."

Not to put a stumbling-block or an occasion of falling in a brother's way [τὸ μὴ τ.θίναι· πρόσκομμα τῷ ἀδελφῷ ἢ σκάνδαλον]. It does not follow that, because the expressions πρόσκομμα and σκάνδαλον are, in general, used metaphorically as synonyms, we would here have to accept a "verbosity in the interest of the case" (Meyer). In ver. 21 we find even three special designations: προσκόπτει ἢ σκανδαλίζεται ἢ ἀσθενεῖ. There also, however, Meyer, with others, regards the threefold designation as only the expression of the urgency of the matter. But in a real reference, the twofold effect of the giving offence comes into consideration. The giving offence is either an occasion for the punctilious brother to become embittered and still more hardened in his prejudice, or to conduct himself frivolously, without an understanding of the principle of freedom, and thus, according to the present passage, eat meat with inward scruples of conscience.* The Apostle indicates the first case in ver. 15, and the second in ver. 23. The use of different expressions, in themselves synonymous, to denote this antithesis, was quite natural, and, in ver. 21, the Apostle seems to distinguish even three cases: to take an offence forward, or backward, or to be strengthened in weakness. Even to this very day, the offence which the Jews take at Christianity is divided into the two fractions of extreme legality and of wild liberalism. The τ.θίναι causes us to return to the original sense of the words (see the Lexicons).

Ver. 14. I know, and am persuaded in the Lord Jesus [οἶδα καὶ πίπισμαι ἐν κυρίῳ Ἰησοῦ]. He knows it already as an Old Testament monotheist, who knows that God is the Creator of all things (1 Tim. iv. 8, 4; Gen. i. 31). But he also has the fixed assurance of it in the fellowship of Christ, by virtue of justifying faith in His Spirit. Calovius: liberate a Christo parta. [Alford: "These words give to the persuasion the weight not merely of Paul's own λογίζομαι, but of apostolic authority. He is persuaded, in his capacity as connected with Christ Jesus, as having the mind of Christ." So Hodge, substantially, but with less exactness, since he retains the incorrect by of the E. V. It is doubtful whether ἐν ever has this force. Jowett, however, calls these words: "the form in which St. Paul expresses his living and doing all things in Christ, as, in language colder and more appropriate to our time, we might say as 'a Christian.'" But this is a dilution of the force of the expression.—R.] A consciousness of Christ's declaration in Matt. xv. 11 is here more probable than questionable; but then that declaration is not in a legal sense the basis of his freedom (comp. also 1 Cor. viii. 8; Col. ii. 14–16).

Unclean; κοινόν, profane, unclean in the religious legal sense (see the Commentary on Matthew, p. 277; the Commentary on Mark, p. 64). Levitically unclean was, indeed, even still a type of what was common or unclean in the real spiritual sense (Heb. x. 29).

Of itself, δι' αὐτοῦ, not according to Lachmann's reading, δι' αὐτοῦ. [See Textual Note 12.] Of itself, according to its nature, in contrast with the economical order, the moral convenience, or the natural feeling or conscience of the one partaking. [Theodoret, reading αὐτοῦ, refers it to Christ.—R.] "The Apostle himself belongs to the strong (comp. ἡμεῖς in chap. xv. 1, and 1 Cor. ix. 22);" Tholuck. But he also again distinguishes himself from the ordinarily strong one, in that he takes into the account, as a co-determining factor, conscience and regard to fraternal intercourse, or habitual practice.—[But to him, ἐν μὴ τῷ. This introduces an exception to unclean, not to unclean of itself. Hence not = ἀλλά, but = nisi (Meyer).—R.]—To him it is unclean. With emphasis. [The uncleanness is accordingly subjective (Meyer).—R.]

Ver. 15. For if [ἐν γὰρ. See Textual Note 12.] The less authenticated reading ἐν δὲ seems at the first glance to be most suitable; but the reading ἐν γὰρ seems to compel us to accept, that even the strong one, who knows that a certain kind of food seems unclean to his weak brother, makes himself unclean by eating it to his offence.*

Because of thy meat thy brother is grieved [διὰ βρωμα ὁ ἀδελφός σου λυπεῖται. Βρωμα, that food which he holds to be unclean. Bengel calls this meiosis. Comp. Heb. ix. 10; xii. 16; xiii. 9.—R.] The difficulty occasioned by the expression λυπεῖται, is due to a neglect to distinguish properly the two kinds of offence. First of all, the question here is concerning that offence which consisted in the weak one's being made to stumble by the strong one's eating of meat. Tholuck: "λυπεῖν, according to the New Testament use of language: to afflict;" therefore λυπεῖσθαι is taken by expositors (Origen) = σκανδαλιζέσθαι. But would he who took offence at the eating be thereby induced to imitate the example?—According to the Apostle, it was, at all events, the one who ate, notwithstanding the offence he had taken, but not the other, who was irritated and felt himself aggrieved as much by the supposed pride as by the inconsiderateness of the strong one. "But such an affliction," says Philippi, "would be the beginning of the judging forbidden by the Apostle, which he therefore would not recommend to special regard."

* [Philippi, Stuart, Hodge, Jowett, and most, regard the two expressions as synonymous, the latter perhaps explanatory of the former. Alford distinguishes: "an occasion of stumbling, in act; an occasion of offence, in thought." Webster and Wilkinson: "A larger obstacle against which we may strike the foot; a smaller one likely to catch the foot. The former denotes a certain, the latter a probable, cause of falling.—Wordsworth gives as a commentary on this verse, some extracts from Hooker, in reference to the non-conformists. These remarks are eminently "judicious," but have a flavor of remote antiquity in their allusions to "obedience to rites and ceremonies constituted by lawful public authority."—R.]

* [If δὲ be read, then this verse introduces a limitation to the practical application of the principle of ver. 14 (Hodge); but if γὰρ be read, then we must take the passage as breviloquent or elliptical. Tholuck and Meyer join with αὐτῷ, κ.τ.λ., finding here the statement of the reason why he must add that exception, viz., to oppose the uncharitableness which is involved in not regarding it. Alford makes it depend "on the suppressed restatement of the precept of ver. 13: q. d., 'But this knowledge is not to be your rule in practice, but rather,' &c., as in ver. 13: 'for if,' &c." Philippi objects to both views, and urges his objections against the better sustained reading. He says Meyer's interpretation is "manifestly too far-fetched;" but his own lay so near, that the temptation to alter the text was as strong as the desire to sustain the change against overwhelming evidence seems to be in the case of some commentators.—R.]

What! a prejudiced man's being afflicted itself the beginning of judging? Philippi, in harmony with Elser, ignores the subjective justification of this affliction, by interpreting the λυπών according to the signification frequently occurring in the classics: to prejudice, to injure. Meyer, on the other hand, urges against this the New Testament use of language, and understands the expression to mean moral mortification, an insult to the conscience, with reference to Eph. iv. 30.* Grotius, and others, have referred the word to the affliction produced by the charge of narrowness. The charge of narrowness comprised in reckless "eating" does, indeed, come into consideration as a single element, but it is not the principal thing.

Thou art no longer walking according to love [οὐκ εἶμι κατὰ ἀγάπην περιπατεῖς]. For the one giving offence injures love, and also makes himself unclean.

Destroy not by thy meat, &c. [μὴ τῷ βρώματι, κ.τ.λ.] Comp. 1 Cor. viii. 10, 11. But it does not follow from this analogy (of 1 Cor.), that the brother is, in all cases, led only, by a narrow and frivolous eating with others, to infidelity to his conscience, and that it is only by means of this that he incurs the danger of the ἀπώλεια, or actually relapses into a state leading to this. The exasperations of the one falling back upon ordinances lead to fanaticism and the ἀπώλεια, just as surely as laxities lead to antinomianism. Meyer says: "The occasion to fall from Christianity (Theophylact, Grotius, &c.) is not at all taken into consideration.† But can there be, in the case of Christians, a relapse into the ἀπώλεια without a real apostasy from Christianity? Bengel: Ne pluris feceris tuum cibum, quam Christus vitam suam.‡

Ver. 16. Let not then your good be evil spoken of [μὴ βλασφημῆσθω ὅν ἡμῶν τὸ ἀγαθόν]. See Textual Note 14. De Wette thus explains the connection of ὅν with what precedes: "If this does not take place, then your good will not be evil spoken of."—R.] What is the good which the Apostle speaks of, and in how far is it exposed to slander? Explanations:

* [Dr. Lange's view appears to be correct, but some remarks must be added for the sake of clearness. The weak brother is evidently the one who is "grieved." The offence of the strong brother is one against charity; hence the objection of Philippi, about Paul's paying special regard to the very judging he had forbidden, is altogether irrelevant; since charity is not to be measured by the propriety of the demands made upon it by the weak brethren. We reject the meaning injure, and (with Meyer) take λυπεῖται in a subjective sense. It must be distinguished from ἀπώλεια, to which it leads as a possible result (Meyer, and others). It does not necessarily imply that the weak brother is led to imitate and thus to offend against his own conscience, although this is a probable result. Wordsworth suggests, as part of the injury, that he is led "to make a schism in the Church by separating from thee."—R.]

† [In his 4th edition, Meyer omits all reference to this point. Philippi, however, calls this verse a dictum probans for the possibility of apostasy. But as Dr. Hodge remarks: "Saints are preserved, not in despite of apostasy, but from apostasy. If they apostasize, they perish."—R.]

‡ [It is evident that ἀπώλεια refers to eternal destruction, since Christ offered His life to redeem from this (Meyer); yet, as this destruction (like the antithetical notion, eternal life) begins here, according to the scriptural representations, we must take it in its widest sense.—Alford thus paraphrases the verse, bringing out the contrast implied in the use of βρώμα: "The mere ἀσκειν your brother, is an offence against love; how much greater an offence, then, if this ἀσκειν end in ἀπολλύναι—in raising (causing to act against his conscience, and so commit sin, and be in danger of quenching God's Spirit within him) by a MEAL of thine—a brother, for whom Christ died!"—R.]

1. τὸ ἀγαθόν is Christian freedom ("in relation to eating meat"), Origen, Thomasius, Grotius, and others; Tholuck, with reference to 1 Cor. x. 29, 30. Then the reference to the eating of meat is evidently nothing more than an accidental consistency of Christian freedom in its general meaning.* De Wette and Philippi, on the contrary, observe, that the matter in question here is the possession not of a single party, but of the whole Church. But Tholuck aptly replies: "This freedom was objectively purchased for the whole Church." There fore also the reading ἡμῶν does not pronounce against this explanation.

2. Theodoret, De Wette, Philippi: faith. [Luther, Melancthon, Hodge, &c.: the gospel. In fact, this is the view of Philippi: doctrina evangelica.—R.]

3. The kingdom of God, in ver. 17. [So Ewald, Umbreit, Meyer. With proper restrictions, this view seems least objectionable. (2.) and (3.) imply that the evil-speaking is from without the Church.—R.]

Unquestionably ver. 17 is an explanation of ver. 16, but the kingdom of God is here described as a treasure and enjoyment of faith, and there it is the first element: righteousness through Christ = freedom from human ordinances; see Gal. v. 1. The explanations harmonize, in maintaining that the question is concerning the Christian good, κατ' ἐτοχίαν. And this good must be named objectively the gospel, and subjectively faith; or, if we comprise both these elements, the kingdom of God. It obscures the text to rend these things asunder by aut, aut. But it is unmistakable that the Apostle speaks relatively of this good, as it is represented in the freedom of faith enjoyed by renewed mankind. Now, as the punctilious Jewish Christians, and particularly the Jews, saw many Christians abusing their freedom, they were exposed to the danger, from this abuse of freedom, to abuse and finally to slander freedom itself, and even the gospel, according to a confusion of fanaticism similar to what occurs in our day, when men confound the Reformation with revolution, with the Münster fanaticism, with sectarianism, and apostasy from Christianity. Paul already had a sufficiently bitter experience in the impossibility of avoiding such slanders, even when the greatest care is observed; he all the more regarded it as an obligation of wisdom and love, to admonish those who were free to make a proper use of their freedom. We must not, however, consider the slander of Christian freedom in itself alone, apart from its principle, faith. Besides, this one slander of Christians against Christians had, as its result, another: that the Gentiles abused Christianity because of its division, and perhaps the proudest among them made it a subject of derision, that Christians contended about eating and drinking, as if these things were the real blessings of the kingdom of heaven. This latter feature is the explanation of Cocceius.

Ver. 17. For the kingdom of God. [Γὰρ]. If the reference in ver. 16 be to freedom, then the connection is: Preserve your liberty from such evil speaking, since nothing spiritual is involved. If, however, Meyer's view be adopted, then a motive is presented here, with a reference to the tenor of the evil-speaking—i. e., the blasphemy would consist in such a wrong estimate of Christianity, or the kingdom of God in the minds of those without. The advantage of taking the wider view of ver. 16 becomes obvious here. For if it be restricted to the strong, then this verse must be so restricted also, when its most necessary application is to the weak brethren.—R.] The βασιλεία τοῦ Θεοῦ, typified by the Old Testament theocracy, is God's dominion over the heart, instituted and administered by Christ; it is the heavenly sphere of life, in which God's word and Spirit govern, and whose organ on earth is the Church. Here, too, Meyer mixes up the second advent: there is "also here nothing else than the messianic kingdom, which shall be set up at the second coming of Christ."

* [Alford: "Your strength of faith is a good thing; let it not pass into bad repute." This is more exact, and avoids borrowing an interpretation from 1 Cor. x. Yet it is still more open to the objection, that the matter here referred to is a possession of the whole Church. The change to the plural (ὑμῶν), its emphatic position, and the phrase τὸ ἀγαθόν itself, sufficiently attest the correctness of the view, which refers this "good" to the whole Church.—R.]

Is not eating and drinking [βρώσεις καὶ πόσις. Comp. Col. ii. 16. The act of eating and of drinking. The reference is obviously to the practice of both parties.—R.] Its nature does not consist in this. [Not as the Greek fathers interpret: it is not won by this.—R.] Meyer: "The moral condition of its (future!) nature does not depend upon it."

But righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost [ἀλλὰ δικαιοσύνη καὶ εἰρήνη καὶ χαρὰ ἐν πνεύματι ἁγίῳ]. De Wette has full ground for contending against the shallow interpretations of these words, by a series of commentators from Chrysostom down to Meyer (Grotius and Fritzsche among the number), to the effect that the question here is only one of moral virtues. With Meyer, the "rectitude" naturally stands at the head. De Wette interprets these ideas in the full sense. Therefore he connects the doctrinal view (Calvin, Calovius, and others) with the ethical. [So Hodge, in last edition. In the earlier, he adopted the "ethical" view. But as he now says: "Paul does not mean to say that Christianity consists in morality—that the man who is just, peaceful, and cheerful, is a true Christian. This would be to contradict the whole argument of this Epistle."—R.] Accordingly, righteousness is, first of all, justification; peace is chiefly rest of spirit; and joy in the Holy Ghost is the joy of our spirit, which has its ground in the Holy Ghost.* But inasmuch as the question here is not so much concerning the virtues of God's kingdom as its blessings, the doctrinal view must be regarded as the principal thing. It might be said, as regards the concrete occasion [i. e., the circumstances of the Roman Church]: a. With righteousness in Christ there is joined freedom from legality; b. With peace and the spirit of peace there are joined brotherly moderation and forbearance in the use of freedom; c. And with joy in the Holy Ghost there is joined the impulse to cultivate social joy through the proper tone of mind. Tholuck, with good ground, has cited chap. xv. 13 in favor of the religious construction of the three definitions; also 1 Thess. i. 6; Phil. iii. 1; 2 Cor. vi.

* [Alford prefers: "in connection with, under the indwelling and influence of," the Holy Ghost, to De Wette's view, which he, however, says is true, though not expressed here.—The phrase "in the Holy Ghost" does not qualify the whole clause, but "joy" alone. Dr. Hodge defended the wider reference in his earlier editions, perhaps to guard from error the "ethical" view of the terms, which he then adopted. In the last edition, he leaves the matter doubtful.—R.]

10. Grotius, and others, have interpreted the joy transitively, to establish joy; and this effect is, indeed, quite peculiar to the social impulse of Christian joy, which it has from heaven ("Behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy"); but this element is not the principal and fundamental thought.

Ver. 18. For he who herein serveth Christ. Ἐν τούτῳ, according to Meyer, means: according to this; that is, according to the relation already given. Tholuck more fitly says: herein. The perception of the opposition between the inward and real and the unreal and outward in God's kingdom, and the cultivation of the former, is meant. So far ἐν τούτῳ is much stronger than ἐν τοῖς τοῖς. [The singular is so strongly supported, that we must adopt it; see Textual Note 14. But it has been referred by many commentators (from Origen to Jowett) to the Holy Ghost. Dr. Hodge assumes that this is the necessary view. But as Alford remarks: "It would be unnatural that a subordinate member of the former sentence, belonging only to χαρὰ, should be at once raised to be the emphatic one in this, and the three graces, just emphatically mentioned, lost sight of." This difficulty has led a number of commentators to retain the plural. But this is contrary to the received canons of criticism, and an unfair method of avoiding the difficulty.—R.]

Is well-pleasing to God, &c. [εὐάρεστος τῷ Θεῷ, &c.] He who, in the perception of this rule of the New Testament, serves Christ with pure motive, has the twofold blessing of being well-pleasing to God and approved of men. Among these men, the best among those who dissent are undoubtedly chiefly meant, for the really quarrelsome partisans are most embittered by the peaceful conduct of faith.*

Ver. 19. Let us therefore follow after the things of peace [ἀγαθὸν τὰ τῆς εἰρήνης διώκωμεν. The inference is from vers. 17, 18 (De Wette, Philippi, Meyer), not from the whole preceding context (Hodge). See Textual Note 14 on the form of the verb.—R.] The διώκωμεν is here in contrast with the impulse of party excitements.

The things which pertain to mutual edification [καὶ τὰ τῆς οἰκοδομῆς τῆς εἰς ἀλλήλους]. Edification always comprises two elements, according to the figure which represents the Church as Christ's temple: 1. Arrangement into the fellowship of Christ by the awakening, vivification, and preparation of the stones; 2. Arrangement into the fellowship of the Church by the promotion of what is essential, and by moderation in the exercise of grace according to the spirit of humility and self-denial; see 2 Cor. x. 8; xiii. 10, and other passages. In this sense, each should build the other up.

Ver. 20. Do not for the sake of meat undo the work of God [μὴ ἐνεκεν βρώματος καταλύε (pull down) τὸ ἔργον τοῦ Θεοῦ]. Instead of building up, the inconsiderate one tears down. The καταλύειν and λύειν are a specific expression of this fact. The work (building) of God has been understood as Christian faith, the σωτηρία, the extension of Christianity; Meyer, and others, have understood the Christian as such. ["His Christian personality."] But the οἰκοδομή here evidently denotes the fellowship of faith. [This seems to combine the two favorite views, viz., that the fellow-Christian is here referred to—that the “kingdom of God” in its extension is meant. Alford, referring to 1 Cor. iii. 9, explains: “Thy fellow-Christian, as a plant of God’s planting, a building of God’s raising.”—R.]

But it is evil [ἀλλὰ κακόν. Instead of de we have ἀλλὰ here. See Hartung, Partikellehre, ii. p. 408.—R.] To κακόν we must simply supply, from what precedes: Every thing which is clean in itself (Meyer). [Alford thinks nothing need be supplied, except, as in E. V., the neuter verb. “It is evil—i. e., there is criminality in the man.” On the other proposed supplements, see Meyer, Alford, in loco.—R.] Κακόν, injurious in this case, because it is not only a sin to him, but also leads him to ruinous frivolity; see ver. 15.

To the man who eateth through offence [τῷ ἀνθρώπῳ τῷ διὰ προσκόμματος ἐσθίουτι]. By the one who eats, there can only be meant the weak one (according to Chrysostom, Luther [Meyer], and others), and not the strong one, according to the explanation of most commentators (Calvin, Grotius, De Wette [Hodge, Alford], and others). But the address is directed to the strong. Do not destroy for the sake of meat—that is, by thy inconsiderate and free enjoyment—the work of God, for, by the πρόσκομμα which thou givest thy brother, thou leadest him to eat against his conscience. For it is said, first, concessively: all things indeed are pure; second, the one eating with (taken, not given) offence to his conscience, is, as an injured one, contrasted with the one who destroys, who has given him offence; we have, besides, in the third place, the whole context.

[Those who find in offence a reference to the offence given by the strong one, rather than to the offence taken by the weak one, also urge the context in favor of their view. The context, however, only proves that the strong are addressed here. They incorrectly infer from this, that the κακόν must be predicated of the action of the party addressed. But is it not like Paul to urge, as a motive, the evil effect upon the brother taking offence? Besides, as Meyer suggests, the other view has no special connection with the former part of the verse, but gives us only the vague remark, that it is wrong to eat so as to give offence to others. The objection, that offence cannot well be applied to offence against one’s own conscience, loses its force, when it is remembered that the strong are cautioned with reference to the effect of their conduct on the weak.—R.]

Ver. 21. It is not good to eat flesh, &c. [καλόν τὸ μὴ φαγεῖν κρέα, &c.] Luther, and others, incorrectly take καλόν as comparative in relation to ἐν ᾧ [“It is better that thou eatest no flesh and drinkest no wine, or (than) that thou eat thy brother,” &c.]. Probably to tone down the force of the expression, which seemed all too strong. But καλόν itself contains the necessary mitigation, since it denotes a higher and freer measure of self-denying love. [Dr. Lange renders it: edel, noble. The case is not hypothetical; the scrupulous demanded abstinence from wine also, we infer from the whole passage.—R.]

Not to do any thing wherein thy brother, &c. [μὴδὲ ἐν ᾧ ἀδελφός σου. See Textual Note 17.] Tholuck, and others, referring to 1 Cor. x. 31, would supply ποῦν with ἐν ᾧ, which is certainly more correct than to supply φαγεῖν ἢ ποῦν. [The E. V. seems to imply the latter view; it is emended, therefore.] As De Wette properly remarks: Paul does not here lay down, as a definite precept, this principle of self-denying love according to which he had lived (see 1 Cor. viii. 13).* On the three expressions προσκόμει, &c., see the explanation of ver. 18. [It is not necessary to find (with Calvin) a climax ad infra in these three verbs, yet they are not precisely synonymous. The figure of ver. 18 is retained, but the third verb expresses the mildest form of offence. De Wette, Philippi (and E. V.) render: is made (or becomes) weak; Meyer, Alford, and others, more correctly: is weak. The full thought, then, is: It is noble not to do any thing wherein thy brother is weak; even to avoid his weak point.—R.]

Ver. 22. Hast thou faith? [σὺ πιστὸς ἔχεις; See Textual Note 18.] The briefer reading is adopted there.—R.] Meyer, with Calvin, Grotius, and others, take these words as interrogative; Tholuck, with Luther, Fritzsche, and others, as concessive, which corresponds better with the context.† [If ἦν be rejected, the interrogative form is to be preferred, as better suiting the lively character of the address (so Philippi, Alford, De Wette, Hodge, &c.). The question implies, on the part of the strong brother, an assertion: I have faith. The concessive view: you have faith, I grant, may imply the same. In fact, whatever reading or construction be adopted, the purport of the verse remains unchanged.—R.] Tholuck: “The stronger will depend upon his faith, but he should not come forward with it.” That is, should not come forward with it in practical uncharitable conduct; but, on the other hand, he should not disseminate the conviction of his faith.

Have it to thyself [κατὰ σεαυτὸν ἔχει. Keep it, because well founded, but for the sake of thy brother, keep it to thyself.—R.] This comprises not only a restriction for the strong, but also a limitation of the principle previously established in ver. 21. Or, in his private life, where he gives no offence to his brother, he may also live according to his faith, yet according to the rule that he should regard himself as present to God.—Before God. [As God sees it, it need not be paraded before man (Meyer, Hodge).—R.] Tholuck explains the ἐνώπιον τ. Θεοῦ by thanksgiving.

Blessed is he, &c. [μακάριος, &c.] Luther: Blessed is he whose conscience does not condemn him in that which he allows. So also Meyer; Philippi, with reference to ver. 5: “Let every one be fully persuaded in his own mind.” But we cannot expect here a simple declaration of the strong man’s blessedness in opposition to the weak; and all the less so, because, immediately afterward, there is mention made of the weak one’s sinful eating in doubt, which the strong man has occasioned by his offence.‡ Thus the proposition directs attention to

* (Hence, while a Christian may strive to reach such a principle in his practice, no brother, especially no “weak brother,” has a right to demand it of him, or obtrude his stumbling, so as to exact self-denial from others.—R.)

† (Fritzsche opposes the interrogative form, because it would imply a negative answer. But there is little warrant for this. If the better correspondence with the context mentioned by Dr. Lange is based on his view of the force of the interrogative, then it disappears at once.—R.)

‡ (Philippi and Wordsworth make the clause apply to both classes; Meyer, to the strong alone (presenting the advantage they have, as a motive to considerate conduct toward the weak, whose danger is set forth in the next clause); Alford, and most, find here a commendation of the

the difference between the theoretical conviction and an inconsiderate conduct according to it. "Blessed is he whose conscience must not practically disapprove of what he, according to his theoretical conviction, approves." No one can have a perfect conviction of practical good conduct, if he make a false application of the theoretical conviction of faith against love; see 2 Cor. viii. 9-12; 1 Cor. ix. 19; x. 23. [This view of Dr. Lange, which seems to be peculiarly his own, implies a distinction so subtle, that it seems out of place in the practical part of the Epistle of this earnest Christian teacher. He adduces no arguments to support it, except the negative one, that the declaration of the strong man's blessedness can scarcely be expected here, especially when the danger of the weak one from the example of the strong one follows immediately. But as, in ver. 20, Paul refers to the evil done to the weak, as a motive to the strong whom he is addressing, so here he may present the blessedness of a strong conviction, and then the danger of a weak one, as a double motive to be careful of the weak brother. As the whole argument tends toward chap. xv. 1, this seems a satisfactory view.—R.]

Who judgeth not himself. The Apostle says αἰνῶν, and not καταξιῶν (as most commentators explain), because the Christian, with the unconscious and false application of a principle which is in itself righteous, and even holy, does not sin so ruinously as he who condemns himself by acting against his religious conviction.* With the germinating principle of faith in the weak one, the law is no more of authority; but so long as it applies to him in connection with faith, he cannot do violence to it. It is not by presumptuousness, but by mature conviction, that we become free.—[Al-loweth, δοκιμάζει. Agendum eligit (Estius).—R.]

Ver. 23. But he that doubteth [ὁ δὲ δισταχίζων]. With the act of eating, he is at the same time stricken and condemned, καταξιῶνται; comp. John iii. 18. Meyer: "It was necessary to define more specifically the actual self-condemnation (Chrysostom, Theodoret, Grotius, and most commentators)." But there is a great difference between self-condemnation and actual self-condemnation. If the explanation, "to be subject to Divine condemnation," does not say: to be already subject to the final judgment, then must it be explained to mean, that a Divine sentence on his condemnable (not condemned) condition has occurred in his act itself, which sentence he must himself best experience in his own conscience, because the fact of his doubting is better known to himself than to any one else.†

grounded on and consonant with his life of faith. That 'faith in the Son of God' by which the Apostle describes his own life in the flesh as being lived, informing and penetrating the motives and the conscience, will not include, will not sanction, an act done against the testimony of the conscience." This is, perhaps, more in accordance with Dr. Lange's view of πίστις (see below) than the ordinary interpretation, which confines it to mere persuasion, moral conviction (Hodge, De Wette, and most).—R.]

And whatsoever is not of faith is sin [πᾶν δὲ ὁ οὐκ ἐκ πίστεως ἀμαρτία ἐστίν]. To be read as a concluding sentence, and not as an explanation of the foregoing: because every thing which is not of faith, &c. [The E. V. (for) is incorrect; and should be substituted, δι introducing, as Alford suggests, an axiom.—R.]—Conflicting explanations:

1. Augustine, and many other commentators; Calovius, &c.: which is not of Christian saving faith. Then the consequence is the proposition: The whole life of unbelievers is sin, even the morality and virtues of the heathen, &c. (Formula Conc. 700: where even the peccata sunt are moderated by the peccatis contaminata).*

2. Moral faith, "the moral conviction of the rectitude of a mode of action" (De Wette, Reiche, and Meyer, after Chrysostom, and others). But undoubtedly Chrysostom's explanation shows a better knowledge of the connection between the requirement of saving faith and subjective conviction than many modern explanations, with all their fidelity to conviction. Even Grotius does not speak of conviction, but of conscience: Peccatum est, quicquid sit, conscientia non addipulante. There can be no perverted decision of conscience which conscience itself did not have to contradict, and consequently also no abstract and subjective certainty of conviction without an objective ground. But conscience itself harmonizes with God's law, just as the law harmonizes with the gospel and its faith. Otherwise, the world would be irretrievably lost in egotistic separation. How would we ever get at the wayward, if the truth did not testify to their conscience?

We accordingly have to distinguish in explana-

* [It is greatly to be doubted whether this explanation necessarily involves this conclusion. It is easy to force upon this, or any other passage, some incorrect inference. For example, as Dr. Hodge well remarks: "It is wrong to do any thing which we think to be wrong. The converse of this proposition, however, is not true. It is not always right to do what we think to be right." Alford says "Here the Apostle has in view two Christians, both living by faith, and by faith doing acts pleasing to God: and he reminds them that whatever they do out of harmony with this great principle of their spiritual lives, belongs to the category of sin. The question touching the 'infidels' must be settled by another inquiry: Can he whom we thus name have faith—such a faith as may enable him to do acts which are not sinful—a question impossible for us to solve." Certainly the Augustinian inference may be deduced far more directly from other passages; and it should not prejudice any against the view which claims that Christian faith must underlie the "faith" here referred to. Bengel: Innititur ergo ipsa fides, qua fideles consentiunt, conscientiam informans et confirmans, partem fundamentum, partem normam recte actionis." Hodge, Haldane, and Wordsworth, however, limit the meaning to something like subjective persuasion, which seems tame and unpositive. The author last named shows the pernicious effects of the other view, especially among the Puritans. But the tone is so well adapted to the days of the Sturges, that one may be excused for surmising the existence of a prejudice against the Augustinian view. Dr. Lange takes the same middle ground with Alford (see above), combining both views: "confidence proceeding from saving faith."—R.]

state in which the strong in faith are. His view (which is also that of Meyer and Hodge) is to be preferred to Dr. Lange's ingenious and refined distinction.—R.]

* [Meyer properly rejects the common view, which takes αἰνῶν as = καταξιῶν, but explains it thus: "who does not hold judgment over himself"; i. e., who is so assured in his conviction, that his decision to do this or that incurs no self-judgment." Dr. Lange's explanation is occasioned by his view of the whole sentence.—R.]

† [Meyer finds here an antithesis to "blessed" (ver. 22); but the idea of Divine condemnation must be properly limited. Philippi: "The act of eating itself condemns him, of course according to the Divine ordering, so that the justice of this verdict appears not only before God, but before men, and himself also."—R.]

sion (2.) between conscience and subjective conviction in the usual sense; see chap. ii. 14, 15. In explanation (1.) we must distinguish: a. Between faith in a doctrinal system and saving faith itself; b. Between developed saving faith and its beginnings under gratia prænata, the doing of the truth in the life of the upright; John iii. 21. It follows clearly enough from chap. ii., that the Apostle does not here mean to characterize such a conduct as sin. Yet, on the other hand, he will not designate such conduct as sinless; for, until the conscientious reconciliation or perfection of conscience, even the better man is in an inward darkness and vacillation concerning his ways, and selfish motives are mixed even with his better actions. But the Apostle also does not speak here solely of the opposition in the life of Christians. Christians must be conscious of their opinion as well as of their action, in the light of truth itself. Philippi has brought out prominently the connection between (1.) and (2.). But he returns to a modified Augustinian view, by deducing from the claim that the confidence of the acceptability to God of an action must be the result of saving faith, the conclusion that all conduct is sin which has not this saving faith as its ultimate source and origin (p. 584).* It would be better to say: whose origin is not the shining of the Logos into the conscience. It is hazardous to regard believers as complete, but still more hazardous to distinguish only complete unbelievers from them. See the Exeg. Notes on ver. 1. On Augustine's view, see Reiche, ii. p. 489.

On the doxology following here in some Codd. (brought over from the conclusion), see the Introduction, p. 35 [and Textual Notes on chap. xvi.]; also on the controversies occasioned by the two concluding chapters. For further particulars, see Meyer, p. 507.†

* (Philippi's view will not be understood unless more fully cited. He says: "πῶς here is not immediately justifying, saving faith, but the confidence springing therefrom, that all the action proceeding from it, and consistent with it, is acceptable to God. The proposition of Augustine, omnis infidelium vita peccatum est, finds here not, indeed, its direct, but its indirect proof. For, if every action which does not proceed from the confidence of its acceptableness to God is sin, and this confidence is the result of evangelical, saving faith alone, then it follows, that all conduct is sin which has not this saving faith as its ultimate source and origin."—R.)

† (On chaps. xv. and xvi. Baur of Tübingen has doubted the genuineness of these two chapters, but on such insufficient grounds that it is not necessary to enter upon the question. See Introd., p. 35. Various theories have been suggested (by Semler, Paulus, Eichhorn, Schulz, Ewald, and now by Renan), which admit that Paul wrote these two chapters, but deny them a place in this Epistle. For this, a plausible ground is found in the insertion of the doxology at the close of chap. xiv., in the long list of acquaintances (chap. xvi.) at Rome, where Paul had never been—none of whom are mentioned in the Epistles written from Rome, especially in the salutation to Aquila and Priscilla, who were at Ephesus shortly before and shortly after the date of this Epistle. But Rome was the capital of the world, and many acquaintances might be there, and as readily depart. Were the salutations few, no doubt the critics would have urged this as an argument against its genuineness. Meyer says: "Among all the reasons which are adduced in support of these different opinions, none hold good, not even those which seem least founded upon mere arbitrariness." The St. Paul of Renan has just appeared. He accepts our Epistle as genuine, but denies the correctness of its title, and also its integrity. The following is a résumé: "The editors of the final and accepted text of Paul's letters had, for a general principle, to reject nothing and add nothing—but above all, to reject nothing. The common body, then, of the so-called Epistle to the Romans was a circular letter, an encyclical letter addressed to the churches of Ephesus and Thessalonica principally,

Chap. xv., ver. 1. Now we that are strong ought [ὁφείλομεν δὲ ἡμεῖς οἱ δυνατοί. The δὲ does not stand for οὐν, as the E. V. indicates (so Hodge), although it connects with what precedes (Meyer, Philippi, &c.).—R.] Tholuck finds in δὲ continuative a proof that the division of the chapter has been improperly made at this verse. As far as conviction is concerned, the Apostle stands on the side of the strong; see chap. xiv. 14, 20; 1 Cor. viii. 4.

[To bear, βαρύνειν. After the Apostle has shown what the strong have to avoid, he shows what is now their duty toward the weak. In natural life, weakness is often oppressed and made to suffer violence by power; in the kingdom of the Spirit, on the contrary, "strong" expresses both the appointment to, and the duty of bearing, the infirmities of the weaker.

Infirmities of the weak [τὰ ἀσθενήματα τῶν ἀδυνάτων. Meyer, Lange: Glaubensschwächen; but, with Philippi, Alford, &c., it seems best to regard the term as general, including, of course, the scruples above referred to.—R.] These are undoubtedly a burden, and thus an impediment to the progress of the strong; but in order to take the weak ones along with them, their weaknesses must be taken up—which is the rule in a caravan. But the bearing does not consist merely in suffering, but rather in forbearance. [Comp. Gal. vi. 2, Lange's Comm., p. 149, where the same verb is used.—R.]

And not to please ourselves. Ἀφίστην see Gal. i. 10 [1 Cor. x. 33].

C. Reciprocal edification, in self-denial, according to the example of Christ, chap. xv. 2-4.

Ver. 2. Let every one of us [ἕκαστος ἡμῶν. See Textual Notes 19 and 20]. Thus the Apostle here comprehends both parties.—[For his good (with a view) to edification, εἰς τὸ ἀγαθὸν πρὸς οἰκοδομήν.] Bengel: Bonum (ἀγαθόν) genus, edificatio species. There is, first, εἰς, then, πρὸς. In order that one may aid the other in what is good, he should promote his edification, his sense for the fellowship of what is good. The good chiefly meant here is self-denying love, the constant exercise of humility.

Ver. 3. For even Christ pleased not himself [καὶ γὰρ ὁ Χριστὸς οὐχ ἑαυτῷ ἡγάσεν. Dr. Lange renders: Denn (selbst) auch Christus lebte nicht sich selber zum Gefallen. The E. V. is more literal.—R.] See Phil. ii. 6; 2 Cor. viii. 9. Pleasing one's self denotes the inconsiderate and unfriendly pursuit of the ideals of our own subjectivity in the selfish isolation of our personal existence.

But, as it is written. &c. [ἀλλὰ καθὼς γέγραπται, κ.τ.λ. See Textual Note 21.] Ps. lxi. 9. The sentence is literally cited. On the different supplements suggested with ἀλλὰ, see but also to the brethren at Rome and one or more other places. Local and individual items were adjoined, according as the special destination of the general circular. These specialities were selected, and sewed on, so to speak, to the final edition, by honest editors, more desirous of saving all St. Paul's authentic words than of nice literary form. Here is the explanation of repetitions, and of salutatory phrases, in the midst of the Epistle to the Romans, otherwise inexplicable in the text of a so clean, straightforward, ineluctant, but logical writer as St. Paul." It would seem that his view is but a vicious and characteristic phase of the general theory advanced by the German author named above.—R.)

Meyer, who would not supply any thing.* Grotius suggests the most natural one: fecit. The citation is from the LXX. The theoretical sufferer, who was reproached for the Lord's sake, was a type of Christ; but Christ's subjecting himself to the reproaches of the world proceeded from His steadfast fellowship with humanity for God's sake. For himself, He might have had joy; Heb. xii. 2, 3 [Alford: "The words in the Messianic Psalm are addressed to the Father, not to those for whom Christ suffered; but they prove all that is here required, that he He did not please himself; His sufferings were undertaken on account of the Father's good purpose—mere work which He gave Him to do."—R.]

Ver. 4. For whatsoever things were written aforetime [ὅσα γὰρ προεγράφη. Justification of the previous citation (Philippi), and a preparation for the subject to be introduced next, viz., the duty of unanimity (Alford). In προ, just before the emphatic ἡμετέραν, Meyer correctly finds the thought: All before our time—i. e., the whole Old Testament.—R.] This does not apply merely to the messianic prophecies (Reiche). The immediate design of the entire Old Testament Scriptures for the Jews does not preclude their universal purpose for all ages.

That we through the patience and the comfort of the Scriptures [ἵνα διὰ τῆς ὑπομονῆς καὶ διὰ τῆς παρακλήσεως τῶν γραφῶν. See Textual Note]. The repetition of διὰ seems to favor the view that γραφῶν depends on παρακλήσεως alone; yet many commentators, who adopt this reading, claim (and with reason) that such a construction would be ungrammatical. Still, Dr. Lange seems to favor it. We paraphrase: "the patience and comfort produced by a study of the Scriptures."—R.] Two things should support the believer, particularly in looking at the retarding, obstructing prejudice of the weak: First, the patience immanent in the Christian spirit (patience evidently suits better here than constancy, which Meyer prefers). [So Philippi, De Wette, &c.] Second, the comfort of the Holy Scriptures, which, in the present connection, consisted in the fact that, in spite of all the impediments to spiritual life in the Old Testament, the development to the New Testament nevertheless proceeded uninterruptedly.

Might have our hope [τὴν ἐλπίδα ἔχωμεν. Dr. Lange: might hold fast hope. Others: might have more and more of the Christian hope.—R.] And then, this comfort was an encouragement to hold fast hope as the hope of better times; that is, of the ever newer and more glorious developments of God's kingdom, in Spener's sense. Beza, and others, properly explain: teneamus, which is opposed by Meyer. We can, indeed, preserve hope by patience, but not acquire it. According to Meyer, indeed, patience should also be referred to τῶν γραφ. (against Grotius, and others), and this should therefore imbue Christians. But yet the patience and comfort of the Scriptures could not mean, without something further: the patience and the comfort with which the Scriptures imbue us. [The genitive γραφῶν is joined with ὑπομονῆς also, by Chrysostom, and by most modern commentators. In fact, this is the only view which can be justified grammatically. "The patience and comfort produced by, arising from, a study of the Scriptures," is the simplest and best sense. So Alford, and most.—R.]—It is justifiably urged by Meyer, against Reiche, and others, that hope must here be taken subjectively. Of course, he who lets go his subjective hope, gives up thereby its object. [The hope is undoubtedly to be regarded as subjective, but the article (which we preserve in English by rendering: our hope) points to a definite Christian hope, viz., of future glory. It would then seem appropriate to understand "we might have hope" as referring to the obtaining of a higher degree of this hope through the patience, &c. (So Meyer, Philippi, De Wette).—R.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The present section contains a confessional Eirenicon of the Apostle. It requires: (1.) Reciprocal recognition of the common ground of faith. (2.) The balancing of the conviction of faith with the conduct of love. (3.) Above all, watchfulness against particular ethical errors on both sides. [The profound insight into human nature manifested in this chapter, combines, with the unparalleled adaptation of its precepts to the social life of men in all ages, to prove "the God of peace" its author. In America, where society is newest, most experimental, and yet public opinion so tyrannical, where, perhaps, the extremes of the weak and the strong are found, it deserves especial study.—R.]

2. As the name, the weak, is not an unconditional reproach, so the strong is not unconditional praise. The weak one's prejudice is a certain protection so long as he keeps his weakness pure—that is, does not make it a rule for others; the strong one's justifiable sense of freedom leads to the danger of self-boasting, particularly against love, which can draw in its train the loss of faith. These propositions can be proved by the example of pious Catholics and of wicked Protestants. Yet the standpoint of the strong man is in itself higher, and though he becomes very guilty by the abuse of his freedom of faith, the Apostle yet portrays, with very strong expressions, the ruin of those who eat in doubt. The unliberated ones, who would not be free in a positive, but in a negative, and therefore insufficient way, become the most unmitigated anomists and antinomians both in a religious and moral respect. If, in the time of the Reformation, all Protestants had become positively free by Christ, Protestantism would hardly have experienced in its history such great impediments of reaction as that of unbelief.

[Weak and strong, old and new, conservative and radical—these antitheses are not precisely synonymous, yet, in their leading features, the same. He does what Paul has not done, who throws himself entirely with one class or the other. The Church has ever contained, and has ever needed, both elements. Yet sometimes those are deemed radical who answer to the description here given of the weak brethren; and those who are truly strong are often classed with the old-fashioned.—The caution about judging is prophetic of what is so manifest in the history of Christ's Church in her imperfection: that more divisions and discords have arisen from the questions, about which the Apostle himself gives no definite decision, than from the discussion of the weightier matters of the earlier chapters.—R.]

* [So De Wette, Philippi, and others. The E. V., by putting a comma after "but," gives the same interpretation:—i. e., but the reproaches, as it is written, &c. The absence of any formula of citation favors this construction.—R.]

3. It is almost impossible to emphasize sufficiently the two distinctions to which the present section leads us. The Apostle shows, first, that we should not deny our free conviction, but should deny ourselves in reference to the inconsiderate conduct according to conviction in practical things, that do not belong to the testimony of faith. How often is this rule exactly reversed, by one's asserting a narrow view in order to please the weak (for example, in the condemning art, concerts, innocent relaxations, &c.), while he himself willingly enjoys occasionally the forbidden fruit.* The second distinction is brought just as closely home—namely, between doing and leaving undone. What one cannot do with the inward assurance of his conscience, must not be done at all.

4. The opposite tendencies that are presented to us as a germ in the Church at Rome, extend in continual gradations through the books of the New Testament, and confront each other in the second century as the matured opposites of Ebionitism and of Gnostic antinomianism.—On the relation between Gentile Christians and Jewish Christians at the time of Justin Martyr, see Tholuck, p. 704.

10. Every thing is pure. According to Olshausen (in respect to the laws on food), creation has again become pure and holy through Christ and His sanctifying influence. The proposition cannot be opposed, but how far must it be more specifically defined? As the creature of God, it has again been recognized as pure and holy. As a means of enjoyment, it has again been freely given in a religious sense. But as a real enjoyment, it is only pure and holy to the one enjoying, when he has the full assurance of his conscience, and therefore eats with thanksgiving. But in this the natural repulsion, practice, law, and a regard to love, limiting the circle of the means of enjoyment, as well as of the enjoyment itself, come into consideration, because they also limit that assurance.

11. The understanding of the present section has been rendered much more difficult by not regarding the manner in which the offence is divided into the two fundamental forms of irritation and presumption. See the Exeg. Notes on vers. 13 and 21.

12. Luther's expression, "the Christian is a master of all masters, a servant of all servants," comes into consideration here. Gregory the Great had expressed the same sentiment, but in a reverse order and application: "Free in faith, serving in love." The parable beginning with Matt. xviii. 23 tells us that the consistent and conscious offence against love weakens faith.

13. Bearing with the weak has: (1.) Its foundation in the fact that the Almighty God bears in love the world, which in itself is helpless; (2.) Its power and obligation consist in the fact that Christ has borne the guilt of the helpless world; (3.) And its dignity lies in the fact that the strength of the strong first finds in this function its whole truth, proof, and satisfaction.

14. On the idea of edification, see the Exeg. Notes on chap. xiv. 19.

15. The word of the Old Testament Scriptures is still of application; how much more, therefore, is this the case with that of the New Testament! Yet, in this relation, we dare not overlook the truth, that Christian life may have but one rule of faith, but yet two fountains: the Holy Scriptures, and the immediate fellowship of the heart with Christ, from which the patience of Christ flows.

VERS. 1-12.

On the proper reciprocal conduct of the strong and weak in faith. 1. What form should it take? a. The strong should receive the weak, and not despise them; b. The weak should not judge the strong. 2. On what should it be established? a. On every body's remembering that God has received the other as well as himself; b. Therefore he should consider that, in whatever the other one does or leaves undone, he does it or leaves it undone to the Lord; c. Do not forget that the decision on our course of action belongs to the Lord alone, to whom we all belong, and before whose judgment-seat we must all appear (vers. 1-12).—Who art thou that judgest another man's servant? Two things are implied in this question of the Apostle: 1. Directly, a warning to guard against any judgment of faith on our brethren; 2. Indirectly, an admonition rather to judge ourselves, and to perceive the weakness of our own faith (ver. 4).—In matters of conscience, each one standeth or falleth to his Lord (ver. 4).—The great value of a strong religious conviction. 1. To ourselves. a. We act according to fixed principles; b. We do not vacillate; c. We preserve our inward peace. 2. To others. a. They know where they are with us; b. They therefore entertain confidence in us; c. Their own life is improved by our example (ver. 5).—The possibility of thanksgiving to God as a test of enjoying that which is allowed (ver. 6).—As Christians, we are the Lord's possession. 1. What is this? a. No one liveth to himself, and no one dieth to himself; that is, whether in life or in death no one belongs to himself; but, b. Whether we live, let us live to the Lord, or whether we die, let us die to the Lord; that is, we belong, in life and death, to Him; we are His. 2. By what means have we become the Lord's property? a. By Christ's death; b. By His resurrection and glorification (vers. 7-9).—We shall all appear before the judgment-seat of Christ! This is said: 1. To the weak in faith, that he may not judge his brother; 2. To the strong, that he may not despise his brother; 3. To both, that they may examine themselves (vers. 10-12).—The great account which every one of us shall have to give in future. 1. Of whom? Of himself, on all that he has done and left undone. 2. Before whom? Before God, who knoweth the heart, and seeth what is secret (ver. 12).

LUTHAR: There are two kinds of Christians: the strong in faith, and the weak. The former arrogantly despise the weak, and the latter easily get offended at the strong. Both should conduct themselves in love, that neither offend or judge the other, but that each do and allow the other to do what is useful and necessary (ver. 1).

STARKE: If one should be certain of his opinion in the use of things indifferent, how much more necessary is it in matters of faith! (ver. 5).—

HENNINGER: Stones in an arch support each other; so should you support your neighbor. You may know much, but your neighbor may be very useful; you should at least bear him witness that he has a tender conscience (ver. 1).—BENGL: Gratitude sanctifies all acts, however different, that are not inconsistent with gratitude (ver. 6).—The art of dying well is nothing else than the art of living well (ver. 7).

GERLACH: An article of food is only unclean when eaten without thanksgiving; but every thing is holy to him who thankfully acknowledges that the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof (1 Cor. x. 25-31). Let him, on the other hand, who, through fear of breaking a Divine commandment, eats but one kind of meat, be thankful even for that which he does enjoy. Every thing depends on our acting in full obedience to the Lord, and in doing nothing wilfully and independently.

HUEBNER: The less scrupulous one must show tender forbearance; the more scrupulous one must guard against decrying the more liberal (ver. 3).—It is not becoming in us to pronounce any definitive opinion on the inward worth of a man.—We should not condemn even the fallen (ver. 4).—Christianity, as a free institution for the training of mankind, allows freedom in regard to services and in the choice of holy-days (ver. 5).—Every believer renounces his own will, lives to the Lord, who has purchased and redeemed him, and accordingly dies in harmony with the Lord.—This dependence on the Lord is something quite natural to the Christian. He, therefore, who will not be led by love to place a restraint upon himself on account of his weaker brother, but is obstinate, acts against that fundamental principle (vers. 7, 8).—He who judges, arrogates to himself Christ's office; he who bears in mind that Christ will judge us all, will no more condemn.

BESSER: To despise and to judge—each is as bad as the other, for in both man encroaches upon God's right, and arrogates to himself a judgment on another's state of faith and heart, which becomes an injury to his own life of faith (ver. 3).

SCHLEIERMACHER: New-Year's Sermon on vers. 7 and 8. The language of the text is placed before us as a motto on entering this new year of life: 1. In relation to what shall happen to us; 2. In relation to what we shall be required to do.

CHARNOCK: Christ, by His death, acquired over us a right of lordship, and hath laid upon us the strongest obligation to serve Him. He made him self a sacrifice, that we might perform a service to Him. By His reviving to a new state and condition of life, His right to our obedience is strengthened. There is no creature exempt from obedience to Him. Who would not be loyal to Him, who hath already received: 1. A power to protect; 2. A glory to reward?

JOHN HOWE: Receive the poor weakling, for God is able to make him stand. Every new-born child is weak, and we must remember that this is the case with every regenerate soul.

BISHOP HOPKINS: On ver. 12. All the wickedness that men have brooded on and hatched in the darkest vaults of their own hearts, or acted in the obscurest secrecy, shall be then made as manifest as if they were every one of them written on their foreheads with the point of a sunbeam. Here, on earth, none know so much of us, neither would we that they should, as our own consciences; and yet those great secretaries, our own consciences, through ignorance or carelessness, overlook many sins which we commit. But our own consciences shall not know more of us than all the world shall, for all that has been done shall be brought into public notice.

HENRY: Though some Christians are weak and others strong, though of different sizes, capacities, apprehensions, and practices, in lesser things, yet they are all the Lord's. They serve Christ, and approve themselves to Him, and accordingly are owned and accepted of Him. Is it for us, then, to judge or despise them, as if we were their masters, and they were to make it their business to please us, and to stand or fall by our sentence?

WESLEY, Sermon on the Great Assize, Rom. xiv. 10: Consider: 1. The chief circumstances which will precede our standing before the judgment-seat of Christ; 2. The judgment itself; 3. Circumstances which will follow it; 4. Application to the hearer.

ROBERT HALL: The proper remedy for a diversity of sentiment is not the exercise of compulsory power, much less a separation of communion, but the ardent pursuit of Christian piety, accompanied with an humble dependence on Divine teaching, which, it may reasonably be expected, will in due time correct the errors and imperfections of sincere believers. The proper conduct to be maintained is a cordial coöperation in every branch of worship and of practice with respect to which we agree, without attempting to effect a unanimity by force.

RICHARD WATSON, on vers. 7, 8: The extension of the work of Christ in every age goes upon the same principle. The principle of selfishness and that of usefulness are distinct and contrary. One is a point, but the centre is nothing; the other is a progressive radius, which runs out to the circumference. The one is a vortex, which swallows up all within its gorge; the other is the current-stream, which gushes with an incessant activity, and spreads into distant fields, refreshing the thirsty earth, and producing richness and verdure. The principle of one is contraction; of the other, expansion. Nor is this a sluggish or inactive principle. Lively desire for the acknowledgment of Christ by men, strong and restless jealousies for His honor, tender sympathies with the moral wretchedness of our kind, deep and solemn impressions of eternal realities, and of the danger of souls; these are the elements which feed it; and they carry Christian love beyond all the philanthropy of the natural law.

HODGE: Owing to ignorance, early prejudice, weakness of faith, and other causes, there may and must exist a diversity of opinion and practice on minor points of duty. But this diversity is no sufficient reason for rejecting from Christian fellowship any member of the family of Christ. It is, however, one thing to recognize a man as a Christian, and another to recognize him as a suitable minister of a church, organized on a particular form of government and system of doctrines.

[F. W. ROBERTSON: It is always dangerous to multiply restrictions and requirements beyond what is essential; because men, feeling themselves hemmed in, break the artificial barrier, but, breaking it with a sense of guilt, thereby become hardened in conscience, and prepared for transgressions against commandments which are divine and of eternal obligation. Hence it is that the criminal has so often, in his confessions, traced his deterioration in crime to the first step of breaking the Sabbath-day; and, no doubt, with accurate truth.—If God has judgments in store for England, it is because we are selfish men—because we prefer pleasure to duty, party to our church, and ourselves to every thing else.—J. F. H.]

On avoiding offence. 1. Offence cannot be avoided at the expense of personal freedom; 2. Just as little can it be avoided at the expense of love toward a brother (vers. 13-16).—If you would avoid stumbling or offence, then preserve: 1. Your personal freedom; 2. But do not injure love toward a brother, for whose sake Christ died (vers. 13-16).—Nothing is unclean in itself; much is unclean if one so regard it (ver. 14).—Take care that your treasure be not evil spoken of! 1. What is this treasure? Spiritual freedom. Comp. ver. 6; 1 Cor. x. 30; 1 Tim. iv. 4. 2. How can it be protected against slander? When the strong man in faith rejoices in its possession, but at the same time walks charitably (ver. 16).

LUTHER: The gospel is our treasure, and it is evil spoken of when Christian freedom is so boldly made use of as to give offence to the weak.

STARKER, HEDINGER: Take heed, soul, lest you give offence! No stumbling-stone, no sin, however small you think it may be, is really small if it can make a weak one fall. Use the right which you have, but use it aright; Matt. xvii. 24 (ver. 13).

GERLACH: It is not our office to judge our brother, and to decide on his relation to God; but it is every Christian's office to pronounce decidedly against uncharitableness, which can condemn another to his fall.

HEUBNER: The treasure is Christian freedom, deliverance from outward ordinances. It is evil spoken of either by the enemies of the Church, when they see the dissension of Christians, or by the weaker brethren, when they condemn the stronger, and use their freedom presumptuously, or by the stronger, when they give offence to the weaker, and injure their conscience (ver. 16).

BESSER: It is a true proverb: "Though two do the same thing, it is not really the same thing," for not the form of the deed, but the sense of the doer, decides as to whether any thing is unclean or holy, or contrary to faith and love (ver. 14).

[JEREMY TAYLOR: In a ripe conscience, the practical judgment—that is, the last determination of an action—ought to be sure and evident. This is plain in all the great lines of duty, in actions determinable by the prime principles of natural reason, or Divine revelation; but it is true also in all actions conducted by a right and perfect conscience. There is always a reflex act of judgment, which, upon consideration that it is certain that a public action may lawfully be done, or else that that which is but probable in the nature of the thing (so far as we perceive it) may yet, by the superadding of some circumstances and confidential considerations, or by equity or necessity, become more than public in the particular. Although, I say, the conscience be uncertain in the direct act, yet it may be certain, right, and determined, in the reflex and second act of judgment; and if it be, it is innocent and safe—it is that which we call the right and sure conscience (The Rule of Conscience, Works [BISHOP HEBER'S edition], vol. xi. pp. 369-522).

CLARKE: It is dangerous to trifle with conscience, even when erroneous; it should be borne with and instructed; it must be worn over, not taken by storm. Its feelings should be respected, because they ever refer to God, and have their foundation in His fear. He who sins against his conscience in things which every one else knows to be indifferent, will soon do it in those things in which his salvation is most intimately concerned. It is a great blessing to have a well-informed conscience; it is a blessing to have a tender conscience, and even a sore conscience is better than none.

[BARNES: Christ laid down His precious life for the weak brother as well as for the strong. He loved them; and shall we, to gratify our appetites, pursue a course which will tend to defeat the work of Christ, and ruin the souls redeemed by His blood?—Do not so use your Christian liberty as to give occasion for railing and unkind remarks from your brother, so as to produce contention and strife, and thus to give rise to evil reports among the wicked about the tendency of the Christian religion, as if it were adapted only to promote controversy.—J. F. H.]

The glory of God's kingdom as a kingdom: 1. Of righteousness; 2. Of peace; 3. And of joy in the Holy Ghost (ver. 17).—God's kingdom is: 1. Not a kingdom of dead ordinances, by which the conscience is oppressed; but, 2. A kingdom of living, evangelical truth, by which righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost are planted and promoted (ver. 17).—God's kingdom is a kingdom which: 1. Rests on righteousness; 2. In whose borders peace reigns; 3. To belong to which brings joy to the hearts of all its citizens (ver. 17).—The blissful service of Christ. 1. The service is in righteousness, &c.; 2. The blessing: a. That we are acceptable to God; b. That we are approved of men (vers. 17, 18).

For what should members of the Christian Church strive, if in most important matters they are one, but in unessential matters they have different views? 1. For what makes for peace: 2. For what contributes to edification (ver. 19).—Even the weaker brother's Christian life is God's work; therefore be indulgent toward his conscience! (ver. 20).—Rather deny self than offend a brother (ver. 21).—The happiness of Christian freedom (ver. 22).—The condemnation of the doubting conscience (ver.

23).—What is not of faith is sin. 1. How often is this expression misunderstood! a. When it is supposed that all the virtues of the heathen are glaring sins; b. When all the civic righteousness of unconverted people is condemned in like manner; c. When the whole civilized life of the present day receives the same judgment. Therefore, 2. There arises the serious question, How should it be understood? a. As a declaration which has no application whatever to the heathen, or to unconverted people in Christendom, but strictly to awakened professors of religion; and, in consequence thereof, b. Contains an appeal to them to do nothing which cannot be done with the full joy of faith (ver. 23).

LUTHER, on ver. 23: Observe, that all this is a general declaration against all works done without faith; and guard against the false interpretations were devised by many teachers.

STARKE: A reconciled and quiet conscience is the workshop of spiritual joy (ver. 17).—OSLANDER: The most certain rule of conduct for using Christian freedom, is to contribute to our neighbor's edification and improvement, but not to his downfall and ruin (ver. 19).

SPENER: The Apostle would say (ver. 17), that you should be careful of nothing but God's kingdom. Where this is promoted, it should make you rejoice, and it should grieve you when it suffers. That, on the other hand, which does not concern God's kingdom, should be regarded by you as a small matter.

GERLACH: The righteousness which avails in God's kingdom is not an outward observance of the law, but inward holiness; the peace with God which we have in it overflows to our brethren, and holy joy destroys both all anxiety and every thing which can offend and grieve our neighbor (ver. 17).

LISCO: To attach importance to eating and drinking, to hold that there should henceforth be no scruple at certain kinds of food, or that, on the other hand, this or that should be renounced, is no sign of true Christianity (ver. 17).

HEUBNER: The mistaking of what is essential in Christianity, makes us petty; while laying stress on merely secondary matters unfits us for accomplishing the principal object (ver. 17).—That which is allowed may be sin: 1. When we do it against our conscience: 2. When we thereby offend others (ver. 21).

BESSER: Every Christian and all Christendom are God's work and building (1 Cor. iii. 9). It is blasphemy against God's sanctuary to destroy this work by ruining a brother sanctified by Christ's blood (ver. 15), and by sundering the bond of peace, which keeps the blocks of the divine building in place (ver. 20).—Every thing which is of Christian faith is truly good, because the doer is good by faith, and his deed is love, the fulness of all good deeds (ver. 23).

LEIGHTON: There is no truly comfortable life in the world but that of religion. Religion is joy. Would you think it a pleasant life, though you had fire clothes and good diet, never to see the sun, but still to keep in a dungeon with them? Thus are they who live in worldly honor and plenty, who are still without God; they are in continual darkness, with all their enjoyments.—The public ministry will profit little any way, where a people, or some part of them, are not one, and do not live together as of one mind, and use diligently all due means of edifying one another in their holy faith.—BURKITT: Observe: 1. That the love and practice of religious duties, such as righteousness and peace, is a clear and strong argument of a person's acceptance with God; 2. That such as are for those things accepted by God, ought by no means, for differing from us in lesser things, to be disowned of us, and cast out of communion by us.

[HENRY: Ways by which we may edify one another: 1 By good counsel; 2. Reproof; 3. Instruction; 4. Example; 5. Building up not only ourselves, but one another, in the most holy faith. None are so strong but they may be edified; none so weak but they may edify; and while we edify others, we benefit ourselves.—CLARKE: If a man's passions or appetite allow or instigate him to a particular thing, let him take good heed that his conscience approve what his passions allow, and that he live not the subject of continual self-condemnation and reproach. Even the man who has a too scrupulous conscience had better, in such matters as are in question, obey its erroneous dictates, than violate this moral feeling, and live only to condemn the actions he is constantly performing.

[HONOR: Conscience, or a sense of duty, is not the only, and perhaps not the most important, principle to be appealed to in support of benevolent enterprises. It comes in aid of and gives its sanction to all other right motives; but we find the sacred writers appealing most frequently to the benevolent and pious feelings—to the example of Christ—to a sense of our obligations to Him—to the mutual relations of Christians, and their common connection with the Redeemer, &c., as motives to self-denial and devotedness.—As the religion of the gospel consists in the inward graces of the Holy Spirit, all who have these graces should be recognized as genuine Christians; being acceptable to God, they should be loved and cherished by His people, notwithstanding their weakness or errors.—The peace and edification of the Church are to be sought at all sacrifices, except those of truth and duty; and the work of God is not to be destroyed or injured for the sake of any personal or party interests.—An enlightened conscience is a great blessing; it secures the liberty of the soul from bondage to the opinions of men, and from the self-inflicted pains of a scrupulous and morbid state of moral feeling; it promotes the right exercise of all the virtuous affections, and the right discharge of all our duties.—H. B. RIDGEWAY, on vers. 22, 23: The reason that the Church is so cold in her devotions, and so little comparative success attends her evangelizing efforts, is, that her confidence in God's promises and methods is paralyzed by a self-accusing consciousness of delinquency. There cannot be an overcoming faith in the people of God, except the Spirit of Him who fulfilleth all righteousness breathes and works in their hearts and lives.

Let us bear the infirmity of the weak without pleasing ourselves; for in this: 1. We seek to please our neighbor for his good, to edification; 2. We herein choose Christ as our pattern, who did not please himself (vers. 1-4).—For what purpose should the strong use the infirmity of the weak? 1. To humble himself; 2. To please his neighbor; 3. To imitate Christ (vers. 1-4).—On pleasing ourselves. 1. In what is its ground? a. In a man's regarding his views as the most correct; b. His efforts as the best; c. His words as the wisest; d. His deeds as the most godly; e. And, consequently, himself as insurpassable. 2. How is it shown? a. In the severe condemnation of the weak; b. In immoderate self-praise; c. In pretentious manners in society. 3. How is it to be overcome? a. By discipline in bearing the infirmities of the weak brethren; b. By an honest effort to please our neighbor for his good, to edification (comp. 1 Cor. x. 33); c. By a believing look at Christ, who did not please himself, but bore the reproaches of His enemies (vers. 1-4).—The blessing of the Holy Scriptures for our inward man (ver. 4).—The Holy Scriptures a fountain of hope (ver. 4).—Examples of patience and comfort, which the Scriptures present to us for awakening joyous hope: 1. From the Old Testament; 2. From the New Testament (ver. 4).

ROOS: Bearing the infirmity of the weak is an exercise of meek love, which neither lightly esteems him who is weak, nor would seek to change him in a rough, vehement manner. To please ourselves, means to act according to our own views, whether another can be offended at them or not; or to so conduct ourselves as if we were in the world for our own sake alone, and not also for our weak brother's sake (vers. 2 and 3).

GERLACH: The Apostle here sets up Christ not merely as a pattern, but as a motive, and the living Author and Finisher of our life of faith (ver. 3).

HEUBNER: The reason why a man does not place himself under restraint, is pleasure with himself; and this hinders all peace, destroys the germ of love in the heart, and is a proof of spiritual weakness, prejudice, and a corrupt heart. He is not strong who cannot bear with others near him, nor tolerate their opinions (ver. 21).—The Bible is the only real and inexhaustible book of comfort; Paul said this even when there was nothing more than the Old Testament.—The Bible is not merely a book to be read, but to be lived [nicht Lese-, sondern Lebebuch.], Luther, vol. v., pp. 1707 (ver. 4).

[JEREMY TAYLOR: There is comfort scattered up and down throughout the holy book, and not cast all in a lump together. By searching it diligently, we may draw our consolation out of: 1. Faith; 2. Hope; 3. The indwelling of the Spirit; 4. Prayer;

5. The Sacraments.—BURKITT: The great end for which the Holy Scriptures were written, was the informing of our judgments, and the directing of our practice, that, by the examples which we find there of the patience of holy men under sufferings, and of God's relieving and comforting them in their distresses, we might have hope, confidence, and assurance, that God will also comfort and relieve us under the like pressures and burdens.

[HENRY: Christ bore the guilt of sin, and the curse for it; we are only called to bear a little of the trouble of it. He bore the presumptuous sins of the wicked; we are called only to bear the infirmities of the weak.—There are many things to be learned out of Scripture; the best learning is that which is drawn from that fountain. Those are most learned that are most mighty in the Scriptures. As ministers, we need help, not only to roll away the stone, but to draw out the water; for in many places the well is deep. Practical observations are more necessary than critical expositions.

[SCOTT: Many venture into places and upon actions against which their own conscience revolts; because they are induced by inclination, or emboldened by the example of those who, on some account, have obtained the reputation of pious men. But they are condemned for indulging themselves in a doubtful case. In order to enjoy freedom from self-condemnation, we must have: 1. A sound judgment; 2. A simple heart; 3. A tender conscience; 4. Habitual self-denial.

[ROBERT HALL: Paul enjoins the practice of forbearance, on the ground of the conscientiousness of the parties concerned, on the assumption not only of their general sincerity, but of their being equally actuated, in the very particulars in which they differed, by an unfeigned respect to the authority of Christ; and as he urges the same consideration on which the toleration of both parties rested, it must have included a something which was binding on the conscience, whatever was his private judgment on the points in debate. The Jew was as much bound to tolerate the Gentile, as the Gentile to tolerate the Jew.

[HODGE: The desire to please others should be wisely directed, and spring from right motives. We should not please them to their own injury, nor from the wish to secure their favor; but for their good, that they may be edified.—BARNES: Christ willingly threw himself between the sinner and God, to intercept, as it were, our sins, and to bear the effects of them in His own person. He stood between us and God; and both the reproaches and the Divine displeasure due to them met on His sacred person, and produced the sorrows of the atonement.—His bitter agony in the garden and on the cross. Jesus thus showed His love of God in being willing to bear the reproaches aimed at Him, and His love of men in being willing to endure the sufferings necessary to atone for these very ones.

SIXTH SECTION.—Exhortation to unanimity on the part of all the members of the Church, to the praise of God and on the ground of God's grace, in which Christ has accepted both Jews and Gentiles. Reference to the destination of all nations to glorify God, even according to the Old Testament, and encouragement of the Roman Christians to an immeasurable hope in regard to this, according to their calling.

CHAP. XV. 5-13.

- 5 Now the God of patience and consolation [comfort] grant you to be like-minded [of the same mind] one toward another according to Christ Jesus:
- 6 That ye may with one mind and one mouth [with one accord ye may with one mouth] glorify God, even the Father [or, the God and Father]¹ of our Lord
- 7 Jesus Christ. Wherefore receive ye one another, as Christ also received us
- 8 [you],² to the glory of God.³ Now [For]⁴ I say that Jesus [omitted Jesus]⁵ Christ was [hath been made]⁶ a minister of the circumcision for the truth [for the sake of God's truth] of God, to [in order to] confirm the promises made
- 9 unto the fathers: And that the Gentiles might glorify God for his mercy; as it is written,
- For this cause I will confess [give thanks] to thee among the Gentiles, And sing unto thy name.
- 10, 11 And again he saith,⁷ Rejoice, ye Gentiles, with his people. And again,⁸ Praise the Lord, all ye Gentiles;
And laud⁹ him, all ye people.
- 12 And again, Esaias [Isaiah] saith,¹⁰
There shall be a root of Jesse,
And he that shall rise [riseth] to reign over the Gentiles;
In him shall the Gentiles trust [hope].
- 13 Now [And may] the God of hope fill you with all joy and peace¹¹ in believing, that ye may abound in hope, through [et, in] the power of the Holy Ghost.

¹² Ver. 12.—[The LXX. (Isa. xi. 10) is followed here. It differs somewhat from the Hebrew, which reads .

וְיָחִיד בְּיָמֵינוּ יְהוָה יִשְׂרָאֵל אֲשֶׁר עָמַד לְנֶס לְפָנֵינוּ אֲלֵינוּ יְהוָה יִשְׂרָאֵל.

Literally: "And in that day shall the root of Jesse which (is) standing ~~for~~ set up be for a signal to the nations; unto Him shall the Gentiles seek" (J. A. Alexander). But the LXX. only strengthens this into a form well suited to the Apostle's purpose.

¹³ Ver. 13.—[F. G. read: ἀγαποῦμαι ὑμᾶς πάσης χάρις καὶ εἰρήνη. So B., inserting ἐν before the datives. N. A. C. D. L.: ἀγαπῶμαι ὑμᾶς πάσης χάρις καὶ εἰρήνης; accepted by most editors.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The positive destination of the Christian Church at Rome.

Ver. 5. Now the God of patience, &c. [ὁ δὲ Θεὸς τῆς ὑπομονῆς, κ.τ.λ. "God, who is the author of patience," &c. So Hodge, Meyer, and most. Luther: "Scriptura quidem docet, sed gratia donat, quod illa docet." Comp. Calvin on the patience of the Christian. De Wette, Meyer, and others, understand by ὑπομονή, constancy. Hodge takes consolation as the source of patience.—R.] God is the common, inexhaustible source of all the matured patience of the New Testament, and of all the preparatory comfort of the Old Testament; and it is from Him that believers must derive the gift of being of the same mind one toward another according to Christ Jesus (not according to His example and will merely, but according to His Spirit).*

Ver. 6. It is only in this path of self-humiliation that they shall and can attain to the glorious way of glorifying the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ—Him who has glorified Jesus as Christ, after Christ passed through the Jesus-way of humiliation, and whom they glorify in the anticipation that He will glorify them with Him, as He has already glorified them in Him. The terms Christ Jesus and Jesus Christ are here reversed with remarkable acuteness and effect.—With one accord, ὁμοθυμαδόν, is not explained by the phrase: with one mouth [ἐν ἐνὶ στόματι], but the former is the source of the latter, as Meyer has correctly observed, against Reiche. ["When God is so praised that the same mood impels every one to the same utterance of praise, then party-feeling is banished, and unanimity has found its most sacred expression" (Meyer).—R.]

The God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ [τὸν Θεὸν καὶ πατέρα τοῦ κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ]. He is not only the Father, but also the God, of Christ, in the highest specific sense (thus Grotius [Bengel, Reiche, Fritzsche, Jowett], and others, in opposition to Meyer). Comp. Eph. i. 17.

[God, even the Father, &c. The E. V. thus renders, disconnecting "of our Lord Jesus Christ" from "God." So De Wette, Philippi, Meyer, Stuart, Webster and Wilkinson. Hodge, Tholuck, and Alford, leave the question undecided. It would seem that either view is admissible grammatically; καὶ is often used exegetically, even, and the article (standing before Θεοῦ only) may merely bind the two terms, "God" and "Father of Christ" (Meyer). At the same time, the article might be looked for before πατέρα, were καὶ explicative. Nor is there any doctrinal difficulty occasioned by either view. The only reason in my own mind for preferring the interpretation of the E. V. is, that those exegetes, who are most delicate in their perceptions of grammatical questions, adopt it. See Meyer in loco.—R.]

Ver. 7. Wherefore receive ye one another [διὸ προσλαμβάνεσθε ἀλλήλους]. In the intensive sense. An exhortation to both parties.

As Christ also received you [καθὼς καὶ ὁ Χριστὸς προσέλαβετο ὑμᾶς. See Textual Note 1.] This is more definitely explained in vers. 8 and 9.

To the glory of God [εἰς δόξαν τοῦ Θεοῦ]. See Textual Note 1.] This must be referred to Christ's reception of them, and not to the exhortation: receive ye one another, according to Chrysostom, and others.* That God might be glorified. Not immediately, in order that we may share the Divine glory with Christ (Grotius, Beza, and others), although the glorification of God shall consist in that. As the self-humiliation of Christ, which was proved by His receiving men into His fellowship, led to the glorification of God (see John xvii.), so also, according to the previous verse, shall the same conduct of self-humiliation on the part of Christians have the same effect. But how has Christ received us into His fellowship? Answer:

Ver. 8. For I say [λέγω γάρ. See Textual Note 4.] The Apostle now explains how Christ received the Jewish Christians and Gentile Christians into fellowship with himself.—That Christ

[Χριστόν. See Textual Note *.] The reading Christ, as a designation of God's Son, in view of the incarnation. In this view He hath been made a minister of the circumcision [διδάκονον γιγνῆσθαι πιστοῦς. See Textual Note ]. Dr. Lunge, in his German text of this verse, thus explains this phrase: "from a higher, Divine-human, ideal point of view, receiving the Jews into His fellowship, by submitting himself to circumcision."—R.] His concrete incarnation as a Jew, in which He became subject to the Jewish law (see Phil. ii. 7; Gal. iv. 4), must be distinguished from His incarnation in the more general sense. By this means, He, as the heavenly Strong One, through voluntary love entered into the fellowship of the infinitely weak in both a human and legal sense, and accordingly received them into His fellowship. It seems far-fetched to regard the circumcision here (with Meyer [Philippi, Hodge], and others) as an abstract idea for the circumcision. The circumcision denotes the law; and as He freely became a minister of the law, He also became a ministering companion of the Jews; Matt. xx. 28. Therefore it is not the theocratic "honor of the Jews" which is emphasized here (Meyer) [Philippi], but the condescension to serve them. [So Hodge, διδάκονον is in emphatic position. The view of the emphasis taken by Meyer seems confirmed by what follows, which sets forth an advantage of the Jews.—R.]

For the sake of God's truth [ὑπὲρ ἀληθείας Θεοῦ. For the sake of the truthfulness of God, in order to justify and to prove it by means of the fulfilment of the promises of the Old Testament.—R.] This undoubtedly seems to express the advantage of the Jews; but it also indicates their perilous condition. His condescension had a twofold cause: God's mercy, and His promises resting upon it. Principally, His mercy took the precedence; but historically, the promise preceded. The truthfulness of God had to be sealed; He must confirm the promises given to the fathers by fulfilling them, however unfortunate the condition of the posterity; must confirm them in a way finally valid, for, as such sealed promises, they still continue in force, according to chap. xi., especially to believers (see 2 Cor. i. 20; Rev. iii. 14).

Ver. 9. And that the Gentiles, &c. [τὰ δὲ ἔθνη ὑπὲρ ἑλλένος δοξάσαι τὸν Θεόν.] Christ had to receive the Jews, acting as a minister to them through His whole life; and He had to confine himself to historical labors among them, not so much because they were worthy of it, as to fulfil the promises given to the fathers. But the Gentiles were now the object of utterly unmerited mercy. The thought that Christ has redeemed the Gentiles through pure mercy, which was not yet historically pledged to them (for the promises in the Old Testament in relation to the Gentiles were not pledges to the Gentiles themselves), now passes immediately over into the representation of the fact that the Gentiles have already come to glorify God as believers, in which they have an advantage on their side also. The meaning of ὑπὲρ ἑλλένος is, that mercy could not help satisfying itself for its own sake, by redemption. The δοξάσαι has been translated by Rückert [De Wette, Hodge, Alford], and others: have glorified; by Köllner [Calvin, Tholuck], and Philippi: should glorify. See Meyer on this point, p. 517.* The aorist says, at all events, that they have decidedly begun to glorify God.

For this cause I will give thanks to thee, &c. [διὰ τοῦτο ἐξομολογήσομαι σοι, κ.τ.λ. Verbatim from the LXX., except that κύριε is omitted here. On the verb, see chap. xiv. 11, p. —R.] Meyer aptly says: "The historical subject of the passage, David, is the type of Christ, and the latter (not the Gentile Christian, with Fritzsche; nor the collective term for the Gentile apostles, with Reiche; nor any messenger of salvation to the world, with Philippi) is therefore, in Paul's sense, the prophetic subject; Christ promises that He will glorify God among the Gentiles (surrounded by believing Gentiles) for His mercy (διὰ τοῦτο = ὑπὲρ ἑλλένος). But this is the plastic description of glorifying on the part of the Gentiles themselves, which takes place in the name of the Lord Jesus, and through Him (Col. iii. 17)."

Ver. 10. Rejoice, ye Gentiles, with his people [Ἐθροῦνθητε ἰσθνη μετὰ τοῦ λαοῦ αὐτοῦ. See Textual Note *], for the Hebrew text.—R.] Deut. xxxii. 43. From the LXX., which reads μετὰ τοῦ λαοῦ αὐτοῦ for מִיִּשְׂרָאֵל, "probably following another reading: מִיִּשְׂרָאֵל;" Meyer. On the impossibility of understanding, by Golin, the single tribes of Israel, which De Wette does, comp. Tholuck, p. 730. [Also Philippi, whose remarks on this citation are unusually full and valuable.—R.] According to the theocratic idea, the definitions: rejoice to his people, or rather, make his people rejoice (הַרְגִּיזוּ), ye Gentiles, and rejoice with his people, amount to the same thing.

Ver. 11. Praise the Lord; Ps. cxvii. 1. [An exact citation from the LXX. See Textual Notes * and †, however.—R.] A prophecy of the universal spread of salvation.

Ver. 12. And again, Isaiah saith. [See Textual Note *.] In chap. xi. 10: According to the LXX., which, however, has translated the original text so freely that the twofold dominion of the Messiah is indicated, on the one hand, over the Jews (as the root of Jesse), and, on the other, over the Gentiles.

A root of Jesse [ῥίζα τοῦ Ἰσασαί]. See Isa. xi. 1. The tree of the royal house of David being cut down, the Messiah arose from the root of the house, which is symbolized by Jesse. In a higher sense, Christ was indeed the holy root of Jesse, and of the house of David itself.

1. It has been taken as dependent on λέγει (ver. 8). So Winer, p. 811, Hodge, Alford, De Wette, Philippi; but in different senses: (a) I say that the Gentiles have praised God (at their conversion). So Alford, Hodge, De Wette. But this is both contrary to the usage with the aorist infinitive, and introduces a thought that does not seem to belong here naturally. (b) I say that the Gentiles ought to praise God (Calvin, Philippi, Tholuck). But there is no idea of obligation introduced in ver. 8 which is parallel to this. (c) I say that the Gentiles praise (indefinitely). So Winer, Fritzsche. But to this there are grammatical objections. Besides this, all these involve an incorrect view of the dependence of the infinitive.

2. The simplest, most natural view, is that of the E. V., Meyer, &c. The infinitive stands next to a clause where there is also an aorist infinitive (βαπτίζονται); it is therefore coördinate: with this, depending also on ἐξ, though expressing the more remote purpose: Christ was made a minister, &c., in order to confirm the promises, and as a result of this, that the Gentiles might praise God for His mercy.—R.]

* (This view can scarcely be deemed "far-fetched," when it is so readily suggested by the antithesis, ἰσθνη (ver. 9), and when Paul so frequently uses the term in this sense (comp. chap. iii. 20; Gal. ii. 7 ff.; Eph. ii. 1; Col. iii. 11).—R.)

Ver. 13. And may the God of hope. A grand description of God here, where the object is to remind the Roman Christians to lead a life in perfect accordance with their universal calling. To this also belongs the duty of looking confidently and prayerfully to the God of hope, the God of that future of salvation which is so infinitely rich, both extensively and intensively.

With all joy and peace. From that hope, the highest possible evangelical, saving joy, shall spring; the result of this shall be the richest measure of peace, and the harmony and unanimity of faith. This shall take place in believing (πιστεύων, it is not by unbelief, or by abridging our faith, that the unity of Christianity should be sought), and accordingly these two spiritual blessings shall ever produce a richer hope, not in human power and according to a human measure, but in the inward measure and divine power of the Holy Ghost.

Therefore the realization of hope should not be striven for by the aid of earthly and even infernal powers: one shepherd and one fold! According to Grotius, the end of this hope is harmony; according to Tholuck, the immediate end is the gracious gifts of God's kingdom; while the ultimate end is the regnum gloriae. However, there lies just between these the end which the Apostle here has in view—that by the aid of the Church at Rome, in their fellowship with Paul, all nations shall be brought, by the spread of faith, to glorify God; Eph. i. 18 ff.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The great grounds of the profound and perfect harmony and unanimity of Christians. a. God as the God of patience and comfort; that is, as the God of the infinite power of passive and active love; b. The pattern, the spirit, the power, and the work of Christ; c. The design that Christians, by being like-minded, and by aiming at substantial fellowship in God and in Christ (as created and redeemed), should find also the ethical fellowship of harmony and unanimity.

2. The universal fellowship into which Christ has entered with humanity, and the special fellowship in which He has pledged himself to the Jews, constitute the basis for the most special and real fellowship into which He, through His grace, has entered with believers. But it is a grievous offence to refuse communion with him whom Christ, by the witness of faith and of confession, has communion, or to abridge and prejudice hearty intercourse with those whom God, in Christ, deems worthy of His fellowship. [Ver. 7 seems to be a dictum probans for what is termed "open communion."—R.]

3. On the antithesis: Christ Jesus and Jesus Christ, see the Exeg. Notes.

4. It is also clear here (see ver. 8) that we must

* Meyer renders: in virtue of the (inworking) power of the Holy Ghost. Our E. V., usually so apt, is peculiarly unfortunate in its treatment of the preposition ἐν, which it renders through in this case. The later revisions have by. But it is to be doubted whether ἐν ever has a strictly instrumental force. The peculiar meaning, in, always remains in it. So here, in believing, in the power of the Holy Ghost; the former expressing the subjective, and the latter, the objective means, yet the former sets forth the status, in which (ἀδούχησιν) they are, and the latter an inworking power. Comp. Philippi.—R.]

distinguish between the ideal incarnation of Christ in itself, and His concrete incarnation in Judaism, and, generally, in the form of a servant.

5. God is free in His grace, and yet also bound in His truth, for He has bound himself to His promises. But this obligation is the highest glory of His freedom. His truthfulness had to satisfy His word, but His mercy had to satisfy itself.

6. The riches of the Old Testament in promises for the Jews, and the high aim of these promises—a world of nations praising the Lord.

7. The God of patience, comfort, hope. All such terms define God to be infinite, and infinite as a fountain, as self-communicating life, and archetype of life. So also is the Holy Spirit defined as the Spirit of truth, &c. See the beautiful remark of Gerlach, below. But the highest thing for which we can praise God, according to ver. 6, is His being the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. Not only is He His Father in the specific sense, but also His God; the glorious God of His consciousness and life is the true God in perfect revelation, and consequently shall become our God through Him.

8. On the development of hope, within the sphere of faith, into joy and peace, and, by means of peace, into an ever richer hope, see the Exeg. Notes. It is only in this way that irenics can be conducted in the power of the Holy Ghost, and not with the modern artifice of attempting them outside the sphere of faith, beyond all creeds, and with the theory of unconscious Christianity, or even with the violent measures of the Middle Ages. The Apostle says: In the power of the Holy Ghost.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Jewish and Gentile Christians should agree for Christ's sake, who has received them both.—Christian harmony. 1. It comes from the God of patience and comfort; 2. It is shaped according to the pattern and will of Jesus Christ; 3. It expresses itself in harmonious praise of God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ (vers. 5, 6).—A harmonious and fraternal disposition is a source of the joyous praise of God, which is not disturbed by a discordant note (vers. 5, 6).—Jesus Christ a minister of the circumcision. 1. Why? For the truth of God, to confirm the promise. 2. How? In obedience to the Divine law, for freedom from the law (ver. 8).—Receive one another, as Christ also received us, to the glory of God. Every thing to God's glory, and not to our own (ver. 7).—The praise of God out of the mouth of Gentiles: 1. Established in God's mercy; 2. Resounding in many tongues; 3. Ascending to heaven (ver. 9).—God's mercy toward the Gentiles: 1. Present from the beginning; 2. Declared by the prophets; 3. Manifested in Christ (vers. 9-13). Ver. 13 is an appropriate text and theme for addresses on occasions of confirmation or marriage.

STARKE: In Christ, souls are worth so much that God receives them, just as men hoard gold and silver, pearls and gems; Isa. xliii. 4 (ver. 7).—MÜLLER: Patience does not increase in the garden of nature, but it is God's gift and grace; God is the real Master who creates it (ver. 5).—Because Christ is a root, He must vegetate, bloom, and bring forth fruit in us (ver. 12).

GERLACH: God is the source of all good things and since He not merely has them, but they are His real essence; since He does not have love and omnipotence, but is actually love and omnipotence themselves, so can He be denominated according to every glorious attribute and gift which He possesses. The advantage which the Gentiles thought that they possessed in their polytheism, when they, for example, worshipped a deity of truth, of hope, &c., is possessed in a much more certain and effective way by the believing Christian, when he perceives, in a vital manner, that the true God is himself personal faithfulness, hope, and love, and thus has all these attributes just as if He had nothing else but them (ver. 5).

HEUBNER: The harmony of hearts is the real soul and power of worship (ver. 6).—Christ is the centre of the Holy Scriptures (ver. 8).—Christ is the bond of all nations (ver. 12).—God alone is the source of all life and blessing in the Church. The means is faith, as the ever new appropriation of saving blessings; from this arises the enjoyment of peace and of all blessed joys—an overflow of hope. But every thing is brought to pass by the Holy Spirit (ver. 13).

BEASER: The Scriptures are a book of patience and comfort (ver. 5).—Every thing which is true joy in this life, is a foretaste of the joy of eternal life—joy in the Lord and His word, joy in all His blessings, which make body and soul happy, &c. . . . All true peace in this world of contention and anxiety, is a preliminary enjoyment of the peace in the kingdom of glory.

SCHLICKERMACHER: The limitation in the labors of our Saviour himself, when we look at His person, and the greater freedom and expansion in the labors of His disciples. 1. Treatment; 2. Application (vers. 8, 9).

VERS. 4-13. THE PERICOPHE for the Second Sunday in Advent.—SCHULTZ: On the likeness of Christ and His redeemed ones. 1. In what respect has Christ become like us? 2. In what respect should we become like Christ? a. In patience and humility; b. In the respect and love with which He treated all men; c. In the joyful faith and peaceful hope with which He overcame the world.—RIEMER: What must there be among Christians, in order that the Church of Christ may stand? 1. One foundation; 2. A harmonious mouth; 3. A common bond.—BRANDT: To what does the season of Advent exhort us? 1. To the industrious examination of what has been written; 2. To the unanimous praise of God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, for all that has been already fulfilled; 3. To an attentive waiting for the future coming of God's kingdom.—HEUBNER: The unity of the Christian Church. 1. In what does it consist? 2. What binds us to it?—The Bible the bond of the Christian Church. 1. Proof: It is the bond, a. In faith, or in doctrine; b. In the holy sense, or in love; c. In worship; d. In daily life. 2. Application. a. A warning against despising the Bible, and an admonition to maintain its authority; b. A dissemination of its use; c. Our own proper use of it.—The Bible the treasure of the evangelical Church.—The inward unity of true Christians amid outward diversity.

[BERRITT: The Christian's hope: 1. God is its object, and therefore the sin of despair is most unreasonable; for why should any despair of His mercy who is the God of hope, who commands us to hope in His mercy, and takes pleasure in them that do so? 2. The grace of hope, together with joy and peace in believing, are rooted in the Christian's heart, through the power of the Holy Ghost—that is, through the sanctifying influences of the Holy Ghost—enlightening the understanding, inclining the will, rectifying the affections, and reducing all the rebellious powers and faculties of the soul in concurrence with our endeavors under the government and dominion of reason and religion.

[HENRY: The method of faith is: 1. To seek Christ as one proposed to us for a Saviour; 2. And, finding Him able and willing to save, then to trust in Him. They that know Him will trust in Him. Or, this seeking Him is the effect of a trust in Him, seeking Him by prayer and pursuant endeavors. Trust, is the mother; diligence in the use of means, the daughter.—What is laid out upon Christians is but little compared with what is laid up for them.—DODDRIDGE: Nothing can furnish so calm a peace and so sublime a joy as Christian hope.—That is the most happy and glorious circumstance in the station which Providence may have assigned us, which gives us the greatest opportunity of spreading the honor of so dear a name, and of presenting praises and services to God through Him.

KOLLOCK, Sermon on the patience of God. I. The nature of this patience, or slowness to anger (1.) It is a modification of the Divine goodness; (2.) It is not the result of ignorance; (3.) It is not the result of impotence; (4.) It is not the result of a connivance at sin, or a resolution to suffer it with impunity; (5.) But it is grounded on the everlasting covenant, and the blood of Jesus. II. Some of the most illustrious manifestations of it. III. The reasons why God exercises it: (1.) He is patient because of His benignity; (2.) In order that this perfection may be glorified; (3.) In consequence of the prayers of pious ancestors; (4.) Because the wicked are often mixed with the pious, and nearly related to them; (5.) The number of His elect is not yet completed; (6.) The measure of the sins of the wicked is not yet filled up; (7.) That sinners may be brought to repentance; (8.) That sinners who continue impenitent may at last be without excuse; (9.) That His power may be displayed; (10.) That He may exercise the trust of His servants in Him. IV. The effects that the belief and knowledge of it should produce upon our hearts and lives: (1.) Because of God's patience we should love Him; (2.) We should repent; (3.) We should imitate Him; (4.) His patience should be our comfort; (5.) We should grieve at the reproaches and insults cast upon God.

SECOND DIVISION.

THE CALLING OF THE APOSTLE TO A UNIVERSAL APOSTLESHIP, AND HIS CONSEQUENT RELATION TO THE ROMAN CHURCH, AS THE POINT OF DEPARTURE FOR HIS UNIVERSAL APOSTLESHIP IN THE WEST.

CHAP. XV. 14-33.

- 14 And I myself also am persuaded of you, my brethren, [Now I am persuaded, my brethren, even I myself, concerning you,] that ye also [yourselves] are full of goodness, filled with all knowledge, able also to admonish one another.
- 15 Nevertheless, brethren, I have written the more boldly unto you [Howbeit, I have written more boldly^a unto you, brethren]^a in some sort [measure], as putting you in mind, because of the grace that is given to me of God, That I should be the [a] minister of Jesus Christ [Christ Jesus]^a to the Gentiles, ministering the gospel of God, that the offering up [offering] of the Gentiles might be acceptable, being sanctified by [ἐν, in] the Holy Ghost. I have therefore whereof I may glory [I have therefore my boasting]^a through Jesus Christ [in Christ Jesus] in those things which pertain to God.^a For I will not dare to speak of any of those things which Christ hath not wrought [did not work] by [through] me, to make the Gentiles obedient [in order to the obedience of the
- 19 Gentiles], by word and deed, Through mighty [In the power of] signs and wonders, by [in] the power of the Spirit of God [Holy Spirit];^a so that from Jerusalem, and round about unto [as far as] Illyricum, I have fully preached the gospel of Christ. [;] Yea, so have I strived [Yet on this wise making it my ambition]^a to preach the gospel, not where Christ was [already] named, lest I should [that I might not] build upon another man's foundation: But as it is written,

To whom he was not spoken of, they [They to whom no tidings of him came] shall see:

And they that have not heard shall understand.

- 22 For which cause also I have been much [for the most part]^a hindered from coming to you. But now having no more [no more having] place in these parts, and having a great desire these many years [having these many years a longing] to come unto you; Whosoever I take my journey into Spain, I will come to you [omit I will come to you]:^a for^a I trust to see you in my journey [as I pass through], and to be brought on my way thitherward [to be sent forward thither] by^a you, if first I be somewhat [in some measure] filled with your company.
- 25 But now I go unto Jerusalem to minister [ministering] unto the saints.
- 26 For it hath pleased them of Macedonia and Achaia [Macedonia and Achaia thought it good] to make a certain contribution for the poor [among the] saints which are at Jerusalem. It hath pleased them verily [For they thought it good]; and their debtors they are. For if the Gentiles have been made partakers of [have shared in] their spiritual things, their duty is [they owe it] also to minister unto them in carnal things. When therefore I have performed this, and have sealed [i. e., secured] to them this fruit, I will come [return]^a by you
- 29 [through your city] into Spain. And I am sure that, when I come unto you, I shall come in the fulness of the blessing of the gospel [omit of the gospel]¹ of 30 Christ. Now I beseech you, brethren,² for the Lord Jesus Christ's sake [by our Lord Jesus Christ], and for [by] the love of the Spirit, that ye [to] strive 31 together with me in *y-ur*³ prayers to God for me; That I may be delivered from them that do not believe [the disobedient] in Judea; and that my service [ministration]⁴ which I have [is] for Jerusalem may be accepted of [prove 32 acceptable to] the saints; That I may come unto you with [in] joy by the will 33 of God,⁵ and may with you be refreshed.⁶ Now the God of peace be with you all. Amen.⁷

¹ Ver. 14.—[Instead of ἀλλήλους (N. A. B. C. D. F.), adopted by modern editors generally, ἑαυτοῦ is found in L., many cursives, versions, and fathers. As an alteration to strengthen the sense, or an error of the transcriber, it is readily accounted for. The list of cursives given by Dr. Hodge adds little to the support of this reading.—The καὶ is also omitted, and ἀλλήλους put before συνάμενοι, in some authorities. These are evidently corrections, to avoid repeating καὶ for the third time.]

¹⁰ Ver. 22.—[B. D. F. Lachmann: πολλάκις, which is probably a gloss. N. A. C. L.: τὰ πολλά. So Tischendorf, Philippi, Meyer, De Wette, Alford, Tregelles.]

¹³ Ver. 24.—[Rec., with N. A. C. L.: ὅς ὑμῶν; B. (dub) D. F.: ὅς ὑμῶν. The former is adopted by Philippi, Tregelles; the latter by Lachmann, Tischendorf, Meyer, De Wette, Alford, Lange.]

¹⁹ Ver. 32.—[Instead of the well-sustained and generally received Θεοῦ (Rec. N. A. C. D. L., most versions and fathers), we find κυρίου Ἰησοῦ (B.), Χριστοῦ Ἰησοῦ (N. L.), Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ (N. L.). The uncial authority is decisive. Besides, Paul always says: θέλημα Θεοῦ, never Χριστοῦ (so Meyer, and others).]

¹² Ver. 33.—[A. F. G. omit Ἄμην; found in K. B. C. D. L., versions and fathers. Bracketted by Tregelles, but generally received. The word is always open to some suspicion, as a liturgical addition, at the close of a benediction.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The following section is termed an Epilogue by Tholuck and Meyer. But this view does not correspond with the purpose and construction of the Epistle. The Apostle now comes to the last design of his Epistle, which is, to make Rome the principal station for his missionary labors in the West. See Schott, Der Römerbrief, p. 314, and elsewhere.

Summary.—A. The Apostle explains, almost apologetically, that his addressing the Romans was the result of his call to make the Gentiles, in priestly labor, an acceptable offering to God; and he gives information respecting the general completion of his work in the East (to Illyricum), and the results of the same; vers. 14-19.

B. His principle, not to invade the sphere of the labor of others (conduct the very opposite of that of all sectaries). The consequent impediments to his coming to Rome, where Christian congregations already exist. The desire, that nevertheless arose in harmony with his calling, to take this step. His hesitation not being fully removed, he describes his intended visit to Rome as a sojourn to gain strength for his further journey to Spain—that is, to the limits of the West; doubtless in the expectation that the Church will welcome him, and commit itself to his direction; vers. 20-24.

C. The last hindrance from his journey to Rome. The mention of the collections a proof of his love for believing Israelites, an expression of the proper conduct of Gentile Christians toward Jewish Christians. A further announcement of his journey through Rome, and of his visit, in the spirit of apostolical refinement. A foreboding reference to the obstructing hostility of the unbelievers in Judea, and a request that the Roman Christians should pray for the fulfilment of his purpose of coming to them; vers. 25-33.

A. Vers. 14-19.—Ver. 14. Even I myself; ἑγὼ ἐγώ, chap. vii. 25. He himself, the same, who has admonished them, has also this conviction. Thus he is not in antithesis to others (Tholuck),* but he, as the one persuaded, is in antithesis to his admonition. This is favored by the following verse. Ritzsche, De Wette, Philippi [Stuart, Alford], explain similarly.

[Ye also yourselves, καὶ ἄλλοι. "Without any exhortation of mine" (Alford).—R.]—Are full of goodness [μιστοὶ ἔστε ἀγαθῶν ὑμῶν]. In the foregoing section the ἀγαθὸν was to be understood particularly of humility and self-denying love, as the key-note of Christ's feeling; accordingly, it must also here be construed as substantive. (Meyer: "That ye are also of yourselves very excellent people.") [Hodge: "Full of kind and conciliatory feelings; or, taking ἀγαθὸν εἶναι in its wider sense, full of virtue, or excellence." This last is adopted, apparently, from Meyer; it is so wide as to seem almost too complimentary.—R.]

With all knowledge [ἰσῶσεως. We reject the article, which is found only in K. B.—R.] The Apostle very willingly refers the γνώσις particularly to the universal destination of Christianity; comp. Eph. i.—Admonish, νοιθετεῖν. Strictly, to direct with brotherly feeling. To set the heart right is not a human affair; but when the heart is properly disposed, the νοῖς (or even the head) can be placed right.

Ver. 15. [Howbeit I have written more boldly unto you, τολμηρότερον δὲ ἔγραψα ὑμῖν]. The adjective is used adverbially. Meyer insists upon this comparative sense. [The verb ἔγραψα is the epistolary aorist, I have written; hence the Amer. Bible Union, I wrote, is a slavish following of the rule which makes the Greek aorist equivalent to the English past tense. The authors of that version unfortunately ignore all exceptions.—Brethren, ἀδελφοί. See Textual Note.—In some measure, ἀπὸ μέρους. This qualifies ἔγραψα: I have written boldly in places (so De Wette, Meyer, Lange); not the adverb: I have written somewhat; i too boldly (Peshito, Grotius, Hodge). Hence the E. V. does not convey the meaning correctly.—R.] The boldness consists in his having spoken to them as to his own church, although he is not, strictly speaking, its founder, and refers, for the most part, to chap. xiv. ff. Meyer enumerates, in preference, a number of other passages: chap. vi. 12 ff., &c. [viii. 9; xi. 17 ff.; xii. 8; xiii. 8 ff.; xiv. 8 f. 10, 13, 15, 20; xv. 1.—R.]

As putting you in mind. He can say this in a general sense of the Christian state of development, which he presupposes in them, and, in a special sense, with reference to his many friends in Rome, who were not only his disciples, but also his helpers.

Because of the grace, &c. [διὰ τὴν χάριν, κ.τ.λ.] The following verse explains the sense in which he means this. Because his great and gracious call impels him to go far beyond Rome, he must first of all arrange matters perfectly with them. [The common interpretation: "My apostolic office was the ground and reason of my boldness," does not exclude the special reference suggested by Dr. Lange.—R.]

Ver. 16. That I should be a minister [εἰς τὸ εἶναι με λειτουργόν. The purpose of the grace given to him.—R.] The λειτουργός denotes, not only according to the immediate connection, but also according to the character of the whole Epistle, the minister in public worship; Meyer: the sacri- ficing priest; Heb. viii. 2; Phil. ii. 17.

Christ Jesus [Χριστοῦ Ἰησοῦ. This reading seems most accordant with the context, since the priestly service under Christ, the King, is referred to.—R.] Reiche: Christ is the offering brought; Rückert, very properly, says: Christ is the High-Priest; against which Meyer strangely

* (Meyer (followed by Hodge in last edition) understands it to mean: "I of myself, without the testimony of others." He urges the emphasis which he thinks rests on καὶ ἑγὼ. Were the meaning that suggested by Dr. Lange, the form would be καὶ ἐγώ. But the view of Dr. Lange corresponds best with that taken of the same expression, pp. 243, 244. Hence we alter "I myself also" into even I myself (so Five Anz. Clergymen). Lange: Ich — auch als einer und derselbe.—R.)

urges, that this is not an idea of Paul, but of the Epistle to the Hebrews. [De Wette, Meyer, Fritzsche, and Philippi, think that Christ is represented here as Head and King of the Church, which is perhaps preferable.—R.]

Ministering (as a priest in) the gospel of God [ἰεουργοῦντα τὸ εὐαγγέλιον τοῦ Θεοῦ. Performing a priestly office with reference to the gospel.—R.] Explanations: 1. The gospel is the offering (Luther). 2. The office of the gospel is his priestly office (Erasmus, Tholuck, &c.). As the law was the basis of the Old Testament cultus, so the gospel is the basis of the New Testament cultus. Hence the meaning is: Explaining, as ministrant to the High-Priest, Christ, the gospel in its liturgical character, and transforming the knowledge of God contained in the gospel into evangelical praise of God (thank-offering); see chap. i. 21. [A slight modification is necessary, if Christ be represented here as King. Estius: "Administrans evangelium a Deo missum hominibus, eoque ministerio velut sacerdotio fungens."—R.]

The offering of the Gentiles [ἡ προσφορά τῶν ἔθνων. Genitive of apposition.] Not the offering which the Gentiles bring, but which the Gentiles themselves are (burnt-offerings).

Being sanctified in the Holy Ghost [ἡγιασμένην ἐν πνεύματι ἁγίῳ. 'Εν seems to be instrumental, and yet may well indicate the element in which they were sanctified, purified.—R.] In the real New Testament mode, not in the merely typical sense of the consecration in the temple.*

Ver. 17. I have therefore my boasting in Christ Jesus [ἔχω οὖν τὴν καύχησιν ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ. See Textual Note *.] We take ἔχω as emphatic, and in connection with the words Christ Jesus. His glorying (the act itself) in his great calling, he, as the minister of Christ, holds within the bounds of the fellowship and Spirit of Christ. [He incidentally opposes any suspicion of his glorying himself, but the main emphasis does not rest on this. De Wette, Alford: "I venture to boast." En, not through Christ (E. V., Stuart).—R.]

In those things which pertain to God [τὰ πρὸς τὸν Θεόν]. According to the context, the restoration of the real worship of God in the world is meant. [Philippi, De Wette, Alford: "My above-named sacerdotal office and ministry."—R.] Meyer says, however: "My boasting is something which belongs to me in virtue of my connection with Christ, in relation to God's cause." Reiche: "My glorying consists in my glorying of Christ. [Dr. Hodge mentions another: "I have offerings for God—i. e., Gentile converts." Too far-fetched.—R.]

Ver. 18. For I will not dare, &c. [οὐ γὰρ τολμήσω, κ.τ.λ.]. The γὰρ explains how he meant the foregoing expression in ver. 17. But ver. 17 refers to ver. 16, in proof that he knows that he is placed, as a minister, completely under the direction and operation of the Spirit of Christ, the High-Priest. Thus Paul speaks, and thus John speaks; but modern criticism, on the other hand, boldly maintains the contrary—that Paul corrected the Ebionitic form of Christ, and that then ("pseu do") John again corrected Paulinism.—The constant purpose was to call the Gentiles to the obedience of faith. Tholuck, and others, here accept a reference to the experiences which Paul had suffered in Corinth from the Judaists. But his purpose is, to show to the Romans that he comes to them simply as an instrument of Christ.

[The emphasis rests on οὐ κατιργάσατο, did not work. Hodge, following Theodoret, and others, places it on Christ, so that the antithesis is what he did, or could do, of himself. But the view taken of the verse by most commentators will appear from Alford's paraphrase: "I have real ground for glorying (in a legitimate and Christian manner); for I will not (as some false apostles do) allow myself to speak of any of those things which (or for me, ἑαυτῶν, ἃ) Christ did not work by me (but by some other) in order to the obedience (subjection to the gospel) of the Gentiles (then, as if the sentence were in the affirmative form, 'I will only boast of what Christ has veritably done by me toward the obedience of the Gentiles,' he proceeds) by word and deed." This last phrase is to be joined with ver. 19.—R.]

Ver. 19. In the power of signs and wonders [ἐν δυνάμει σημείων καὶ τεράτων]. Thus the ἔργον of Paul is explained. Comp. the Acts of the Apostles.—But he refers every thing, word and work, signs and wonders, in a more special sense (in signs the miracle refers to the coming renewed world, and in τέρας to the astonishment of the old world) to the power of the Spirit, the spiritual life in which the Holy Spirit has become one with his spirit.* These "wonders" are incidentally a confirmation of the accounts of similar import in the Acts of the Apostles, and are therefore very uncomfortable to Baur, and others; comp. 2 Cor. xii. 12.

From Jerusalem. After the intensiveness of his labors, he comes to their extensiveness. Three points must be here observed: (1.) From Jerusalem; (2.) κύκλῳ; (3.) To Illyricum. As for (1.), the Apostle has reckoned his stay in Arabia and Damascus among his years of instruction, and not among his years as teacher. Likewise Jerusalem, where he first entered upon his apostolical labors, was not only the starting-point of the mission of all the apostles, but especially of his (see Acts ix. 28, 29; xxii. 18.).

Round about [καὶ κύκλῳ]. This does not mean in an arc (from Jerusalem by way of Asia Minor, Macedonia, and Greece, to Illyricum; Theodoret, Flacius, and others), but round about; † in which, indeed, points forming a circle come into consideration, though the expression must not be pressed geographically.

As far as Illyricum [μέχρι τοῦ Ἰλλυρίου καὶ οὐ]. The later expositors generally regard Illyricum as the terminus (see Tholuck); but Meyer, on the contrary, is of the opinion that this view subjects the Apostle to the suspicion of boasting; and probably, therefore, that he made an excursion into Illyricum, "possibly to the journey narrated in Acts xx. 1-3." But μέχρι θαλάσσης means to the sea, not into the sea. In Acts xx. 1-3 there is no trace of a journey by way of Macedonia and Greece to the West.

* [Should πνεύματος be accepted as the correct reading, then, of course, πνεῦμα may be taken in the second sense (see p. 235); yet this is not absolutely necessary since Meyer rejects the longer reading, and at the same time refers πνεύματος to the Holy Spirit. But the reading πνεύματος ἁγίου is more probably correct; see Textual Note *.—R.]

† [De Wette, Philippi, Alford, and others, join this with "Jerusalem," taking it as = and the neighborhood. It does seem to be connected with the starting-point, and yet Dr Lange rightly includes the intermediate journeyings, &c.—R.]

* [This verse, instead of supporting the idea that the Christian ministry is a priesthood, virtually opposes it. Had the Apostle laid claim to actual and special sacerdotal functions, it is very unlikely that he would have kept the claim so constantly out of sight in his Epistles. In this passage, the offering is a figurative one, the priestly function is also figurative. The silence of the rest of his writings of itself proves that this must be regarded in another than a literal sense. See Doctr. Note *.—R.]

I have fully preached, πῆλιν ῥησέναι. [Literally: have fulfilled; but the E. V. conveys the meaning quite accurately.—R.] Not completely discharged the office of the gospel (Beza, Bengel, and others), but completely spread the gospel. The expression, therefore, does not mean: accomplished every thing with the gospel (Luther), or, perfectly declared the gospel (Olshausen). See Meyer [p. 527] for other explanations. The difficulty disappears if we appreciate the circumstances and method of the apostles. They had neither time nor calling to perform missionary labor in every village; they understood their calling in a universally historic and dynamic sense, and, consequently, when they had once conquered the fortresses, they had also conquered the surrounding country.

B. Vers. 20-24.—Ver. 20. Yet on this wise making it my ambition [οὕτω δὲ φιλοτιμούμενον]. See Textual Note 8. The verb means: to make it a point of honor. Alford thinks, however, that it loses its primary meaning here, which is doubtful.—R.] See the Lexicons. The φιλοτιμούμενον, as an accusative dependent on με, see 2 Cor. x. 15.

Was already named [ὄπον ὀνομάσθη]. Has been named according to His name.—This principle [which must not be deemed an attempt to avoid opposition (Reiche, and others).—R.] was in harmony with the labors of the apostles everywhere, because they had to lay the foundation. But it had a special meaning for Paul—that he had to establish the gospel in its full and most universal diffusion, and therein would not collide with the often nationally qualified, though evangelically free, missionary methods of the other apostles (see Gal. ii.). The subsequent settlement of John in Ephesus was the result of a call to lay an ideal and unifying foundation, by means of which even the work of Paul could be carried further forward; besides, the labors of John embraced many churches which had arisen after Paul's labors in that region.

Ver. 21. But as it is written. [See Textual Note 9. Ἀλλὰ introduces the positive explanation of οὕτω, on this wise; not where others had preached, but according to this rule of Scripture.—R.] Isa. lii. 15, according to the LXX. Meyer says that the subject is the (there mentioned) ἔθνη, not the nationes. Not at all, even if the subject be violently rent asunder into two parts. The universal impulse of the gospel to go farther and farther into every land, was already expressed in prophecy.

Ver. 22. For which cause also I have been for the most part hindered [διὸ καὶ ἐντοπτόμην τὰ πολλά]. Because he had to carry on his missionary labors now here and now there in the East. According to Meyer, Paul would say: By this means I have been hindered in most cases (τὰ πολλά), besides other instances. Undoubtedly the Apostle knows also other instances of hindrance; see 1 Thess. ii. 18.*

* [Philippi, Hodge, and others, adopt this view of τὰ πολλά as = perumque, for the most part—i. e., this was the principal reason. Alford follows Schott and De Wette, who understand it to mean: these many times—i. e., so often.

Ver. 23. No more having place [μηκέτι τόπον ἔχων]. Meyer, following Luther: space, scope. [Philippi, De Wette, Alford: opportunity, occasion.—R.] But the Apostle's scope was conditioned by a standing place, a central point; and here it is most natural to think of such a place. Tholuck: "The apostles were accustomed to carry on missionary labor in the metropolitan cities, leaving the further extension of the gospel to the churches established there, and therefore, after all, to let the pagan remain heathen."

Ver. 24. Whenever. The ὡς ἄν [instead of ὡς (Rec.).—R.]: quandocunque.—Spain [Σπανία]. Usually called Iberia by the Greeks. The Roman Hispania. According to Meyer, this plan for his journey was not fulfilled; according to Tholuck, the question depends on whether we accept a second Roman captivity, and this again on the evidence of Clemens Romanus. See the Introduction to this Epistle [especially Dr. Schaff's note on p. 11], as well as the Introduction to the Pastoral Epistles. Neander, i., p. 525; Wieseler, Chron. des apost. Zeitalters, i. Excursus. As a church already exists in Rome, although not established by an apostle, the Apostle cannot designate Rome as his principal object before Rome had met him in this respect; but as ancient Spain embraced the whole Pyrenean peninsula, it undoubtedly has for the Apostle the still further significance of a symbol of the whole West extending beyond Rome. To him, Spain meant the Western world. But Spain itself was a proper object, because there the two preliminary conditions of missionary labor already existed: Jews and Jewish synagogues, and Grecian and Roman civilization. It does not follow, as Meyer supposes, that Paul gave up his plan of going to Spain after receiving the news, in his first captivity, on the state of things in the East, and thought chiefly of a return; Phil. ii. 24.

[I will come to you. This clause is retained by Dr. Lange. See Textual Notes 11 and 12. Rejecting it, we paraphrase: But now I have no longer a central point for labor in these parts, and (as I am seeking to begin labor in the extreme West) I have had a desire to see you for many years while on my way to Spain. For (now that there is some hope of my starting for Spain, and as you are the Christian church nearest that region) I trust, &c.—R.]

And to be sent forward (on my journey) thither by you [καὶ ὑμεῖς ἰμῶν προπεμφθῆναι]. The ἀπό denotes not merely by them, but from them, as a new point of departure.—R.] The expression προπεμφ. not only expresses a real attendance, such as Paul generally received from the churches for his further journey, but also the friendly furtherance of his journey, or even the friendly dismission; Acts xxi. 8.—In some measure [ἀπὸ μέρους]. Grotius: "Non quantum vellem, sed quantum licebat.—R.] An expression of the high regard in which he held their fellowship.—Filled, ἐμπλησθῶ, by spiritual satiation.

C. Vers. 25-33.—Ver. 25. But now I go. He regards this new official hindrance as the last.—[Ministering, διακονῶν]. Present participle, not the future; the journey is part of the ministry, the whole action is already begun. This is lost sight of in the E. V.; Amer. Bible Union: "I am going to Jerusalem to minister," is even more objectionable.—R.] On the collection mentioned, see 2 Cor. ix. 1, 2; Acts xxiv. 17. Origen is of the opinion that he wished to bring this collection home to the hearts of the Romans too.* He had time enough still for this.

Ver. 26. For Macedonia and Achaia thought it good [εὐδόκησαν γὰρ Μακεδονία καὶ Ἀχαΐα. Dr. Lange: were joyfully willing. The above rendering is perhaps scarcely strong enough, but is taken from later revisions. It seems best to preserve the personification of the original.—R.] The translation: they have wished, does not at all do justice to the εὐδοκ.

A certain contribution [κοινωνίαν τινα. Literally, a certain communion or participation. As used here of a contribution, "honesta et equitativa plena a peltatio" (Bengel).—R.] As the symbol and expression of the κοινωνία, it is itself κοινωνία. The later giving of alms, and particularly that of the Middle Ages, has not kept this meaning in view. Τίνα softens the force. Meyer says: "There is no further trace in the Epistles of Paul of the community of goods." We might add: There is no trace from the outset of a legal[†] carried out community of goods!

Ver. 27. [For they thought it good, εὐδόκησαν γὰρ. The γὰρ introduces an explanation of εὐδόκησαν (ver. 26). The clause is = for they thought it good being their debtors.—R.]—In spiritual things. A statement of the cause of the propriety of this relief in temporal matters.—[To minister, λειτουργήσαι. The figurative priestly service is still in mind, and to it belongs the privilege and duty of providing for the poor saints. Who, then, cannot be Christ's priest, so long as we have Christ's poor with us?—R.]—In carnal things. The σαρκικά denote, in a general idea, external things; σὰνξ is the external, material, and finite side of human life, of life in general. Conclusion a majori ad minus.

Ver. 28. And have secured to them. Σφραγίσθαι. Luther [marginal reading]: "Truly and faithfully preserved to deliver up." To this belongs also here the full spiritual meaning and effect. Strange view: When I have brought over to them the money, sealed (Erasmus, and others). Still more strange: When I have safely effected, with letter and seal, the proper delivery of their collection. It may be that, by sealing, the Apostle alludes to the usual method of the world in the management of money affairs, as, for example, in Phil. iv. 15. Meyer: Vouched for; that is, corroborated as the fruit ripened for them.—[This fruit, τὸν καρπὸν τοῦτον; i. e., the amount of the collection. There seems to be no reference to the fruit of love or faith, still less of Paul's activity.—R.]

Ver. 29. And I know, &c. [οἶδα δέ, κ.τ.λ. See Textual Note ¹⁴.] A text applicable in many ways for installation sermons.

Ver. 30. Now I beseech you. The Apostle's wonderful presentiment of what he has to experience in Jerusalem; see Acts xx. 22; xxi. 10 ff.

By our Lord Jesus Christ. Αἰά, see chap. xii. 1.—By the love of the Spirit. Meyer: The love effected by the Holy Spirit. As this is self-evident, Paul means a love extending itself with the Christian spirit, so as to embrace in its universality the entire kingdom of God, which can pray for all affairs of the kingdom and its administrators and overflows the whole earth.

In your prayers. Codd. D. E. [F. G.] add the proper gloss ὑμῶν; Col. iv. 12. [See Textual Note ¹⁵.] It is not genuine, though correct.—R.]

Ver. 31. [The disobedient, ἀπειθοῦντες. Either unbelieving (E. V., Hodge, De Wette, and others) or disobedient (Philippi, and others). The two ideas are intimately related in the New Testament, but the latter seems the prominent one here.—R.] The Apostle describes the unbelieving Jews as disobedient. Those were, in a special sense, rebels against the Messiah, who refused the obedience of faith.—My ministration [ἡ διακονία μου]. Meyer: My rendering of service designed for Jerusalem.—[May prove acceptable. Of this he had doubts, and with good reason.* Yet he adds: to the saints.—R.]

Ver. 32. That I may come unto you in joy [ἵνα ἐν χαρᾷ κλῆθω πρὸς ὑμᾶς. In the element of joy; the emphasis rests on this phrase.—R.] As if he had, to a certain extent, forebodings that he might come to them in sad circumstances, as a captive.

And may with you be refreshed. By spiritual interchange. [Alford: "That we may mutually refresh ourselves; I after my dangers and deliverances, you after your anxieties for me." See Textual Note ¹⁶.—R.]

Ver. 33. Now the God of peace. It is very natural for him here to call God the God of peace, in consequence of his conflicts and their difference. Grotius accepts the latter alone; Meyer, the former alone; Philippi, the peace of reconciliation; Fritzsche, salvation in a general sense; Tholuck, "different occasions;" see chap. xvi. 20; Phil. iv. 9; 1 Thess. v. 28; Heb. xiii. 20.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On the great importance of this section, see the Introduction, the Arrangement, and the Summary.

2. On ver. 14. The church of that day at Rome, compared with that of the present day.

3. On ver. 15. The sense of the calling and the duty of the calling embolden. The Apostle's sense of his great calling.

4. Grand view of the conversion of the whole world. An offering in which the nations are offered to God. Christ, as the High-Priest, has brought a propitiatory sacrifice; now the ministers, as subordinate priests, must present the thank-offering and burnt-offering. But what a source of worship, and of the elevation and purification of worship, has proceeded from the ministerial service of Paul in both an extensive and intensive respect: churches, church-towers, hymns, prayers, festivals without number, and praising Gentiles (vers. 10, 11). The antiphony of praising Gentiles (ver. 11) responds to the extolling intonation of the Apostle (ver. 1c).

* [The existence of a coolness between Paul and the Christians at Jerusalem, perhaps the great body of them, is evident from the Epistle to the Galatians and the Acts of the Apostles. But this by no means implies either a want of unity among the apostles personally, or different gospels. See Lange's Comm. Galatians, pp. 40, 63; Lightfoot, Galatians, Dissertation iii. pp. 263 ff., St. Paul and the Thrice.—R.]

* [A most gratuitous assumption is that of Schott, that these collections were to win favor, and protect him during his absence in the extreme West. Decidedly unpauful! —R.]

Hodge: "In this beautiful passage we see the nature of the only priesthood which belongs to the Christian ministry. It is not their office to make atonement for sin, or to offer a propitiatory sacrifice to God, but, by the preaching of the gospel, to bring men, by the influence of the Holy Spirit, to offer themselves as a living sacrifice, holy and acceptable to God." Comp. Calvin.—R.

5 Paul's missionary sphere. See his Life in the Introduction.

6. Paul's principle in ver. 20; a principle of genuine churchliness in contrast with hierarchical and sectarian propagandism. [The term used by the Apostle belongs to the sphere of minor morals, to "a point of honor," indeed. Yet the principle is not unimportant. Men may be Christians, and disregard it, but not Christian gentlemen, not men possessed of that delicate sense of propriety which no rules can impart. Besides, such efforts at proselytizing generally ignore the essential graces of Christianity: humility, self-abnegation, charity. He who insists on missionary efforts among Christian people, is necessarily uncharitable. Sects whose main efforts are in this channel, will not be celebrated for the graces of Christianity. Moreover, Christian ethics have so far informed the world, that ungodly men recognize the necessity of "honorable" conduct in Christian workers, and can sneer at the unseemly "competitions" of much that is called pious zeal. This does not prove that the world's sense of honor is higher than that of the Church, but that the standard of sectarian proselytists is far too low. That a man can be a zealous missionary and not be a meddlesome propagandist, is evident from the case of this Apostle.—R.]

7. On ver. 23. The thoroughly dynamical view which the apostles had of the world, is reflected even in their thoroughly dynamical missionary method, according to which they conquered the capital and central points of the ancient world.

8. Vers. 26 ff. The idea of fellowship in its full universality. The sacred method in the matter of collections: (1.) An assignment of reasons (debtors); (2.) Voluntariness; (3.) Authentication; (4.) Connection with the purposes of God's kingdom.

9. Spain, as the representative of France, Britain, Germany, and Scandinavia. [And of America, too! For from the neighborhood of the pillars of Hercules, toward which Paul's missionary zeal led him, the voyager sailed who discovered the new world.—R.] How does the matter stand now? Paul through Rome to Spain—this has again become a prospect of the present day, or a pium desiderium. [From Spain to Rome seems the likelier course; yet, where Spain has long held her hand, how strong is the rule of Rome!—R.]

10. On the Apostle's great anticipation, see the Exeg. Notes.

11. Prayer a wrestling and striving. See the history of Jacob at Jabbok. The Israelites = God's warriors. Christians at Rome must now help the Apostle to fight against the schemes of degenerate warriors of God.

12. The God of peace. As an infinite source of peace, as if peace itself constituted His divinity. So the love of the Spirit; the whole Spirit which in Christianity is poured out over the earth, must be regarded as a breath of Love and of Spring exhaling over the earth.

13. Amen. See the Lexicons, the Concordance, and the Catechisms. Also the conclusion of chap. xvi.

CHAP. XV. 14-33.

The good testimony which Paul gives to the Christians at Rome (ver. 14).—The Apostle's call as the Apostle to the Gentiles. 1. From whom did he receive it? From God, who gave him this grace (comp. chap. i. 5; xii. 3; Gal. i. 1). 2. How did he regard it? As a priestly employment in the sanctuary of the New Testament. 3. What blessing did he derive from it? He brought the Gentiles to obedience to the gospel. 4. By what rule did he administer it? To preach the gospel only where it was not yet known (vers. 14-21).—The proclamation of the gospel regarded as a priestly service (ver. 16).—The task of the missionary to the heathen. 1. What is it? To administer the gospel among the heathen; that is, to declare it with priestly consecration, devotion, and patience. 2. What should be its constant end? To labor that the heathen may be an offering, a. acceptable to God; b. sanctified by the Holy Ghost (vers. 16, 16).—The most beautiful and best glory is, when we can glory of serving God (ver. 17).—The right means for conversion (vers. 18, 19).—Paul's great field of labor (ver. 19).—The first missionary sphere among the Gentiles (ver. 19).—From East to West! That was the course of the gospel in the first period of the Christian Church. But it has subsequently come to be from West to East! (ver. 19).—To build on another man's foundation, a mark of sectarianism (ver. 20). Common nowadays.

The Apostle Paul's plans for his last journeys. 1. They bear witness to his enterprising spirit, which continued fresh in Christian joy even to his old age; 2. But they are accompanied by anxious forebodings, that lead him to request the intercession of others (vers. 22-33).—Christian collections. 1. How must we regard them? As a service rendered to the saints; either, because, a. spiritual gifts have been received from a certain quarter, for which service in temporal goods is willingly shown; or, b. because brotherly love always requires us to do good to every man, but especially to those who are of the household of faith (Gal. vi. 10). 2. How must they be taken up? a. In such a way that no moral compulsion be exercised; b. But so that all givers can bring their gifts willingly (vers. 26-28).—Only he who can say, with Paul, "I am sure that, when I come unto you, I shall come in the fulness of the blessing of the gospel of Christ," can cheerfully respond to a call to preach to another congregation (ver. 29).—The fulness of the blessing of the gospel of Christ. It consists: 1. In unconverted people being won to the kingdom of God; 2. In converted people being furthered in knowledge, faith, and holiness (ver. 29).—The Apostle's request for the intercession of the Church at Rome in his behalf. 1. Motives: The Church should intercede for him: a. For the Lord Jesus Christ's sake—that is, for the sake of the Lord's honor; b. For the love of the Spirit—that is, on account of the fraternal fellowship effected by the Holy Ghost between the Apostle and the Church. 2. The object of the intercession: a. On the one hand, the deliverance of the Apostle from the unbelievers in Judea; b. The friendly reception of his service of love (the collection) by the saints there. 3. The desired result: a. That he should come to Rome in peace; b. And might be refreshed with the Church in Rome (vers.

30-32).—The God of patience and comfort is a God of hope, and the God of hope is a God of peace (ver. 32; comp. vers. 5, 13).

LUTHER: On vers. 14, 15: This is, though you do not need my writing, yet I am urged by my office, which I have by God's grace, to teach and to admonish every one of you.

STARKE: Blessed be the land which is full of the gospel of Christ! That is more than if it were full of gold and silver (ver. 19).—Do not remove from one place to another without necessity and a good cause; remain in your country, and live honestly (ver. 23).—HEDINGER: Notice that Paul will not build on any other man's foundation; but now it is nothing new in the Church for one to take from another his good ground, Christ, by clamoring, exciting suspicion, and other forms of wickedness (ver. 20).—What does love for Christ not do? What a journey to Rome and Spain? Friend, are you not an official successor of Paul, a pastor, and a shepherd of souls? How many miles do you have to go on the way to the preaching stations, the school, or the private house of one of your hearers? How often, and how willingly, do you make the visit? (ver. 24).—Praying is the same as fighting. It is greater labor than ploughing. But how indifferently do you regard it! (ver. 30.)

SPENNER, on ver. 29: Such confidence of the preacher in the fellowship of his flock effects much good, for it proves love. A want of confidence, on the other hand, destroys much edification.—To the ministerial office there belong: 1. Teaching; 2. Care for the poor; 3. Admonition of the hearers to prayer (vers. 14-33).—He is not worthy to be in Christ's kingdom and to enjoy it, who does not daily pray that it may be extended (ver. 30).

GERLACH: Paul regards himself as a priest, who, by the preaching of the gospel, prepares and presents to God the offering of the whole Gentile world.

HEUBNER: Paul's solicitude lay: 1. In the office which was given to him, with which he also received strength; 2. In the holy love which he had. Where both of these exist, admonitions are never wholly fruitless (ver. 15).—A minister who is merely a preacher, becomes a talker; but, reversely, the priest should always be a preacher, or else he will be merely a Japanese bonze (ver. 16).—Christian love has regard for the rights of others (ver. 20).—The highest service of missionaries is, that they must begin from the very start, and labor with the rough material (ver. 21).—The change in the circle of operation.—The journeys of the Apostles, which were holy, abundant in blessing, and full of suffering (ver. 24).—Spiritual benefactors are the highest, and though temporal blessings cannot perfectly requite their spiritual benefits, we should nevertheless repay even with them (vers. 26, 27).—Christians should not come empty to each other, but with spiritual blessings (ver. 29).—The power of Christian intercession (ver. 30).

BESSER: The Apostle's official seal to the Epistle to the Romans (vers. 14-33).—The pure sacrificial vessel is the gospel of God; the Gentiles, brought by faith in this vessel, are an acceptable offering, sanctified by the Holy Spirit, who is the sacrificial fire from heaven (1 Peter i. 12), who continues the holy burning by which Christ has sanctified himself for a burnt-offering for all (ver. 16).—Miracles in themselves are no proof of truth; but as signs of the real Christ, the miracles of the Apostles imprint a seal upon their doctrine for the joy of believers and for the judgment of unbelievers (vers. 18, 19).—The fight of faith is fought by him who prays, seeing and feeling the opposite of his hope, and seeking the concealed face of God, who is a God of hope (ver. 30).—God gives peace everywhere and in every manner (2 Thess. iii. 16): Peace in believing on His grace (chap. v. 1), peace in reliance on the love of His government (chap. viii. 28), peace in the certainty that Christ reigns over His enemies (chap. xvi. 20), and peace in the love of the Spirit (ver. 33).

[BURKITT: As we honor the God of peace, whom we serve; as we love the Prince of peace, in whom we believe; as we hope for the comfort of the Spirit of peace, and as we cherish the success of the gospel of peace, let us preserve it where it is, and pursue it where it flies from us.—HENRY: The blessing of the gospel is the treasure which we have in earthen vessels. When ministers are fully prepared to give, and people fully prepared to receive, this blessing, both are happy. Many have the gospel who have not the blessing of the gospel, and so they have it in vain. The gospel will not profit, unless God bless it on us; and it is our duty to wait upon Him for that blessing, and for the fulness of it.]

[DODDGE: Let us adore the God of grace and peace, who works the most important ends by methods unthought of by us; and let us be very cautious that we do not rashly judge that He hath rejected our prayers, because we do not see them answered in that particular way which might have been more agreeable to our own wishes.—CLARKE: Beware of contentions in religion; if you dispute concerning any of its doctrines, let it be to find out truth, not to support a preconceived and preestablished opinion. Avoid all polemical heat and rancor; these prove the absence of the religion of Christ. Whatever does not lead you to love God and man more, is most assuredly from beneath. The God of peace is the author of Christianity; and the Prince of peace, the priest and sacrifice of it; therefore love one another, and leave off contention before it be meddled with.]

[HONER: As oil poured on water smooths its surface and renders it transparent, so does kindness calm the minds of men, and prepare them for the ready entrance of the truth. Besides these qualifications, he who admonishes others should be entitled thus to act. It is not necessary that this title should rest on his official station; but there should be superiority of some kind—of age, excellence, or knowledge—to give his admonitions due effect.—BARNES: The success of a minister is not for his own praises, but for the honor of God; not by his skill or power, but by the aid of Jesus Christ.—God may disappoint us in regard to the mode in which we purpose to do good; but if we really desire it, He will enable us to do it in His own way. It may be better to preach the gospel in bonds than at liberty; it is better to do it in a prison, than not at all. Bunyan wrote the "Pilgrim's Progress" to amuse his heavy hours during a twelve years' cruel imprisonment. If he had been at liberty, he probably would not have written it at all.—J. F. H.]

THIRD DIVISION.

THE COMMENDATION OF COMPANIONS AND HELPERS IN A SERIES OF SALUTATIONS WITH WHICH IS JOINED A WARNING AGAINST SEPARATISTIC FALSE TEACHERS (JEWS AND GENTILES), WHO COULD HINDER AND EVEN DESTROY ROME'S DESTINY AND HIS APOSTOLIC MISSION. YET THE GOD OF PEACE WILL SHORTLY BRUISE SATAN (JUDAISTIC AND PAGANISTIC ERRORS) UNDER THEIR FEET.

CHAP. XVI. 1-20.

A. Phebe of Corinth.

- 1 I commend unto you Phebe our sister, which [who] is a servant [deaconess]
2 of the church which is at Cenchrea: That ye receive her in the Lord, as becometh saints, and that ye assist her in whatsoever business she hath [may have] need of you: for she [too] hath been a succourer of many, and of myself also.

B. Roman friends.

- 3, 4 Greet Priscilla [Prisca]¹ and Aquila, my helpers in Christ Jesus: Who have for my life laid down their own necks: unto whom not only I give thanks,
5 but also all the churches of the Gentiles. Likewise greet [salute] the church that is in their house. Salute my well-beloved Epenetus, who is the first-fruits of Achaia [Asia]² unto Christ. Greet [Salute] Mary, who bestowed much
6 labour on us [or, you].³ Salute Andronicus and Junia [or, Junias],⁴ my kinsmen, and my fellow-prisoners, who are of note among⁵ the apostles, who also were in Christ before me. Greet [Salute] Amplias, my beloved in the Lord.
8 Salute Urbane [Urbanus], our helper in Christ, and Stachys my beloved.
9 Salute Apelles [the] approved in Christ. Salute them which [who] are of Aristobulus' household [the household of Aristobulus]. Salute Herodion my kinsman. Greet [Salute] them that be of the household of Narcissus, which 12 [who] are in the Lord. Salute Tryphena and Tryphosa, who labour in the Lord. Salute the beloved Persis, which [who] laboured much in the Lord.

C. Warning against false teachers.

- 17 Now I beseech you, brethren, [to] mark them which [those who] cause divisions and offences contrary to the doctrine [teaching]⁸ which ye have 18 [omit have] learned; and avoid them. For they that are such serve not our Lord Jesus [omit Jesus]⁹ Christ, but their own belly; and by [their] good words and fair speeches¹⁰ deceive the hearts of the simple. For your obedience is come abroad unto all men. I am glad [rejoice] therefore on your behalf [over you]:¹¹ but [omit but] yet I would have you wise unto [concerning] that which is good, and simple [harmless] concerning evil. And the God of peace shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you. Amen [omit Amen].¹²

² Var. 5.—[Rec., with D³ & L, Syriac versions, and fathers: 'Achaia. K. A. B. C. D¹. F., most versions, Latin fathers: 'Asia. De Wette defends the former on the authority of the Peshito, and also because of the difficulty arising from 1 Cor. xvi. 16, where Stephanas is called the first-fruits of Achaia, might have occasioned the change into Achaia. But the probability is rather that the parallel passage was written on the margin, and thus crept into the text; and as the Epistle was written in Achaia, the error was readily retained. The reading Achaia is accepted by most modern editors and commentators.

¹¹ Ver. 14.—(N. A. B. C. D. F., most versions, sustain the order: Ἐμὴν, Παρροβαν, Ἐμὴν; adopted by Lachmann, Tischendorf, Meyer, and most modern editors. That of the Rec. is supported by D. L., some Greek fathers

¹³ Ver. 17.—[O. teaching in preference to doctrine, see chap. x. 17, p. 212, and the Eng. Notes.]

¹⁷ Ver. 20.—[None of the uncial MSS. now known support the Ἀσπ of the Rec., which is accordingly rejected by all critical editors.—Alford, Tregelles, and others, bracket Χαιρεῖν, which is not found in N. B.; but it seems best to retain it.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Summary.—A. Commendation of Phebe the deaconess; vers. 1, 2.—B. The salutations to his Roman friends and companions in their household churches, and the commendations therein expressed; vers. 3–16.—C. Warning against false teachers, who create dissension. Benediction; vers. 17–20.

In the Apostle's salutations he does not merely take cognizance of friendly relations in a good-natured way, but rather designs, with a distinct section of his Epistle, and in the wise and sincere form of his salutations, to awaken in the Church at Rome the consciousness that, in its principal elements, it is indirectly a Pauline church—that is, one appropriated by him in his universal efforts.* Comp., on this point, the Introduction, p. 33, and the construction of the Epistle. It is characteristic, that Aquila and Priscilla stand at the head of those whom he salutes; by their settlement in Ephesus they had already prepared for his connection there, just as they now had done in Rome, and afterward do again in Ephesus; 2 Tim. iv. 19. And so there are many among those saluted who have preceded him, as his precursors. The whole body of those greeted is made up of different classes. Some are helpers of his missionary labors, who have labored with him, and part of whom have exposed themselves to dangers for him: Prisca, Aquila, Mary, Andronicus, Junia, and Urbanus. A number of them are his relatives, such as Andronicus, Junia, and Herodion; or very near friends, as Rufus and his mother. Besides, there are those whom he can distinguish as disciples converted through his instrumentality, or well-known friends: Epenetus, Amplias, Stachys, Apelles; perhaps also Tryphena, Tryphosa, and Persia. We can further distinguish companies, a church in the house of Aquila, an assembly at the houses of Hermes, Hermas, and their companions; at the houses of Philologus, Julia, and their companions. Perhaps the believers in the households of Aristobulus and of Narcissus also form separate divisions of the Church.

A. Vers. 1 and 2.—Ver. 1. I commend. [Both an introduction and a commendation are implied. The description consists of two parts: First, she is a sister, which is the general ground for welcoming her; then, more specially, she is a deaconess, who had faithfully discharged her duty (ver. 2). The name is derived from Ἀπόλλων, Phœbus (Apollo), but there is nothing remarkable in this, since the etymology would be as little recalled then, as now, in the case of proper names.—R.] See 2 Cor. v. 12. Phebe is usually regarded as the bearer of the Epistle.

Who is a deaconess; δακονος. On the institution of deaconesses, comp. Church History and the Pastoral Epistles. Meyer furnishes the special literature on p. 539. [The word διακονισσα occurs frequently in later ecclesiastical Greek. Pliny, in the celebrated letter to Trajan, says: "Necesse-rium credidi, ex duabus ancillis quæ MINISTRÆ dicebantur, quid esset veri et per tormenta querere." Their duties were, to take care of the sick, poor, and strangers in the female portion of the Church. "This office was the more needful on account of the rigid separation of the sexes at that day, especially among the Greeks" (Schaff). Meyer refers to Bingham, Orig. i. pp. 341–366; Schoene, Geschichte der Kirche über d. Kirchlich. Gebräuche, iii. pp. 102 ff.; Herzog, Encycloped., iii. p. 368; Nander, Pflanzenz., i. p. 265 f. The last named argues that the deaconesses must not be confounded with the ὑπηρέται of 1 Tim. v. 3–16. See, however, Lange's Comm. in loco. We may add: Schaff, Apostolic Church, § 185; Suicer, Thesaurus, sub voce. Of Phebe, Conybeare says (St. Paul, ii. p. 154): "She was a

* [Ford: "Some persons, regarding this chapter as containing little more than a register of names, treat it with comparative indifference; thereby defrauding their souls of much good. St. Chrysostom, in his day, had cause to complain of the same neglect shown by many to the conclusion of this Epistle. Hence he bestows special pains in explaining it. "It is possible," he writes, "even from bare names to find a treasure;" and then he at once proceeds to disclose what the treasure is." The list of names shows: (1.) Paul's personal regard; (2.) The high place he accords to women; (3.) The constitution of the Roman Church; (4.) The great influence he exerted, if so many friends could be found in a church he had never visited. (5.) The endearing name received from his friendly mention, is a type of the eternal blessing which belongs to those whose names are written in the Lamb's Book of Life. Evidently there are not many rich or great in this list—few of whom we know any thing save what is here hinted; yet these names abide, while those of the wealthy and honored have been forgotten. Even Horace and Livy give no such extended fame as Paul has done to his friends and acquaintances at Rome.—R.] widow of consideration and wealth, who acted as one of the deaconesses of the Church, and was now about to sail to Rome upon some private business, apparently connected with a lawsuit in which she was engaged." He adds: "She could not (according to Greek manners) have been mentioned as acting in the independent manner described, either if her husband had been living or if she had been unmarried."—R.]

Cenchrea. The eastern seaport of Corinth (see the Encyclopædias).

Ver. 2. That ye receive her in the Lord. She should be received with Christian interest.—And that ye assist her [καὶ παραστήτε αὐτήν]. The verb is frequently used as a legal term, hence the conjecture of Conybeare, that her business at Rome was connected with a lawsuit.—R.] It is hardly probable that the early Church employed deaconesses to travel in the discharge of official business; the business of Phebe seems to have been of a personal character.

[For she too, καὶ γὰρ αὐτή. She herself also, not αὐτὴ (this one).—R.] The reason why the Romans should zealously support her in her affairs does not lie in an official call to Rome, but in her services for the churches at home, and for the Apostle in particular. ἱεροστάτης is a specially honorable designation. [It may refer to her official duties, but not necessarily so. The idea it implies is of service bestowed by a superior on inferiors.—Of myself also. "When and where, we know not. It is not improbable that she may have been, like Lydia, one whose heart the Lord opened at the first preaching of Paul, and whose house was his lodging;" Alford.—R.]

B. Vers. 3-16.—Ver. 3. Prisca. [This is the real name; Priscilla is the diminutive, according to the common mode of forming such appellations.—R.] She belonged, like Phebe, to the women who were prominent because of the energy of their faith, and deserved the honorable position before the name of her husband, Aquila (comp. Acts xviii. 2). See 2 Tim. iv. 19. [The frequent sneers at Paul about his views respecting the female sex and their prerogatives might be spared us, were this chapter carefully read. The order here is a sufficient answer: the wife's name first, because she was foremost, no doubt. The standard is, after all, capacity, not sex. Both are called "my helpers," and it would seem that, as such, they were both engaged in spiritual labors, which term includes vastly more than public preaching.—R.]

Ver. 4. Their own necks. Meyer translates the ἐπιθήκων literally: have laid under, under the executioner's axe. But there has been no mention made in Paul's previous history of the executioner's axe. Even Meyer himself doubts whether we should take the expression in its exact meaning. Since Paul was a member of their family, they were answerable for him in the tumults that arose in Corinth and Ephesus (Acts xviii. 12; xix. 23).—What they did for the Apostle, was done for all the churches of the Gentiles.

Ver. 5. Likewise salute the church that is in their house [καὶ τὴν κατ' οἶκον αὐτῶν ἐκκλησίαν]. The definite prototype of an apostolical household church, the type of the later parish. At the same time, the single household churches in Rome are already connected by the bond of fellowship into one spiritual church. Accordingly, the church in the house is almost = the assembly in a certain house.* Tholuck: "In the metropolis, which was at that time about four miles in circumference, there were not less than five of them (comp. Kist, in Ilgen's Zeitschrift für hist. Theologie, ii., 2d part, p. 65)."

Epenetus. "Unknown, as all the following ones to ver. 16. (Rufus may be the son of Simon Mark xv. 21.) The legends of the Fathers made the most of them martyrs and bishops, and the Synopsis of Dorotheus misplaces the most of them among the seventy disciples;" Meyer.

The first-fruits of Asia [ἀπαρχὴ τῆς Ἀσίας. See *Textual Note]. Asia proconsularis. The reading Achaia is less authenticated, and creates difficulty, inasmuch as, in 1 Cor. xvi. 15, Stephanas is mentioned as the first-fruits of Achaia. On the solution of this difficulty (by supposing that Epenetus was a member of the household of Stephanas, now in Rome), see Tholuck, p. 738.—[Εὐχριστόν. Meyer, Philippi: with reference to Christ; De Wette, Lange: for Christ. The meaning obviously is: first converted to Christ.—R.] The first-fruits, or those first converted, were generally the natural leaders of the incipient churches.

Ver. 6. Mary. Not more definitely known. There is no need of explaining that the reading, bestowed much labor† on us, is much more natural than the other, on you, for elsewhere the Apostle always brings out prominently the relations of the persons saluted to his own labors. [See *Textual Note.—R.]

Ver. 7. And Junia (or Junias). The word has often been taken, and by Chrysostom [Grotius] among the rest, as a feminine noun, Junia; it seems more probable that it is Junias, an abbreviation of Junianus (see Tholuck, p. 739). [If feminine, it is the name of the wife or sister of Andronicus; the Rec. accents thus: Ἰουνίας, which indicates the feminine. Most editors (not Tregelles): Ἰουνιᾶν. It is as impossible as it is unnecessary to decide the question, though Meyer thinks the added description favors the masculine form.—R.]

My kinsmen. The expression συγγενεῖς has been understood by Olshausen, and others, in the broader sense of fellow-countrymen; against which it has been remarked that, in that case, others than Jewish Christians have received this designation.

* [Dr. Hodge suggests that, as a tent-maker, Aquila had better accommodations for such an assembly than most of the Christians. See Alford in loco, where he quotes Justin Martyr's statements about these assemblies. Certainly there is no warrant for supposing that only the household servants, &c., are meant.—It is clear that the early Church was formed quite as much upon the household model as upon that of the synagogue. No form of church government should ignore this, nor can Christianity make true progress at the expense of the family. As the religion of Jesus Christ has sanctified household relations, and elevated them all, how far is the Church responsible for the manifestations of moral decay in social life? May not the schisms in families, produced by sectarian propagandism, so far interfere with any thing akin to these household churches, as to exercise a deteriorating influence? Certainly it is difficult to conceive, that any Christians at Rome would lay in wait for Prisca's children, to decoy them with presents to some other assembly. Yet that is a recognised form of ecclesiastical (I will not say Christian) effort in these days!—R.]

† [The verb κομίζω, when not followed by ἀλλοιῶ, refers to practical activity, not to preaching and teaching. Here probably some acts of womanly kindness are intended, such as Paul would be more likely to have received than the whole Roman Church. Hence "us" is more probably correct than "you." Besides, why should Paul add this description, were she so well known to that Church?—R.]

nation, besides the three thus denominated. Dr. Baur finds in these kinsmen not only a mark of the unauthenticity of chap. xvi., but even of the unfairness of the author, who, by this fiction, would make for the Apostle the favorable appearance of having sustained a more intimate relation to the Jewish-Christian Church in Rome.

My fellow-prisoners [συναγχαλωτοὺς μου]. Further particulars are not known. But as, according to Acts xxiii. 16, the Apostle had a nephew in Jerusalem who took a deep interest in his cause, and as it is said of Andronicus and Junias, or Junia, that they were before him in Christ—that is, were believers—so it is natural to make a family from the names of Andronicus, Junias, or better, Junia and Herodion, and to suppose that these, as the early converted kinsmen of Paul, had already made an impression in Jerusalem upon the unconverted Paul, and, after his conversion, had taken an interest in him in his captivity. Then, these were specially adapted, like Aquila and Priscilla, to prepare the way for him in Rome. This would also give a simple explanation to among the apostles, ἐν τοῖς ἀποστόλοις. They were highly respected as believers among the apostles in Jerusalem. So also Meyer: "distinguished—that is, most honorably known to the apostles. Thus Beza, Grotius, and most others; De Wette, Fritzsche, and Philippi. They take the right ground, for ἀπόστολος is never used by Paul in the broader sense (as Acts xiv. 4-14), and therefore cannot be explained, with Origen, Chrysostom, Luther, Calvin, &c., and Tholuck: among [i. e., among the number of] the Apostles."* See Meyer for hypotheses respecting their conversion.

Ver. 8. Amplias. An abbreviation of Ampliaton.—[Beloved in the Lord, "beloved in the bonds of Christian fellowship" (Alford).—R.]

Ver. 9. Urbanus—Stachys. The Apostle's distinctions result from an exact view.

Ver. 10. Apelles. This has been confounded (by Origen, and others) with Apollos, but without any ground whatever. [Comp. Horace, Sat., i. 5. 100. Supposed to be a freedman, but the name was common among this class (Meyer, Philippi). There are various conjectures about the grouping of freedmen and slaves in these verses.—R.]

The approved [τὸν δοκιμὸν]. A predicate of tested steadfastness in faith.—Who are of the household of Aristobulus. That is, the Christians in the household, probably slaves of Aristobulus. See the additional ἐν κυρίῳ in the following verse. [Alford: "It does not follow that either Aristobulus or Narcissus were themselves Christians. Only those of their familia (τοῖς ἐκ τῶν) are here saluted who were ἐν κυρίῳ; for we must understand this also after Ἀριστοβούλου."—R.]

Ver. 11. Narcissus. Grotius, Neander, and others, have regarded him as a freedman of Claudius (Sueton., Claud. 28). [This freedman, however, was put to death two or three years before this Epistle was written. It is possible that the salutation is addressed to his family, known thus after his death.—R.]

Ver. 12. Persia. [The name is derived from Persia, as the native country of the bearer; but it is not known that it was borne for this reason in this particular instance.—R.] She is thus candidly distinguished from the two just named.

Ver. 13. Rufus. See Commentary, Mark, p. 151.—The chosen. A very expressive distinction. [Not merely "elect in Christ," but a chosen man, a distinguished Christian (Hodge).—R.]—His mother and mine [καὶ τὴν μητέρα αὐτοῦ καὶ ἐμοῦ]. "His mother by nature, mine by maternal kindness" (Webster and Wilkinson).—R.] Fervid expression of gratitude for the enjoyment of friendly care.

Ver. 14. Hermas. This verse contains a numerous group, probably intimately associated, and less known to the Apostle. Hermas has been regarded by Origen and Eusebius as the author of the work: Ὁ ποιμὴν. But this author belongs to the middle of the second century.—The brethren who are with them [τοὺς σὺν αὐτοῖς ἀδελφοὺς]. This, as well as the expression in ver. 15: All the saints who are with them, has been understood as referring to a household church. Incidental hypotheses: (1.) Christian associations for common business pursuits, &c. (Fritzsche, Philippi). (2.) Missionary unions (Reiche). [The latter is quite improbable.—R.]

Ver. 15. Julia. Probably the wife of Philologus; for, in what follows, she is distinguished from the sister of Nereus.

Ver. 16. With a holy kiss. Ἐν φιλήματι ἁγίῳ, 1 Thess. v. 26. Comp. 1 Peter v. 14: ἐν φιλήματι ἁγίῳ. "In Tertullian, it is the osculum pacis; the fraternal kiss after the finished prayer in the assemblies of the Christians is mentioned by Justin Martyr (M. Apol. 1. Op. 65);" Tholuck.—For further particulars, see Meyer and Winer. The continuance of this Oriental Christian custom of connecting the salutation and the kiss as an expression of fellowship and of common festival, is known in the Greek church (see Luke vii. 45).

All the churches [αἱ ἐκκλησίαι πάσαι. See Textual Note]. As Paul has made known in many churches his intention of going to Rome, and because of this opportunity had received many salutations for Rome, he regarded himself sufficiently warranted to greet Rome in the name of all the churches, particularly of those which he had established. Grotius limits the expression to the Grecian churches; others, in other ways. [Stuart, Olshausen, to the churches in Corinth and vicinity; Bengel, to those he had visited.—R.]

C. Vers. 17-20.—Ver. 17. Now I beseech you, brethren. A warning against those who cause divisions and variances is very properly connected with the hearty and solemn injunction for the universal preservation of unity and harmony. See an analogous instance in Eph. vi. 10 ff. This section is, therefore, by no means "supplementary," as Meyer holds it to be. On the contrary, it is observed, by both him and Tholuck, that it may be inferred from the position of the Apostle's words (at the conclusion), and their brevity, that the false teachers here designated have not yet found entrance into the Church. He already knew that they exist ed, and that they increased both intensively and extensively; therefore he could—as he subsequently did in his farewell address at Miletus, when setting out for Ephesus—here definitely predict their presence in Rome. Carpzov has had in mind the differences in chaps. xiv. and xv.; Clericus, and others, the early heathen philosophers. In both, the idea of Christian false teachers is wanting. Others have decided them to be Libertines. That the Apostle, at all events, had in view, besides the future Judaizing and Ebionitic zealots for the law, the gnosticoizing and antinomian spirits of the future, is proved on looking at the arrangement for the reception of both these tendencies, which he, according to chaps. xiv. and xv., unquestionably found already in the Church. According to De Wette, the kind of false teachers here mentioned cannot be more specifically determined; according to Tholuck, with reference to Phil. iii. 2, &c., the zealots of the law are meant.

[Alford says: “Judging by the text itself, we infer that these teachers were similar to those pointed out in Phil. iii. 2, &c.: unprincipled and selfish persons, seducing others for their own gain; whether Judaizers or not, does not appear; but considering that the great opponents of the Apostle were of this party, we may perhaps infer that they also belonged to it.”—R.]

To mark [σκοπεῖν. To notice carefully; used in Phil. iii. 17, with reference to those who should be imitated; more intensive than βλέπειν (Meyer).—R.] This, and the avoiding of them, Krehl thinks can be referred only to present false teachers, which is very properly opposed by Tholuck.—[Divisions and offences, τὰς διχοστασίας καὶ τὰ σκάνδαλα. The articles point to known divisions and scandals, whether Paul referred to any particular persons or not. Dr. Hodge seems disposed to refer the first word to doctrinal divisions, the latter to moral offences; so Webster and Wilkinson. Philippi and Meyer seem to refer the first to divisions, however occasioned, and the latter to temptations to depart from the gospel ground of faith and life. The objection to the former distinction is, that the “divisions” hinted at in the Epistle were mainly of an ethical rather than a doctrinal origin.—Contrary to the teaching, παρὰ τὴν διδασκίαν. On the preposition, see Gal. i. 8, Lange’s Comm., p. 19. Most German commentators are disposed to reject at least the exclusive reference to doctrinal instruction. As our English word doctrine suggests dogmatic theology, we substitute teaching, which includes all instruction.—A commendation of their teachers is implied, which hints at the indirect Pauline origin of the Church.—Avoid them, ἐκκλίνατε ἀπ’ αὐτῶν. There is no reference to official excommunication, but to personal treatment of those who might or might not be church members.—R.]

Ver. 18. Serve not our Lord Christ [τῷ κυρίῳ ἡμῶν Χριστῷ οὐ δουλεύουσιν. See Textual Note *]. See chap. ii. 8; Phil. iii. 19; 2 Cor. ii. 20. Fanaticism, by its confusion of spiritual and carnal affections and motives, degenerates into disguised sensualism.—Their own belly [τῇ σαυτοῦ κοιλίᾳ]. This is a symbol of their self-interest, selfishness, sensuality, and of their insa. aiming at a mere life of pleasure; comp. 1 Tim. vi. 5; Titus i. 11.

And by their good words and fair speeches [διὰ τῆς χρηστολογίας καὶ εὐλογίας. See Textual Note *]. Comp. 2 Cor. xi. 14. By good words they represent themselves in a rosy light, and by flattering speeches, their hearers. For further particulars, see Tholuck, p. 741. Melanchthon understands, by εὐλογία, religious blessings and promises; for example, those of the monks. [Hodge takes the two words as synonymous. Meyer thinks the former characterizes the tenor, and the latter the form, of their words. Χρηστ. is found only here in the New Testament. The view given by Dr Lange is quite tenable.—R.]

The simple [τῶν ἀκάνων. The unwary]. Those who, as such, can be easily deceived. [How many were deceiving and deceived, appears from Phil. i. 16, written from Rome a few years after ward.—R.]

Ver. 19. For your obedience [ἣ γὰρ ὑμῶν ὑπακοή]. The γὰρ is explained in different ways:

1. It implies, indirectly, that they also are not free from this ἀκανία (Origen, Fritzsche). [Dr. Hodge takes obedience as = obedient disposition, and, with others, regards this as implying a liability to be led astray. But “obedience,” without further definition, would mean the “obedience of faith,” in this Epistle at least; besides, this view implies that their obedience was not altogether of a commendable character.—R.]

2. It implies an antithesis; as for the Roman Christians, he knows that they, as being obedient to the gospel, cannot be so easily deceived (Chrysostom, Theodoret, Meyer).*

3. The γὰρ specifies a second ground for ver. 17 (Tholuck, De Wette, Philippi). [So Alford. But Meyer correctly says, that γὰρ is never repeated thus in a strictly coordinate relation. Alford finds also a slight reproof here.—R.]

Explanation (1.) is, as it seems to us, very aptly modified by Rückert. Since they succeeded in deceiving the simple, they will think that they can also easily find an entrance to you, for they regard your obedience, which is everywhere known, as that very simplicity. [This avoids the objection to which the view, as held by Dr. Hodge, is open. Still, Meyer seems nearest the true explanation.—R.]

I rejoice therefore over you [ἐφ’ ἧμῖς οὖν χαίρω. See Textual Note *]. The emphatic position of ἐφ’ ἧμῖν favors Meyer’s view of γὰρ while the next clause, with its adversative δέ, seems to introduce the real warning.—R.] It is, at all events, desirable that they allow themselves to be warned, according to the rule which the Apostle lays down.

Wise [σοφοὺς. A. A. C., Rec., insert μὲν which seems to be an interpolation on account of δέ, which follows.—R.] They should be receptive inquirers after what is good. But, on the other hand, they should be as unresponsive of, and unteachable in, what is bad, as if they were simple-hearted people.—Harmless. [Dr. Lange renders: ungelehrn, einfältig, simple, as in E. V. But harmless seems to be preferable, especially as another

* [Meyer finds the ground for this antithesis in the position of ἀκάνων . . . ὑμῶν, and paraphrases: “Not without ground do I say the hearts of the simple; for you they will not seduce, because you do not belong to the simple; but you are so noted for your obedience (to the gospel), that it is everywhere known; about you I am therefore glad, yet I would have you wise and pure,” &c. “An elegant mingling of the warning with the expression of firm confidence.” This view is now favored by Philippi, and is no open to the objection urged against (1.), nor does it present any grammatical difficulty whatever.—R.]

Greek word has been rendered "simple" just before (ver. 18).—R.] Meyer explains ἀκραιβους by pure [i. e., unmixed with, free from, evil], which does not make an antithesis to the foregoing (comp. 1 Cor. xiv. 20). Matt. x. 16, on the contrary, constitutes a harmonious antithesis to the whole passage. For different expositions of the ἀκραιβους, see Tholuck. [Dr. Hodge: "Wise, so that good may result, and simple, so that evil may not be done;" so most commentators.—R.]

Ver. 20. And the God of peace, &c. [ὁ δὲ θεὸς τῆς εἰρήνης, κτλ.] In the divine power of the Spirit and Author of peace. It is just as the God of peace that He will bruise Satan, who, by his false doctrines, causes divisions, and rends the Church asunder. The συντρίψει, shall bruise, is the prophetic future; but not optatively, according to Platt [Stuart] (see 2 Cor. xi. 15). The expression is an allusion to Gen. iii. 15.

The grace, &c. This is the usual concluding benediction (see 2 Cor. xiii. 13). In 2 Thess. iii. 16, 18, a concluding salutation also follows the benediction. [The presence of the benediction here has led to various conjectures: that Paul intended to close, but afterward added the salutations; that ver. 24 is not genuine, since it only repeats this doxology, &c. But the text is well sustained here, except the final Amen (see Textual Note 13); and certainly no one has a right to say that Paul shall always close his Epistles in the same way, or to impugn either the genuineness of the text or the inspiration of the author, because he does not conform to a certain mode (however customary with him).—R.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. We become best acquainted with the nature of the office of deaconess in apostolic times from the Pastoral Epistles. From these it is evident, first of all, that this office was not of a missionary character, but a local service in the Church, springing from Christian consecration, and more exactly defined, by the restraint then placed on women, by the general destination of the sex, as well as by age and character. This form of the office in the early Church was succeeded, in the Middle Ages, by the religious orders, which assumed, besides, a qualified missionary function. Recent times have attempted glorious things in relation to this office, and have accomplished great results; but the full development of the matter from the idea of a local evangelical service, into which, in its wider sense, all the female members of the Church are called, remains a grand problem for the Evangelical Church. [Woman's work in the Church diaconal, not ministerial.—All Christian women called to a diaconal service; some to a more special, and perhaps official, service of this nature.—The danger of the mediæval extreme best avoided by regarding the Church as founded upon the family; not intended to override it (see the household churches named here). How are we Protestants ignoring this idea?—The diaconal service a priestly one (chap. xv. 27); noble, however humble it appears.—R.]

2. The commendation of Phebe, a model for Christian commendations.

3. The Apostle's salutations. Christianity is as intensively personal in a holy sense, as actually free from the ungodly respect of persons. The Apostle's friends as preparers of his way, and witnesses of his greatness and humility. His brief descriptions of them are models of a proper estimation of persons, free from all flattery. A group of constellations in the apostolic age, as a segment of that spiritual starry sky which eternity will reveal.

4. The warning against the false teachers. See the Exeg. Notes.

5. The Apostle's glorious prophecy opens a still greater future for Rome. We also read, in Matt. xiii., that it is Satan who sows the tares among the wheat, and thereby causes offences. False teaching seems here to be a ground of divisions and offences. The first practically evil effect proceeds outwardly, the other comes inwardly.

6. It has been said, that the Apostle has pronounced too hard a sentence on his opponents. But the Apostle had established the great festival of peace, and therefore he must regard the enemies of God's Church of peace as just what they really are—the demoniacal disturbers of the institution of a heavenly life on earth.

[TO THE ROMANS.]⁴

² Ver. 24.—[This verse is wanting in K. A. B. C., and in other important authorities. In some cursives, and in some copies of the Peshito, it is found after ver. 27. D. F. L., Greek and Latin fathers, insert it here. It is rejected by Lachmann, Koppe, Reiche, Tregelles; bracketed by Alford; accepted by Meyer and Lange (Tischendorf varies). It was not inserted to form a proper ending to the Epistle, since the authorities which omit it have the concluding doxology; but was probably omitted on account of the unusual combination of the benediction and doxology. So Dr. Lange, who makes the doxology a liturgical antiphony, expending the "Amen" of this verse, and of course retains vers. 24-27 in this place.

³ Ver. 25.—[The emendations are from the revisions of the Amer. Bible Union, Five Ang. Clergymen, and Noyes. Dr. Lange's rendering is, in some respects peculiar: "But to Him, who can make you strong (chap. i. 11): According to (as an antiphony to) my gospel and the preaching of Jesus Christ,—according to the revelation of the mystery; that was kept in silence since eternal ages; but that has been now made manifest, as through the prophetic Scriptures;—according to the command of the everlasting God, made known among all nations for the purpose of their obedience of faith:

To the only wise God—
 Through Jesus Christ, whose is the glory—
 Into eternity an (accordant) AMEN."

It will be noticed that this differs from the usual view, in some of its details as well as in the liturgical view it presents. See further the Exeg. Notes.

I. Is this Doxology genuine? A careful scrutiny of the external authorities as given above justifies the opinion of Alford: "Its genuineness as a part of the Epistle is placed beyond all reasonable doubt." The few authorities which omit it altogether, seem to have done so with no intention of rejecting it. The variation in position is so readily accounted for, as to cast little doubt on the genuineness. Nor is the internal evidence against it. The style is Pauline. Though the other Pauline doxologies are simpler, this was the close of the greatest Epistle. Reiche thinks that, owing to the personal character of chaps. xv., xvi., the public reading closed with chap. xiv.; that then a doxology was spoken, which crept into the text at that point, and afterward was transferred to the close. But this is mere conjecture. (See Meyer.)

II. What, then, is its true position? We answer, without hesitation, at the close of chap. xvi. (1.) The weight, if not the number of diplomatic authorities favors this position. (2.) In accounting for the variation, it is much easier to account for the change from this place to chap. xiv., than for the reverse. The doxology forms an unusual conclusion; it was preceded by the usual closing benediction; the words ὑμᾶς σπριγας would seem to point to the "weak" (chap. xiv.). Other theories are advanced, but this seems the simplest explanation of the change.—The repetition in some authorities is easily accounted for, since the early criticism could not decide where it properly belonged, and yet feared to reject; the omission arose from the same doubt (since F. G. both have a blank space in chap. xiv.).—Dr. Lange's view of the connection renders extended critical discussion unnecessary.—R.]

* [Subscription. That of the Rec. is probably correct, but not genuine. K. A. B¹. C. D. G. have: πρὸς τοὺς Ῥωμαίους; to this B². and others add: ἐπὶ τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ καὶ τοῖς Ῥωμαίοις; G.: ἰερὰ ἐκκλησία.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL

A. The salutations.—B. The doxology, in conformity with the fundamental thought of the Epistle, in the form of a liturgical antiphony. The everlasting Amen of the Church as a response to the everlasting gospel of God, as an Amen: 1. To the proclamation of the gospel in general; 2. To Paul's proclamation of the call of the Gentiles; 3. To God's command to bear the gospel forth unto all nations, for the consummation of which our Epistle is designed.

A. Vers. 21-24.—Ver. 21. Timotheus. See Acts xx. 4; also the Encyclopedias.—Lucius

Not Luke (Origen, and others). "It is uncertain whether this is the Lucius of Cyrene in Acts xiii. 1."—Jason. Comp. Acts xvii. 5.—Sospater. Acts xx. 4. The identity is, at least, by no means improbable. [In regard to these three persons commentators differ. All three may be identical with those mentioned in the Acts, yet all the names were common, while Sospater and Sopater (Acts xx. 4) may be the same name, without the identity of persons being thereby established.—My kinsmen, οἱ συγγενεῖς μου. See vers. 7, 11. It seems probable that some relationship more close than that of fellow-Jew is here referred to.—R.]

Ver. 22. Tertius. Probably an Italian (he has, without any ground, been identified with Silas; * see Meyer). The writer of this Epistle, which Paul dictated to him. On other untenable hypotheses (a clean copy; a translation into Greek; see Meyer. It was natural that he should present his own salutation. [Tholuck considers this irregularity a corroboration of the genuineness of the chapter.—R.] Groundless suppositions: 1. Paul wrote from ver. 23 with his own hand (Rambach); 2. From ver. 23, Tertius wrote in his own name (Glückler). ["Entirely groundless also is the view of Olshausen: Paul wrote the doxology immediately after ver. 20, but on a special and small parchment, the vacant side of which was used by the amanuensis, Tertius, in order to write vers. 21-24 in his own name;" Meyer. The internal evidence is altogether against this.—In the Lord, ἐν κυρίῳ. Wordsworth follows Origen in joining these words with what immediately precedes, as implying that the work of an amanuensis, not less than that of an apostle, is done "in the Lord." Most commentators connect it with ἀσπάζομαι, which is preferable.—R.]

Ver. 23. Caius. Caius. See the Lexicons on the frequent occurrence of the name. The identity with the Caius in 1 Cor. i. 14 is very probable; perhaps he is also the same person as the Caius in Acts xx. 4. Paul was now lodging with him, as he had already done with others.—Probably also a household congregation gathered in his house. [Or he may have been universal in his hospitality to Christians (Alford).—R.]

Erastus. The city treasurer. The same name in Acts xix. 22 and 2 Tim. iv. 20 does not seem to denote the same person, unless, as Meyer remarks, Erastus had given up his position.—Quartus [Κουάρτος. This shows how the Greeks transferred the sound of the Latin Qu into their language.—R.] A brother in a general Christian sense.

B. Vers. 25-27.—Ver. 25. Now to him who is able to establish you [Τῷ δὲ δυναμένῳ ἱκανῶς στηρίξαι. To this dative, that of ver. 27 corresponds, all that intervenes being dependent in some way upon δυναμένῳ. The real grammatical difficulty is therefore in ver. 27.—R.] Στηρίξαι. See chap. i. 11; 1 Thess. iii. 2; 2 Thess. ii. 17. He is very solicitous that the Church in Rome be steadfast and faithful. He clothes his solicitude in the form of a liturgical antiphony, in which he again takes up the first Amen, in order to say Amen to the three solemn representations of the gospel of God, in the name of the Roman Church, and of all God's churches in general. Comp. the liturgical meaning of the Amen in 1 Cor. xiv. 16.

According to my gospel [κατὰ τὸ εὐαγγέλιόν μου]. According to this view of the doxology, we do not explain κατὰ in reference to my gospel, but according to my gospel, as an antiphony to my gospel—and, mentally, for the first, second, and third time. If we mistake this liturgical form, this doxology becomes a network of exegetical difficulties. The first κατὰ is explained by Meyer: may He establish you in relation to my gospel, that you may remain perseveringly true to my gospel. For other explanations, see the same author, p. 551 f. [Philippi, Alford, and others, agree, in the main, with Meyer: in reference to—i. e., in my gospel; He can establish you, or, "in subordination to, and according to the requirements of" (Alford), my gospel. Dr. Hodge prefers through, which is scarcely defensible lexically. Dr. Lange's view of the proposition depends on his view of the doxology as a whole.—R.]

And the preaching of Jesus Christ [καὶ τὸ κήρυγμα Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ]. As it is not only spread abroad in his gospel, but also outside of it, in all the world. Explanations: 1. The preaching concerning Christ (Luther, Calvin, Tholuck, and Philippi); 2. The preaching which Christ causes to be promulgated through him (Meyer, and others); 3. The preaching of Christ during His stay on earth (Grotius).*

According to the revelation [κατὰ ἀποκάλυψιν. The κατὰ is taken by Meyer, and others, as coordinate to the former one, and dependent on στηρίξαι; by Tholuck, and others, as dependent on the whole opening clause, in the sense of in consequence of; by Alford, and others, as subordinate to κήρυγμα.—R.] This is the specific designation of the universality of the gospel according to Paul's view; Eph. iii. 3, 9; Col. i. 26, &c.—The mystery relates particularly to the freedom or national enlargement of the gospel. [Philippi, and others, unnecessarily limit mystery here to this enlargement of the gospel. It seems best to take it in its full meaning. See chap. xi. 25.—R.]

Ver. 26. [But now is made manifest, φανερωθέντος δὲ νῦν. This is obviously in antithesis to the latter part of the preceding verse. The question respecting the relation of the clauses is, however, a difficult one. Beza, Flatt, Meyer, De Wette, and others, join these words closely with ver. 25, making the rest of this verse subordinate to γνησθέντος. They render somewhat thus: "But which is made manifest in the present age, and by means of the prophetic Scriptures, according to the command of the everlasting God, is made known unto all nations, in order to lead them to the obedience of the faith." Hodge, Alford, and others, join together the first part of the verse as far as "the everlasting God;" while Dr. Lange takes the third κατὰ as coordinate to the first and second. Besides, there is room for a great variety of opinion in regard to the relation of the different phrases.—R.]

Through the Scriptures of the prophets [διὰ τῶν γραφῶν προφητικῶν. The presence of τῶν seems to favor the connection with what follows, but Dr. Lange renders "as through," &c.,

* [The ground of this supposed identity is that the Hebrew word answering to the Latin Tertius (תרתי) sounds like Silas. But the latter is a contraction from Silvanus.—R.]

* [Of these, (3.) seems most untenable. (1.) makes this phrase an extension of the preceding one; (2.) an explanation of it. They are not, however, contradictory of each other. Dr. Lange seems really to combine them.—R.]

thus adopting the other view.—R.] By this addition, Paul proves that this present revelation, whose special organ is Paul himself, is not neologically new, but according to the analogy of faith. Through the Scriptures of the prophets means, that their sense has now become fully clear.*

According to the commandment of the everlasting God [κατ' ἐπιταγὴν τοῦ αἰωνίου Θεοῦ. See Textual Note†, on Dr. Lange's rendering.—R.] Here Meyer's view of the construction of κατὰ does not hold good any longer, and therefore he makes the third principal proposition as a supplement to the second: and by means of the prophetic writings according to the commandment of the everlasting God, &c. This commandment is the last form, the last word, because it brings very near to the Church at Rome the obligatory duty of interesting itself in the work of the world's conversion. The commandment of the eternal God should, as an injunction continually resounding, find an eternal echo in the Amen of the Church.†

Ver. 27. To the only wise God, &c. [μόνον σοφῷ Θεῷ, κ.τ.λ.] Meyer: "To the only wise God through Jesus Christ."† Curious words! Better: To the only wise God be the glory through Christ (Luther, Beza [E. V.]). Yet the ὁ opposes this view, if we refer it to Christ. The ὁ, indeed, has been cancelled by Beza and Grotius, according to cursives 33, 72, and Rufinus; but it stands firm, and is also no obstruction to the proper construction of this doxology. For by all means there belongs to Christ, or the Lamb, the honor of unsealing the book of God's mysteries, and in eternity the Church can utter thanksgiving and praise to Him for it in the Amen of the Church. Comp. Rev. v. 12. [It must be added, however, that while the glory may be very properly ascribed to Christ, it is grammatically harsh to refer the relative ὁ to Christ, since Θεῷ is the leading word in this verse, and by implication throughout.—R.]

Because the force of the last Amen was mistaken, many supposed that the Apostle was gradually led, by the parentheses, from the doxology to God, to the doxology to Christ (Tholuck, Philippi). Such a great obscurity would be a bad crown to his grand and clear work. Besides, the previous repetition μόνῳ σοφῷ Θεῷ is against it. Other suppo-

† [If Dr. Lange's view be not accepted, then Meyer's is to be preferred: This general making known took place: (1.) By means of the prophetic Scriptures; (2.) According to the command of God; (3.) For the establishment of the obedience of faith; (4.) Among all nations. So most commentators.—The word αἰωνίον, everlasting, has been deemed superfluous; yet it seems specially appropriate.—"The first εἰς indicates the aim—in order to their becoming obedient to the faith: the second, the local extent of the manifestation" (Alford).—R.]

sitions—that the ὁ is a pleonasm, standing for αἰωνῷ*—as well as the proposed supplements, prove only that there must be a mistake in the whole conception of the doxology. We may regard it as removed by the liturgical construction of the conclusion corresponding to the fundamental liturgical thought of the Epistle. The Amen of eternity shall again ascend to God through Christ, just as the eternal gospel has come from God to man through Him. But we do not read τὸ ἀμήν, because the conclusion is not didactic, but a prayer.

[Dr. Lange thus avoids an anacoluthon, by making a double doxology, as it were—to God an eternally accordant Amen, to Christ the glory. It must be confessed that this view is novel, with scarcely an analogy in the New Testament or elsewhere; yet it is beautiful, poetic, and appropriate. For the Apostle, in closing such an Epistle as this, must have been filled with thoughts not less grand than these. Still, should we accept the view of Meyer, the thought remains grand, Pauline, and appropriate. (See Winer, p. 528, on the anacoluthon.) For he who had dived so deeply into the riches of the knowledge of God in Jesus Christ, might well close by declaring that God was revealed as absolute wisdom in Jesus Christ, and ascribe to Him, as such, the glory forever. And when, through the preaching of Jesus Christ, according to this gospel, the mystery of God's love in Jesus Christ shall be made known to all nations, and they, through the knowledge of the revealed Scriptures, become obedient in faith, then to Him, whose wisdom shall be thus revealed, be all the glory. The true antiphonal AMEN is pronounced by those who labor for and await that glory, who to-day, with uplifted heads, expect the final triumph, not less than he who closes his great Epistle in such confidence.—R.]

CHAP. XVI. 1-16.

The abundance of apostolic salutations (vers. 1-16).—The Apostle's good memory of his friends (vers. 1-16).—Phebe, a pattern for every Christian deaconess. 1. Every one, like her, should minister to the poor and sick in the Church of the Lord; 2. Every one, like her, should not teach God's word, but bring it over, as Phebe brought the Epistle to the Romans to Rome (vers. 1, 2).—The evangelical office of the deaconess arose from living faith: 1. In the apostolic Church; 2. In the Middle Ages; 3. At the present time.—How should our churches act toward the deaconesses?—He who exercises love may also lay claim to love (ver. 2).—Aquila and Priscilla, a Christian couple of the apostolic age; comp. Acts xviii. 2, 26 (vers 3, 4).—Aquila and Priscilla contrasted with Ananias and Sapphira; comp. Acts v. 1 ff.—The Christian Church originally a household church (ver. 5).—The family, the birthplace of Christian service in the Gentile world; comp. Acts x. 17; xvi. 34, 40; xviii. 7; 1 Cor. xvi. 19 (ver. 5).—The Marys of the New Testament. 1. Mary, the mother of our Lord; 2. Mary, the sister of the mother of Jesus; 3. Mary of Bethany; 4. Mary Magdalene; 5. Mary, the mother of John Mark; 6. The Roman Mary (ver. 6).—See the Concordance.

The Marys of the New Testament grouped in pairs. 1. Two of them belong to the immediate family of Jesus; 2. Two are friends of our Lord; 3. Two are protectresses of His apostles (ver. 6).—The various yet well-considered designations of the individuals saluted by the Apostle: Helpers in Christ (ver. 3); well-beloved, my beloved, beloved (vers. 6, 9, 12); beloved in the Lord (ver. 8); approved in Christ (ver. 10); chosen in the Lord (ver. 13); sister (ver. 1).—The salutation with a holy kiss (ver. 16).—The holy kiss of fraternal fellowship, and the Judas-kiss of the betrayer (ver. 16).

LUTHER, on ver. 17: This is said against all doctrines of men.

STARKE: Christianity does not abrogate worldly transactions and external business, but rather directs them aright, and brings a blessing upon them (ver. 2).—HEDINGER: How beautiful! Pious women in the service of the Church, taking care of widows, children, the poor, and the sick! Oh, how sadly has this zeal died out in the Church; every one is for himself in his own house! Yet who does not see the footprints of a God still living? (ver. 2).

SPENER: We see, at least, that women are prohibited from no spiritual employment, with the exception of the public office of the ministry (ver. 2).—With a holy kiss, without any wantonness, actual or imagined (ver. 16).

HEUBNER: Commendations of the Christian are very different from merely worldly ones, for they have a holy cause and a holy purpose (vers. 1, 2).—Natural weakness, strengthened by grace, accomplishes much (ver. 6 ff.).—The true Christian must read all these names with hearty interest, even though we know but little or nothing of their works. Their names stand in the Book of Life.—Celebrity, so called, is something very ambiguous; the lowest faithful servant of Christ is more than the most admired worldly hero.—Pious souls can even wish to remain concealed, λαθεῖν βούλας (vers. 5, 6 ff.).—The kiss can be most unholy and most holy (ver. 16).

[BURKITT, on vers. 5-7: O happy houses, and thrice happy householders, whose families are little churches for piety and devotion!—Observe: 1. That seniority in grace is a very great honor: and to be in Christ before others, is a transcendent prerogative. 2. That God will have the good works of all His saints, and the services especially which are done to His ministers and ambassadors by any of His people, to be applauded, valued, and recorded.

—HENRY: In Christian congregations there should be lesser societies, linked together in love and converse, and taking opportunities of being often together.—DODDRIDGE: Many women have been eminently useful. The most valuable ministers have often been assisted by them in the success of their work, while their pious care, under the restraint of the strictest modesty and decorum, has happily and effectually influenced children, servants, and young friends; yea, has been the means of sowing the seeds of religion in tender minds, before they have been capable of coming under ministerial care.—SCOTT: We should hope the best of others, and commend what is good in their conduct.—HUGO: The social relations in which Christians stand to each other as relatives, countrymen, friends, should not be allowed to give character to their feelings and conduct to the exclusion of the more important relation which they bear to Christ. It is as friends, helpers, fellow-laborers in the Lord, that they are to be recognized.—BARNES: Religion binds the hearts of all who embrace it tenderly together. It makes them feel that they are one great family, united by tender ties, and joined by peculiar attachments.—J. F. H.]

Warning against disturbers of the Church. The Apostle pronounces against them: 1. With all frankness, designating them, a. as those who cause divisions and offences; b. whom the others should avoid, because they are not in Christ, but serve themselves, and deceive simple hearts by honeyed words and false speeches. 2. With all confidence in the members of the Church at Rome; because, a. their obedience is come abroad unto all men; b. he himself is glad on their behalf; c. but desires that they be very careful, wise unto that which is good, and simple concerning evil. 3. With the strongest hope in the God of peace, who he expects will shortly bruise Satan under the feet of believers (vers. 17-20).—On divisions and offences in the Church (ver. 17).—We can cause offence, not only by a bad life, but also by bad teaching (ver. 17).—Good words and fair speeches very easily deceive simple hearts (ver. 18).—Not every thing which tastes sweet is healthy, nor is every thing which has a pleasing sound true (ver. 18).

Wise unto that which is good, and simple concerning evil! Comp. Matt. x. 16; 1 Cor. xiv. 26 (ver. 19).—The God of peace conquers, Satan is trodden upon (ver. 20).—To God alone be glory through Jesus Christ forever! Amen (vers. 26-27).

STARKE, HEDINGER: Christians are not dumb blocks (Ps. cxix. 100, 104); but industrious, wise, zealous in that which is good, full of excellent counsel and wise execution. But it is owing to their godly simplicity and love that they do not understand wickedness, intrigues, and all kinds of low tricks (especially when men make themselves pleasant, according to the flesh, by shifting about, talking politics, and flattering with the cross of Christ), and are often deceived (ver. 19).

SPENER: A lie cannot stand long, but must finally be exposed (ver. 20).

BENGEL: In this whole Epistle the Apostle mentions the enemy but once; in all his Epistles he mentions Satan nine times, and the devil six times (ver. 20).

LISCO: Warning against deceivers. 1. Import; 2. Description of false teachers; 3. Ground of warning; 4. Comfort (vers. 17-24).—The ascription of praise to God, and the wish for His blessing. 1. The subject of the ascription of praise; 2. Its ground (vers. 25-27).

HEUBNER: The holiest union can be dissolved by evil desire and unbelief; the purpose of the evil spirit is always separation and destruction (Divide et impera). This takes place especially by means of false teachers (vers. 17, 18).—The world is wise in doing evil, and unskilful in doing good (ver. 19).—By God and His Spirit we can conquer Satan and his works. Christ has begun to destroy the works of Satan, though the task is not yet finished (ver. 20).

[FARINDON, on ver. 20: If the devil inspire evil thoughts, God is both able and willing to inspire good; and in all our trials, in all time of our tribulation, and in all time of our wealth, in the hour of death and in the day of judgment, His "grace is sufficient for" us.

[JEREMY TAYLOR: All people who desire the benefit of the gospel are bound to have a fellowship and society with these saints, and communicate with them in their holy things, in their faith, and in their hope, and in their sacraments, and in their prayers, and in their public assemblies, and in their government; and must do to them all the acts of charity and mutual help which they can and are required to; and without this communion of saints, and a conjunction with them who believe in God through Jesus Christ, there is no salvation to be expected: which communion must be kept in inward things always, and by all persons, and testified by outward acts always, when it is possible, and may be done upon just and holy conditions.

[BURKITT: God is only wise, because all wisdom is derived from Him; all the wisdom of angels and men is but a ray from His light, a drop from His ocean. Let the wisdom of God, in all His dealings with us and ours, be admired and adored by us; for all His works of providence are as orderly and perfect as His works of creation, though we perceive it not.

[HENRY: Mark those that cause divisions; mark the method they take, the end they drive at; there is no need of a piercing, watchful eye, to discern the danger we are in from such people; for commonly the pretences are plausible, when the projects are very pernicious. Do not look only at the divisions and offences, but run up those streams to the fountain, and mark those that cause them; and especially that in them which causes these divisions and offences; those lusts on each side, whence come these wars and fightings. A danger discovered is half prevented.

[SCOTT: In order to maintain communion with the Lord and with His saints uninterrupted, avoid, with decided disapprobation, those persons who aim to prejudice believers against each other, to draw them off from faithful pastors, or to seduce them into strange doctrines, contrary to the simple truths of God's word.

[CLARKE: The Church of God has ever been troubled with pretended pastors, men who feed themselves, and not the flock; men who are too proud to beg, and too lazy to work; who have neither grace nor gifts to plant the standard of the cross on the devil's territories, and, by the power of Christ, make inroads upon his kingdom, and spoil him of his subjects. By sowing the seeds of dissensions, by means of doubtful disputations, and the propagation of scandals; by glaring and insinuating speeches—for they affect elegance and good breeding—they rend Christian congregations, form a party for themselves, and thus live on the spoils of the Church of God.

[HODGE: However much the Church may be distracted and troubled, error and its advocates cannot finally prevail. Satan is a conquered enemy with a lengthened chain.

[BARNES: Let men make peace their prime object, resolve to love all who are Christians, and it will be an infallible gauge by which to measure the arguments of those who seek to promote alienations and contentions.

[M'CLINTOCK: There is nothing in religion incompatible with the natural affections. Nay, you will find that he who loves God most, has the strongest and most trustworthy love for kindred and friends. The human affections are purged of all dross by the fire of love to God. A heart full of charity prompts to all good and kind actions, just when they are called for. It will give tears, when tears and sympathy can bless or save; it will give sacrifice, when sacrifice can help or save some suffering soul. Earnest love to God must display itself in tender attributes, in good, kind, and gentle ministrations—in all forms of benevolence and personal sacrifice. And these things become the more easy, the more we know of the love of God.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

TRANSLATOR'S PREFACE.

AFTER nearly four years of labor, remitted at intervals by reason of ill-health, I am able to lay before the public Dr. Kling's able Commentary on the First Epistle to the Corinthians in something of an English dress. The difficulties of translating his involved and scholastic style, designed only for German students, into readable English, suited for the public at large, can be known only by such as have attempted a like task. To have translated literally, and have strictly followed his method, would have been to make the work a comparative failure. By the consent, therefore, of the principal Editor, Dr. Schaff, I have, without altering the meaning, introduced such modifications of method and style as seemed necessary to give the Commentary the widest circulation. The changes made have been mainly, in substituting an English text for the Greek, excepting where the latter was absolutely required to render the comment intelligible,—in intercalating this text through the body of the Commentary instead of putting a few catch-words at the head of the paragraphs,—in breaking up the majority of the ponderous sentences into their component parts (a few being left as specimens here and there to show what a German scholar is capable of in this direction),—and in omitting some portions of the homiletical and practical sections which seemed to be needlessly extended. The parts added by me, are all inserted in brackets, with the exception of the text in black letter, and the headings under the caption "Doctrinal and Ethical" which are italicized. All matter thus enclosed, which is not accredited to particular authors, must be ascribed to me. This general acknowledgment of responsibility I have preferred to make here, rather than insert Tr. or D. W. P. all down the page—say, as a whim of my own. The additions made by me, it will be seen, amount to over one quarter of the whole Commentary. The authors consulted have been mainly Alford, Stanley, Wordsworth, Hodge, Robertson, Bloomfield, Barnes, Poole, Scott, Whitby, Meyer, de Wette, Olshausen, Bengel, Calvin, and Chrysostom. Such portions of their several works as seemed calculated to shed light on the text, or to illustrate the course of Biblical Criticism, I have freely used. These frequent citations, while they have served to enrich the body of thought, naturally tended to break up the logical structure of the paragraphs; but the lack of continuity, wherever seen to exist, will be tolerated for the sake of the benefit derived.

To the homiletical sections I have added the plans of such sermons as I have found in my library, not being in circumstances freely to consult any other as I would gladly have done.

In consequence of my ill-health, Dr. C. P. Wing, who has been pleasantly associated with me in preparing the Second Epistle, kindly consented to assist in furnishing the critical notes on the text from chapter VII. to the end. In this he has been far more full and painstaking than I was in the earlier chapters; for which scholars will thank him. The portions added by him are very properly distinguished by his initials C. P. W.

RECAP

J. 6

With these explanations I submit the work to the candid judgment of the Christian public, in the hope that they will find it a serviceable addition to the abundant and exceedingly valuable Commentaries that have been already issued on this portion of the New Testament. If it will aid in leading any to the better understanding and appreciation of this most important portion of Scripture, giving them a tithe of the benefit I have enjoyed, it will be the largest count in my recompense for the labor spent on it. Severe criticism on the style of the translation I must deprecate in advance. If I have succeeded in putting Dr. Kling's exceedingly involved, prolix, cumbrous, yet thoughtful style into readable English, it is more than I dared to hope for after having enlisted in the work and clearly apprehended the nature of the task before me. In consequence of being obliged to recast the whole of the exegetical and critical part, and, as it were, work myself into a new method, some slight errors of punctuation and lettering will be found in the earlier chapters, for which I ask the reader's indulgence.

With the ever-growing conviction that no Commentary of uninspired man can ever exhaust the fullness of meaning contained in the Scriptures, and deeply conscious how far short this new effort falls below the attainable standard, I with diffidence present it to the Church as a tribute of humble reverence and affection for the Word of God, and a token of sincere desire that this Word may be more and more known, felt, and enjoyed by all believers, not only in its obvious scope and more general meaning, but also in the subtler implications and suggestions of its moods and tenses, its particles and order of language, being all informed by the Spirit of the Living One who is the Sum and Source of all Beauty, Goodness, and Truth.

The translation of this part of the Biblework is made from the second German edition, 1865, as revised by the Rev. Mr. HAUFF, of Gmünd, an intimate friend of Dr. KLING, who died a few weeks after the date of his preface to the first edition (March 1, 1861).

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF DR. KLING.

BY

THE AMERICAN EDITOR.

FRIEDRICH CHRISTIAN KLING, D. D., the author of the Commentary on the Epistles to the Corinthians in Dr. Lange's Bibelwerk, was born Nov. 4, 1800, at Altdorf, in the kingdom of Württemberg, and died at Marbach in April, 1861. His father was a clergyman of the Evangelical Lutheran Church, and destined him for the same calling. Young Kling passed through that thorough systematic course of classical, philosophical and theological training for which the Gymnasias, the lower Seminaries (Maulbronn, Schöndal, Blaubeuren and Urach), and the University of Württemberg are unsurpassed even in Germany. After graduating in Tübingen he went to the University of Berlin, which was then at the height of its fame in the theological department. He attended chiefly the lectures of Schleiermacher and Neander, and enjoyed their personal friendship. His theological views were moulded by these celebrated divines, especially by Neander; but like most of their pupils, he advanced beyond them in the direction of a positive evangelical orthodoxy.

On his return to Württemberg in 1824 he spent a few years as Repetent in the theological Seminary at Tübingen—an honorable position of tutor and assistant professor, to which a few of the best scholars of each graduating class are appointed, with the additional advantage of a literary journey at the expense of the government. In March, 1826, he was elected deacon (i. e. assistant minister) in the town of Waiblingen, where he spent six useful and happy years. He was married to a grand-daughter of the celebrated philosopher, Fr. H. Jacobi. While faithfully discharging his duties as pastor, he furnished frequent contributions to leading theological Reviews, which made his name favorably known throughout Germany.

In 1832 Dr. Kling received and accepted a call as professor of theology in the University of Marburg, where he labored successfully and acceptably for ten years. In 1842 he followed a call to the University of Bonn, and taught there till 1849 alongside of such eminent colleagues as Drs. Nitzsch, Bleek and Sack. The state of his health induced him to withdraw from the academic career to which he had devoted seventeen of his best years, to the more quiet and simple life of a country pastor at Ebersbach, in his native Württemberg. When his health was restored, he entered upon a more extensive sphere of labor as Dean of Marbach on the Neckar (the birth-place of Schiller). His leisure hours he devoted to theological study till his peaceful death.

Dr. Kling was a gentleman of great simplicity and purity of character, plain and modest in appearance, gentle and amiable in temper, kind and affectionate in disposition, decidedly evangelical, yet liberal in his views, of solid learning, sound and sober judgment, sincere and humble piety. As a pupil of Schleiermacher and Neander, he retained from the former a lively interest in the systematic arrangement and speculative construction of the doctrines of Christianity from the Christological and soteriological principle; while with Neander he shared a love of Scriptural simplicity, and taste for history and held to the motto: Pectus est quod facit theologum. He was no creative genius, opening new avenues of thought, but followed in the track of great and good men, yet with fine discrimination and independent judgment. He was not brilliant either as a lecturer or preacher, but very instructive, sound and winning, and was highly esteemed and beloved by all who knew him. I spent several days with him in the family of Dr. Krummacker at Elberfeld (now at Potsdam) in 1844, where, together with Dr. Krummacker and Dr. Sander, he assisted at my ordination on the eve of my departure for America; and I met him afterwards at Stuttgart and at a missionary festival at Basel in 1854. I well remember the impression which his sweet and lovely spirit, his simplicity and humility made upon all on those occasions, and how he reminded us of the beloved disciple.

Dr. Kling commenced his literary career in 1824 by publishing from manuscripts, at the suggestion of Neander, the sermons of Bertholdt, a powerful Franciscan revival preacher of the 13th century, who is said to have addressed crowds of from 60,000 to 200,000 people, hungry for the bread of Life. This work was favorably reviewed by the celebrated German philologist, Jacob Grimm, and opened a mine of theological lore which lay buried among the German writers of the middle age. Since that time he prepared no extensive work except the Commentary on the Epistles to the Corinthians, to which he devoted the last years of his life. He wrote the Preface a few weeks before his death. He had repeatedly lectured on these Epistles while professor at Marburg and Bonn, and published comments on the more difficult sections in the Studien und Kritiken. He laid himself out mainly in the exegetical and doctrinal sections, while the homiletical hints are mostly gathered from older sources. This Commentary was well received for its solid learning and Christian spirit; but the style is somewhat heavy and diffuse. Hence I allowed the translators full liberty to reproduce it freely in justice to the English idiom as well as the thoughts of the original. It is no disparagement of the author to say that the American translators have greatly improved his work by condensation and valuable additions and adaptation to the English reader. Every page gives proof of their independent scholarly labor. The German edition contains 417, the English 596 pages, and a good deal of the new matter is in very small type.

Dr. Kling was also a constant and highly esteemed contributor to the first theological Reviews of Germany, such as the Studien und Kritiken, the Tübinger Zeitschrift für Theologie, the Deutsche Zeitschrift, etc., in which he took an active part in the leading exegetical, critical and doctrinal questions of the age. His essays and reviews were always marked by conscientious care, solidity, sound sense, and justice to all who differed from him. Among the many elaborate articles and discussions of his industrious pen we may mention those on Clement of Alexandria, Hasse's Anselm of Canterbury, the early life of Neander, Baur's view on the Epistle to the Romans, on several passages in the Corinthians, on Schaff's History of the Apostolic Church, on the relation of philosophy and theology,—all in ULLMANN AND UMBREIT'S Studien und Kritiken. He also furnished the articles on "Athanasius," "Augustine," "Bertholdt the Franciscan," "Hilary of Poitiers," "Marheinecke," "Möhler," "Christianity," "Conversion," "Justification," and other important subjects for HERZOG'S "Theological Encyclopædia," but he died before the completion of this work, and found an honorable place in a supplementary volume (XIX. p. 704-706) of this great storehouse of the modern evangelical theology of Germany.

THE EPISTLES OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO THE CORINTHIANS.

INTRODUCTION.

§ 1. THE POSITION AND SIGNIFICANCE OF THESE EPISTLES.

The Epistles to the Corinthians occupy the second place in the series ascribed to Paul, according to the order of Scripture. Preceding that to the Romans in the order of time by nearly a year, they rank next to it in importance, as it respects both their contents, and the Church addressed.

I. As to their contents. These are mainly of a practical kind. Unlike what we find so abundantly in the other Epistles of our author, we encounter here no discussions on the cardinal questions of Christianity, whether dogmatical or apologetic. Nothing is here said of the need of salvation, felt by the ancient world; nor of the supply of this need through Christ; nor of the relations of Christianity to the elder dispensation; nor of the nature of the Gospel salvation; nor of the way it fulfilled the law and the promise; nor of the great plan of God's kingdom in relation to both Jews and Gentiles; nor of the part these were to bear in successively drawing each other to a participation of divine grace. Topics of this sort here give place to others, more particularly called for by the peculiar condition of the Corinthian Church. Taking occasion from the circumstances immediately in view, Paul, in these Epistles, labors rather to exhibit the bearings of Christianity upon human conduct in its several relations to the church, to the state, to society in general, and to domestic life. And first of all, he begins with setting forth the varied condition of things in the Church, especially in their moral form and aspect. Under this head he treats of the position which church-members hold to their teachers; of their worthy maintenance of the grace which they have received; and of their high calling, both towards those who are Christians and those who are not,—alike at home and abroad,—but, above all, in the assembly of the saints, whether convened in solemn festival, or for general edification. In short, Paul here solves the problem of preserving and restoring the purity of the Church as a body consecrated to God in Christ, by setting at work brotherly love, as well in the mutual furtherance of each other's spiritual welfare—especially through the right use of spiritual gifts, as in the friendly balancing of all inequalities of outward condition, by a ready generosity on the part of the rich. From this he goes on, taking occasion from the attempts of his opponents to undermine his Apostolical character and influence, to give various expositions of an apologetic and polemic kind respecting the Apostolic office, its value, and the proper recognition of it, especially in reference to himself and his position. One doctrinal question only is directly and thoroughly handled,—that of the resurrection of the dead (1 Cor. xv.); and this is so done that its connection with the fundamental facts of Christianity, and its bearing upon the whole body of Christian truth, as well as its ethical elements, is made to appear in the clearest light.

That Epistles of so preëminently ethical a character (whose teachings are, however, every where made to rest on their proper doctrinal basis) should be made to follow an Epistle like that to the Romans, was perfectly proper—all the more so, because of their importance in a twofold respect: 1. Historically, as illustrating to a remarkable degree the condition and circumstances of the Christian churches in the midst of the pagan world; 2. Normally, inasmuch as the Apostle so portrays the proper demeanor of a Christian Church and of those holding office in and for it, that churches and office-bearers may here find a mirror for themselves for all time to come.

II. Looking at the relative importance of the two churches (at Rome and at Corinth), it must be conceded, that the church of the former city, as being the capital of a world-wide empire, and furnishing the largest opportunity for the spread of the Gospel, stands preëminent. Yet the church at Corinth, too, possessed a high degree of consequence, derived from the peculiar position and character of the city in which it was planted. Corinth, as is well known, was the metropolis of Achaia—a province that embraced in its bounds Hellas and the Peloponnesus. Situated on a narrow isthmus which just parted the Ionian Sea from the Peloponnesus, it commanded two celebrated harbors—the one looking toward the East, and the other toward the West. It thus became the centre of an extended and varied commerce. The arts and sciences also flourished there in unrivalled splendor. It was noted, too, as the centre of religious worship for the whole Greek nation. In it was gathered a population numbering from 400,000 to 500,000—comprising people from all parts of the world. Of these a large portion were Latins, the descendants of that colony which had been sent here by Julius Cæsar, about a century and a half previously, for the purpose of recovering it from the desolation and ruin which had been brought upon it by Mummius. An illustration of Paul's estimate of the importance of the place we have in the fact, that he labored here no less than a year and a half for the establishment of a church. In his view, it was a fit point from whence the Gospel might be made to diffuse its rays far and wide over the world, and where a church, once planted, might stand forth as an example for other churches scattered over the globe, whose members would naturally cluster here upon the errands of trade and commerce. And for this there were peculiar facilities arising from the manifold activity and cultivation of the people generally, which gave promise of a spiritual development no less rich and varied. But while Corinth presented peculiar advantages for a church, it also abounded in peculiar perils. No place was so noted for its luxury and licentiousness as Corinth. The infamous goddess Aphrodite was here worshipped with sensual rites of the grossest kind, having no less than three thousand priestesses of loose character ministering at her shrine. Indeed, so notorious was the dissipation of the people, that the word Corinthianise (κορινθιάζειν) was used to express conduct the most voluptuous and debauched. There was danger therefore lest in such a place the development of a Christian church would be obstructed by prevailing immoralities. No less great an evil was to be apprehended from the peculiar proneness of the Greek mind to intellectual conceit and party strife. In short, it may be said that in this one city there were concentrated in the fullest degree all those dangerous and corrupting influences which proceed from a thorough-going epicureanism, at once the most vicious and the most refined.

A church occupying so important a position, and at the same time so beset with temptations, naturally required a special care on the part of the Apostle. Of this the two Epistles before us give abundant evidence. The nearer the Apostle stood related to this church, founded by his labors, and the more it threatened to deviate from its true course or actually went astray, the more was he, as its spiritual father, constrained to exert himself in its behalf and give vent to his own deep emotions of concern for its welfare; and the more energetically, too, did he find it necessary to assert the consciousness of the position which he held towards them. In the first of these Epistles it is only here and there that he gives us a glimpse into his inmost thoughts and feelings on the subject. But it is from the second that we ascertain far more of the real traits of his noble character. For here it is, that, with the most unrestrained candor, and borne on by emotions which carry him beyond himself, he pours forth his whole soul, showing them with the utmost frankness how he had felt and acted, labored and suffered in their behalf. At the same time, also, in reply to the attacks of his foes, he so conducts his self-defence, that not only what he says of himself, but also the way in which he says it, vividly presents to our view abundant evidences of his rare fidelity and truthfulness, shining forth, as these traits do, both in his deep humility and in his lofty bearing, in his simplicity and in his honesty, in his self-denial and in his love, in his magnanimity and in his boldness, in his ardent devotion and in his deliberate demeanor, in his exaltation of soul and in his quiet, resigned cross-bearing.

‡ II. RISE AND DEVELOPMENT OF THE CORINTHIAN CHURCH.

Upon his second missionary tour, after a divine providence had led Paul from Asia to Europe (Acts xvi. 7-9), and he had here amid various fortunes established churches at Philippi and Thessalonica, and Berea, and finally at Athens had encountered Grecian philosophy, and pride of learning, with the doctrine of a heavenly wisdom, Paul came on his way, about the year 52, to Corinth. The city was then in the height of its prosperity, puffed up with the pride of wealth and the vanity of carnal science, and captivated by a fondness for sophistical dialectics and pompous rhetoric; and Paul entered it, not in the lofty consciousness of his own strength, but in weakness and fear and much trembling, (Acts xviii. 1; 1 Cor. ii. 3) and with an humbling sense of the inadequacy of his own abilities to the great task before him. And his resolve was not to oppose human wisdom and eloquence with weapons of like character, but with the simple preaching of Christ crucified, in order that the faith of believers might stand in the power of God alone (1 Cor. ii. 1, 5; 2 Cor. x. 3, 4).

For the sake of support, he first joined in company, as a tent-maker, with one Aquila, a Jew of Asia Minor, who had been banished from Italy in consequence of the decree of Claudius Cæsar which drove all Jews from Rome (Acts xviii. 2, 3). This co-partnership proved also a fellowship in the faith. But whether Aquila and Priscilla, his wife, were already Christians at that time, or were converted by Paul, it is impossible to decide. His first intercourse on the themes of the Gospel was also with the Jews. To them he was directed by the prophecy and the promise of which they were the bearers. Among them he obtained an entrance and foothold in the character of a travelling brother, and as one learned in the Scriptures. On entering the synagogue, it was expected of him, as was customary, that he would speak a word by way of edification; and he improved the opportunity to announce, and lay before them for suitable proof, the advent of the long expected Messiah. Here, too, he found certain Greeks who had attached themselves to the Jewish communion, or who, at least, came occasionally into the synagogues as hearers. These, by means of their social position and family connections, formed a bridge of access to the rest of the Gentile community. To convince both these parties of the truth which he had to impart was therefore his chief labor. But here again, as often before, only a small number believed. And when, by the arrival of his helpers, Silas and Timothy, Paul gathered fresh strength for his work, a fierce opposition arose, which so kindled the indignation of the Apostle that, shaking off the very dust from his mantle, and casting on them the guilt of their exclusion from the promised salvation, he declared himself henceforth at liberty to labor with a pure conscience among the heathen. From this time onward he delivered his discourses in the house of a proselyte, Justus by name, who dwelt hard by the synagogue. Here Crispus, the ruler of the synagogue, joined him with all his house, and many others also, who believed and were baptized. But with the growth of the church, the opposition rose likewise, and waxed to such a degree that the Apostle began to despair, and needed a word of encouragement from the Lord. This was graciously vouchsafed him in a night vision—"Fear not, but speak boldly," &c. (Acts xviii. 9, 10). The result corresponded with the declaration. An attempt of the Jews to secure a judgment against Paul before the tribunal of the Proconsul Gallio so signally failed, that the accusers themselves were set upon and roughly handled by the Greeks without interference from the authorities. After remaining awhile longer in Corinth, Paul departed for Ephesus, attended by Aquila and Priscilla, whom he left behind at this latter place as he journeyed onward. These persons were destined henceforth to exert an important influence upon the development of the Corinthian Church. Meeting with the eloquent Apollos, an Alexandrian Jew, who had been a disciple of John and was well versed in Christianity, they took him and instructed him in the Gospel, and on his going to Corinth gave him letters of introduction to the disciples there. In this congenial sphere his talents soon found full scope, and by the assistance of divine grace he proved greatly useful to the infant Church through the skill with which he was able to convince the Jews, out of their own scriptures, that Jesus was the Christ (Acts xviii. 11, 28.). So far the narrative in the Book of Acts.

Our first Epistle gives us further glimpses into the after-condition and development of this Church. We here mark a gratifying progress on the whole. There appears among them a wealth of spiritual gifts, especially in the department of religious knowledge (chap. i. 5). But there is no steadfastness in the progress made. The old life of nature continues still to assert its power in various ways, and in different forms and degrees in different persons, according to their several peculiarities and relations, and that, too, to such an extent, that the Apostle denies them a proper spiritual character, and designates them as σάρκιναι: creatures of flesh, and σαρκινίαι: carnal.¹

One indication of this carnal temper was seen in the re-appearance of the old Greek *Party spirit*² under a Christian form. The Corinthian Church failed to abide unitedly in Christ. Following the fashion of the schools, they soon joined themselves to different human organs of the spirit of Christ, with a one-sided and exclusive devotion, maintaining and magnifying the peculiar excellencies of their favorite teachers in a contentious zeal, until at last they broke into factions, each separate tendency pushing itself to an extreme, and settling there.³

In chap. i. 12, four parties are enumerated,—those of Paul, of Apollos, of Cephas, and of Christ; and they are mentioned in the order of their rise. The occasion which gave them birth was the appearance of Apollos at Corinth. His mode of understanding and interpreting the Gospel was no doubt essentially the same as that of Paul. But while Paul made it a rule to preserve the utmost simplicity in his preaching, Apollos, on the contrary, gave full scope to his Alexandrine learning and to his well trained powers of eloquence and argument. These shining qualities so attracted a portion of the Church, that in their over-estimate of them, they exalted

Apollos above Paul, as a teacher of superior education and culture. In opposition, however, to such pride of "wisdom," Paul insisted upon that "demonstration of the Spirit and of Power" (ii. 1, 4; 2 Cor. xi. 6) which characterized his own discourses. Thus an opposition was developed. Over against the adherents of Apollos, there arose a party for Paul, who applauded the founder of the Church as their master, and wished to make him their head. But while between these two parties there existed hardly any essential difference, and the issue respected only the relative worth of the two leaders, it was otherwise with those who professed to follow Peter. In this case the antagonism turned altogether upon a diversity of views both in morals and religion. Inasmuch as there is no proof that Peter himself was ever at Corinth, we must ascribe the origin of this movement to the presence of Judaizing teachers, who were interested in setting up a strictly legalistic party, and who appealed to Peter's authority, as an Apostle who had been directly called of Christ, and had enjoyed personal communion with him.

But what does the Apostle mean when he speaks of some as saying that they were "of Christ?" If the language here used indicates a vicious partisanship, as would appear both from the connection and from the order of the words, how are we to understand it? It were natural to suppose here, that in view of the devotion manifested by the several parties just mentioned towards their favorite leaders, there were still others who felt opposed to all adherence to men, and were resolved to exalt Christ alone as the Head to whom they belonged, but who did this in so exclusive and partisan a manner, that instead of proving a uniting element in the Church, they only made the rents worse. If, now, we may assume with Osiander, that under the opposers whom the Apostle assails 2 Cor. x., this party be meant (v. 7), we should detect in them a Judaizing clique, (chap. xi. 22) whose leaders, intruding into this Church, arrogated to themselves Apostolic authority, while they rejected that of Paul (2 Cor. xi. 5, 15; xiii. 11). That they are to be linked with the Petrinists, or are to be regarded as a modification of this party, is an unwarrantable assumption, since in 1 Cor. i. 12, they are co-ordinate with these as a distinct body, and in the Second Epistle throughout, no further allusion to Peter occurs.¹

As to the grounds on which they rested their special connection with Christ, opinions differ. No sufficient reasons exist for supposing with some that they appealed to a direct family relationship with Christ, or to an immediate personal acquaintance with him, or, with others (Schenkel, Dähne, Goldhorn), that they were a set of Gnosticizing theosophic mystics, who prided themselves upon visions and revelations which they professed to have received from God. Perhaps, with Thiersch, (The Church in the Apostolic Age, 2d ed. p. 144.) we might take them to have been personal disciples of Christ, tinged with Pharisaic notions, who had come from Palestine as well as from Rome to Corinth to exert here a dangerous hostility to Paul by stealing from him the hearts of the Church, but who had nevertheless so far unmasked themselves as to merit from Paul the epithets "false apostles" and "servants of Satan" (2 Cor. xi. 13.). But there is no evidence compelling us to such conclusions.²

²[In opposition to the prevailing views of German critics it may be well here to state the conclusions which Dean Alford has given of his investigations on the subject of the parties at Corinth. "(1.) That these designations (I. 12) are not used as pointing to actual parties formed and subsisting among them but (2.) as representing the spirit with which they contended against one another being the sayings of individuals and not of parties. ("Each one of you saith)," q. d. 'You are all in the habit of alleging against one another, some your special attachment to Paul, some to Apollos, some to Cephas, others to no mere human teacher, but barely to Christ to the exclusion of us his apostles.' (3.) That these sayings,

The "yet carnal" character of the Corinthian church showed itself also in an incapacity rightly to apprehend and apply Christian truth in its purity and power, and to enjoy Christian liberty in its laws and limitations. They were carnal in their boasting over the gifts of knowledge existing in the church, i. e. their pride of wisdom, their vain self-satisfiedness, and consciousness of perfected attainment (chap. iii. 4).—Carnal, too, in the grossest sense, was it for a member of the church to hold concubinage with his own stepmother; and the church betrayed a lack of spiritual life in so far as it was wanting in earnestness, power and courage, sufficient to expel this impure and all-defiling element from the midst of it.—It was carnal also, only in a different direction, for church members to go to law one with another, and that, too, before heathen tribunals (chap. vi. 1-8), since in this there was manifested not only a lack of that yielding brotherly love which prefers to suffer wrong than to do wrong, but also a defective sense of the high dignity of Christians who are called to share hereafter in the judicial functions of their Lord, when he shall sit to judge the world.—The immaturity of their carnal state, and their defective sense of Christian liberty and obligation, appeared also in the sphere of the sexual relations, developing themselves in two opposite directions. On the one hand, there were some who insanely held that Christian liberty involved the right to gratify the sexual impulse in promiscuous intercourse with those who prostituted themselves for money, after a fashion allowed and religiously consecrated among the Pagans (whoredom)—as if the Christian were free to dispose as he chose of that body which God had redeemed unto himself (vi. 12 ff). On the other hand, there were those so fettered by legal scruples as to maintain that even marital intercourse was inconsistent with the sanctity of a Christian life, and who therefore insisted not only upon the duty of celibacy, but also upon the cessation of connubial intercourse between parties already married, yea even upon the dissolution of the marriage tie, in case of one of the parties still remained unconverted. Such austere notions betrayed a lack of sound religious prudence, an ignorance of human infirmity, as well as of that divinely ordained diversity in human constitutions which rendered what might be possible and meet for one person wholly unsuitable for another. They also indicated a want of confidence in the power of Christianity to draw those, who consented to remain with believing companions in the closest intimacies of the natural life, into a fellowship of the spirit also. And last of all, they evinced a want of insight into the Gospel rule of abiding in the vocation wherein a person is called—a rule which ceases to be valid only in case the unbelieving party insists on a separation.

In contrast with such asceticism there existed also in some quarters an unrestricted desire while they are not to be made the basis of any hypothesis respecting definite parties at Corinth, do nevertheless hint at matters of fact and are not merely 'exempli gratia:' and (4.) that this view of the verse, which was taken by Chrys. Theodoret, Theophylact, Calvin is borne out, and indeed necessitated by ch. iv. 6, 'These things I have in a figure transferred to myself and Apollos for your sakes.' In answer, however, to the argument adduced in support of Alford's view from this last text, as if it implied that Paul had only used the names of himself and Apollos instead of the real names of unknown leaders, by way of accommodation, and to avoid all personal altercation, Stanley well remarks, "This would not apply to the use of the name of Cephas, and it is clear that the Apostle in this instance [ch. iv. 6.] merely expresses his intention of confining himself to those who called themselves after his name and that of Apollos, in order to show that his censure was aimed, not only against his Judaizing opponents, but against the factious spirit itself, by which those who claimed to be his partisans were no less animated than those who claimed to be his friends."

The opinion that Paul's language was intended to designate parties actually existing in the Church is confirmed by the testimony of Clement, who in writing to this same Church less than fifty years later says, "The blessed Paul wrote to you about himself and Cephas and Apollos, because, then as well as now, you formed parties." See Stanley. Among American commentators Hodge and Barnes substantially agree with our Author. The former says, "The idea that the names of Paul and Apollos and Cephas are used figuratively, when other teachers were really intended, is so unnatural and has so little to sustain it that it is now almost universally repudiated."

"It is a remarkable fact," writes Stanley, "that the factions, once so formidable, have never been revived. Never has any disruption of the unity of Christianity appeared of equal importance; never has any disruption which once appeared of importance (with the exception, perhaps, of the Paschal controversy) been so completely healed."

for marriage, as though celibacy were an evil and a disgrace. In reference to such a tendency the Apostle insisted only that in view of "the present distress" believers hold themselves free from earthly ties, and that in forming new connexions they take care to keep within the circle of Christian fellowship (chap. vii.).

A further antagonism of a similar kind was called for by the same cause in relation to the use of meat that had been offered unto idols (viii. ff.). On this point, likewise, two parties were formed; one strict, and the other liberal-minded. On the part of the former, there was a clinging to the external aspects of the act, or at least some remains of heathenish superstition in regard to an actual objective influence exerted by the idols upon the meats offered to them. On the part of the latter there was evinced indeed a more correct insight into the merits of the subject; but this was accompanied by an overweening pride, and a lack of self-denying love, which was shown in the reckless use they made of their liberty, by reason of which some were scandalized, and others were led to participate in heathen ceremonials in a manner utterly inconsistent with the proper observance of the most sacred feast of Christian worship. This lack of knowledge in regard to the privileges belonging to a Christian, as well as the lack of consideration and self-denial towards others, were alike indications of the "yet carnal" mind. In the one case faith was not live enough to beget a liberalizing knowledge; in the other case, it was not strong enough to produce brotherly love.

This same lack of decorum as well as of brotherly love, was also to be seen in the sphere of public worship (chap. xi.); the former, in that the women violated the custom, prevalent in the Churches of God, of appearing in the congregation veiled; the latter, in that the love-feasts to which the Lord's Supper was attached, were celebrated in a manner entirely at variance with the design for which they were instituted, which was to awaken and preserve a just sense of the unity and equality of all believers in Christ, for here the rich separated themselves from their poorer brethren, and kept the portions they brought, aside for their own use, so that the affluence of the one class and the poverty of the other were exhibited in painful contrast.

The "yet carnal" mind was furthermore manifest in relation to the spiritual gifts which abounded in the Church. There was a lack both of correct insight into the ground and purpose of these gifts and of determination to maintain a constant reference to this ground and purpose, in the use of them. In other words, there was wanting an humble recognition of dependence upon the one God, and Lord, and Spirit, for the existence of these gifts, and also a sincere and loving endeavour to employ them for the furtherance of the interests of the Church. Besides, there was mingled with this a foolish pride at the possession of such gifts, and an unreasoning over-estimate of those in particular which had in them something remarkable and astonishing, such as the gift of tongues. The ability to speak what was incomprehensible, except through an interpreter, in a state of ecstasy, was more highly prized than the ability to prophesy, even though this was better fitted for edification. It was also a token of carnal immaturity, that they were indisposed to repress the impulse to prophesy when it was operating to disturb the order of the congregation, and to hinder edification. With this there was associated also a display of vanity on the part of women in their desire to imitate the men in speaking in an inspired vein (chap. xii.-xiv.).

In addition to all these erroneous moral tendencies, there existed also a theoretic error, (easily passing over, however, into one of practice) which resulted from an adherence to the old heathenish habits of thought. It was an aversion to the doctrine of the glorification of the body (cf. Acts xvii. 32). There were persons in the Corinthian Church who denied the possibility of the resurrection of the dead, inasmuch as they could not see into the method of the process. (Chap. xv. 35). In this case they showed themselves guilty of gross ignorance, partly in relation to the consequences of such a denial (vv. 1-19), partly in relation to the whole system of God's counsels and ways, of which the resurrection formed an important part (vv. 20-28), partly in respect to the practical significance of the resurrection (ver. 29), partly in respect to God and His power (ver. 34), and partly in regard to the development of the life in Christ; which was in accordance with the analogies of the natural life, and with the precedent set by Christ himself (ver. 35 ff.).

§ III. LITERATURE.

Among the more general exegetical works on the New Testament, or on the Pauline epistles, must be mentioned first, the patristic commentaries of CHRYSOSTOM, THEODORET, THEOPHYLACT, and ORCUMENIUS; then, those of the Reformers CALVIN, BEZA, FLACIUS, and others; then those subsequent to the period of the Reformation by GROTIUS and his learned opponent CALOVIUS; and last of all, the later commentaries by FLATT, OLSHAUSEN, DE WETTE, MEYER, BURGER, NEANDER, etc., and, as especially deserving of consideration, that by OSIANDER (Stuttg. 1858). With these we have compared also the Roman Catholic exposition of the two Epistles to the Corinthians by BISPING (2d ed., 1863). Besides these, honorable mention must be made of MELANCTHON (1 Cor., and a few chapters of 2d Cor.), W. MUSCULUS, ARETIUS, BULLINGER, SEE, SCHMID, MOSHEIM, S. J. BAUMGARTEN, SCHULZ, MORUS, EMMERLING, KRAUSS, HEYDENREICH (on 1st Cor.), and BILLROTH. To these may be added the collective works: CRITICI SACRI; POOL's Synopsis; WOLF's Curæ; STARKE's Bibel-Werk; the BERLENBURGER BIBLE; C. H. RIEGER's Observations on the New Testament, which naturally connect in spirit with the excellent Gnomon of BENDEL; GOSSNER's Spirit of the Life and Doctrine of Jesus Christ in the New Testament (1818), drawn for the most part from the Berlenburger Bible and from Zinzendorf; HEUBNER's Practical Exposition of the New Testament (1858); W. F. BESSER's Bible-Lessons (8th vol. 1862). Important aids to the exposition of these Epistles are furnished by the treatises on the Apostolic period (HESS, NEANDER, SCHAFF, LECHLER, LANGE, THIERSCH, and others); upon the Apostolic and Pauline doctrine (MESSNER, LUTTERBECK, USTERI, DÄNE); upon the New Testament Theology (CHR. SCHMID and others). Comp. also BAUR, The Apostle Paul [2d ed. by Zeller, 1867, 2 vols.], and from the earlier time STORR's Notitiae Historicae (in his Opuscula).

[Among the English and American works, those possessed of distinguished merit are, H. HAMMOND's Paraphrase of the New Testament, with Notes (1684); M. HENRY's Exposition of the Old and New Testament (begun in 1704); D. WHITBY's Paraphrase and Commentary on the New Testament (1726); THOS. SCOTT's Commentary on the Bible (1821); A. THE

FIRST EPISTLE TO THE CORINTHIANS.

§ I. ITS GENUINENESS.

The genuineness of this Epistle is undoubted. The witnesses for it stretch far back into the remotest antiquity; and among the earliest are Polycarp, Ignatius, Clemens Romanus, Irenæus, Athenagoras, and Clemens Alexandrinus, [Lardner adds Barnabas and Hermas].

[As specimens of the testimony they adduce, take the following furnished by Lardner and Alford:

Barnabas (A. D. 71) has the following evident allusions to 1 Cor. iii. 16, in his Epistle ch. vi.: "The habitation of our heart is an holy temple to the Lord;" and in ch. xvi. "God truly dwells in our house, that is, in us. This is the spiritual temple built unto the Lord."

Clemens Rom. (A. D. 96) in his Epistle to the Corinthians, ch. xlvii. writes: "Take into your hands the Epistle of the blessed Paul the Apostle. What did he write unto you at the first, in the beginning of the Gospel? Verily he did by the Spirit admonish you concerning himself, and Cephas, and Apollos, because that even then ye did form parties." And then we have citations in xlviii. from 1 Cor. x. 24; in xxxvii. from 1 Cor. xii. 12; in xlix. from 1 Cor. xiii. 4; in xxiv. from 1 Cor. xv. 20.

Hermas (A. D. 100) in Sim. v. § 7 alludes to 1 Cor. vii. 11, "If therefore a man or woman perseveres in anything of this kind and repents not; depart from her, and live not with her; otherwise thou also shalt be partaker of her sin. But it is therefore commanded, that both the man and the woman should remain unmarried, because such persons may repent."

Ignatius (A. D. 107) in his Epistle to the Ephesians § 2. quotes from 1 Cor. i. 10, "That in one obedience ye may be perfectly joined together [in the same mind, and in the same judgment, and may all speak the same thing of the same thing"¹]. And in ibid. § 18 from 1 Cor. i. 18; in Epistle to Rome § 5 from 1 Cor. iv. 4; in Epistle to the Magnes § 10 from 1 Cor. v. 7; in Epistle to Ephesians from 1 Cor. vi. 9, 10, etc.

Polycarp (A. D. 108) in Epistle to the Phil. ch. xi. quotes from 1 Cor. vi. 2, "Do you not know that the saints shall judge the world? as St. Paul teaches. Another citation in ch. v. from 1 Cor. xi. 9.

Further illustration might be given, but the above are sufficient to show the strength of the evidence. Those interested in prosecuting the investigation are referred to Lardner and Tregelles and Alford].

The internal characteristics also allow no uncertainty on the subject. The boldest criticism of our day, that of the Tübingen school, has suffered it to go unchallenged, and puts these two Epistles beside those to the Romans and the Galatians as the genuine writings of St. Paul.

[The best exposition of these internal evidences is given us by Paley in his Horæ Paulinæ, ch. iii. Among these may be mentioned a minuteness of detail and characterization, also incidental allusions and omissions, such as could hardly be looked for in a forged document; and besides these numerous close, yet undesigned coincidences between the statements in the Epistle and portions of the narrative in the Book of Acts.

But aside from and beyond all these evidences is the style and tone of the Epistle itself. Its every line is instinct with the spirit of Paul. All the features of his great and unique character are too sharply impressed upon it to allow of any hesitation as to the authorship].

§ II. PLACE AND TIME OF WRITING.

The subscription purports that this Epistle was written at Philippi. But this is directly contradicted by Paul's own statement in xvi. 8, where he says that he would "Tarry at Ephesus until Pentecost." Michaelis thinks that the mistake must have arisen from a mis-apprehension of διέρχουαι in xvi. 5, which being read in the present was made to mean "I am now passing through Macedonia," thus indicating his whereabouts at the time of writing. All modern critics agree in taking xvi. 8 as deciding the point of place.

As to the time, there is not the same unity of opinion, though Conybeare and Howson assert that "its date can be fixed with more precision than any other." Kling says "about the close of Paul's well-nigh three years' residence at Ephesus, some time before Pentecost, and shortly before Easter, after he had sent away Timothy and Erastus (iv. 17; Acts xix. 22), and had himself resolved to go through Macedonia and Achaia. (Acts xix. 21; 1 Cor. xvi. 8)." The editor of the second edition singularly adds, without any apparent sense of the contradiction, "that it is not to be put before the month Tisri (Sept.), the beginning of the Jewish year, since the Apostle must certainly have followed the Jewish reckoning, and not the Attic-Olympian." Whatever may have been meant by this, Kling's view as to the season of the year (Spring) is accepted by the majority of recent critics. (MEYER, DE WETTE, WORDS., ALF., HODGE, etc.)

But not so agreed are they as to the year itself. Kling puts it at A. D. 58, and so also Meyer. De Wette says 57 or 58. Alf.: "It is almost certain that it was written before Pentecost A. D. 57;" and so also Pearson, Mill and Wordsworth. According to Lardner's computation it was in the year 56. This was also the opinion of the French commentators, L'Enfant and Beausobre. This variation of two years is however a very slight one. The judgment of critics preponderates in favor of the year 57].

§ III. THE OCCASION AND DESIGN OF THE EPISTLE.

From what has been said in the general Introduction it is easy to infer what prompted the Apostle to write to the Corinthians, and what object he had in view. The moving cause was the whole condition of the church as unfolded in this Epistle. And in view of the evils which had broken out among them he felt constrained to attempt their suppression without delay, and that, too, by writing, as he had good reason for not wishing to defer his work in Macedonia. The chief points he aimed at was to restore harmony, repress inordinate license, correct errors of faith and practice, and confirm them in their allegiance to their Divine Master. [To these we may add, to reestablish his own authority and vindicate his own character and style of preaching from the attacks of enemies who had crept into the church during his absence, and assailed his Apostleship].

Already before this had he learned of some of the excesses into which several of the converts had fallen, and in an Epistle (now lost) had warned them against keeping company with fornicators, and urged the expulsion of such members from their communion. (1 Cor. v. 9, 11). And now again he had received further information, through persons arrived from Corinth, of the party-strifes which had sprung up among them. Besides this he had received a letter from the church (also lost) propounding various questions on points at issue in regard to which he was asked to decide. [Reason enough therefore was there for his writing; and from the abrupt manner in which he enters upon the case in hand, after his calm opening, which is not without indications of restrained feeling, we see how thoroughly his whole soul was roused to his work, and how strongly he felt the necessity upon him for plain and decided utterances. The result was an Epistle which forms one of the most important portions of Sacred Writ. Thus man's evil occasions are God's grandest opportunities for good].

§ IV. ITS STYLE.

[On this point we can do no better than give entire the statements of Alford in his Introduction.

"This Epistle ranks perhaps the foremost of all as to sublimity and earnest impassioned eloquence. Of the former, the description of the simplicity of the Gospel in ch. ii.—the concluding apostrophe of ch. iii. from ver. 16 to the end—the same in ch. vi. from ver. 9 to the end—the reminiscence of the shortness of the time ch. vii. 29–31—the whole argument in ch. xv. are examples unsurpassed in Scripture itself; and of the latter ch. iv. 8–15, and the whole of ch. ix., while the panegyric of love in ch. xiii. stands a pure and perfect gem, perhaps the noblest assemblage of thoughts in beautiful language extant in this world. About the whole Epistle there is a character of lofty and sustained solemnity, an absence of tortuousness of construction, and an apologetic plainness, which contrast remarkably with the personal portions of the second Epistle."

And all these qualities shine forth unconsciously, without effort, while in the earnest and direct prosecution of his purpose, yea, while entirely repudiating all attempts at rhetoric as utterly inconsistent with the simplicity of the Gospel. Here we have a beautiful illustration of the unconscious character of the truest eloquence.

"No Epistle," Alf. proceeds, "raises in us a higher estimate of the varied and wonderful gifts with which God was pleased to endow the man whom he selected for the Apostle of the Gentile world, or shows us how large a portion of the Spirit, who worketh in each man severally as He will, was given to him for our edification. The depths of the spiritual, the moral, the intellectual, physical world are open to him. He summons to his aid the analogies of nature. He enters minutely into the varieties of human infirmity and prejudice. He draws warning from the history of the chosen people; example from the Isthmian foot-race. He refers an apparently trifling question of costume to the first great proprieties and relations of Creation and Redemption. He praises, reproves, exhorts, and teaches. [He is tender, sarcastic, ironical]. Where he strikes, he heals. His large heart holding all, when he has grieved any, he grieves likewise; where it is in his power to give joy, he first overflows with joy himself. We may form some idea from this Epistle—better perhaps than from any one other, because this embraces the widest range of topics,—what marvellous power such a man must have had to persuade, to rebuke, to attract and fasten the affections of men."

§ V. CONTENTS.

The main thought of this Epistle is to be seen in the object aimed at (§ 3); its organic unfolding in the General Introduction in the development we have given of the history of the Church (§ 2).

The entire contents of the Epistle revolve round the one purpose of leading the Corinthian Church to realize its true idea, and to set aside all those faults and defects in knowledge and practice which obstructed its proper growth.

I. To this end, after the benediction connected with the address, the Apostle first alludes to the good beginning which the Corinthians had, on the whole, made in a sound church life, thankfully acknowledging the divine grace which had been vouchsafed to them in this respect, and their spiritual good estate as established therein. To this he adds the hope, grounded upon the truth of God, that they would continue steadfast unto the end (vv. 4–9).

II. From this he turns to reprove their defects and discords of which he had been informed, first, by word of mouth from members of the Church, and then by letters of inquiry sent to him touching these things.

A. These defects were, first, a lack of sound Christian community of feeling.

1. As it respects the position of Church members towards Christ and his organs (i. 11, ff.–iv.). He begins with rebuking the party spirit which was manifested towards himself, who had given no occasion for it, and towards Apollos; mainly in so far as this grew out of an inordinate estimate of human wisdom, learning and eloquence, an estimate which was wholly inconsistent with the plan of salvation, with the character of those called to participate in it, and with the style of that preaching which was to lay the foundation of the Christian life. (i. 17–ii. 5.). This preaching, however, he maintains, involved a high divine wisdom, which remained a closed mystery only to such as were not spiritual. (ii. 6 ff.). This declaration he then applies to the Corinthian converts as being not yet spiritual (iii. 1 ff.) and leads them to a right estimate of those who were revered as party leaders, and of their doings (5 ff.), warning them at the same time against all destructive violations of the Church, which was the temple of God. (18 ff.). From this he proceeds to instruct them in regard to the lofty claims of Christians to the several means and instruments of salvation (21 ff.) and exhibits to them the proper standard for measuring the worth of Christ's servants, a worth which was to be manifest in due time, and the manifestation of which therefore was to be waited for in suspense of judgment (iv. 1 ff.). After he had thus set before them the contrast between their imagined self-sufficiency, and the actual condition of the Apostles (6 ff.) he passes from the severe into a paternal tone, points out the difference between a mere teacher and a spiritual father, and rebukes their arrogance towards the latter, which seemed to proceed from the assumption that he was unable to punish (iv.). With this he proceeds to notice a further defect in Christian community of feeling.

2. As it respects the discipline of unworthy and corrupt Church members (v.).

He here insists upon the excommunication of a member who had disgraced the Church by gross immorality, and the toleration of whom hitherto was a just cause for deepest shame. In this connection he corrects a misunderstanding of what he had said in a former letter in regard to intercourse with immoral persons.

3. As it respects the demeanor of Church members in their civil relations toward each other (vi. 1 ff.).

He rebukes the practice of Christians going to law with each other before heathen tribunals, especially when they were in the wrong, since unrighteousness belongs to the sins which exclude from God's kingdom, and from which therefore they as Christians had been purified.

4. As it respects a becoming Christian deportment in the sexual relations as opposed to heathenish fornication (vi. 12 ff.).

That this practice was by no means one morally indifferent, is shown from the relation of the body to Christ as the head of the Church, from its character as a dwelling-place of the Holy Spirit, and from the price paid for its ransom.

5. As it respects their views of marriage (the foundation of all social life), and the conduct of the several parties in this relation (vii.).

One inquiry in the letter of the Church had touched upon the relations of the marriage and the celibate state. Marriage and the bed undefiled he advised as a safeguard against fornication and as a relief to incontinence. Otherwise, to remain single were a noble thing (ver. 1 ff.). But the dissolution of existing marriage relations is discountenanced except in cases where the unbelieving party insisted upon it (ver. 10 ff.). The general rule laid down is for a person to abide in the condition wherein he is called (ver. 17 ff.). But the unmarried are advised to remain as they are, both on account of the existing distress which demanded an entire freedom of the spirit in regard to all possession and enjoyments, and for the sake of a more entire devotion to the Lord and His will. Nevertheless, the contracting of marriage is not condemned as sinful, and in some cases is approved (ver. 25 ff.).

6. As it regards the conduct of the strong and liberal-minded towards the weak in things indifferent; that is to say, a defect in self-denying love (viii.–x.).

The discussion here, which was called forth by an inquiry about the eating of meat offered unto idols, proceeds on the assumption, that mere knowledge without love, so far from furthering the life of the Church, only begets a corrupting pride (viii. 1 ff.). He then gives them to understand that an insight into the nothingness of gods, so called, was not so general as to divest all persons of a conscious relation to the idols in the eating of the meat offered to them. Hence to lead such persons to eat of this meat by the exercise of a liberty conformed to such an insight, when the mere eating was of no moral worth before God, was in fact a betrayal into sin; and so a beguiling to perdition. And this was entirely contrary to the love of Christ, who had made the greatest sacrifice in their behalf (ver. 5 ff.). Here the Apostle shows them, by his own example, that the surrender of an acknowledged right for the sake of furthering the cause of Christ was the proper boast of the Christian, and the condition of obtaining an indestructible crown (ix.). He then warns them against all false confidence, in supposing those once received into the communion of God's people, and into a participation of the means of grace, could ever fail, while at the same time he points them comfortingly to the faithfulness of God in keeping them from temptation (x. 1 ff.); dissuades them from participating at idol altar-feasts, as inconsistent with a participation in Christian solemnities (ver. 14 ff.) and finally exhorts them to follow the rule of love, and do what was for the glory of God. (ver. 25 ff.).

7. As it respects their deportment at the assemblies of the Church.

- a. Of women in the matter of dress. He pronounces the covering of their head in public as a custom that was in accordance with nature and suited to the position ordained of God for woman, while that of being uncovered was more suited to the man (xi. 1-16.).
- b. Of the rich towards the poor in the observance of the Lord's Supper. He reproves the custom of the two classes separating at the love feasts, as contrary to the nature of the institution, and calculated to draw down upon it the judgment of God, because of the unworthy communion it occasioned (ver. 17 ff.).
- c. Of the Church generally, and of those endowed with spiritual gifts in their improper estimate and use of these gifts (xii. to xiv.).
 - a In respect to these, he exhibits, first, their foundation and object and hence their unity in manifoldness, as designed for mutual helpfulness, suitably to the organic character of the Church (xii.).
 - β He next shows the measure of their worth and the rule of their use, viz.: Love which is described according to its qualities, and recommended and praised above all transient gifts, because of its eternal duration.
 - γ Finally, he compares the gifts of prophecy and of speaking with tongues in respect to their worth, as measured by their fitness to edify the Church; and sets forth the rules that are to regulate their use in accordance with their design and with what is seemly for the Church of God. (xiv.).

To these defects in true Christian community of feeling, there is added, still.

B. A defect in doctrinal knowledge and of steadfastness in respect to the article of the resurrection of the dead (xv.).

On this point the Apostle teaches them, 1. How the possibility of this fact is essentially presupposed in the resurrection of Christ, that well attested event on which the faith and hope of Christians rest (vv. 1-19); 2. What position it occupies in the carrying out of God's plan of salvation, (ver. 20 ff.); 3. What practical consequences its denial involves; 4. How the objections against it arising from its mode, and from the nature of the resurrection body, are groundless and irrational, (ver. 35 ff.); and 5. How it will be with those who survive at the moment of Christ's appearing (ver. 51 ff.).

III. The concluding portion of the Epistle (xvi.) is made up of instructions in regard to the collection for the Christians at Jerusalem; of intimations in regard to his approaching visit; and hints respecting the treatment they were to give his friends and helpers; and, finally, of greetings and parting wishes accompanied with earnest exhortation.

Obs. The survey above given of the contents of this Epistle finds its proper supplement in the attempt made in Introd. § 2. to refer back all its faults to the lingering carnality of the Corinthian Church. These are but the various points of view from which to consider and expound it.

How nearly the contents of this Apostolic letter touch our Christendom, and what practical bearing it has for us is well expressed by old HEDINGER in the following powerful language, which we may well consider (comp.) STABKE, EINL. § 12 "A Christianity decayed in all the duties of life and its several relations, may see itself distinctly mirrored in this Epistle, and may perceive how, with the Corinthians, all their mistakes and idle fancies about the nature of true blessedness have not yet entirely died out. How sadly is the Church of the saints still tormented with rationalizing spirits, and with falsely-famous worldly-wise ones, who intrude upon others that are truly spiritual their own self-coined conceits and rules! To what extent are multitudes still corrupted from the simplicity of the faith! How boldly do people judge of spiritual things according to the crooked standards of a carnal or political wisdom! How conceited and puffed up are many pastors and teachers through their vain learning! How merciless toward the weak! How tender in rebuking distinguished sinners! How common has fornication become! How grossly and wickedly do many conduct themselves both in married and single life! How careless are people about winning their neighbor's regard! How often is the Lord's Supper dishonored and disgraced, as if it were a common meal, by the unbelieving, the hypocritical, and the godless! And such, forsooth, will still pretend to be Christians! God grant that by the frequent perusal of this Epistle, yea, of the entire Scriptures, they may reform betimes! Furthermore, we may learn from this Epistle: 1. In Paul, his love and patience as evinced towards the faults of the Corinthians; his wisdom and foresight in convicting and reproving; his zeal against open offenders; his care that a great evil might be warded off in season. 2. But in the Corinthians, (a) How a good beginning may not hold out, and how easily persons may be turned from the simplicity which is in Christ, if they do not keep a wakeful watch over themselves; (b) What damage is done, if a person yields too much to his own reason, or relies on his secular wisdom, or allows himself to be ensnared by the artful words of carnal learning. 3. What a blessing it is to have a faithful teacher. 4. How necessary and useful church discipline is. 5. How difficult it is steadfastly to refrain from sins to which a person has been accustomed, and which he formerly considered not sinful. 6. How high an estimate should be put upon every believer, and what care should be taken not to offend the weak. 7. That Satan regards nothing as too sacred to be turned by him to the advantage of his kingdom and to the injury of Christ's Church, as (e. g.) spiritual gifts. 8. How dangerous it is to err in fundamental truths and how necessary to instruct others concerning them."

COMMENTARY.

THE FIRST EPISTLE TO THE CORINTHIANS.

FIRST DIVISION.

THE GREETING; THANKS AND HOPE IN REFERENCE TO THEIR CHRISTIAN STATE IN GENERAL.

I. Greeting.

CHAPTER I. 1-3.

1 PAUL, called¹ to be an apostle [a chosen apostle] of Jesus Christ through the will
2 of God, and Sosthenes our [the] brother, Unto the church of God which is at Corinth,² to them that are sanctified in Christ Jesus, called to be [chosen] saints, with all that in every place [om. in every place] call upon the name of Jesus Christ 3 our Lord, [in every place³] both theirs and ours: Grace be unto you, and peace, from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ.

² Ver. 2.—[Our author inserts the clause "which is at Corinth" after "Christ Jesus," an unnatural order, authorized by B. D. E. F. G. It, and which he vindicates on the ground that it were more natural to suppose that the order of the Received Text was a supposed improvement by transcribers, than that the clause in question should have been placed by design or error in those manuscripts after "sanctified in Christ Jesus." The valuable Cod. Sin., however, agrees with the Received Text, and we adhere to this against the decision of Alford, Stanley or others.]

³ [We here conform to the unquestioned order of the Greek text, which alone yields the true meaning.—See below.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

VERS. 1-3. These opening verses, according to ancient custom, combine to present in advance the address and greeting; that is, the designation of the parties concerned in their mutual relations, and likewise the benediction.

VER. 1. PAUL.—Concerning his person and history, his importance to the Church and his labors, consult the general introduction to these Epistles [also Herzog's Real. Ency. art. Paul. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, do. Kitto's Bible Ency. do. Besser, "Paul the Apostle." Eadie, "Paul the Preacher." Howson, "Hulsean Lectures," for 1862. A. Monod, "Five Discourses on St. Paul." Ld. Lyttleton, "On the Conversion of St. Paul." Neander, "Planting and Training," etc.]

A chosen Apostle of Jesus Christ, by the will of God.—The ordinary rendering, "called to be an Apostle," does not give sufficient prominence to the leading thought here, which is shown by the order of the words to lie in 'Apostle.' The sense is,—an Apostle by virtue of his calling; and this calling was that given him by Christ (Acts ix. 22-26), having for its deeper ground the will of God (comp. Gal. i. 15 ff.). Hence, neither of these designations is superfluous. The fact of "being called" is insisted on in contrariety to everything like arbitrary assumption of honor, or unwarrantable intrusion into office. "Καλεῖν: to call, like קָלָה is used to denote the way in which God specially appoints men to any particular end." NEANDER. And this was a matter which, in view of the parties at Corinth who refused to acknowledge Paul's apostleship, and sought to put him below the twelve, directly called by Christ when on earth, it was in point to bring prominently forward; and no less important was it to show that this calling came through (διὰ) the Supreme Will. And there was the greater necessity for this, inasmuch as the office of which he claimed to be the bearer was highest in the divine economy. It was that of an ambassador of Jesus Christ, whose business it was to represent his Master, whose words and acts were to be regarded as Christ's words and acts, the honoring or contemning of whom was to be looked upon as the honoring or contemning of Christ, who, as Christ's commissioner, appointed to organize and govern the Church throughout the world, wielded an all-embracing power, and exercised a far-reaching authority, and who agreeably with such an appointment and such plenitude of authority was endowed with a wealth of spiritual gifts, such as is ordinarily distributed among several persons in a less degree.*

And Sosthenes the brother.—Although conscious of his high and well established position, he nevertheless does not present himself before the Church alone; but he takes into company one who officially stood far below him. Him, however, he designates as an equal—as a brother both to himself and the Church, in the unity of Christian faith and hope. "The disposition on the part of Paul to send out his Epistles in the name of one or more of the brethren happening to be with him (Gal. i. 2), may be taken either to imply that the persons mentioned had aided in the upbuilding of the churches concerned, or as an expression of their perfect agreement with what he wrote. It certainly is, at any rate, a testimony to that fellowship in the Spirit, which Paul so often inculcated, and which he was ever diligent both to cultivate in himself and to inculcate upon his readers." BURGER. Whether this Sosthenes was the ruler of the synagogue mentioned in Acts xviii. 17,—supposing him to be then already inclined to the cause of Christ, in case it was by the Jews that he was beaten, or that he was violently opposed to this cause, in case he was beaten by Greeks, (the readings which indicate the one or the other are neither of them original),—cannot be accurately ascertained. In any case, he must have been known and esteemed in the Church, so that it was not without its influence with them that he expressed his assent to the contents of the letter, and represented them before Paul. That he must have written the letter himself under Paul's dictation, as some suppose (Billroth, Hodge) (comp. xvi. 21), does not necessarily follow from this connection. Perhaps we might infer that he had been an official assistant of Paul; but even this is not expressly denoted by the term 'brother.'

VER. 2. Names and characterizes the party written to.—Unto the Church of God.—"The congregation," or, 'the Church of God' is the Old Testament designation of Israel as a divinely gathered people. It means a people assembled before God and for God. The derivation of the word ecclesia points out the mode of its gathering. It was by means of a 'calling,'—a spiritual instrumentality. Hence its members are designated as "the called." In this a personal independence is presupposed. Salvation is offered, not enforced, and it is shared only by those who voluntarily accept and enter into it. Τῷ θεῷ: of God—Gen. of possession. The Corinthian Church is hereby emphatically declared to belong not to any human leader, but to God alone. The Church is His.—Which is at Corinth [The local designation of the Church. Geographical divisions are in the Church the only ones recognized in the New Testament, and the Church in one place or city is always spoken of as a unit. Though consisting of one or more distinct congregations, it was regarded as an organic whole under one general superintendency. It was otherwise when a province was in view, e. g., the churches of Asia.—"Church at Corinth" that wicked city! what a joyful and striking paradox." Bengel.]—to them that are sanctified in Christ Jesus.—By this the Church of God is distinctly characterized in its members as Christian. It is composed of persons who are sanctified, i. e., separated from the mass of sinful humanity, the world, and devoted to the exclusive service of the true God [and whose guilt has been expiated by an atonement. Both ideas, those of consecration and expiation, are included in the word αἱγιαίνω: to sanctify]. This is not to be understood in a simply legal or theocratic sense (as in the case of the Jews, who were termed a holy nation because of their descent from Abraham and their divine government); nor yet in a purely objective sense, as implying the mere imputation of holiness; but in a real sense, as being the result of the operation of the Holy Ghost (comp. vi. 11; 1 Pet. i. 2). Yet this inward appropriation of salvation is not on this account to be considered as complete, but only as begun in its informing principle, and as existing in a germ which may be developed in various degrees.

In Christ Jesus.—These words denote the ground or soil whereon those who are sanctified stand, and from which they derive the power of sanctification. It is Jesus Christ, into whose fellowship they have entered by faith and baptism (comp. Gal. iii. 26 ff.; Rom. vi. 3), [and who is the only centre and bond of union for the Church]—called or chosen saints. This implies that they are consecrated to God and numbered among His peculiar people by virtue of a divine call, ["effectual call as distinguished from a merely external invitation." HODGE] (comp. Rom. x. 14; ix. 24, etc.); hence, that they, as well as the Apostle on his part (ver. 1), were also indebted for their high position to the Divine Will, which was made known to them in their call through the Gospel (Rom. x. 14; 2 Thess. ii. 14). "Paul here may have reminded them of their 'calling' as something which was alike for all, having in view already the parties whom he was soon to rebuke for giving undue prominence to the human instrumentality, and for insisting upon subjective diversities in a schismatic way." NEANDER. ["It is not to be inferred from this that the Corinthian professors were all true believers, or that these terms express

[* On the nature and extent of the apostolic office, consult articles under the word "Apostle," in Kitt's Enc., 2d ed.; Smith's Bib. Dict.; Herzog's Real. Enc.; also, Owen's Works, vol. iv. p. 437-446; Schaaf, Hist. of Ap. Ch., Book iii. chap. 2; Conybeare and Howson, Life of St. Paul, ch. xiii.; Litton, The Church of Christ, Book ii., Part ii. ch. 1.]

With all that call upon the name of our Lord Jesus Christ in every place.—There is a difference of opinion as to the connection of these words. They might be joined to those just preceding, e. g., 'who are called holy, as are all who, etc.' So taken, they would serve to remind the Corinthian converts of their fellowship with Christians in all places. So Bengel. Or they may be construed as enlarging the circle of those whom Paul intends to address. The former construction would not be unsuitable, since it would furnish a fit antidote to the narrow-minded tendency to division which showed itself in the church. But the latter is favored by the similar passage in 2 Cor. i. 1, which at the same time more exactly defines and explains the general statement we have here: 'in every place.' Then we should have immediately joined to this, as belonging to it, the closing words—both theirs and ours.—To connect these [as the E. V. does] with "our Lord," g. d. "their Lord and ours," is hardly admissible from the order of the Greek text, and is also unsuitable, because in that case the word "our" as connected with "Lord" would be understood not simply of Paul or Sosthenes, but also of the recipients of the letter included with them as well. (Comp. 2 Cor. xiii. 18).—Referred to the daughter churches of Corinth in Achaia, as suggested by 2 Cor. i. 1, these words yield the sense: "in every place which belongs as well to them—the Corinthians as the mother church—as also to us, the Apostle and his companions." So construed, the Apostle will here be understood as, on the one hand, conceding to them the right of the mother church, and impressing upon them the duty of taking a deeper interest in the daughter churches, and, on the other hand, as indicating his interest in these, and so winning them also to the reception of his doctrine and exhortation. [But is it not more natural to refer "theirs" to "those who call upon, etc.," and to include under "ours" both the parties writing and the parties written to? So Alford. Another interpretation has been proposed. "The Epistle is addressed to all Christians in Corinth and Achaia, wherever they might be. Every place is at once theirs and ours—their place of abode and my place of labor." See Hodge. "These words form a weighty and precious addition—made here doubtless to show the Corinthians that membership of God's Holy Catholic Church consisted not in being planted or presided over by Paul or Apollos or Cephas (or their successors), but in calling on the name of our Lord Jesus Christ." Alf.].

Who call upon the name, etc.—ἐπικαλεῖσθαι τὸ ὄνομα. By this is denoted, not the being called by the name of the Lord, as if the Greek verb were in the Passive, but, as every where in the Old and New Testament, the calling upon the name of the Lord, especially the invocation of His help as Lord. It is, accordingly, an act of divine worship, [and in a more extended sense, denotes a life of reverence towards God, and of habitual religious faith]. The term Lord, answering to the Hebrew יהוה or Christ, indicates His plenipotence and truth, which is more fully set forth in Matth. xi. 27; xxviii. 18; John xviii. 2; and which rests partly upon His original sonship and His mediatorial agency in the creation (viii. 6; Col. i. 16 ff.; Heb. i. 2 ff.), and partly upon His redemptive office (vii. 22 ff.; Acts xx. 28; Tit. ii. 14).—The name indicates the being as revealed and known; hence the invocation presupposes faith—faith, preaching—and preaching, the word of God (Rom. x. 14 ff.). Those who called upon the name of Christ formed a contrast with those who blasphemed this name among the Jews. (Luke xxiii. 39; 1 Tim. i. 13; Acts xxvi. 9; comp. chap. xxii. 16). This same thought lies at the foundation even in places where instead of a name we have a mere description. The name of Jesus Christ expresses what He is, His entire personality together with His office and work. [On the import of names, especially as belonging to Deity: see Bush, Com. Ex. iii. 13; Hengst. Com. Ps. viii. 2; ix. 12; Whately, Serm. Matth. i. 23].

V. 3. The benediction, which elsewhere among the Greeks, and twice also in the New Testament (Jas. i. 1; Acts xv. 23) is woven with the address into one sentence, is here peculiarly extended.—Grace and peace constitute the sum total of Gospel blessings, the former being the ground and source of the latter. Χάρις properly denotes that which begets joy, viz. favor, grace, kindly feeling. It may be regarded either as a quiescent trait, the mere outshining of an inward goodness or amiability; or as an energy put in active exercise for the welfare of others. Among the Greeks the word was used also in connections which we should deem immoral. But in the language of revelation it denotes that supreme love and self-devotion which was manifested in its most perfect form by the Son of God. It is what we, in respect of the unworthiness of the object, denominate grace, by which is meant sometimes the mere feeling of kindness in the heart, and sometimes the beneficent act which is its result. Here, indeed, it means the peace of forgiveness and reconciliation, corresponding to the Hebrew שָׁלוֹם which includes the entire welfare of the individual both spiritual and physical, and the root of which is inward peace, the repose of the spirit in the sweet consciousness of being reconciled to God, and in the blessed assurance that we have God for our friend and have to expect from Him good alone. (Comp. Rom. viii. 1, 31-39). ["The wish of peace has a peculiar bearing here in view of the dissensions at Corinth." Olz.].

From God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ.—That this clause is not to be translated "from God the Father of us, and of the Lord Jesus Christ," is clear from Gal. i. 8; not to say any thing of the impropriety of thus putting Jesus Christ in a subordinate position.—The co-ordination of Jesus with the Father is to be explained on the ground that the office of mediating grace and peace rests upon His divine sonship, and so upon His equality with God.—This is a truth already indicated in the appellation "Lord," and which is inferred from viii. 6, and from the whole Pauline system of doctrine. ["Here it is to be remarked, that God is called our Father and Christ our Lord. God, as God, has not only created us, but renewed and adopted us. God in Christ has redeemed us. He is our owner and sovereign, to whom our allegiance is immediately due; who reigns in us, and rules over us, defending us from all our enemies. This is the peculiar form which piety assumes under the Gospel. All Christians regard God as their Father and Christ as their Lord." Hodge].

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. From the fact that God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ are exhibited to us as the common source or sum total of all the blessings of salvation, it is to be seen that the Apostle, even while subordinating Christ to God (iii. 23; xi. 8; xv. 28), yet maintains such a mediation through Christ of the Divine grace, and of the blessings flowing from it, as presupposes in Christ the Mediator a divine nature. How the two things, subordination and equality of substance, agree, is a problem for the science of Christology. This is the mystery of love, which in the Father flows out in the fulness of the divine perfections; which in the Son keeps itself evermore as consciously dependent and recipient, and, accordingly, both thinks, purposes and does every thing with sole reference to the Father.

2. The equality of Christ with God is also indicated by the calling upon the name of the Lord Jesus Christ. Both this invocation and that derivation of all the blessings of salvation from the Father and from the Lord Jesus Christ conjointly, can be made consistent with the Old Testament teaching respecting God, only on the supposition of the essential divinity of Jesus Christ and His true equality with the Father.

1. The consciousness of being called to the ministry through the will of God (ver. 1) is: 1. the ground of our confidence in appearing before a Christian congregation to instruct, exhort, reprove and comfort (comp. 2 Cor. iii. 4 ff.); 2. the spring of humble devotion to the service of the Lord, devoid of all arbitrary and self-willed activity, and in every thing observant of the Master's eye, and subject to His word; [3. an example for all engaged in any lawful vocation. The consciousness of being called to our work in the providence of God is necessary for the sanctification of our labors, by imparting to them a noble aim, a right impulse, and a true courage to do and endure valiantly for God, our true Master, in all things appointed unto us. After Robertson].

2. The main features of a true church (ver. 2) are, 1. that it is an assemblage before and for God; 2. that it consists of such as are consecrated to God in Jesus Christ; 3. that it is thus consecrated through the mighty creative will of God; 4. that its members are such as call upon the name of the Lord Jesus Christ; [5. that these things may exist in connection with many glaring faults in true professing believers, and with many false professions of faith, which yet do not necessarily vitiate the claim to be called a true church].

3. The proper fellowship between the office and the church rests, 1. in that the former works out for the latter the benefits of salvation which come from God and Jesus Christ in the way of blessing; 2. in that the latter receives these benefits from the ministration of blessing with earnest and hearty desires.

4. VRS. 2, 8: BESSER:—How must the Apostolic greeting shame many congregations who assemble to hear this Epistle read, and yet come there with discordant sentiments and divided tongues! "The name ἐκκλησία; church," says Chrysostom, "is a name not of separation, but of union and harmony."

[5. VER. 2. BENGE:—The consideration of the church universal frees the mind from party bias, and sways it to obedience.]

II. Gratitude and hope in respect to their Christian state in general.

CHAPTER I. 4-9.

4 I thank my God always on your behalf, for the grace of God which is [was'] given
5 you by [in: ἐν] Jesus Christ; That in every thing ye are [were] enriched by [in] him,
6 in all utterance, and in all knowledge; Even as the testimony of Christ was confirmed
7 in you: So that ye come behind in no gift; waiting for the coming of our Lord Jesus
8 Christ: Who shall also confirm you unto the end, that ye may be blameless in the day 9 of our Lord Jesus Christ. God is faithful, by [through] whom ye were called unto the fellowship of his Son Jesus Christ our Lord.

[Ver. 4. δοθείς was given, viz., at the time of conversion].

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

This opening, in which the Apostle expresses his thanks to God for the abundance of spiritual gifts possessed by the Corinthian Church, and his hope in their steadfastness and further prosperity in all good, should by no means be regarded as a simple rhetorical captatio benevolentiae, as a mere bit of flattery designed to win his readers, so that they might the better accept his subsequent exhortations and rebukes, and keep themselves well disposed in spite of the unpleasant things he had to say, and submit to be the more readily guided to the ends he had in view. What Paul here says is preëminently the truth. It comes from his heart. He does feel a sincere joy that so much good exists in the church and that it affords such ground of hope for the future. It is a conviction which proceeds from his fatherly disposition (comp. iv. 15). Nor are we to regard it as any self-deception or fond fancy of his. For however great may have been the faults of individuals, the work of Divine grace had nevertheless been begun in all the plenitude of spiritual gifts, and his confidence in the continued operation of the Lord confirming their hearts, and in the faithfulness of God towards them, was verily well grounded. Both these things are presupposed in his exhortation and rebuke. First, objectively: in so far as the expectation of any good results from his efforts rested only upon the existence of some good already in the church and upon God's faithfulness and coöperation. Again, subjectively: in so far as the acknowledgment of previous successes and the hope of yet greater ones, generally inspire confidence and render persons favorably disposed to receive exhortation and rebuke as given kindly and intelligently, and infuse into them courage to undertake the work of reform; and this courage is of the right kind since it refers all good back to God as the source. And in this style of address there is something more than cool human calculation. It is acting in perfect conformity with the true laws of the mind, and above all with the law of that love "which believeth all things and hopeth all things," but which nevertheless secures the same results that worldly prudence is wont to calculate for in a selfish way. "The Corinthian Church was well trained and instructed and established in the faith; but it was not yet entirely simple-minded and pure in heart; there was much worldly vanity and party spirit still among them. So in every church there is to be found a mixture of what is praiseworthy and blameworthy. The praise of the better class piques even the worse, and is a means of inciting them to merit that praise, too. And the reproof of the bad ought to affect the better class likewise, awakening in them regrets that there are such persons by their side and in their communion as deserve reproof, and it should prompt them to remove the evil. Every church is one organic whole, by reason of which the several members exert an influence upon each other and share in that which others have and are." Heubner, p. 213. "This introduction, breathing blessing and praise, gratitude and confidence, exhibits the spiritual shepherd in apostolic simplicity and truth. All goodness in the church he denominates a work of grace, and he sets in prospect the consummation of the salvation begun as only grace likewise, and he does it in a manner at once humbling and animating. He looks at the church in its germ, in the strength of its better elements which may be rendered a source of blessing to others, and so, wisely preparing the way, he passes over from the bright to the darker side." Oslander.

VER. 4. I thank.—An expression of acknowledgment and joy towards God as the Author of all good.—My God.—As in Rom. i. 8 and elsewhere,—of course not in an exclusive sense, but as an avowal of his own personal communion with God and direct interest in Him; a personal attestation of his religious position, without any sinister design, but yet in a manner calculated to elicit respect and confidence in what he is about to say.—Always.—This cannot mean that he was always engaged in audible thanksgiving, or that this feeling of gratitude was also definitely present in his consciousness; but only that he bore this church perpetually upon his heart with grateful emotions to God—a meaning which the word in the Greek also carries.—On your behalf for the grace of God.—The personal object for whom and the reason on account of which the thanks were given. [χάρις: grace, the disposition in God, for χαρίσματα: the blessings flowing from it—"a metonymy which has passed so completely into our common parlance, as to be almost lost sight of as such."—Alf. Wordsworth, however, distinguishes here, χάρισμα is a special gift to be used for general edification. χάρις is grace generally for personal sanctification. Tongues, miracles, healing are χαρίσματα. χάρις is given in order that χαρίσματα may be rightly used."].—Which was given you in Jesus Christ.—Comp. also ver. 2.—Christ is here regarded, in a sort, as the place, where the grace of God is manifested (comp. 2 Cor. v. 19) so that he who enters there becomes partaker of it. But this entrance is faith, by which the believer is in Christ and comes into vital communion with Him.

VER. 5. Extends the thought and shows wherein the manifested grace consists.—That ye were enriched in him—i. e., as being in Christ and having constant communion with Him; and this enriching is the work of God's grace.—In every thing.—A general statement, which is at once more particularly defined and limited.—In all doctrine.—Thus ought λόγος to be translated with Luther [in which Calvin, Alf., de Wette, Billroth, Meyer concur, understanding by it: doctrine preached to the Corinthians], and not: "utterance," as though the reference were to powers of eloquence or the gift of tongues [so Bengel, Stanley and Wordsworth; "and which interpretation," Hodge says, "gives good sense and is the one generally adopted." Meyer: "All manner of external endowments for speaking;" excluding however any allusion to gift of tongues, as inconsistent with the subordinate value attached to this in chap. xiv. This view is sustained by xii. 8; 2 Cor. viii. 7; xi. 6. In this case γνῶσις; knowledge, would denote the inward endowment. The order of the words appears to support Kling's view. "Truth preached, (i. e.) 'doctrine,' must precede 'truth apprehended,' i. e. 'knowledge.'" But the analogous passages in the two Epistles go to prove Meyer's view and the correctness of the English version also].—In all knowledge.—By this he means: the general acceptance of the doctrines that had been communicated to them on every side, and a comprehensive insight into their truth. This statement does not conflict with the fact of peculiar defects in individuals.

VER. 6. Further confirms and illustrates the foregoing. Inasmuch as—καὶ ὅτι: [not correlation: "according as," but as in appended clauses denoting explanation, quoniam, si quidem, since. Winer's Gr. LIII. 8].—The testimony of Christ.—Christ may here be taken either as the subject, the one testifying, or as the object, the one testified of. The one does not exclude the other. In the former case the phrase would mean, the proclamation of the Divine plan of salvation in all its parts (its grounds, aims and relations; its beginning, mediation, execution and consummation), obtained by a direct insight into the heart of God, into His inmost thought and purpose (comp. Jn. i. 18; vi. 46). But in this testimony of Christ, which sounded forth from the Apostles also, and so included their preaching, there is involved also the other idea, Christ's own personal testimony, and the testimony of His Apostles likewise, to His divine Sonship and His mediatorial office. It makes little difference whether we construe it in the one way or the other. ["The former is the higher and therefore the better sense. It is good to contemplate the Gospel as that system of truth which the Eternal Logos or Revealer has made known." HODGE. Yet, it must be said, usage favors the latter acceptance. "The testimony of Christ" is the witness borne concerning Christ by His Apostles of which the New Testament is the record, and in this instance by Paul. So Calvin, Alf., Stan., Meyer]. "That the word μαρτυρίαν, testimony, and not διδασκαλία, instruction, is here chosen, does not rest upon a simple Hebraism, but is well explained on the ground that the gospel has not to do first and primarily with a system of ideas, but with an announcement of facts, the power of which a person must experience in himself." NEANDER. The same expression occurs in 2 Tim. i. 18.—was confirmed in you.—Others render: 'was established among you' (Mark xvi. 20; Rom. xv. 8; Heb. ii. 4), whether it be by signs and miracles or by extraordinary operations of the Gospel.—Rückert: 'by its effects on you.' But this neither suits the connection with what precedes, nor what is afterwards (ver. 7) mentioned as the result of it. The former indicates that the testimony of Christ was confirmed in their hearts, inwardly rooted there. And this happens partly through a comprehensive knowledge, so that thus the words "in all knowledge" would be further illustrated, and partly as its presupposed condition, inasmuch as it is effected by faith, which is the root of all knowledge, and is to be regarded as a becoming fixed and remaining steadfast in the truth. Respecting their steadfastness in this respect see xvi. 1; 2 Cor. i. 24.

VER. 7. The consequence.—So that ye come behind in no gift.—The deep and fixed rooting of the gospel in the soul results in a rich unfolding of spiritual life, of which he now proceeds to speak. By "gift" we are to understand a result of the operation of divine grace. Rom. v. 16 expresses by it the work of grace as a whole. Here we are to understand it of the particular operations by which the members of the Church were variously qualified to labor for the edification of the body of Christ, either by instruction, or exhortation, or rule, or service, inasmuch as the native talents of individuals requisite for such labors are awakened and sanctified by divine grace (comp. xii.). When such talents fall within the sphere of moral effort, and are exercised in furthering the welfare of the Church and in glorifying God, they acquire an ethical character, and the gifts appear as Christian virtues. That such were the gifts alluded to seems to be intimated in what follows.—Waiting for the revelation of our Lord Jesus Christ.—This constant expectation of our Lord's second coming (Rom. viii. 19 etc.), when He shall be revealed in his glory unto all (Col. iii. 4), is one of the characteristic features of primitive Christianity (comp. Phil. iii. 20; 1 Thess. i. 10; Tit. ii. 13; 2 Tim. iv. 8). Hence the clause has been taken as a simple paraphrase of the word: Christians. But this is by no means allowable here.—The connection of this participial clause with the preceding one has been variously interpreted. Luther somewhat loosely: "And are waiting," "only waiting" in the sense, that they were all ready; in which sense we might translate it: "And can wait" or: "can comfortably wait;" But this would conflict with the entire contents of the Epistle. To take it as ironical, (Mosheim) in the way of a slant at their self-sufficiency, would be inconsistent with the friendly winning style of the introduction. And no less so, to suppose that he intended to alarm, by the suggestion of a coming judgment (Chrysostom), or to rebuke the sceptics of whom mention is made in chap. xv. More correct it would be, undoubtedly, to adopt the closer connection and translate: "while ye are waiting," or, "ye who are expecting," etc. The train of thought is this, that they, in this state of waiting, did not cease to make advances in every Christian qualification. So considered, the fact of "not coming behind" obtains the sense of: not falling short from any lack of earnest moral endeavor. There was a self-cultivation on the part of the spiritually quickened in consequence of their establishment in the faith (ver. 6). [But it must be added also that in the very mention of their waiting attitude, a commendation is intended. For this very "waiting," as Alford well says, was "the greatest proof of maturity and richness of the spiritual life; implying the coexistence and coöperation of faith, whereby they believed the promise of Christ—hope, whereby they looked on to its fulfilment, and love, whereby that anticipation was lit up with earnest desire." But it may be asked, Were the Corinthians looking for Christ's second advent as an event likely to occur in their day, and which some of them might expect to witness? This question must be answered in the affirmative. As Trench has well remarked, "It is a necessary element of the doctrine concerning the second coming of Christ, that it should be possible at any time." And all the hints given us throughout the Epistles (comp. 1 Thess. iv. 13—v. 10; Phil. iii. 20; Tit. ii. 13; 2 Tim. iv. 8) show that the hope of seeing Christ appear, while yet in the flesh, was an influential and inspiring sentiment, pervading the whole early Church. It was a powerful motive to watchfulness and patient endurance. And that it should so operate was one design of the secrecy which veiled it. "Latet ultimus dies, ut observetur omnes dies" (Aug.). That such was the case with the Corinthians seems to be intimated in the use of the word expressive of their mental attitude, ἀπεκδεχόμενοι: waiting it out, as persons expecting to see what they are waiting for].*

The earnest endeavor of the Church (or at least its better portion, its kernel) just recognized, leads the Apostle, in spite of all existing defects in individuals, to cherish the hope which he expresses in

VER. 8. Who shall also confirm you.—To whom does the relative "who" refer? Most naturally to Christ, mentioned just before in ver. 7. But in this case it is remarkable that in the next clause instead of saying "in His day," he uses again the whole name and title of Christ. Hence the "who" might be referred back to "God" (ver. 9), whose gracious doings are spoken of in vv. 5 and 6, and to whom the confirmation in the faith is ascribed (2 Cor. i. 21; Rom. xvi. 25). The effect then of the Divine confirmation of the testimony of Christ in them would be regarded as awakening the hope also that God would establish them still further.† The reference however to Christ must still be maintained. The use of the full phrase "in the day of our Lord Jesus Christ," must be regarded only as the adoption of a solemn formula, elsewhere also employed, to designate the time of the second advent (comp. 2 Tim. i. 18). In 2 Thess. iii. 3 we have likewise the work of confirming believers ascribed to Christ. And this is mentioned here in correspondence with what is said of their not coming behind in any gift and of their patient waiting. It involves also what follows.—Unto the end.—i. e., as the connection requires, not the end of the present life of individuals, but the end of the present dispensation, which terminates at the second advent, when the new era (αἰὼν μέλλων) will come in.—"Blameless."—A short constructio pœgnans—εἰς τὸ εἶναι ὑμᾶς: that ye may be, [which is supplied in the E. V. "Compare the expressions διδάσκειν σοφὸν, αὐξάνειν μέγα, to teach a man so as to become wise, to increase him so as to be great; Kühner, § 417, 3. This is called by grammarians a proleptic use of the adjective." Words. See Winer, Gram. Part iii. § lxvi. 3. g. j. By the term 'blameless' we understand such as are liable to no accusation; and this not simply putatively, but, since he is speaking of their condition at the appearing of Christ, in the sense of an actual or perfected holiness, so that the All-seeing Judge Himself will have nothing to lay to their charge (comp. Eph. v. 27). Meyer. "This blamelessness is conditioned upon perseverance in the faith by which our justification is appropriated, and therefore is imputed; nevertheless by virtue of the moral nature and power of faith, as well as by virtue of the sanctification through the Holy Ghost, it is entirely of a moral nature (Rom. vi. 1 ff.; viii. 1 ff.). Hence the person who is ἀνέγκλητος: blameless, appears at the revelation of Christ not indeed as ἀναμάρτητος: sinless, but as a "new creature in Christ" (2 Cor. v. 17) who having been Divinely restored (Eph. ii. 10) and progressively sanctified (1 Thess. v. 23) has worked out his own salvation in the moral power of a new life (Phil. ii. 12). [But here a question arises. Is this promise absolute or conditional? Conybeare and Howson add the gloss, "He will do His part to confirm you." Hammond puts in the qualification, "God will make good His promise if you do not fail yourselves." A. Clark inquires "But can it be said that God will keep what is either not intrusted to Him? or, after being intrusted, is taken away?" But such limitations seem to take from the promise its blessedness and comfort, for if this promise be of any value, it is the fact that it furnishes a guarantee against that greatest of dangers, the fickleness of the human will. It is in view of this danger, so manifest in the Corinthians, that Paul expresses his assurance of their steadfastness as grounded in the confirming grace of God. It were better therefore to take the promise absolutely. "Those to whom God gives the renewing influence of the Spirit, He thereby pledges himself to save; for the 'first fruits of the spirit' are of the nature of a pledge." Hodge.]

VER. 9. Refers the hope expressed in ver. 8 to its deepest ground.—God is faithful.—He will not drop the work He has begun after the fashion of weak inconstant men; but persevering in love He will carry out that which was commenced in love, even unto its goal. (Comp. Phil. i. 6; 1 Thess. v. 24; 2 Thess. iii. 8; Rom. xi. 29).—["Here, on this fidelity of God, and not on the strength of the believers' purpose to persevere, nor on any assumption that the principle of religion in their hearts was indestructible, was the confidence of the Apostle in their steadfastness grounded." Hodge. This faithfulness of God is pledged in three directions: 1. to Himself in the purpose formed; 2. to Christ in the covenant made with Him, Is. liii.; and 3. to believers].—Through whom.—δι' οὗ: a popular expression. We can speak of God as a mediating as well as a principal cause. (Rom. xi. 36). His Providence it is that through a great variety of arrangements and coöperating circumstances mediates the call, viz., the presentation of the Gospel to them, and also its effect in their hearts.—Ye were called unto the fellowship of His Son, &c.—This calling of God is the commencement of His work. Its goal is a participation as a son in the glory of his Lord (Comp. Rom. viii. 21, 23; 2 Thess. ii. 14). The fellowship with Jesus Christ embraces our entire condition, into which we are transferred through the power of the word when heard and received, and through the sacraments, extending from childhood on until we come into the inheritance of the glory which is to be revealed in Him and in us also." Burger.

* Neander believed that in the minds of the Apostles, especially in Paul, a progressive development in Eschatology took place. The second advent at first seemed close at hand and possible in their day, but as they became more enlightened as to the future by the illuminations of the Spirit, it stood at a farther remove. Neander "Plant and Train, of the Christian Church," p. 434.]

† The reasons for referring "Who" to God, ver. 4, are well given by Stanley "1. καὶ βεβαιώσαι: also confirm, evidently refers back to ἐβεβαίωθη: was confirmed, in ver. 4." 2. "In the day of the Lord Jesus Christ," would else be: "in His day." 3. ὁ θεός: God is the general subject of the whole sentence, and therefore repeated in ver. 9. "God is faithful. For the sense comp. Phil. i. 6." To these may be added a 4. from Hodge: "vocation and perseverance are in the work of redemption specially referred to the Father." The same position is taken by Calvin, Alford, Billroth, Olshausen, de Wette, Oelander and others.]

But does not ver. 9 compel us to take God as the subject in ver. 8? [Certainly; one would suppose so]. By no means [!]. The truth of God is a pledge that Christ will confirm us. For it is precisely because we have been called through the unchangeable loving will of the Father to have part in Him, the glorified Son of God, and therefore to be made conformable unto Him that He whose will is ever one with the Father can do no other than confirm us. [Rather far fetched].

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. That Jesus Christ is the living sanctuary, whence all the manifestations of Divine grace are made, and all gifts are imparted, rests upon the character of His person. In Him it pleased God that all fulness should dwell—yea, that the fulness of the Godhead should dwell in Him bodily (Col. i. 19; ii. 9). From this it follows that believers are complete in Him. (Col. ii. 10).

2. The actual participation in this fulness is conditioned on the confirmation of this "testimony of Christ" in the heart through a lively faith, which involves a union with Christ and results in energetic endeavors, awakened in prospect of Christ's glorious advent, to be behind in no gift, in order that the Church of Christ may become a well-equipped organic whole, and so ripen on to perfection.

3. To this actual confirmation of the truth in the heart there corresponds the work of Christ, resting upon the faithfulness of God who has called us unto the fellowship of His Son, for the confirmation of His own unto the end that they may be found blameless at His appearing, and prepared to participate in His glory as a bride adorned for the bridegroom (Rev. xxi. 2, 9; comp. 2 Cor. xi. 2; Col. i. 12).

[4. The nature of the believers' calling: 1. As to its condition. It is a fellowship with Christ through faith in character, in sufferings, and in glory. 2. As to its permanence, endurance unto the end; kept by the power of a faithful God. 3. As to its activity, a cultivation of Divine gifts in the service of Christ.]

[5. The second advent of Christ is possible for any generation, and ought constantly to be looked for, desired and prayed for.]

1. A proper joy at the prosperity of a church: a. expresses itself in thanks to God, (ver. 4); b. is occasioned by the grace of God manifested to it in Jesus Christ; c. and should fill every minister's heart even as it did Paul's, compensating him for all the toil and suffering of his ministry].

2. The wealth of a church in doctrine, [or utterance] and knowledge, a. has its ground in Christ, (ver. 5); b. is obtained through the confirmation of his testimony in it.

8. The right waiting for the coming of Christ allows us to remain neither idle nor unfruitful, but inspires us with an earnest zeal constantly to appropriate and improve every spiritual gift.

4. Our hope for the perfection of Christians is our confidence in Christ [or God], who will confirm them blameless unto the end, and it is founded upon the faithfulness of God who has called us to the fellowship of His Son. (ver. 9.)

[5. The test of a true or false Christian is his waiting for or dreading the revelation of Christ. Bengel].

HEUBNER: VER. 4: 1. Gratitude is something more than prayer. He who does nothing but always pray, is and appears ever unsatisfied. 2. God must become our God, i. e., we should not only acknowledge Him as God in general, but we should also recognize Him as our own God from all the experiences of life. This is true egotism. 8. A teacher has no blessing except what comes from God. VER. 5: 1. Wealth in that which is needful for salvation is true permanent wealth. 2. The amount the Apostles accomplished in their churches ought to shame us. They were obliged to quarry their churches out of the rough rock. We find Christians ready made to our hand, yet how little we achieve. VER. 7: Christian life in a church is to be known by the awakening of all good Christian energies. Every one should be ready to serve the holy cause of Christ with his gift. VER. 8: Unblamableness at Christ's judgment should be the goal of a Christian.

[VER. 4. There is a bright side even to the most disheartening circumstances of the church. It is our duty to consider these first and take courage].

[VERS. 4-9. The rebukes of a minister, when steeped in love and prefaced by commendation descend like an excellent oil that doth not break the head].

SECOND DIVISION.

REPROOF OF DEFECTS AND FAULTS.

I. Exhortation to unity and rebuke of party spirit.

CHAPTER I. 10-17.

- 10 Now [But¹] I beseech [exhort²] you, brethren, by the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye all speak the same thing, and that there be no divisions among you; but [rather³] that ye be perfectly joined together in the same mind [ᾠμῶν sentiment]
- 11 and in the same judgment. For it hath been declared unto me of you, my brethren, by them which [who] are of the house of Chloe, that there are contentions among
- 12 you. Now this I say, that every one of you saith, I am of Paul; and I of Apollos;
- 13 and I of Cephas; and I of Christ. Is Christ divided? was Paul crucified for⁴ you?
- 14 or were ye baptized in [into: εἰς] the name of Paul? I thank God that I baptized
- 15 none of you, but Crispus and Gaius; Lest any [In order that no one⁵] should say
- 16 that I had baptized in [ye were baptized into⁶] mine own name. And I baptized also the household of Stephanas; besides I know not whether I baptized any other.
- 17 For Christ sent me not to baptize, but to preach the gospel:

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The connection may be understood thus: I thank my God for his work of grace among you, and in view of his faithfulness am confident that the work, Christ [or God's] has begun, he will perfect. You, nevertheless, I exhort, that ye consider carefully what is required for the fulfilment of this work, and remove whatsoever shall hinder it.

VER. 1. The Exhortation.—I exhort you brethren.—A friendly, winning address, which, as an evidence of his fellowship in the faith and his equality with them in it, imparts to his exhortation the character of an entreaty. This is also implied in the Greek παρακαλῶ. “Paul often adds the term: brother, when he has an earnest word to utter.” (vii. 29; x. 1; xiv. 20). MAYER. The δε: but, introduces the transition from his exhibition of the bright side of the church to the reproof of its dark side. It is as if he said: “For much in you I have to thank God, but there is much in you which I have to censure.” NEANDER.—By the name of our Lord Jesus Christ.—It is thus he strengthens his exhortation and presents a motive for compliance.—[“The name of Christ was the bond of union and the most holy thing by which they could be adjured.” STANLEY.] The force of it lay in this, that they all acknowledged Jesus Christ to be their Lord, and so professed themselves to belong to one and the same Master; and in this the obligation to unity was unmistakably indicated. Similar instances are found in Rom. xv. 80; xii. 1; 2 Cor. x. 1.—The contents and aim of the exhortation are expressed in the several clauses which set forth the same leading thoughts in several relations [and they are introduced by ἵνα: in order that, which points not only to the import but also to the intent of the exhortation. See WINER, LIII. 6.]—That ye all speak the same thing.—By this he means: give expression to their inward accord and harmony of sentiment. It is precisely the opposite of the conduct mentioned in v. 12. They were with one voice to avow their allegiance to the one Lord, to the exclusion of all divisive party-watchwords. This is obvious from the following negative clause—that there be no divisions among you.—Inasmuch as he is not treating here of “dissensions in doctrine, but of divisions arising from adherence to different leaders, and from peculiar modes of apprehending and applying doctrine,” we are not to regard him as insisting upon “an exact uniformity of profession in the essential points of doctrine and life.” [The word used for divisions is σχίσματα, lit.: schisms. These, “in their ecclesiastical sense, are unauthorized separations from the church. But those which existed at Corinth were not of the nature of hostile sects refusing communion with each other, but such as may exist in the bosom of the same church, consisting in alienation of feeling and party strifes.” HODGE.]—But rather that ye be perfectly joined together in the same mind and in the same judgment.—The inward positive side implied in the previous negative one. [The original word for “joined together” is from καταρτίζεν: to repair, to mend, to reunite and make perfect what has been broken. It were natural therefore to suppose an allusion here to the broken condition of the church which needed to be reunited and to translate the word as in the text literally. So Alf. and Hodge and Stanley, who says that "καταγορεύω was the acknowledged phrase in classical Greek for a reconciler of factions." Calvin takes the word to signify: "fitly joined together, just as the members of the human body are joined in most admirable symmetry," thus furnishing a picture of what the church should be. Kling however, following the Vulgate and Theoph. prefers the derivative sense of: perfect, and makes it=τέλειος.] That wherein they were to be united is given in two words νοῦς and γνώμη. The former "embraces that peculiar mode of thought and of viewing life which lays the foundations for the moral judgment and moral self-determination. So in 1 Tim. vi. 5; 2 Tim. iii. 8. Comp. BECK, Bibl. Seelenlehre, § 51; DELITZSCH, Bibl. Psychol. § 189. The latter is power of knowledge, understanding, spirit, also sense, disposition, as well as insight obtained, view, opinion, conviction, also resolve, design, aim; view expressed=counsel, proposition. The two must here be distinguished. Only it cannot be readily decided which denotes the side of thought and judgment, and which that of will and disposition. Since, however, γνώμη is used elsewhere in this Epistle to signify view, and counsel (see vii. 25, 40, also 2 Cor. viii. 10), perhaps it would be best to take it here also in a theoretic acceptance= view, conviction. ["In the New Testament it always means judgment and opinion. When the two words are used together, the former is most naturally understood of feeling, a sense in which the word mind is often used by us." HODGE. "Disposition and opinion." ALFORD].

VER. 11. Explains the occasion and motives for the exhortation, while the disgrace of it is softened by the fraternal address.—For it hath been declared unto me of you, my brethren, by them of Chloe.—Sad reports had reached him, and he names his authorities in advance. What relation these persons sustained to Chloe, whether children, or servants, or other members of her household, cannot be ascertained from the text, "Paul names his informants without reserve in order to obviate suspicion." BESSER. "Concealment and mystery sow distrust and destroy love." BURGER. This Chloe must at all events have been a woman well known to the Corinthian brethren, either as a resident at Corinth, so that her people had come from thence to Corinth, or as a resident at Ephesus, so that these persons had learned of the state of things at Corinth during a visit there.—that there are contentions among you.—ἐριδεις: discords, wranglings, which would inevitably lead to separations, to a rent in the Church, if not arrested in season. [Here he sets forth in severer phrase what he had more gently intimated in the word "schisms" above, and shows its evil and bitter character.]

VER. 12. Fuller explanation. Now this I mean.—τοῦτο: this, as commonly, points to what follows (vii. 29; xv. 50), not to what precedes. That every one of you saith: (i. e.) has one or other of the following speeches in his mouth. A like use of ἐκαστος; every one, appears in xiv. 26. [WINEB says, "There is no brachylogy here. In these four statements Paul intended to comprehend all the declarations current in the chapter regarding religious partisanship. Each adherent of the respective sections used one of the following expressions"]. "Saith boastfully." BENGE. He here vividly sets before us the several partisans, as they step out side by side, or in opposing ranks, each announcing the name of the leader he followed. It is as if he saw or heard them thus arraying themselves "As they were wont to do at the school, so here they acted in the Church." BESSER.—I am of Paul.—(i. e.) I belong to him as my head or spiritual father. The Genitive of ownership or dependence. The order of mention is most readily explained by supposing it to correspond with that of the rise of the parties. According to NEANDER, Paul follows the order of particular relationship, since the Apollos-party was only a fraction of the Pauline. The idea of a climax (BENGE), Paul in his humiliation putting himself at the bottom, is superfluous and improbable. Altogether groundless, however, and without any indication in its favor, yea, directly contrary to ver. 14, is the opinion of the old expositors, that Paul used these names at random by way of a cover to the real leaders whom he had in mind. See the statement made respecting these parties and their rise in § 2 of the Introduction. The Pauline party naturally stands first, since the Church depended on Paul as its founder, and that portion which clave to Paul and his ways, (after a fraction had defected to Apollos), must be regarded as the original party.—I of Apollos.—(a shortened form for Apollonius). He was just as little disposed to act the part of leader, as was Paul. This may be seen from the fact that notwithstanding the urgent solicitation of Paul, he positively declined to visit Corinth at that time. This was no doubt with a view to avoid giving any fresh fuel to the strife which had already sprung up. (Comp. iv. 6; xvi. 12). Respecting him see Acts xviii. 24 etc.; xix. 1; also OSIANDER on our passage [and SMITH, Bible Dict.]. That he was a humble man, one who did not pride himself upon his culture, one of the few "wise after the flesh," who had been early called (i. 26) and "had sanctified their science by faith in Christ, to whom they made it subservient," is clear from his willingness to be instructed by those simple mechanics, Aquila and Priscilla. Far from wishing to outbid Paul for influence and popularity, he labored only to confirm believers by a cautious reference to the Prophecies of the Old Testament. We find him once more mentioned commendatorily in Titus iii. 18. Highly probable is the suggestion, first made by Luther, and afterwards ably advocated by Bleek, that he was the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews. Oslander calls this Epistle a most noble monument, both of his genius, which harmoniously combined human culture and Divine illumination, and of his style of doctrine, which was directed mainly to the work of atonement, and to the illustration of the fulfilment of the Old Covenant in the New, &c.—I of Cephas.—(i. e.) Peter, without doubt. It was his Aramean name, found also at ix. 5; xv. 5; Gal. ii. 9. Whether the party following him adopted this name, because they derived it through Jewish emissaries out of Syria, or because it seemed to them more sacred as coming from the mouth of our Lord (Jno. i. 42), or because the Shibboleth of a vernacular word sounded more imposingly, we are not able to decide. It is more probable that the Jewish name was the more common one with Paul. Only once in Gal. ii. 7 ff, do we find him using the Greek name: Peter.—I of Christ.—As a supplement to what was said in the Introduction on this point, see Meyer in loco. We here give the main particulars. First, according to a fair exegesis it must be maintained that the parties were four in number. Alike needless and inadmissible is the attempt to resolve them, either into two essentially identical pairs (as Baur does, who distinguishes between that "of Paul" and that "of Apollos" only in form, and takes that "of Christ" to be the same as that "of Peter," which only assumed this cognomen because it deemed a genuine Apostleship dependent on personal connection with Christ, or which, as Becker thinks, consisted of native Jewish converts connected with the Petrinists that had come in from abroad, but had called themselves Christians because they had been converted by Paul and Apollos); or into two main parties: that of the Apostles and that of Christ, the three first adhering to Apostles or Apostolic teachers, and the fourth going back immediately to Christ (as Neander and others do); or into three parties, in such a way as either to set that "of Christ" as the only rightly disposed one, in contrast with the others as sectarian, see iii. 23, (as Schott and the Greek expositors); or to assign the designation "of Christ" to the three parties in common who all professed themselves Christ's, but who desired to have their participation in him regarded as dependent on their connection with this or that teacher (as Rábiger: "I belong indeed to Christ, but it is as a Pauliner and am nevertheless a true Christian"). But Calovius hit the truth long ago, when he said "even those who called themselves Christians from Christ were guilty of schism, since they separated themselves from the rest in a schismatic spirit and insisted on appropriating this term to themselves alone." To this we may add what Flacius writes, "Under the pretext of Christ's name they scorned all teachers and would have nothing to do with them, pretending that they were wise enough for themselves without the aid of other instructors. For there was sin on both sides, either by exalting Church teachers too much or by appreciating them too little." As soon as the knowledge of Christ came to be established in the Church, there may have been persons, who, in opposition to an over-estimate of all human instrumentalities, held to an independent Christianity, and so were easily brought to look away from these instrumentalities altogether, and with utter contempt of their worth and authority, fell into the way of asserting their exclusive dependence upon Christ, and so, priding themselves on this point, got to regard themselves as his sole genuine disciples, and tried to pass for such. To seek for this class exclusively among Jewish or among Gentile converts ("the philosophically educated to whom Christ appeared like a second perhaps higher Socrates, and who, despising the Apostolic form of the doctrine of Christ, sought to refine it by philosophical criticism." NEANDER) is altogether unwarranted. The few philosophically educated Gentile converts could easily have satisfied themselves with the tendencies of the Apollos party. Nor are we justified in tracing to these the beginning of Gnosticism or Ebionitism, or in charging upon them a looseness in morals and a denial of the doctrine of the resurrection. According to Roman Catholic expositors, the party "of Apollos" were in danger of falling into a false spiritualism which volatilized the positive contents of Christianity; the party "of Peter" contained the germs of the later sect of Ebionites; and the type of the party of Christ was an ecclesiastical liberalism.

VER. 13. The reproof, in the form of questions which expose the absurdity of the partisanship just charged.—Is Christ divided?—There is a doubt whether this should be read as a question or as a simple declaration. Meyer and others [likewise Stanley following Lachmann] take it as an emphatic assertion of the lamentable results of the aforementioned divisions: "Christ has been divided! torn up into various sect-Christians instead of being entirely and undividedly the Christ common to all!" Since each of the exclusive parties claimed to have him, their conduct was virtually a rending of Christ. But ever since Chrysostom, commentators have generally regarded the words as a question. This would be more conformable to the analogy of the other clauses, and be just as forcible. Besides the subsequent question is of different import, so that it is not to be expected he would connect the second to the first with an or, as in the case of the third which is but a correlate to the second. This is what BENGE means. "The cross and baptism claim us for Christ. The correlatives are, redemption and self-consecration."—To the sound consciousness of a true Christian who knows but one Christ, the bond of universal fellowship, such partisanship is a contradiction. It involves a division of Christ against himself, since the parties, who exclude each other, all think to have him. Hence the question, "Is Christ divided? Is there a Pauline, an Apollonian, a Petrine, a Christian Christ?" Thus we apply the question to all parties alike; and not merely to the fourth, as BAUR does, who takes Paul to imply, that the name of Christ employed as a party designation was the most significant evidence, that they, by their sectarianism, had rent Christ in pieces. Every party, he says, must still, as a Christian party, have thought to have Christ. If then there were but one proper Christ-party, it followed that the one Christ, in whom all distinctions ought to vanish, was rent asunder (Tüb. Zeitschrift, 1836, s. 4). It is clear in this case that the clause is not to be taken as a question. Under the term Christ, we are to understand not the Church as a mystical body of Christ (Estius, Olah.), still less Christian doctrine, the Gospel (Grotius), but the Person of Christ, as the Head of the Church, in opposition to all party leaders. This is evident from the following questions, in which the exclusive right of Christ as Lord over His redeemed ones, and their obligations to Him as having been baptized into His name, are set forth: Was Paul crucified for you?—Lit: Paul surely was not crucified for you; was He? [The question is introduced here with the negative Particle μή. Meyer adduces this as an argument to prove that the previous clause which is without μή, is consequently to be read differently, as a declaration. To this Alford replies, "that the μή introduces a new form of interrogation respecting a new person, viz. Paul; and that it was natural for solemnity's sake to express the other question differently. In μεμέρισται ὁ χριστός the majesty of Christ's person is set against the unworthy insinuation conveyed in: "is divided"—in μή Παῦλος ἐσταυρώθη ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν, the meanness of the individual Paul is set against the triumph of Divine love implied in "was crucified for you."] With the strictest impartiality, which here appears as the truest prudence, he rebukes first the partisan attachment to his own person, and makes those, who set him up as their leader, to feel his painful disapproval of their course. Such persons while boasting of their connection with him, were assigning to him a position which belonged to Christ alone. They were acting on the supposition that he had suffered for them, an act which was the ground of their belonging to Christ, who through His sacrifice for sinners had acquired the right to their undivided devotion (comp. 2 Cor. v. 15). [If (as Socinianism alleges) the sufferings of Christ were merely exemplary, there would be no such absurdity or simplicity, as St. Paul here assumes to exist, in comparing the sufferings of Christ to the sufferings of Paul" Words]. To this ground of claim there corresponds the question expressing and confirming their personal objection—Or were ye baptized unto the name of Paul?—That is: was the name of Paul called over you at your baptism, as though he were the person to whom you pledged yourselves, and in whom ye believed and whom you professed as your Lord and Saviour? This is certainly the sense, although "the baptism into the name" may be regarded primarily as submersion into it as a person's life-element; so also as an introduction into fellowship with the party named as into an essential ground of salvation; or as immersion in reference to him, so that the obligation to profess faith in that which is expressed by the name is indicated (comp. on Matth. xxviii. 19). "The fact that Paul puts his name for all the rest proves how ingenuously he was opposed to all this party spirit, and how humbly he was anxious that Christ's name should not be prejudiced through his own" NEANDER.

VERS. 14-16. I thank God that I baptized none of you.—The Apostle recognizes as a thank-worthy Providence that he had been kept, for the most part, from administering baptism, since he had thereby obviated all appearance of intention to bind the baptized to his own person, an appearance which certainly would have arisen had he here acted contrary to his usual custom elsewhere;—but Crispus, the ruler of the synagogue, converted through Paul (Acts xviii. 8),—and Gaius, certainly not the one of Derby (Acts xx. 4), but the same as that Gaius mentioned in Rom. xv. 23, a man of distinction, who entertained Paul, and with him the Church, either by furnishing his house as a place for meeting, or by receiving there such of the Church as wished to visit Paul—in order that no one should say—By this is expressed not the design of the Apostle, but the Divine intention in ordering his conduct in such a way.—While writing he recalls another exception, "perhaps from information derived from Stephanas himself, who was with him."—And I baptized also the household of Stephanas—the family whom in xvi. 15 he calls "the first fruits of Achaia." οἶκος includes also the domestics. ["Under the old dispensation, whenever any one professed Judaism, or entered into covenant with God, as one of his people, all his children and dependents, that is, all to whom he stood in a representative relation, were included in the covenant, and received its sign. In like manner, under the Gospel, when a Jew or Gentile joined the Church, his children received baptism and were recognized as members of the Christian Church" HODGE]. In order to avoid all blame for want of frankness he adds, besides I know not whether I baptized any other.—"Inspiration, although it rendered him infallible, did not make him omniscient". It will be seen that he baptized only the first converts, afterwards, when these multiplied, he transferred the business to helpers, possibly also to deacons, to whose functions this in course belonged. In like manner Peter (Acts x. 48). On this point he next proceeds to explain himself more fully by stating the view he took of his office.

VER. 17. For Christ sent me not to baptize but to preach the Gospel.—Ἐπεὶ ἐπελὲν a plain allusion here to his office as ἀπόστολος. The appointment to this office did indeed include the work of baptizing (Matth. xxviii. 19). But in Mark xvi. 15, as well as in Luke xxiv. 47; Acts i. 8, and John xv. 27, the work of preaching, of bearing testimony concerning Christ, appears to be the chief calling of an Apostle. And so it was in the calling of Paul (Acts ix. 15; xxii. 15; xxvi. 16-18 comp. Gal. i. 16). The preaching which awakened faith, was the proper entrance upon the work of Christ, who indeed never Himself baptized but only through His disciples (John iv. 2). ["The main thing in the commission was to make disciples. To recognize them as such by baptism, was subordinate, though commanded, and not to be safely neglected. In the Apostolic form of religion, truth stood immeasurably above external rites. The Apostasy of the Church consisted in making rites more important than the truth" HODGE].—Whether we are to assume here, as Calvin does, an ironical hit intended at the opposers, who employed the easier function to gain adherents, may be doubted. The supposition that they did so, is, at least, uncertain. The word εὐαγγελίζεσθαι: to evangelize, in classic usage, and commonly in the Old Testament, like בשר employed to denote the announcement of all sorts of good news, is in the New Testament used solely in regard to "the good tidings," by way of preëminence, the proclamation of salvation in Christ, and the fulfilment of the promises and the perfect revelation of divine grace before prepared (Is. xl. 9; lii. 7; lx. 6; lxi. 1, &c.—The contrast in "not,"—"but," is not to be weakened into a comparative, "not so much as." Baptism was not the object of his commission, although it was allowed to him. (Acts ix. 16, 20; xxii. 16; xxvi. 16-18.)

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The Church is essentially one, as a body subject to Jesus Christ, the one perfect Lord and Head, who has an absolute right over all its members by virtue of His complete self-offering in their behalf, and to whom they are absolutely bound by being taken up into fellowship with Him, as the element of their life and the sole ground of their salvation. It can properly be divided no more than Christ Himself can be divided. [This unity consists of oneness of sentiment, of conviction and of speech. That is, there must be an inward and an outward unity, an invisible and a visible unity; the former manifesting itself in the later, the latter sustained by the former. The pretence of the one is not sufficient without the other.—See this whole matter exhaustively discussed by BAXTER on "Catholic Unity," "Reasons for Christian Unity and Concord," "The Catholic Church Described," Practical Works, vol. iv.; LITTON "On the Church of Christ," B. ii. part ii. chap. 1; JOHN M. MASON, Complete Works, vol. ii. p. 265; Emmon's Works, vol. ii. sec. 13].

2. All sectarianism arising out of an inordinate preference for favorite teachers is a sin. It ruptures this unity by limiting Christ's right over us and our subjection to Him. It concedes to a mere man, to his peculiar opinions and ways and doctrines, something of that power and importance which belong to Christ alone; inasmuch as it binds men, and would fain bind all, to these objects, as if on these our whole salvation depended; causes them to move in these as the very element of their existence; draws to these their entire devotion, and so makes a human personality with all its individuality and singularity an essential mediator of spiritual life, which comes alone by truth and grace.

3. The proper view of Christ and of the instrumentalities He employs in their relation to Him is the true antidote against schismatical tendencies. Christ is the fountain-head of truth and grace, in whom all fulness dwells, and from whom all believers, whether teachers or taught, derive their spiritual excellencies. Where this truth is recognized, there there can be no inordinate devotion to human agencies. These agencies can be regarded only as the various imperfect rays of the One Light, which, so far from detaining us by themselves, should conduct us up to the source from whence they stream. Yet just as little does it become us to despise these human agencies, and withdraw into our own particular knowledge and experience of Christ, as though we were sufficient unto ourselves. Rather it must appear to us that, the more superabundant and glorious the fulness of Christ is, the greater must be the necessity for numerous and manifold vessels to take it up, from various sides and according to their several capacities, and to present it to others in ways suited to their manifold necessities, so that persons shall be most easily led, one through one and another through another, into a participation of the riches of Christ, according to their several aptitudes and needs.

But the more this is done in truth the more open does a person gradually become to other aspects of Christ and to other organs of His. And this will lead us, on the one hand, to a just estimate of these organs themselves, and, on the other hand, to modesty of deportment and to a loving regard for such as were first led to Christ and edified by this or that teacher. And while the interested adherence to one particular aspect of Christ leads to a division of the one Christ in our feelings, and then to a rupture of the Church into parties, which deny to each other the full and proper enjoyment of salvation, and shut themselves up against each other in those aspects of the life and character of Christ which have been exhibited to them through the several organs they have chosen, the procedure we have been advocating conduces at last to a perfect unity of conviction and sentiment, which, precluding all division, makes itself known in unity of speech, wherein the manifold voices confessing the one all-embracing, all-sufficing Christ, blend in harmony. This is a catholicity which is to be found as little in Romish Christianity as in the coagulations of a Lutheran or Calvinistic speciality.

4. [Sectarianism; its nature and origin; a historical survey of it in its existing aspects]. "The tendency to sectarianism lies in human selfishness and stubbornness of opinion, in conceit and egotism. Sectarianism does not consist in holding fast to our profession for conscience sake, but in using our own form of doctrine or religion as a means for exalting ourselves and for ruling over or opposing others. And this is not confined to leaders alone. That sectary who does not feel strong or courageous enough to take the lead, will at least join himself with ambitious devotion to some other person better able to do it, in whose honor and glory he may share. But Christianity refuses to be sectarian at all. How then, it may be asked, do existing divisions comport with it? They arise, under the Providence of God, out of the diversity of human opinions. Only, these denominations ought not to hate one another, but they ought to plant themselves on the one common ground, Christ, and recognize each other there.—The one Christ can have but one doctrine and one church. But under the hands of men Christianity disintegrates into parties. From this arises a necessity for our choosing that party which seems to us the purest and most Christian. Parties were unavoidable. God suffered them that they might become instrumental in exciting Christians to greater zeal, to mutual purification, and to the exercise of kindly forbearance towards each other. Toleration is a word which should not be spoken among Christians; for toleration is a very proud, intolerant word." Heubner.

Our confessions (Greek, Romish, Evangelical, with all their divisions) are, on the one hand, historical necessities; they resulted from the gradual working out of Christian ideas or principles, such as the Theocratic, the Hierarchical, and the Protestant, which is the principle of freedom, subject only to the word of God. On the other hand, they result from the disturbance occasioned by sin in the development of Christian truth and life. This is true even in respect to their national forms: the Greek, the Roman, the German, and the mixture of the latter with Roman and other elements. Hence the petrification of the first principle (theocratic) in the Oriental Greek Church; of the second (the hierarchical) in the Occidental Romish Church, so that the third (the Protestant) came to an independent form in the sphere of German life, differing itself only according to national peculiarities. In one place there was a rigid adherence to the letter, accompanied with great intellectual acumen and force of will; and in another larger freedom prevailed, associated with greater breadth and depth of spirit and sentiment. But on the part of both (the Reformed and the Lutheran) communions, the influence of the two first principles was again felt, and the result was a stiffening of life and form, which showed itself in the former case in an ever-increasingly superficial adherence to the letter of the Bible, and in the latter case in an external induration of a form of doctrine,—which was originally free, and which asserted the freedom of the religious personality (justification by faith),—until at last in both spheres a false freedom usurped the throne, a subjectivity emancipated from all obligations to the word of God; in other words, rationalism. And now the only proper return to unity can be effected by attaining unto the knowledge of the truth of the several principles above mentioned, and by fusing down in our living consciousness the stiff forms of the past, and with these the truth of all that has been transmitted to us, through a deeper penetration into the word, or rather into Christ Himself, who is the kernel and substance of the written Word; and through a more humble, self-denying appropriation of Him in our lives. Such a return is at the same time an advance towards the true union, which the spirit of God will create by the harmonious combination of diversities.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

1. The Apostolic exhortation to unity, addressed to a church torn by factions, and suited to Christendom at the present time. 1. Its matter: a. To speak the same thing, unity of confession; b. on the ground of unity of sentiment and views. 2. The motive of such unity: the name of our Lord Jesus Christ; a due regard for the interest all have in Him according as He has given Himself to be known, experienced and enjoyed by them (vv. 10–13).

2. The wrong of parties in Christendom; a. so far as they subordinate Christ to human leaders or put these literally into His place; b. so far as they are servilely dependent on such leaders and take pride in them; c. so far as they exclude, scorn and hate each other; d. so far as they boast of their partisanship in vain self-sufficiency, and seek to glorify themselves and their leaders in it (vv. 12, 18).

3. The proper conduct of a teacher towards such as are devoted to him: a. that he perpetually points them away from himself to Christ (v.

10), while he never forgets that he and they alike are indebted to Christ for everything (v. 13); b. that he ever keeps in view the main object of his calling, to preach Christ (v. 17).

VERS. 13, 14. As the Corinthians made it a matter of great moment by whom they were baptized, instead of considering into whom they had been baptized, so now multitudes put a greater stress upon the party by whom they are confirmed, than into what and to what they are confirmed. (Bibl. Wörterb., II. § 79.)

STARKE: VER. 10. The noblest virtue which can befit Christians is brotherly union through the bond of love (Col. iii. 14), and this because of Christ's command (Jno. xiii. 34) and of his prayer (Jno. xvii. 11), after the example of the Apostolic Church (Acts iv. 32) and the manifold exhortations of the Apostles (Phil. ii. 1; 1 Pet. iii. 8; Eph. iv. 2). LANGZE:—The unity of the church is certainly much insisted on and very important. Yet we must take care not to prescribe one for another a form or a name according to our own opinions, especially in incidentals which do not belong to the fundamentals of faith. In these respects there must be variety of judgment. It is enough if we agree in all matters essential to salvation. HKD. (v. 11):—What a shame! Rending asunder the body of Christ! Who perpetrates the mischief? Not the peacemakers, not the confessors and friends of Christ, but the zealots without knowledge; those who love profane and vain babblings; impure spirits who preach Christ of contention. O man, study the precept which inculcates the restoration of the erring in a spirit of meekness (Gal. vi. 1) and exercise thyself therein. VER. 11.—Teachers should not believe every report, but should ascertain facts before they reprove. To give information at proper quarters from a desire to effect reform is no sin; only let care be taken not to exaggerate. VER. 12.—Honor is due to ministers, but they must not be served as lords. To call oneself Lutheran by way of distinction from the Papists or those belonging to other denominations, without adhering to Luther as authority, is not improper; but to do this in a sectarian spirit is just as wrong as it was for the Corinthians to say, "I am of Paul." VER. 13.—The death of Christ is alone meritorious; no saint can merit anything for himself, much less have his merits imputed to others. VER. 14, 15.—The care of God's Providence over us can best be recognized in the issues of events, which is then to be acknowledged with reverence and gratitude even in the smallest particulars.

VER. 10. BURGER: "Speak the same thing;" unnecessary, capricious deviation from the established forms of doctrine is a violation of the spirit of unity and love.

["There are many sore divisions at this day in the world among and between the professors of the Christian religion, both about the doctrine and worship of the Gospel, as also the discipline thereof. That these divisions are evil in themselves and the cause of great evils, hinderances of the Gospel, and all the effects thereof in the world, is acknowledged by all; and it is doubtless a thing to be greatly lamented that the generality of those who are called Christians are departed from the great rule of 'keeping the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace.' He who doth not pray always, who is not ready with his utmost endeavor to remedy this evil, to remove this great obstruction of the benefit of the Gospel is scarce worthy the name of a Christian." JOHN OWEN.]

[VER. 18. CALVIN: "Paul crucified for you!"—This passage militates against the wicked contrivance of Papists by which they attempt to bolster up their system of indulgences. For it is from the blood of Christ and the martyrs that they make up that imaginary treasure of the church which they pretend is dealt out by means of indulgences. Here, however, Paul in strong terms denies that any one but Christ has been crucified for us. The martyrs, it is true, died for our benefit, but (as Leo* observes) it was to furnish an example of perseverance, not to procure for us gifts of righteousness."]

VERS. 14-17. [If the doctrine of baptismal regeneration be correct, Paul was instrumental in saving but few souls. Certainly the commission of modern Romish missionary seems to read the reverse of St. Paul's. He is sent to baptize, not to preach the Gospel.]

II. THE TRUE METHOD OF PREACHING.

A. Repugnant to the predilections of both Greeks and Jews.

CHAPTER. I. 17-25.

17 Not with [in ἐν] wisdom of words, [discourse]¹ lest the cross of Christ should be made 18 of none effect. For the preaching [discourse] of the cross is to them that perish, 19 foolishness; but unto us which are saved, it is the power of God. For it is written, I will destroy the wisdom of the wise, and will bring to nothing the understanding of 20 the prudent. Where is the wise? where is the scribe? where is the disputer of this 21 world? hath not God made foolish the wisdom of this² world [the world]? For after that [since]³ in the wisdom of God the world by wisdom knew not God, it pleased 22 God by the foolishness of preaching⁴ to save them that believe. For [since both]⁵
23 the [om. the] Jews require a sign, [signs]⁶ and the [om. the] Greeks seek after wisdom:
But we [on the contrary]⁷ preach Christ crucified, unto the [om. the] Jews a 24 stumblingblock, and unto the [om. the] Greeks [Gentiles ἐθνῶσι]⁸ foolishness; But unto them which are called, [these, the called]⁹ both Jews and Greeks, Christ the 25 power of God, and the wisdom of God. Because the foolishness of God is wiser than men; and the weakness of God is stronger than men.

² Ver. 20.—The τοῦτου of the received text is undoubtedly transferred from the preceding. Lachmann and Tischendorf reject it according to the best authorities.

³ Ver. 21.—[ἐπειδὴ is not temporal but illative.—Ait.]

⁴ Ver. 21.—[κηρύγματος: passive noun, the thing preached both in contents and in form.]

⁵ Ver. 22.—[ἐπειδὴ καὶ it may be rendered: "For both," but Kiling translates as above.]

⁶ Ver. 22.—The plural σημεῖα is better attested: whether it is internally the more probable may be doubted.

⁷ Ver. 23.—[ὁδὲ after ἐπειδὴ expresses contrariety.]

⁸ Ver. 23.—[ἐθνῶσι is decidedly better attested than the received Ἕλλησι which arose out of vers. 22 and 24.]

⁹ Ver. 24.—[αὐτοῖς δὲ τοῖς κλητοῖς; the αὐτοῖς serves to identify the called with the believers, ver. 21.—Ait.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

[The connection.—From the mention of his commission, especially to preach the Gospel, the Apostle takes occasion, as it were incidentally, to set forth the manner in which this work was to be done. The topic thus introduced has however a direct bearing upon the previous one, for he handles it in a way both to vindicate his own course to which some had taken exception, and also to rebuke those tendencies, which, in their antagonism to a pure Gospel, had engendered contention and schism. Of the mode of transition to this theme Bengel remarks: "I doubt whether it would be approved by the rules of Corinthian eloquence. Therefore the Apostle in this very passage is furnishing a specimen, so to say, of apostolic folly, and yet the whole is arranged with the greatest wisdom."]

VERS. 17b-21. [The proper mode of preaching described first negatively].—Not in wisdom of speech.—οὐκ ἐν σοφίᾳ λόγου. It is better to join this clause to the word "preach" just preceding, than to the main statement "Christ sent me." [As to the meaning there are three distinct interpretations. 1. That of Calvin, and others, who place the stress on "speech," and understand by the phrase ornate and artificial discourse in contrast with plain homely speech. The objection to this is that it fails to give due weight to the word "wisdom," which is used by the Apostle in a strict sense throughout the chapter, and is the special object of his animad-version. 2. That of Olshausen, who takes it to denote "word-wisdom," i. e., "a wisdom in appearance and not in reality," an interpretation which de Wette justly styles "sonderbar." 3. That of Storr and Flatt, de Wette and Hodge, who, taking the emphasis to be on "wisdom," and understanding it of the subject-matter, suppose the Apostle to be repudiating here all connection with heathen philosophy. But to this it may be replied that such repudiation was wholly gratuitous, for no one would imagine that in preaching the Gospel he would be likely to employ the speculations of a secular wisdom. 4. That of Meyer and Kling, who while emphasizing "wisdom," understand it as referring to the form of discourse. According to this, what the Apostle asserts is that he was not to preach the Gospel in a philosophical manner, making it a matter of science rather than a vital power for the heart and conscience. In such a case the Genitive would be used analogously to the Hebrew construction, where the first noun in construction qualifies the second. Hence "wisdom of discourse" would be=philosophic discourse. See Nordheimer Heb. Grammar B. III. ch. v. § 801. 2.] So Neander "Σοφία λόγου=σοφία ἐν τῷ λέγειν, not wisdom absolutely, but the wisdom of dialectic demonstration." Indeed it is not to be denied that in the course of this paragraph both σοφία and λόγος are used also in relation to the subject matter, and that this is always more or less affected by the mode of exposition. Unquestionably it makes a difference whether the subject matter is first vitally apprehended by the spirit and then creates its own form of expression for itself, or whether a form foreign and unsuitable is forced upon it, drawn from other spheres of life and thought; in other words whether the Gospel is proclaimed naturally in its divine excellence and simplicity, or whether, taken up under the conceptions of an alien philosophy, and arrayed in the rhetoric and dialectics of a people still unsanctified (like the Greeks for example), it be thus presented to the mind. An instance of the latter kind occurred not only in the Gnosis of the heretics, but also to a certain degree in that of the Alexandrian Church of a later period. And probably it was with an eye to the beginning of such a tendency in the party of Apollos that the Apostle affirmed that, according to the will of the Great Commissioner, it devolved on him not to preach the Gospel "in wisdom of speech." And the expression means nothing else than: not in the style of a philosopher trained in the rhetoric and dialectics of the schools, [but in that of a witness, bearing testimony to the great facts in and through which God had chosen to reveal himself. The reason for this was], lest the Cross of Christ be made of none effect.—Κενωθῇ, become empty, void; here according to the connection: be robbed of its power and influence. By "the Cross of Christ" we understand that death of Christ upon the cross by which we are redeemed and reconciled to God. This is the centre and kernel of all Gospel preaching, by the power of which sinners are delivered from the tyranny of sin, and restored to a new and divine life. And this cross, he says, would be bereft of all efficiency for such results were it set forth in the forms of philosophy, inasmuch as in this way it would serve only to call out the assent of the intellect or awaken an aesthetic pleasure, while the flesh, that is, the corrupt natural life of the selfish heart, would remain unaffected. But let the cross only be held up before that heart in its divine simplicity, and it would then display an energy destructive of this life. Through it the flesh with its affections and lusts would be crucified. (Gal. v. 24). But although this blessed result is obtained by means of preaching or doctrine, yet it does not follow from this that we are to make "the cross" here equivalent to "the doctrine of the cross, or to the doctrine of Christ crucified." Rather the relation which this clause sustains to the foregoing implies that here we are to understand the simple fact itself held up in its own native majesty and power. [Whatever obscures or diverts attention from this deprives it to that extent of its power].

* Leo the great ad Palestinianos, Ep. 81. See the passage cited in full, Calvin's Instit. (Lib. III. cap. v. § 1.).

VER. 18. [The position thus taken he proceeds to explain and substantiate from obvious facts.—For the preaching (lit: word λόγος) of the cross is to them that perish folly, but to those that are saved, ourselves, it is the power of God.—Here the force of the argument is to be found in the second member of the antithesis. The first is introduced merely as a concession to a supposed objection. The Corinthians might retort, "The cross of Christ rendered without effect by wisdom of speech! Why, your method of preaching is not half so taking and effectual as the one you denounce." This the Apostle concedes, but limits its applicability only to a certain class, to those who are in the way of sin and are going to destruction. 'These,' he says, 'are blind. They have no sense of sin, and see not therefore the wisdom of the cross. To them it is folly. But while to them I acknowledged it is such as you say, yet to those who are in the way of salvation, the cross is a thing of power. They see its meaning. They feel its disenthraling and life-giving influences. And it is by what you see of its effect among these that you must judge of it'. Accordingly that to which this divine power is ascribed, "the word of the cross," must be regarded as Gospel-preaching in its simplest and most unadorned style, the earnest exhibition of the great act of redeeming love directly to the heart, without human accessories. It is not the doctrine about the cross, but the word which presents the cross itself in its concrete form and in its plain and pungent application to human conditions. It is of this he predicates a divine power. But this power is manifested only among such as are saved—a thought which is brightened by the foregoing contrast. In both clauses the sign of the Dative "to" means "in their judgment." But in the one case it is a judgment proceeding from a blinded mind, in the other a judgment founded upon blessed experience. In reference to the first see 2 Cor. iv. 3, 4; to both 2 Cor. ii. 15, 16. To the former it seems absurd to have the fact of Christ's death nakedly held before them as the ground of all salvation—to hear a voice from the cross calling unto them "Look unto me and be saved," because they see no rational connection between cause and effect here.

These are "the lost," i. e., they are excluded from all participation in the blessedness and glory of God's kingdom, and are doomed to bitter anguish and disgrace. (See 2 Thess. i. 9; Rev. xxi. 8; xxii. 15; Mark ix. 43). In contrast with this appears the state of salvation, that is, a deliverance from this doom, (see Luke vi. 9; Matth. xviii. 11; Jas. iv. 12) which includes also a share in the blessedness and glory of God's kingdom. (Comp. 2 Tim. iv. 18; Rom. v. 10; viii. 24). There are here, then, two classes of persons contrasted in relation to their final lot. For the purpose of designating them P. uses the present participles (ἀπολλυμένοις—σωζομένοις) as the ones best suited, since time is not taken into account. It is therefore not "the present for the future" for the purpose of indicating the certainty of the lot contemplated, nor yet does the present denote the progressive development in the condition of the parties. Nor yet would it be in place here to introduce the idea of predestination, as Rückert does, taking the terms to denote the divinely appointed destiny of two classes, for with Paul this idea never occurs in any such way as to exclude the idea of a free self-determination, (comp. 2 Thess. ii. 10; Acts xiii. 46) since to all profounder contemplation the work of God and the act of man in the genesis and development of faith are inseparably one. "This only must be conceded that the Apostle's mode of expression is grounded upon a τρόπος παιδείας; a mode of teaching peculiar to him. Paul delights to refer back everything at once to the divine superintendence. Only in this reference the human receptivity or non-receptivity is at the same time included." NEANDER. On "the power of God" see Rom. i. 8 where the Gospel is said to be "the power of God to every one that believeth." The contrast between "folly" and "power" is certainly not a strict one, but nevertheless a true one. As the former implies that the Gospel is, according to the judgment of those that perish, a weak thing, so does the latter imply that it is to the others, a manifestation of divine wisdom; or, as the idea of folly excludes that of power, so does the idea of power presuppose that of wisdom.

VER. 19. Confirmation adduced from Scripture. "For it is written ["This formula with its following citations is found only in those Epistles of Paul which were addressed to churches in which there was a large admixture of Jewish converts. It does not occur in those written to the Thessalonians, Ephesians, Colossians, Philipians, which were composed almost entirely of Gentile converts. This coincidence between the History in Acts and the character of the Epistles is evidence of the genuineness of both." WORDS.] I will destroy the wisdom of the wise and bring to naught the prudence of the prudent."—This Divine declaration is taken from a prophecy of Isaiah, which culminates in an announcement of salvation through the Messiah (Is. xxix. 14, comp. ver. 17 ff.), and, as the result and penalty of the hypocritical conduct of the Jewish people, proclaims the downfall of the wisdom of their wise ones and the vanishing of the understanding of the prudent, so that this wisdom and understanding should contribute nothing towards their deliverance in the day of evil. This judicial threatening on the part of God was incontrovertibly fulfilled in the times of the New Testament. The wisdom of the ungodly proves unfit for apprehending the Gospel-salvation. In reference to this it loses all its availability and appears as nothing worth. The citation is not literal, though, according to the sense, exact. [It is taken from LXX. with slight variation: ἀδελφὰς for κρίψω, and αὐτοῦ omitted twice. "The prophet makes use of neuter verbs, while Paul turns them into the active form by making them have a reference to God. They are however perfectly the same in meaning. "Wisdom perishes," but it is by the Lord's destroying it. "Prudence vanishes," but it is by the Lord's covering it over and effacing it.—The application of this to the subject in hand is this: The Lord has been wont to punish the arrogance of those who, depending on their own judgment, think to be leaders to themselves and others; and if this happened among a people whose wisdom the other nations had occasion to admire, what will become of others?" CALVIN]. In reference to this subject see the words of Christ: Matth. xi. 25 ss.; also chap. xv. 7, 8.

VER. 20. [The Apostle's triumphant challenge for disproof of this declaration.—Where is a wise? where is a scribe? where is a disputer of this world?—The designations here are all anathrōus, and Meyer, de Wette, Kling, all translate as above. Alford, Stanley, Hodge, Barnes, insert the article. The difference in meaning is plain, though not important. In the one case the inquiry is after the person mentioned, q. d., 'Where is a wise man to be found?' as though he were not. In the other the question is, 'What has become of him conceding that he exists?' The latter better suits the drift of the text.—There is a question also as to whether these words likewise are cited from the Old Testament. There is something like them to be found in Is. xxxiii. 18, uttered "in a burst of triumph over the defeat of Sennacherib," and Stanley considers them as taken from thence. But as the Apostle is here evidently speaking in his own name, we can regard his language as no more than an undesigned imitation of that of the Prophet—a lingering echo of it freely reproduced to suit a present purpose. He is here appealing in his own name to existing facts by way of confirmation. Where is the wise? etc. So CALVIN]. They have vanished. They pass for nothing in the Divine economy. So far as it is concerned, they are as if they had never been. His mode of challenge occurs also elsewhere with Paul (xv. 55; Rom. iii. 27, 29, 31).—The last attributive: "of this world," belongs, although not grammatically, (since the questions are rapid and abrupt), yet logically, to all the three terms, and describes those mentioned as belonging to the lower stage of human development, the Præ-Messianic period. This old world, so far as it seeks to maintain itself still, even after that which is perfect has come in Christ, shows itself to be perverse and at enmity with God; yea, as in itself evil, because pervaded with error and sin. Comp. Gal. i. 4, "from the present evil world." Here the term rendered "world" is αἶών and more properly denotes a period of time, an age of the world.

The antithesis to this is αἰὼν ἕκτερος or μέλλων: that age, or: the coming age. (חֲבֵל עוֹלָם). This is a course of existence founded on the redemptive work of Christ, and includes in itself all the impulsive forces and power of the new life. Until the end of "this age," the "coming age," will be in a germinal state, enclosed and restricted within the envelope of the present; but then it will burst into open manifestation as the sole reality. The αἰὼν οὗτος: present age, is identical with ὁ κόσμος: this world. The only distinction is that the latter designates the sphere of life itself as one essentially godless and corrupt in its on-goings, especially the human race as alienated from the life of God, while the former indicates the period of time through which it continues. Hence in Eph. ii. 2 we see the two united in one phrase. αἰὼν τοῦ κόσμου τούτου: the course of this world. The present age, as the period of the rule of sin and error, has for its god or governing principle the devil, as in 2 Cor. iv. 4 he is denominated 'the god of this world,' and in Jno. xii. 31 'the archer or ruler of this world.' In so far now as the Jews also in their hostility to the perfect revelation of God in Christ, by which they became blinded to the nature of earlier revelations, also (2 Cor. iii. 14 ff.) belonged to this corrupt age, and inasmuch as in the progress of this discussion the Jewish element also is brought up to view, we shall be obliged to understand by the "wise" here mentioned, Jewish as well as Pagan sages, (not the one or the other exclusively): and since the Apostle afterwards speaks of wisdom only, it may be well perhaps to take the term "wise" in a general sense as denoting all those who were devoted to the higher science, or at least pretended to be such; and the other two terms as specific, "the scribe" denoting the wisdom-seekers among the Jews—and "the disputer," the like among the Greeks. Such appropriation of the terms is supported by the fact that according to the uniform usage of the New Testament (Acts xix. 35 alone excepted) "scribe" is the designation of the Jewish learned class. But the other term, συζητητής, which is best translated: "disputer" (comp. συζητεῖν Mark viii. 11 ff.; συζητήσις Acts xv. 2. 7; xxviii. 29), and hence denotes a class of persons who make disputing their business and have facility in it, can be only incidentally applied to the Sophists then widely spread throughout the Hellenic world. So MEYER. But would it not be more suited to the rhetorical character of the passage to make no such disposition of terms, but merely to abide by the general fact that the Apostle had in his eye men who boasted of their learning and science and ready abilities, and as masters of the truth looked down contemptuously upon the masses—men who were to be found among the Jews as well as among the Greeks,—and that only in the word "scribe" there is a prevailing reference to the Jew? [Stanley, who takes ver. 20 as a modified citation from Is. xxxiii. 18, says "These expressions acquire additional force by a comparison with the Rabbinical belief that the cessation of Rabbinical wisdom was to be one of the signs of the Messiah's coming (see the quotations from the Mishna in Wetstein ad loc.), and that this was expressly foretold in Is. xxxiii. 18. Analogous to this was the belief of Christians that the oracles of the heathen world ceased on the birth of Christ"].

The challenge is strengthened by a further question—hath not God made foolish the wisdom of this world?—i. e. actually demonstrated that it is not what it professes to be; but rather, folly—unreason, stupidity, incapacity for knowledge in relation to the highest matters. ["We must here carefully notice these two things that the knowledge of all the sciences is mere smoke, where the heavenly science is wanting; and man with all his acuteness is as stupid for obtaining of himself a knowledge of the mysteries of God as an ass is unqualified for understanding musical harmonies.—Paul (however) does not expressly condemn either man's natural perspicuity, or wisdom acquired from practice and experience, or the cultivation of mind obtained by learning; but only declares that all this is of no avail for acquiring spiritual wisdom.—We must restrict what he here teaches to the specialties of the case in hand." CALVIN].

VER. 21.—Shows why and how it was that God had made foolish the wisdom of this world. —For since in the wisdom of God, the world by wisdom knew not God, it pleased God through the foolishness of preaching [κήρυγμα, not κήρυξις, not so much the preaching as the thing preached, though not without an implication of the former] to save them that believe.—The relation of the premise to the conclusion is that of a sequence, divinely ordained in the way of punishment [rather of mercy], so that in the first man's guilt [rather guilty impotence, see below], is assigned as the ground of what is stated in the other. From this we perceive the incorrestness of Rückert's view, who, snuffing predestination everywhere, explains the phrase "in the wisdom of God" to mean: "in virtue of God's wisdom, its leading and appointment." Neither does it consist with the relation of the two clauses to explain it of the wisdom of God's plan of salvation in the Gospel (Mosheim and others); for the refusal to recognize this wisdom was not anything to which the divine determination spoken of in the second clause could be referred, as to something definitely concluded upon. To this it must be added that from the very beginning, before the disposition of men in relation to it could be ascertained, the preaching of the Gospel had for the world the appearance of folly. The case is entirely different in chap. ii. 6. Rather we must here understand a reference to something prior to Christ, to certain exhibitions of Divine wisdom previous to the revelation made in Christ, in and through which man could or ought to have discerned God,—to its way in nature and history, and indeed not merely to that revelation alluded to in Rom. i. 18 ff; Acts xiv. 17; xvii. 24 ff, but also to the ordinances of this wisdom in the guidance of the covenant-people, who, because of their unbelief (with the exception of the "election," Rom. xi. 7), belonged together with the world. Neander, on the contrary, discovers here only a contrast instituted between revelation and the religion of reason, and regards the wisdom of the Greeks as the particular object of whose relation to Christianity the Apostle is treating. But this interpretation is opposed by the fact that in the vv. 22-24 closely connected by ἐπειδή: since, with v. 21, Paul three times expressly states that by "the world," in v. 21, not only the heathen but also the Jews are intended. But does not the declaration in reference to the heathen that, they "did not know God" conflict with Rom. i. 21 where it said that 'when they knew God they glorified him not as God?' We must here distinguish between that sense of a God forced upon the mind by a revelation of God, a merely passive religious notion, the ineffectualness of which is set forth even in the passage above referred to, and that living knowledge of God, which involves communion with Him, and which is the thing here denied of the world and which, had the world possessed, it would have qualified the world for the comprehension of that more perfect revelation in Christ which was to be the fulfilment and consummation of all that had gone before, so that had this knowledge existed such a decree of God as is affirmed in the second clause would not have been made, nor would the preaching of the Gospel have been to them foolishness. The "wisdom" then, "through" which the world knew not God (διὰ τῆς σοφίας), denotes that intelligence by means of which the knowledge of God ought to have been attained, but was not. It is the appropriate organ of the human mind, sharpened by culture, through which God is perceived and recognized as He displays Himself in His wisdom; in other words, the eye for discerning God's light. But this proved itself disqualified for its proper end, since the world, the possessor of this wisdom, had become alienated from the truth and love of God, and hence perverted and darkened by error and sin. The translation, "on account of their wisdom," as though this was the cause of their not perceiving God* would require the accusative (διὰ τὴν σοφίαν). It might still be questioned whether the phrase "through wisdom" does not refer like the previous one to the wisdom of God, so that it has its corresponding antithesis in the phrase, "through the foolishness of preaching." This is Bengel's view. "In the wisdom of God, i. e. because the wisdom of God was so great. By wisdom, namely, that of preaching, as is evident from the antithesis, by the foolishness of preaching." So, too, Fritzsche (Hall, Lit. Zeit. 1840). "After that, in the wisdom of God, i. e. while God allowed His wisdom to shine forth, the world did not recognize God, through the wisdom made available for them by God, then God resolved to choose means of directly the opposite kind. In setting forth the antithesis here, it occurred to him to emphasize strongly the wisdom of God, which failed of attaining its end." But all things considered, the view carried out by us merits the preference, and the repetition of "the wisdom of God" must always appear somewhat artificial.*

*[Kling has hardly done justice to the view which he calls Bäckert's, and stigmatizes as Predestinationism. There certainly is no little plausibility, and much fair ground in Scripture for interpreting, "In the wisdom of God," to mean "according to the wise ordination or arrangement of God." All the movements of the ante-Christian period were unquestionably so disposed by Providence as to prepare the way for the coming, and the reception of Christ. And why may it not have been a part of the Divine plan to allow the

The judgment [rather the merciful pleasure] of God towards a world not recognizing Him in consequence of its own sin, is introduced by the phrase εὐδοκῶν ὁ θεός,—God was pleased—hence "concluded," "determined." It indicates here not so much the freedom or pure favor, from which the resolve proceeded, as the suitability of his proceeding to the end contemplated, or to the circumstances of the case. We find it first among the later Scripture writers, and most commonly in the Sept. In the New Testament it occurs chiefly in Paul (Rom. xv. 26; Gal. i. 15 ff.). In reference to the expression and thought comp. Luke x. 21. The world had shown itself incapable of discerning God in His wisdom through its wisdom. Therefore God found it good no more to appeal to human wisdom by the manifestations of His wisdom, but by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe,—i. e., by a proclamation, the contents of which carried the impress of folly, or must need appear foolish to the world as it was. This was to deliver from sin and wrath, and introduce to everlasting blessedness those who should believe in what was declared. In other words, the determination was, to appeal to faith instead of to reason. [So Hodge: "The foolishness of preaching means the preaching of foolishness, i. e., the cross." But is there not an allusion to the nature of the preaching itself as being distinct from philosophical disquisition in the simplicity of its method. Preaching is heralding, proclaiming facts and messages, a foolish matter for those who delight in the subtleties and arguments of philosophy.] From this it is clear [?] that the phrase "through foolishness of preaching" does not furnish, as might ap-world to try its own wisdom, and test its capacities to the utmost, in order that its utter inefficiency for discovering God, and finding out a means of salvation, might be fully proved and thus that consciousness of ignorance and inability be awakened, which is one of the first conditions of simple faith in revelation? Paul hinted at this very truth in his speech at Athens (Acts xvii. 26, 27). "And hath made of one blood all nations of men, for to dwell on all the face of the earth; and hath determined the times before appointed, and the bounds of their habitation; that they should seek the Lord, if happily they might feel after Him and find Him, though He be not far from every one of us." This interpretation carries therefore a legitimate and Scriptural sense, and it is preferred by Alf, Barnes, Poole, and most American sermonizers.

But there is still another interpretation, worthy of consideration, as having the advantage of giving to the important word "wisdom" a uniformity of meaning throughout the entire passage. What Paul is here controverting is the fondness for philosophic speculation as characteristic of the Greeks, and which in the Corinthian Church was threatening to destroy the practical nature of Christianity, and turn it into another scheme of philosophy. This tendency, or rather its products, the Apostle calls "wisdom" (σοφία), and it is, as he says, something he would not indulge in, however pleasing to the Corinthian temper. One reason for this was, the utter inefficiency of all philosophy in the matter of religion. He does not condemn it absolutely, but relatively to the ends in view. This, therefore, it became him distinctly to state, which he does in verses 20, 21, may be paraphrased thus: "For since in its speculations and philosophy did not know God, it pleased God through 'the announcement of the simple facts of the Gospel, which to a speculative mind seems like folly: to save those who accept them in mere faith.' We thus take σοφία—φύλασσο, make τοὶ θεοὶ the objective Genitive, and interpret the whole phrase "In the wisdom of God," as denoting the sphere of thought in reference to which the Apostle was speaking. This was in fact theosophy, a word compounded of just the ones here associated. The antithesis then in the two clauses would be between philosophy and preaching, between scientific knowledge and faith, accepting the simple proclamation of the Gospel].

pear to be the case at first sight, the contrast to the phrase "this wisdom,"* but to the other, "in the wisdom of God;" and the antithesis to "this wisdom" is to be sought in "them that believe." Faith is pure receptivity, and as such is directly the opposite of all endeavors after knowledge by the unaided powers of the intellect, such as are peculiar to human wisdom. It is the humble acceptance and appropriation of the testimony concerning Christ crucified, in spite of all the objections which the understanding of the natural man may urge against the doctrine of salvation, and in the utter renunciation of one's own opinions, and in the entire repudiation of predominant theories. In the act of believing there are united, therefore, both humility and courage. Finally, there is still another correspondence in the words "know" and "save." Knowledge ought to lead to salvation (comp. Jno. xvii. 3). Not knowing, therefore, hindered the obtaining of salvation.

VERS. 22-24. Mode in which the Apostle fulfilled the good pleasure of God expressed in ver. 21.—Since both Jews require signs and Greeks seek after wisdom, we therefore on the contrary preach Christ crucified.—[So KLING translates the passage. But there is a question here as to the construction. This verse, like the previous one, begins with ἐπειδή. It may therefore be taken as a parallel to that, (so Hodge, Meyer), resuming the thought and amplifying it (so Stanley), and like the preceding having a protasis † and apodosis (as Kling); or it may be joined by ἐπειδή directly to the previous clause, and regarded as explanatory of what is said of the "foolishness of preaching" being the means of saving believers (so Alford, Calvin, Rückert, de Wette). In this case the second clause instead of being an apodosis would be directly dependent on ἐπειδή, and the rendering would be:—Since, or seeing that, while both Jews require signs and Greeks seek after wisdom, we on the other hand preach Christ, etc.—This seems to us the most natural rendering. See Winer, P. iii. § lxx. 6. But Kling rejects it as "the less suitable." According to his view], what the protasis states is the result of "not knowing God" (ver. 21); what the apodosis states is the judicial procedure corresponding to it as carried out in "the foolishness of preaching," viz., a refusal to yield to vain demands for wisdom, and the counter preaching which appears to those making these demands as absurd, but which to believers proves to be the power of God and the wisdom of God. The ἐπειδή introduces a case well known and made out: since indeed; the δέ (after ἡμεῖς) is used also elsewhere in the apodosis after ἐπεὶ and ἐπειδή to make the antithetic relation of this clause the more prominent: therefore, on the contrary (comp. MEYER on this passage). This construction is favored by the parallelism between the protasis and apodosis in ver. 21, and those here found. The καί,—καί: both,—and, unite here classes alike in one respect, i. e., in the unwarrantableness of their demands, but otherwise diverse, and they belong not exclusively to the subjects mentioned (Jews and Greeks), but serve to connect the two clauses in one whole: "since it is so, that both Jews require signs and Greeks seek wisdom." Jews and Greeks here represent two classes of men according to their peculiar characteristics. Hence they are mentioned without the article. It is as if he said "since people like the Jews seek, etc." The Greeks here as in Rom. i. 16, and elsewhere, stand as pars pro toto, for the Gentiles generally, who, according to the most probable reading, are mentioned afterwards in ver. 23. They are the people who best represent the whole multitude of nations (ἔθνη) found outside of the covenant relation with God, and who, in respect of culture and language, prepared the whole civilized world for Christianity; just as the Jews, scattered among them all, did the same thing in respect of religion, being freighted with the promise which was to be fulfilled in Christ. It was among these two nations that Christianity had its first sphere of operations,—the Jews, who had the first claim to announce the fulfilment of that promise which had been preserved, and of that hope which had been awakened by them (comp. Acts xiii. 46; iii. 25; Rom. i. 16; xv. 8), and the Greeks, who had carried out the work of human culture in science and art, and had, as it were, taken the whole civilized world in possession, and so had furnished the most perfect form for the human appropriation of the truth of revelation, and so the richest receptivity for the life and truth which were in Christ, and which were fitted to ensure them the most perfect satisfaction. But in both alike did Christianity encounter peculiar obstructions. The Jews clung to the external form of revelation, the miracle; and they did this to such a degree as to insist on having it before their eyes in its most striking, dazzling form, as the condition of their acceptance of the truth. They thus betrayed their fundamental unbelief and disaffection for the truth which rebuked their sin, humbled their pride, and demanded of them entire self-denial. This is what is meant by their "seeking after a sign," or, according to another reading, "signs." (Comp. Jno. iv. 48; and Matt. xii. 38; xvi. 4; Luke xi. 16; Jno. ii. 18; vi. 80). (Meyer, Ed. 3.) "Signs, that is, miraculous tokens, by which Jesus, whom the Apostles asserted to be risen from the dead and ascended on high, should prove Himself to be the Messiah. These they still called for, inasmuch as the miracles of His earthly career had lost for them all evidencing power, in consequence of His crucifixion". The Greeks, on their part, had been captivated by the outward show and glitter of their civilization. Whatever did not appear before them under the name of a new philosophy (comp. Acts xvii. 19 ff.), or was not sustained by philosophic proof, or was not set forth with logical and rhetorical art, they refused to accredit; and by insisting on wisdom only in a form agreeable to them, they likewise betrayed their unbelief and their aversion to that Divine truth which required a mortification of their vain self, with all its pride of science and art, and which demanded a humble surrender to a revelation in Christ that infinitely surpassed all their attainments. Thus on both sides, in modes diverse and conditioned by their peculiar histories, did the same opposition arise to the preaching of the Gospel which held up to their faith the one Christ, who was declared to have secured the salvation of mankind, and built up the way to regal glory, not through wondrous miracles, according to the demand of the Jew, nor through such wisdom as wisdom-seekers sought, but by suffering the shameful death of a malefactor. Thus did the preaching of the Apostles and their associates (ἡμεῖς) concerning a crucified Messiah, their public proclamation of this fact and its significance in all simplicity, prove for the Jews a stumbling block, i. e., an offence, a hindrance to faith, the occasion of a fall, something causing them to err (comp. πρόσκομμα Rom. ix. 32 ff.). A person hanging on the accursed tree presented such a contrast to all their desires for some glorious exhibition of power (such as destruction to their enemies, etc.), that they could do no otherwise than reject Him. ["They could have tolerated Christ on the mount, but not Christ on the cross."—A. BUTLER].—For the Greeks (Gentiles) foolishness.—That salvation could come to the world through a crucified Jew appeared to them plainly absurd. It was an instrumentality utterly inadequate to the end proposed. Thus while to the Jews such a person was an object of horror, as one accursed of God, to the Gentiles he was an object only for scorn and contempt. (Comp. Acts xxiii. 18-32; Luke xxiii. 36-41). To this, however, there is a noble contrast.

* One would suppose that the naturalness and indeed inevitableness of this contrast would have shown the incorrectness of Kling's interpretation. (See Winer, part iii. sect. 47. d.) Paul means here to set the simple "testimony of Jesus" over against "philosophy" or "wisdom," and the method of faith over against the method of reason. In all that follows he is correct.]

But unto these—the called—Christ the power of God and the wisdom of God.—This clause might be taken to depend on "we preach," so that this would be repeated in thought, and "Christ the wisdom of God" form an antithesis to "Christ crucified" with its adjuncts: We preach Christ as crucified, who for the Jew is a stumbling block, etc., but to those who are called we preach Christ as the power of God. Bengel appears to suggest this, when to "Christ" he adds "with his cross, death, life, kingdom," and says further, "When the offence of the cross is overcome, the whole mystery of Christ lies open."—But the course of thought would be more simple if we put "Christ crucified" directly in opposition with what precedes: "We preach a crucified Messiah who to the Jews is a stumbling block, etc.—but to them who are called, Christ—the power of God." By it then is signified, that He, the crucified one, at whom the Jews stumble, is to the called, the Anointed of God, (Messiah, Christ),—the One in whom the promise of a heavenly king is fulfilled, the Power of God, etc. This corresponds also to the expression respecting the "word of the cross" in ver. 18. The αἰροῖς: to these serves to give prominence to "the called" as the chief persons in the case, who occupy a positive relation to "the crucified," and enjoy an experience corresponding to it. It points at the same time to those already mentioned, to "them that believe," ver. 21, and to the "saved," ver. 18; and while the first of these terms designates their subjective position towards the Gospel, the second shows the advantage they derive from it. The term "called" indicates the Divine ground on which they stand. (On κληρονομή: called, comp. ver. 2). By the addition of: both Jews and Greeks he gives us to understand that in the purpose of grace denoted in their calling the separation hitherto existing between these parties had been removed. (Comp. Rom. ix. 24 and x. 12).—the power of God and the wisdom of God.—Here we have the antithesis to "stumbling block" and "foolishness." While the Jews were asking how a person crucified and accursed could possibly be the Saviour of Israel, how one so utterly devoid of strength could be able to overthrow all hostile power, and the Greeks were deeming it absurd to expect salvation from one who came to so miserable an end, the chosen of God were, on the contrary, experiencing and confessing that from this very crucified Redeemer there issued a Divine power, the power of a heavenly life and peace, a renewing, sanctifying, beatific power, such as could be found in nothing creaturely, and that accordingly Christ was the possessor of such a Divine power, that in Him there existed a Divine wisdom that was capable of solving the hardest problems, of lighting up the darkness that rested on the ways of God, of fulfilling God's noblest purposes of bringing men back from all their wanderings into the path of life and of introducing them at last to their final destination.

VER. 25. A general proposition, substantiating what has just been said.—Because the foolishness of God is wiser than men, and the weakness of God mightier than men.—The phrase "foolishness of God" is not to be taken too abstractly, as if it meant the Divine folly. The Apostle is evidently here speaking from a human point of view and implies merely that which appears foolishness in God. He here has in mind God's dealings with men in the Gospel, such as the procuring of salvation through the crucifixion of Christ, and other things connected therewith, which in the judgment of self-styled wise men of this world, who measure every thing by the measure of their fancied wisdom, appeared contrary to reason. Now of this apparent foolishness of God he affirms that it surpassed in real wisdom all men however wise they seemed to be in their own sight, or were held to be by others, or whatever they might be able to reason out or imagine. In a similar manner we must interpret the following expression, the weakness of God—By this he means a Divine scheme which seemed weak to those who held merely to physical force and boasted in that (for instance, the procuring of redemption through one subjecting himself to the humiliation of death on the cross), but which in fact is stronger than men, i. e., exerts a mightier power than they with all their imagined strength and prowess. Bengel adds: "Although they may appear to themselves both wise and strong, and wish to be the standards of wisdom and strength." Thus interpreted, it would be needless to construe the words "than men" as involving a figure of speech in which a comparison instituted with a person or thing as a whole, properly applies only to a part of it, or to some quality in it, as though they meant: "than the wisdom of men," or "than the strength of men." Both interpretations, however, amount to the same thing.—There is still another construction suggested by what follows, viz.: that by the foolishness and the weakness of God are meant the persons themselves who are "called" (ver. 24), who experience Christ crucified as "the wisdom of God and the power of God," so that they in consequence become Divinely wise and strong, and are thus enabled as the foolishness and weakness belonging to God to surpass men, i. e. that portion of the race who remain out of Christ in wisdom and power. "The thought is this—Human nature delights in doing great things. God, on the contrary, in His earthly dispensations always appears weak and small at the first, and not until afterwards reveals the overwhelming power that is concealed in His instrumentalities." NEANDER.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Christ and His cross—Christ crucified.—This is the clear light from Heaven, which comes to scatter all the darkness of man's sinful life. This is the key to all the riddles of a history that has been deranged and confused by falsehood and sin. All God's revelations in the Old Testament, his ordinances, institutions, promises, judgments and blessings here reach their fulfilment and find their real explanation. All the hints of truth current among heathen nations—all their sighing and striving after the knowledge of God and communion with Him, all attempts to get rid of the consciousness of guilt, to atone for sin and to effect a perfect restoration to Divine favor—all the labor of the wise to discover a clue for the great labyrinth of human life—in short every thing which glimmered as a ray of light here and there in this darkness, obtains in Christ its proper goal; and in so far as it at last leads to the apprehension of this perfect light and salvation, it has been not in vain. Here is the "power of God" which in place of a thousand-fold yet vain endeavor on the part of man is able to insure a true Divine life, an undisturbed peace, an all pervading sanctification—spreading from the inmost centre of a heart that embraces the holy, forgiving love of God,—and an invincible patience and steadfastness combined with the serenest tranquillity amid all the plagues, diseases, adversities and conflicts which may assail us from within and without. Here, too, is the wisdom of God. From this the deepest problems of human knowledge and human activity receive light, so that they can be recognized in their truth and in the goal to which they tend; and right methods of solution for them may be attained. Here the eternal thoughts of God, and the thoughts of man which spring up responsive to these out of the inmost truth of the human heart through the operation of the all-enlightening Logos, encounter each other. Here redeeming love with its wondrous plan of forgiveness and regeneration meets the manifold devices and strivings of man for the removal of guilt and, the acquisition of the chief good, and gives them a perfect satisfaction.

2. Christ and His cross—as confronting the world.—But the more this revelation of God in a crucified Saviour surpasses all the doings of man hitherto, the less can it be measured by the standard of truth and goodness existing among men, the less can it come within the scope of their ordinary conceptions. Where, therefore, the heart has not been renewed by a surrender to the truth foreshadowed by its mysterious need and corresponding to it, and so no change has been wrought in the whole course of thought, there this revelation remains an incomprehensible mystery; and where to the indolence, which refuses to stir out of the old beaten track, there is added an arrogant pride, which, with arbitrary exaggeration and embellishments insists on making what already exists the measure of the new and rejects whatever does not suit the demands thus originated, there, it is certain, that the revelation of God will be violently opposed. And this will be so much the more sure to occur, when, for the sake of presenting a contrast with the vain parade of carnal self in adhering to what is externally imposing and brilliant, and in cleaving to its own productions which seem so beautiful and fair, the revealed truth and grace are constrained to show themselves in an unpretending form, putting contempt upon the proud display of might by assuming a lowly aspect of weakness and setting at naught a lofty pretentious wisdom by wearing the guise of foolishness in order to lift humanity thereby out of the vanity of its conceited claims, and out of the arbitrariness of its own devices and endeavors, into the experience of a true divine power and wisdom.—But the cross and its preaching, which prove such a stumbling block and foolishness to those who are bound up in their vain conceit becomes to those who obey the heavenly calling in faith and who in the mortification of self with all its foolish conceits and pretensions yield themselves to the influences of the grace and truth in Christ, and in so doing experience its enlightening, sanctifying and beatific power, the wisdom of God and the power of God. Thus it happens that men with all their wisdom and power remain far inferior to what belongeth unto God, however foolish and weak it may seem.

3. "VERS. 22-24 afford us a point of observation which enables us to survey Church History in clearest light. The Apostles found two distinct tendencies setting in in strong hostility to the Gospel, the desire for miracles, and the conceit of wisdom. These two tendencies show themselves repeatedly through all times. A false, one-sided supernaturalism and a false one-sided rationalism are ever in rivalry with each other either to resist the Gospel in open enmity or to disturb and corrupt it by secretly insinuating themselves into it. It may be said that all external opposition and all internal peril to the Gospel resolve themselves at last into these two opposite principles. So long as a pure Gospel withstands and excludes these it will succeed in satisfying the genuine human needs lying at their foundation and in thus quieting them on both sides. This proves itself to be the true wonder-working power before which all other miracles must pale, and the true wisdom of God before which all other wisdom must be put to shame, and thus does it exhibit itself in both ways as the absolute Religion." NEANDER.

4. [Since it is "to the called" that the Gospel proves "the power of God and the wisdom of God," by bringing them at last to believe and be saved, it follows that the difference in the effects produced by the Gospel, so that on the one hand it appears to some as an offence and to others as foolishness, but to others still as a means of salvation, is all owing to the calling of God—his effectual calling.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

1. The cross of Christ is made of none effect by cunning words or the wisdom of speech.—For the wisdom of speech is 1, on the one hand scholastic wisdom which a. culminates only in knowledge, not in reformation; b. gives no satisfaction on the chief point, Religion; c. being in constant strife with itself evermore corrupts rather than improves; 2. On the other hand an artificial rhetoric, which springs not from the heart or from zeal for a cause known to be true, but aims only to dazzle and please, and by this means to persuade. But a mode of proceeding so altogether unworthy of heavenly truth robs the cross of Christ of its peculiar power; since a. the attention is turned away from the subject to the speaker, and so the heart is diverted and betrayed into vanity; b. and everything is viewed according to its fitness to delight; c. and the effect is ascribed not to the power of the truth presented but to the eloquence displayed. After HEUBNER.

2. The preaching of the cross. 1, is foolishness for those who are lost. a. Who are these? They are such as are hardened in their own guilt—such as follow their own perverted sense and will not accept of truth or consent to self-humiliation, so that humanly judging there is nothing to be hoped for from them. b. Why is the preaching of the cross foolishness for them? Because to the world, which insists on its own importance, everything appears absurd which tells its pride, destroys its meritoriousness and conflicts with its wisdom and righteousness. 2, is a wisdom of God unto us who are called.—The believer who permits himself to be saved, awakened and enlightened by the spirit of God, finds in the cross a divinely derived and divinely operating power, which draws the heart into peace with itself and with God, fills it with holy love, and strengthens it with a new power of life; and he recognizes therein a wisdom far surpassing all human thought and sense. After HEUBNER.

3. The vanity of scholastic wisdom or the judgment of God upon conceited worldly wisdom.—1. It effects nothing, because it aims only at show and not at improvement. 2. God allows it to be betrayed into folly and shame, because it seeks to be wise and strong without God, without prayer and piety. 3. Christianity exposes it in all its barrenness, since, while Christianity renews humanity, worldly wisdom perishes in its own schools, and is unable to maintain its own progress. After HEUBNER.

4. The causes of the rejection of the Crucified.—1. The Jewish desire for whatever was striking, imposing and externally mighty; 2. The Gentile conceit of wisdom and a vain misculture; 3. The pride of both which sought to comprehend God, but which would not enter into the apparently weak and foolish ways and means of his economy. After HEUBNER.

5. The preaching of the cross has with those who are saved a threefold effect. 1. It shames, inasmuch as man crucified Christ with his sins; for a long time did not recognize him; did not honor or thank him; and was willing so long to tolerate the sins which nailed Him to the cross. 2. It humbles, by reminding us of Christ's own love, in that He, the Great God, died for us poor worms, and did so much for us when we were utterly worthless. It inclines us also to benevolence towards all men who differ from us only in this, that we are sinners saved, while they can and may yet be saved. 3. It awakens, gives power and life, so that we not only are ready and inclined, but also are enabled to love God, and to prove our love by works.

6. The Cross of Christ is an offence to all men who think that a good life will ensure them a happy end. These are the enemies of the Cross in the midst of Christendom. They worship it externally; they take pride in it, but in fact they hate the doctrine of the Cross. They cannot accept the truth that Christ has become our Redeemer and that we are saved out of sheer mercy, so that the holiest, the most pious, the most liberal, the most upright man is just as far from Heaven as the most miserable sinner, and that there is but one way for all. To the wise and prudent the cross of Christ is foolishness. The truth that Christ died for us they regard as a fable. There are persons even among [nominal] believers who take it as a compliment if they are said not to believe. Yet should one accuse them of holding the truth, and yet of living in untruthfulness, disobedience and ingratitude towards God, it would be the same as if he pronounced them deliberate villains. Oh! could they but once hear the Gospel in a way to pierce their hearts they would certainly ask, What shall we do? Let the doctrine of the Cross be once made vital in the soul, then would there be no need of exhortation, alarm and threatening in view of this or that judgment. It would be sufficient to say, "The Saviour died for me." If we are in trouble for our sins, and the hope of salvation vanishes, and the voice comes, "Christ has died and earned salvation for us," how the heart not only seizes but holds fast to the declaration! How the truth penetrates like a divine power into the soul which can never be lost or forgotten! Then are our sins buried in the depths of the sea; they can no more tyrannize over us. Then we need sin no more. Such is the effect of the Word of the Cross in them that believe. GOSSNER.

HEBINGER:—Power, wit, all human work and counsel corrupts faith, misleads in the church, and hinders the efficacy of the means of grace. In divine things, the more foolish anything seems to the world, the better it is. "Wisdom, wisdom, ready understanding, science, learning out of a thousand books!" Such is the cry of the world. An evil sound is it in the churches and in the schools. One thing is needful—one book, one Christ.

STARKE:—The Gospel has a differencing effect according to the character of the persons who hear and use it. Mankind are divided into two classes: 1. Unbelievers; they are such as live on, without caring for their salvation, either in security or hypocrisy; each word and work of theirs is a step toward Hell. 2. Believers; they are those who are in daily concern about their salvation; and this is with them so vital a point that even when unmoved by efforts from abroad, while in the midst of their labors or talk, they are not easily repelled from it (ver. 18). Wisdom is in itself something divine, and before the fall the image of God in man consisted in it (Col. iii. 10); and even now the inclination to know and learn something is a remnant in us of this divine image. But if our natural wisdom profits us but little now, and is every where scandalized, this is the fault, not of wisdom, but of our corrupted reason and understanding. None of the loftiest and most learned of this world ought to be ashamed of the simplicity of the Gospel, for God Himself, the highest and wisest of all, let Himself down to it. Sufficient is it for us that an infinite power resides in the Cross to deliver us out of all our deep depravity. (ver. 21).—God can never suit people. One will have it this way and another that. Shame on you! God does as it pleases Him (Matth. xi. 16 ff.). Men always delight in what is strange, lofty, conspicuous. Instead of desiring that God's name alone should be praised they seek themselves in every thing. They look either at power, wealth, faculty, or at learning, prudence, dexterity. Both are means to greatness, but they prove hinderances in the kingdom of God. (ver. 22).—God will remain unsurpassed in His words and works (Ps. lxxviii. 41), but their wisdom and strength are vain. The world makes wisdom to consist in much learning which secures honor and regard. But a believer considers it the height of wisdom to know that he is a poor sinner, becomes justified and saved only in deepest humility. The greatest power consists in being able to overcome ourselves and the kingdom of Satan. God can put to shame all the devices of the craftiest and all the might of the greatest in this world. Why wilt thou fear? Look to God! He can and will give thee enough for all things (ver. 25).

H. RINGER:—Let him who would even now, by the preaching of the Cross, awaken a sense of the Cross in the hearts of men, and thereby coöperate for their salvation, not seek for assistance from the fickle arts of worldly wisdom, but let him observe what renders himself humble and subdued, and what he can thus convey with a tender spirit to others, and let him shun every thing which on the contrary tends to puff himself up and wherewith he is tempted to court the favor of men.

[SPENCER: (ver. 21).—"Some Christian ministers sometimes think to do Christianity a very good service by philosophizing it to make it keep up with the times. In all this they do Christianity no other service than rob it of its power by robbing it of its peculiarity, and do no other service to the 'philosophic minds' which they say they would influence, than just to mislead them and keep them away from true faith in Christ and reliance on his great atonement.

Every thing is coming to be philosophized. Many a minister in the pulpit—shame on him—betrays his trust to the Bible and his God by teaching religion very much as if it were a new matter of reason, and human progress, and human discovery, instead of taking God's Word as his authority and instructor, and uttering in the ears of the people like the old prophets, Thus saith the Lord God. Beware of such proceedings. They tend to infidelity. Learn duty from God. The Bible is safe. Philosophy is blind."]

[ROBERTSON:—"Men bow before talent even if unassociated with goodness, but between these two we must make an everlasting distinction. When once the idolatry of talent enters, then farewell to spirituality; when men ask their teachers, not for that which will make them more humble and God-like, but for the excitement of an intellectual banquet, then farewell to Christian progress. Here also St. Paul again stood firm. Not Wisdom, but Christ crucified. St. Paul might have complied with these requirements of his converts, and then he would have gained admiration and love, he would have been the leader of a party, but then he would have been false to his Master—he would have been preferring self to Christ."]

THE TRUE METHOD OF PREACHING.

B. As suited to the character of the called and the ends contemplated.

CHAPTER I. 26-31.

26 For ye [om. ye] see your calling, brethren, how that not many wise men after the 27 flesh, not many mighty, not many noble, are called: But God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise; and God hath chosen the weak things of 23 the world to confound the things which are mighty; And base things of the world, and things which are despised, hath God chosen, yea, and [om. yea, and]¹ things 29 which are not, to bring to nought things that are: That no flesh should glory in his 30 presence [the presence of God].² But of him are ye in Christ Jesus, who of God [om. of God], is [has been] made unto us wisdom, [from God, ἀπὸ θεοῦ]³ and [both] 31 righteousness and sanctification, and redemption: That according as it is written, He that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord.

² VER. 21.—Instead of the rec. αὐτοῦ the best authorities read τοῦ θεοῦ which is repeated by way of emphasis.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

[The connection. Kling here, as usual, follows Meyer in considering these verses as confirmatory of what immediately precedes ver. 24. It were better, however, with de Wette and Hodge, to regard the Apostle as introducing here a new argument in support of the general position taken in the previous section. It is an argument drawn from facts directly under their eye. In proof of what he had said of the true method of preaching and the utter vanity of the worldly wisdom they were tempted to prize, they could see for themselves what course the Gospel had in the main actually taken among them who were its converts and what were the ends subserved by this. Accordingly he begins by directing attention to the character of the called, first described negatively].

VER. 26. For look at your calling, brethren.—The verb βλέπετε may be taken in the Indicative [as in the E. V.]; but the Imperative corresponds better with the animated style of the Apostle (see x. 18; Phil. iii. 2). ["And is required by the emphatic position which the verb occupies in the sentence" ALF. So also Words., Wickliffe, Tyndale, and the Rheims version]. Nor is this at all inconsistent, as Bengel asserts, with the use of the "for," since this is to be found elsewhere also in imperative clauses. [Βλέπετε: "to consider, take to heart, is employed to express a more intent, earnest, spiritual contemplation than ὁρᾶν. The one denotes mental vision, the other bodily sight." W. WEBSTER]. (Heb. xii. 8). The "calling" which they are requested to observe is not their secular vocation, or their external circumstances [Olshausen], in which they were found when called of the Lord. Nothing is said of this in the subsequent context. Nor yet can we admit Bengel's explanation: "the state in which the heavenly calling proves an offence to you." This anticipates a thought which is not mentioned till afterwards. It is more correct to understand it of the Divine call, both as to the act itself, and the method God pursued in calling them, especially in respect to the persons whom he had chosen and their condition. [This is seen in the very use of terms. "He does not say τὴν κλήσιν ὑμετέραν, nor τὴν ὑμῶν κλήσιν but τὴν κλήσιν ὑμῶν: the calling of you." WORDS.]. What this was he proceeds to state—how that not many wise men after the flesh.—The "flesh" here denotes the purely human state or course of action, as utterly devoid of Divine influence or coöperation. It is the sensuous and selfish life, possessed by sin. Hence a wisdom which is suited to this life, which moves according to its ways instead of after the methods of that Divine spiritual principle from which all true higher knowledge springs, is "a wisdom of this age," "of the world" (ver. 20), earthly, godless, and hostile to God. Such is its essential character. Yet without pushing the matter so far, we might simply abide by the idea of what is purely human. (Comp. Herzog's Theol. Real. Ency. under the word "Fleisch").*—To attach this qualification to the remaining predicates, would be superfluous. These of themselves indicate what is external, worldly, and belonging to the lower extra-christian life.—not many mighty, δυνατοί: persons of consequence in civil life, influential, powerful, whether it be by wealth or any other means,—not many noble, εὐγενεῖς: of distinguished descent, well-born. In highly-civilized, aristocratic Corinth, all this was regarded of great importance.—are called.—There is no verb in the original with which the above nominatives can agree, and it is best to supply the defect [as in the E. V.] "are called" from the word "calling" in the first clause. Others prefer "are," and take it either as the sole predicate of the clause: "There are not many wise, etc., among you;" or they unite with it the adjectives as predicates: "Many are not wise, etc." [Some of the Fathers thought that the persons employed to dispense this calling were here meant. So THEODORET. "God endorsed the nations in the evangelical net of Galilean fishermen." Also AUGUSTINE. "Christ caught orators by fishermen, not fishermen by orators." WORDSWORTH]. The supplying of "are called," suits as well with the preceding words, "your calling," as with the following, "hath chosen." "In the early centuries it was often flung at Christianity (by Celsus and others) that its converts were, for the most part, common people, women and slaves." Paul here not only confesses the fact, but also discovers in it one cause of glory for the Gospel; for it is precisely in this that the Gospel displays itself to be the power of God and the wisdom of God, that starting from such humble beginnings it had nevertheless both outwardly and inwardly overcome the world.

VERS. 27, 28. The positive aspect of the case. But the foolish things of this world.—Luther translates "in the eyes of the world," as though the Genitive in the original were that of estimation. But Paul is here speaking of things not as they seem, but as they are; and here, as well as in the subsequent Epistles, we have the actual quality indicated: "The foolish things" (τὰ μωρά), the neuter for the sake of greater generalization. We have here a strong contrast to "the wise," i. e. whatever is lacking in higher cultivation and insight, including, too, the additional thought of being deemed foolish, contracted and simple.—hath God chosen, an expression which is repeated three times with great emphasis. It denotes the Divine purpose which is made known in the calling; or that Divine decision in virtue of which a separation is effected among fallen mankind, and certain individuals are selected out of it to become a possession of God in Christ, and are so made blessed (comp. ἐκλέγεσθαι Eph. i. 4; Is. xv. 19). The expression belongs to the Theocratic language of the Old Testament (comp. כָּחַר Deut. xiv. 2 ff.). "Fore-knowledge" and "Predestination" are cognate terms, Rom. viii. 29; 2 Tim. i. 9, yet so, however, that the word "choose" here designates the free, eternal gracious will of God, as carried out in time, and therefore includes the "calling" in itself.—The object of such a choice is to confound the wise i. e. the wise after the flesh. By the fact that He selected the "foolish," persons destitute of superior culture, to enjoy holy and blessed communion with Him, the wisdom in which "the wise" boasted, is exposed in all its insufficiency and worthlessness. Or we may say with de Wette, "the wise were put to shame by being compelled to see the foolish obtaining that which was denied to them." In the latter case, it is implied that "the wise" are conscious of the preference made, "and so were stung to reform" (Oslander). But this is not sustained by the context as the parallel expression "bring to nought" shows. The jubilant contrast proceeds.—and the weak things of this world, i. e. the weak of every kind, bodily, mentally, politically.—God hath chosen to confound the things which are mighty.—The antithesis here is introduced by the neuter: τὰ ἰσχυρά, denoting the category in general, although persons are meant. That any thing contemptuous was intended by this use of the neuter, is not probable, since he just before spoke of a kindred class, "the wise," in the masculine. The "confounding" is seen in the fact that "the weak things," by virtue of the indwelling "power of God," evince an energy and an overcoming power which is denied to the strong of this world.—In the third set of contrasts there appears an expansion of thought on the one side, with which there is nothing to correspond on the other.—And the base things of the world, and the despised things hath God chosen—the things which are as good as not, in order that He may bring to nought the things that are.—Here we have the antithesis only to the last expression of the first series: "the things that are" (τὰ ὄντα). [This is readily accounted for, if the omission of the καὶ as sustained by the best authorities (see critical notes) be correct. In that case the τὰ μὴ ὄντα: the things which are not instead of being an addition to the previous specifications, would stand in opposition with them, as a sort of summary of their meaning, and so be the main word requiring the offset on the other side]. Observe also the order of thought in the specifications. "base things,"—ἀγενῆ: of low origin. To this is added as a natural consequence: "despised things"—τὰ ἐξουθενήμενα: regarded as nothing. Then below both, as putting the matter in its strongest possible aspect, there comes the τὰ μὴ ὄντα (to be distinguished from τὰ οὐκ ὄντα inasmuch as the μὴ is not an absolute, but a subjective negative. Winer, § 59, 3): that which in the opinion of men is as good as non-existent.—In the antithetic τὰ ὄντα, some would insert a τί, making it read: things that are somewhat, of some importance. But this we are as little warranted in doing as in making τὰ μὴ ὄντα—τὰ μὴ ὄντα: things which are of no account, are nothing. What Paul here sets in contrast with the former are things which have being, are real, which are regarded as existing, and "which continue to make themselves pass for sole realities." And for these things the verb "confound" would no longer suit. So we have another "bring to naught:" καταργῆσαι make null, deprive of all validity. This is a much stronger expression, and it puts its object, relatively to the highest good to be enjoyed, out of existence.* The truth of the assertion has been well brought out by Neander: "In its scorned professors, the Gospel has in fact displayed a power of action and endurance, which far transcends the measure of the natural man. They alone never bowed to the despotism of the Roman Emperor. To them also the Gospel has imparted a steadfastness of conviction, which the proud philosophy of the Greeks never possessed; and a Christian mechanic, as Justin Martyr and Tertullian have affirmed, was able to answer questions which the Greek philosopher asked in vain."

[* Whitby discovers an allusion in the above designations to the Jews and Gentiles. His observations are valuable. "The Jews looked upon themselves as the only ἐυγενεῖς, persons of true nobility, as being of the stock of Abraham. 'Even the poorest Israelite,' saith R. Akibah, 'is to be looked upon as a gentleman, as being the son of Abraham, &c.'; but the Gentiles they horribly despised, as the base people of the earth, not fit to be conversed with, they being styled in their law, οὐκ ἔθνος: not a nation; λαὸς ὁ τεχθόμενος, a people that shall be born, Ps. xxii. 31; ὁ κτεθόμενος, that should be created in the generation to come, Ps. cii. 19, and so yet had no being, Deut. xxxi. 21. οὐ λαὸς, not a people, Hos. i. 10; and it being said by the prophet, that all the Heathens are as nothing, and were accounted as nothing, Is. xl. 17, they still account them as such. Hence, Mordecai prays, Lord, give not thy sceptre τοῖς μὴ ὄντι, to them that are not, Esth. iv. 11; and Esdras. As for the people which also came of Adam, thou hast said they are nothing. And now, O Lord, these Heathens who have ever been reputed as nothing, have begun to be lords over us. 2 Esdras vi. 56-57. Thus Abraham is said to be the father of the Gentiles, before that God who calleth things which are not as if they were, Rom. iv. 17: and Clemens Rom. saith of the Gentiles, 'He called us who were not, and would that of no being we should have a being.' So filthy are the Gentiles represented here by things that are not, things base, things accounted as nothing. See also 1 Cor. vi. 4. And this is the ancient exposition of Origen, who, speaking of the rejection of the Jews, or the calling of the Gentiles, and God's provoking the Jews to jealousy by them that were not a nation, he confirms this from these words: 'God hath chosen the base things of the world, and things which are not, that he might abolish the things which were before, that Israel, according to the flesh, might glory before God.' Philocal. c. p. 3. Now, however much we may feel constrained to take these designations in question in their more natural and broader acceptation as above, it is very evident that they were derived from the Theocratic usages loquendi.]

VER. 29. The reason of the above mentioned peculiarity of God's procedure in "calling" men.—that no flesh should boast in the presence of God.—μη κανχήσεται πᾶσα σὰρξ, lit.: that all flesh should not boast. A Hebraism. The negative belongs to the verb, and —that all flesh should give up their boasting. The sense is: "no man should boast that he, out of his own endeavors, or position, or worth, had contributed anything to the great achievements of the Gospel." NEANDER. It is a question whether we are to take the word "flesh" as simply denoting humanity in general, or are to associate with this the ideas of guilt and transiency which are also conveyed by it. As a general rule the expression occurs in this way only when the one or the other of these ideas is implied in the context. "Flesh beautiful, yet frail" says Bengel.—["Here then we see that God by confounding the mighty, and the wise, and the great, does not design to elate with pride the weak, the illiterate, and the abject, but brings down all of them together to one level." CALVIN].

VER. 30. The ground in the Divine economy on which this end is obtained and the glory of salvation secured to God alone.—But of him ye are in Christ Jesus.—A two-fold construction and exposition is here possible. Either the first five words may be taken as a sentence by itself, stating the fact of their origin in God: "Of him are ye." The subsequent words, "in Christ Jesus," would then assert the ground of their being from God—of their Divine Sonship, and this too in such a manner as to carry the emphasis. Such a construction is supported by the fact that the important relative clause which follows is joined directly to it. Or the words "ye are in Christ Jesus" may be taken together as denoting their being in fellowship with Christ, and then "of Him" assigns the cause of this fact,—shows how they came to be in Christ. The latter construction is not contrary to usage, and at least is not more forced than to suppose the word "are" to be employed as a pregnant construction for 'have sprung' or 'been born,' as Osiander does. We might compare with this Eph. ii. 8, "And that," to wit, being saved, "not of yourselves," which is the same as 'and ye are not saved of yourselves,'—stated in the positive form, 'ye are saved of God,' i. e. He is the author of your salvation. So here: He is the author of your being in Christ Jesus. This is sustained also by the "from God" (ἀπὸ Θεοῦ) in the relative clause which evidently refers back to "of Him" (ἐξ αὐτοῦ) and imparts to the thought additional emphasis* by repetition. In relation to the truth conveyed see Jno. vi. 44, 87, 65. The preference accordingly is to be given to the second construction. In this way, on the one hand, we preserve the Pauline expression "to be in Christ," and avoid one which never elsewhere occurs—ἐκ Θεοῦ εἶναι: "to be from God." By this explanation we would be compelled to refer ἐν κυρίῳ: "in the Lord" (ver. 81), to God and not to Christ, contrary to Pauline usage. But this need present no difficulty, since these words in ver. 81 are not Paul's, but a citation from the Old Testament.—Who was made wisdom unto us from God, both righteousness and sanctification and redemption.*—Here we have the rich treasure of blessings contained for us in Christ all laid open, revealing the largeness of our indebtedness to God, for what of real worth we have and are. "From God" is not to be connected with "wisdom" as indicating the source whence it came, but with "was made" as showing the author of the act. (ἐγενήθη, a later Doric form for ἐγένετο, not passive). This is the order of thought presented in the German [as well as in the English] version. The fact that Christ has been made to us "wisdom" depends on God; and not only "wisdom," but also the other particulars specified. Observe, too, he here passes over into the first person plural, "unto us," including therein himself as he frequently does elsewhere when specially moved by a sense of his fellowship with his readers in the salvation of Christ. The position of "wisdom," coming in as it does before the words "unto us from God," and thus separated from the remaining predicates, is not to be explained on the ground that "wisdom" is the leading thought to which the others are subordinated. Such a construction is neither called for by the καί, which only serves to connect "righteousness" and "sanctification" a little more closely, nor by the nature of the conceptions expressed by the other terms, which designate rather coördinate aspects of the one great scheme of salvation entirely distinct from wisdom, and therefore not capable of being included under it. Rather we may say that in consequence of the course of thought thus far pursued, the idea of "wisdom" pressed foremost upon his mind, and so came in where it did; or that he put the qualifying word common to the several members of the sentence right in among them as a word of connection (Osiander.) It is natural to look for some antithesis to what precedes in these four specifications, "wisdom," etc. But it can only be called a mistake in Bengel when he attempts to find a contrast, as in "wisdom" to "the foolish things;" so also in "righteousness" to "the weak things," in "sanctification" to "the base things," and in "redemption" to "the despised things."†—When it is affirmed

[† We here insert the arguments in favor of the interpretation which Kling has simply set aside without refuting, and which seems worthy of consideration as best fitted to dispose of some of the difficulties under which his view labors—and also as fraught with valuable suggestions. This other interpretation has in its favor, that it takes in the thought as it flows upon the mind in the order of the words, "who is made unto us a wisdom from God—both righteousness and sanctification and redemption." In a collocation of words so peculiar, it was natural to take the last three terms as an after thought exegetical of the main one—and such an addition was needed. Wisdom was what Paul had been disparaging throughout this section. But it was the wisdom of man. Now he glories in Christ as having been made unto us wisdom. It was necessary therefore to difference this from what he had been condemning. So he adds ἀπὸ Θεοῦ—not ἐξ, as in the previous clause where he wishes to express the cause of an act; but ἀπὸ: from denoting derivation, showing whence this wisdom came. It is no objection to this that the article τῆς is not mentioned before ἀπὸ, since the omission is quite in Paul's style. Eph. iii. 13. (See Alf. also 15). Then to characterize this wisdom, to exhibit its distinguishing peculiarities as practical and suited that "Christ was made to us wisdom," by this we are to understand that in Him, in His person, the fulness of which was unfolded in His history, the mystery of the Divine plan of salvation has been disclosed, and with this an insight been afforded us into the dispensations and judgments of God, and we are enabled to recognize and lay hold upon that which shall conduct us to the goal of our noblest longings (comp. ii. 7 ff.; Col. i. 9 ff.; 26 ff.; iii. 2; iii. 10; Phil. i. 9 ff.; Eph. v. 8 ff. etc.). As closely related ideas, "righteousness" and "sanctification" are so joined as to form a distinct whole: δικαιοσύνη τε καὶ ἁγιασμός. The first reminds us of 2 Cor. v. 21—"that we might be made the righteousness of God in him;" and of Jer. xxiii. 6—"The Lord our righteousness;" and also of the saying of Christ himself in Matth. iii. 15, as well as of Acts xiii. 38; Is liii. 11; Gal. ii. 16, 17; Rom. i. 17; iii. 21 ff. In the language of Holy Writ righteousness denotes that conduct which comports with the law of God or the disposition suitable to it. This existed in Christ in absolute perfection; and it existed in Him as the second Adam (xv. 4, 7), the son of man, the head representing the whole body, and in behalf of the entire sinful race, whose obligations to the law He had fulfilled by a life of perfect obedience, and whose debt to justice He has cancelled by submitting to the penalty threatened upon sin in a voluntary sacrifice of Himself even unto death, thereby complying with the behests of the Father and revealing His holy and compassionate love towards the fallen. In this way has He become righteousness for us, that we may be counted righteous before God and enter into the possession of the rights and privileges which belong to this state of righteousness—that is, be adopted into the Divine family. This, regarded as an act of God, is expressed by the terms δικαίωσις δικαιοσύνης: to justify, justification; and the pardon of sin, as the negative side of justification, includes also, for its corresponding positive side, God's cordial acceptance of us as pleasing in His sight. But in this judicial portion of Christ's redeeming work there lies also, at the same time, an element of moral change—of sanctification (ἁγίασμός), and the intimate connection between these two things is expressed by the τε καὶ. ("In this conjunction there is implied at once distinction and equality, an intimation of similarity, as though the one were consequent upon the other." OSIANDER. In order that the for man's deepest deeds, instead of being merely speculative, he subjoins the three great points it contemplated. And here is where wisdom of the Gospel far surpasses that of secular philosophy. It gives him in Christ pardon, holiness, triumphant deliverance from woe to glory. Here then we find 1, an adequate reason for the order of the words; 2, not a repetition but a distinct thought in ἀπὸ θεοῦ, and so a reason for the change of preposition; 3, not a digression from the main course of thought as must be supposed in the other interpretation, which Stanley admits, but a glorious consummation of it, displaying the infinite superiority of the wisdom from God over all human wisdom; 4, an epexegetical quite in the manner of Paul. Rom. i. 12. Since writing the above I see that the view above given is adopted, though not argued out, by Butler in his sermons on our text. It is substantiated also by the Syriac, Vul., and Rheims versions. Neander's testimony may be added: "In these last three conceptions (righteousness, sanctification and redemption), there are presented to us the practical contents of the wisdom (from God), by which it is distinguished from the wisdom of this world"] relation to God, in which our justification places us, may be subjectively sustained, so that we may say "the judgment of God is according to truth," there must be an inward connection between the Head and the members who participated in the righteousness of their Head. This connection is effected by the love of Christ awakening faith in us. This love at once destroys in the subject of it all disposition to live for himself, as the moving spring of his existence, all ambitious aspiring, and transports him into a state of mind that leads him to live and to become every thing in Christ alone. And this is faith, humble, earnest faith, that works in us repentance as its result. In this emancipation of the individual from the thrall of selfishness (an emancipation which is at the same time a deliverance from every thing to which selfishness binds us, even the idols of flesh and sense, and the world), and in this union to Christ as the sole worthy and worth-giving Saviour, lies the germ of our "sanctification." By this we understand becoming godly-minded—the consecration of our whole life in all its elements unto God—the offering up of self unto the Most High, so that all labor becomes a Divine service, the springs of which are joy in the Lord and the witness of the Spirit to our adoption and final salvation. This ἁγιασμός: holiness, may be regarded either as progressive—sanctification, or as a fixed quality—sanctity. The latter is the prevailing usage in the New Testament (Rom. vi. 19–22; 1 Thess. iv. 8, 4, 7; 1 Tim. ii. 15; Heb. xii. 14 etc.). It is to be so taken here. In reference to the thing itself see Jno. xvii. 19, and the juxtaposition of "ye are justified" and "ye are sanctified" in 1 Cor. vi. 11. But while all are agreed as to the meaning of these foregoing terms as a whole, it is not so in regard to the last one, "and redemption" (ἀπολύτρωσις). Are we (with Meyer) to take this as denoting the work of Christ through which our salvation is achieved (as in Rom. iii. 24; Eph. i. 7), so that it is for us an object of faith? or (according to the Catholic expositors) as our final deliverance from death and all the evils and temptations of sin (as in Rom. viii. 23; Eph. i. 14), and so as an object of hope? The latter interpretation corresponds better with the position of the word, since it will hardly do, after having mentioned "righteousness and sanctification," to go back again to the negative idea of deliverance from guilt, which is already involved in the term righteousness. On the other hand, its position renders the addition of any explanatory term like that found in Rom. viii. 23; Eph. i. 14; iv. 80, unnecessary. Comp. for a fuller development of the thought Rom. viii. 10, 11, and 21–24. —Here then is the final stage of our salvation a deliverance from the bondage of corruption unto the glorious liberty of the sons of God. That in this, as well as in the foregoing instances, Christ exhibits himself as the "power of God" victorious over the power of sin and its terrible consequence, death, is a proximate thought, so that here again those two chief predicates, "wisdom and power," recur to view, only the second with greater prominence. But in the case of "sanctification," as well as of "redemption," it is implied that Christ is in Himself what He has become for us; that He in all His life and walk was entirely severed from all fellowship with sin and wholly consecrated to God, i. e. holy, and as such was the principle of our sanctification; that He arose victorious from the grave and the whole realm of sin, and at once ascended up on high, exalted over all, and as such carries in Himself the power by which our redemption is to be achieved. (Comp. xv. 26, 55; Eph. ii. 6).

VER. 31. The final cause of the peculiar method of God's call and the plan of His salvation by the free gift of an all-sufficient Saviour.—In order that, according as it is written, he that boasteth, in the Lord let him boast.—Here is where the argument conducts us. There must be a boasting, a glorying; not, however, in oneself before God, but in God as the author of all our advantages and blessings. And this boasting is the expression of a lofty emotion of joy and confidence. If by the term "Lord" Christ were meant, it should be explained as an exultation in His fellowship, in possessing a share in His salvation. But the relation to ver. 29 points rather to God, the original source of all salvation. And such an application would not militate against Paul's usage, because, as has already been remarked, the passage is a citation from the Old Testament (Jer. ix. 23), particular prominence being given to the chief thought by holding fast to the original form. Hence the anacoluthon, ἡα—καυχᾶσθω, instead of καυχᾶται. If anything were to be supplied it would be γένηται. For a similar case see Rom. xv. 3.

DOGMATICAL AND ETHICAL.

1. God's thoughts and ways entirely unlike those of the natural man.—What is great and glorious in the sight of men, God sets at naught. What men slight as mean and contemptible, God prizes, or makes it precious. Man's propensity is to exalt himself, and hold in honor whatever is the product of his own powers and bears the mark of mental or physical superiority, or can be used to personal advantage, or is of noble origin, while he treats all that is crude and powerless and vulgar, just as if it had no existence. God, on the other hand, in His work of redeeming vain man, especially at its very commencement, proceeds on methods quite the reverse. Here we see the Son of the Highest, who is in the form of God, the Fulness of Divine life and wisdom and power, and, as the perfect image of the Father, is infinitely exalted above the most eminent of created beings, yea, is the very substance and vital principle of all the excellence and power which these beings possess—we see Him emptying Himself of His glory, entering into a state of creaturely dependence, assuming the form of a servant, coming into association with a sinful race although Himself sinless, bearing in holy sympathy all their burdens and trials on His own heart, and sharing in their condemnation and suffering and death, even to the ignominious death of the cross. Thus, at the very start, did Divine Power and Wisdom and Holiness exhibit themselves as weakness, foolishness and sin; Life and Light, as death and darkness; Riches inexhaustible, as deepest poverty; the All in All, as nothing; Essential Being, as not being. Thus in His fundamental act did God confront and confound the vain conceit of men who aspired to resemble Him in power, wisdom and blessedness. And this initial procedure has shaped the whole method of salvation ordained in the Gospel. As the condition of pardon and acceptance God requires of men the absolute renunciation of their own wisdom, power and sufficiency, and a disposition to ascribe all honor and glory unto God, who has thus manifested Himself to them in Christ, and to regard His workmanship in them as alone possessing worth. But since this requirement is exceedingly difficult for such as have distinction in this world, it happens that among the saved there are found not many wise, mighty and noble; but the Divine calling proves effectual rather in the sphere of the rude, the weak, the ignoble and the lowly, inasmuch as it is among these that the disposition to accept salvation exists in the highest degree or is most readily awakened. Thus it cometh to pass that while the wise and the noble and the mighty of earth are passed by and deemed unfit for heavenly honors, the foolish are lifted up into the light of Divine wisdom, the weak are clothed with Divine power, the ignoble are invested with the highest nobility, those who are as if they were not, attain consideration as the only real personages, and by the contrast the pomp and pride of earth are put to shame. The reason of this is that there may be no boasting before God. To this there is the opposite.

2. Unto God the Lord be all glory—He is the author of all benefits which come to us through Christ, and as He is the author so is He their final cause. Of Him and to Him are all things.

And these benefits appertain to all the aspects and relations of man's being and life as connected with God and His kingdom, viz. the intellectual, the legal, the moral and the physical. First, Wisdom. This in its highest form is the knowledge of God, and such a knowledge we have imparted in the revelation of His Gospel—a knowledge of His character, His works and ways, of the economy of His kingdom in its preparation, establishment, spread and final consummation, by means of which the thoughtful spirit may be led to choose the way of life, and to advance from the first appropriation of salvation in faith on to its full fruition in glory. Of this wisdom Christ is made to us the substance and the illuminating principle. The second is Righteousness, i. e., restoration of fellowship with God by the satisfaction of all the law's demand, and the cancelling of all obligations incurred, so that the sinner can on this ground, be accounted righteous in the sight of God, and be reinstated in his forfeited rights, and have free access to the Father as one of His family. This righteousness Christ has been made unto us by His having fulfilled all the claims of the law, both in doing and in suffering, both by yielding a perfect obedience and by assuming the curse out of His free, infinite love, so that we, being found in Him, may be made partakers of His merits. The third, inseparably connected with the preceding, is the Sanctification of human life in all its inward and outward movements so far as they are determined by man's own will. This is effected by the shedding abroad of the love of God in the heart through the indwelling Spirit, who, consequent upon the work of Christ, comes to appropriate to us His righteousness and to assure us of his pardoning grace. And when, notwithstanding all past sins, we become thoroughly conscious of this love to us, there is awakened in our souls a love in return which shows itself in perfect confidence and in entire devotion to God, and in the utter renunciation of all selfish and worldly affections. And this is holiness. But this holiness perfects itself gradually, in the daily exercise of repentance and faith, and love more and more takes possession of the whole life to the complete regulation of all our faculties and relations, so far as they can be determined by it. And this Christ is made, unto us by virtue of His holiness passing over into our hearts through the Holy Ghost, whom He hath given unto us, and who transforms us into a likeness to His all-perfect character. Finally, Redemption.—This is the destruction of all our enemies, even to the last, which is death, so that not only is the spirit life because of righteousness, but God, who hath raised from the dead the Lord Jesus Christ, will quicken our mortal bodies through the Spirit that dwelleth in us. Thus is man, in respect to his entire organism, delivered from the bondage of corruption, and introduced into the glorious liberty of the children of God. And all this is done through the power and after the type of Christ, who, Himself victor over death, has become the principle of life eternal for all who believe in Him. As they die with Him, so also will they reign with Him. In this that profound saying is fulfilled, that corporeity is the end of the ways of God; in other words, that the deliverance of our whole organization from the ban of death, and our introduction into the fulness and power of an indestructible life is the consummation of God's work of restoring fallen man; a work which was begun in his deliverance from the condemnation of sin. Short and good, Olearius: Christus est sapientia in verbo, quoad doctrinam, iustitia in merito, quoad fidem; sanctificatio in spiritu, quoad vitam; redemptio in novissimo adventu, quoad salutem eternam.

3. [The efficiency of faith in the matter of salvation.—This consists not in any virtue or meritoriousness of the act itself but in the fulness of blessings contained in the Being whom it appropriates or to whom it unites us. It enlightens because it lets in the light of Christ's wisdom; it justifies because it appropriates the righteousness of Christ; it sanctifies because it puts us into fellowship with Christ's holy life, and it proves our victory over death and the grave by associating us with Him who, as the Captain of our salvation, has proved himself the mighty conqueror. Thus while the wisdom and the power of this world are limited, by the weakness and imperfection of human faculties, faith proves its superiority over both by taking to itself the fulness of Him who filleth all in all.]

4. [Christ cannot be divided in the benefits accruing from Him. We cannot have Him for our wisdom or for our righteousness without at the same time having Him for our sanctification and our redemption. The lack of any one of these benefits proves the absence of them all.—Christ is a perfect whole, and His work a perfect whole, and to be accepted at all He must be accepted as a whole.]

5. [The surpassing excellence of God's method of salvation is seen in the fact that he presents to us not a dead system of doctrines nor lifeless instrumentalities to be acquired and improved by us, but a living agency, a person, infinite, ever-present, ever-active, all-wise, all-powerful, all-good, who acts upon us while we act on Him, and saves us by an efficiency of his own.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

1. [The method of preaching the Gospel must be adapted to the nature of the Divine calling.—1. As to the subjects thereof. The preaching should be of such a kind, and be set forth in such a manner, as to reach the poor, the illiterate and the weak. One sign that the kingdom of God has come is that the poor have the Gospel preached unto them. As it was in the beginning so must it still be. God's calling has not changed its nature. But in thus suiting the Gospel to the humble, we are not to set aside the noble and learned as though excluded from salvation. At the manger in Bethlehem the worship of the shepherds was followed by the worship of the wise men from the East; among the disciples there was a Joseph of Arimathea; the vacancy in the Apostleship made by the fall of Judas was filled by a Paul; among the converts at Corinth was Erastus the chamberlain and the wealthy Gaius. 2. As to the ends it has in view, viz: the humbling of man's pride and the promoting of God's glory.—The aim at such an end must be seen in the style and manner of the preacher himself and in the effects which he seeks to produce. 3. As to its contents.—This must be Christ in all His fulness and in His manifold adaptations to the wants of the sinner; Christ Himself, not a system of doctrines, nor a code of precepts, but the living person.]

2. The reason why not many wise are called. 1. Not because God puts contempt on human wisdom, on rank or fortune, or upon man's natural faculties and powers, for these are His gifts and were designed for good, 2, but on account of men's guilt. They abuse these gifts into an occasion for withdrawing themselves from the grace of God, and setting up for themselves to the darkening of their own understandings and the ruin of all their own interests through their weakness and insufficiency. SPENCER in STARKE.

3. Three classes of persons, the wise, the strong and the noble, are the special foes of God's kingdom, partly because they think that God's grace detracts from their power and consequence, and partly because they imagine themselves to be already in a blessed condition (John ix. 39-41). STARKE.

4. The fact that a majority of its professors at first were of humble rank redounds to the honor of Christianity. From this it is seen: 1. That it esteems all men alike. 2. That it owes its rise and spread not to human might and art, but to God. 3. That it requires not learning but an honest heart that is anxious for its own salvation.

5. The obligations which spring from these truths.—The poor and needy owe Christianity their profoundest gratitude for being so honored by it. [At the same time they must be careful not to arrogate any superiority in the sight of God over those who are above them in learning or birth or ability. Pride in ignorance and meanness is no less abominable in the sight of God than pride in greatness, wealth and learning.] On the contrary, the rich and the noble have occasion to humble themselves. Christianity owes them nothing, and they should be mindful of the danger of being beguiled from it.

6. The proud and self-sufficient must be humbled.—The Saviour did not become the Son of David until the princely glory of David's house had departed and his descendants had come to the saw-horse. This was to show that the loftiness of this world must be brought low, if it would enter the kingdom of God. [The heights of earthly promotion and glory lift us no whit nearer Heaven.—It is easier to step there from the lowly vale of humiliation and sorrow.] God's kingdom is a cross-kingdom. GOSSNER.

7. Cheer for the lowly.—What the world rejects that God lifts up and transforms into a sanctuary. Art thou small and despicable in the sight of men, rejoice at it and consider that God looks down especially upon thee (Ps. cxlii. 6-8 and cxxxviii. 6).

8. Instruction for the high.—To God belongs all the glory. If then God is to display his power in thee and make something out of thee, thou must consent to become as nothing. Everything in Christianity turns upon this one quality of humility. The blessedness of the children of God is that they possess nothing, the glory of which does not belong to God.

9. What incomparable riches in Christ!—Believest thou in Him? Then thou possessest Him. Let earth's trifles pass. Thou hast Christ, and with Him thou hast all things.—He is thine in all his offices.—As a Prophet, he is our wisdom; as High-Priest, he is our righteousness; as King, he is our sanctification; and in all three offices, he is our complete redemption. HEDIEGER.

C. As Illustrated by the Apostle's Example.

CHAPTER II. 1-5.

1 And I, brethren, when I came to you, came not with excellency of speech or of 2 wisdom, declaring unto you the testimony¹ of God. For I determined not to know²
3 any thing among you, save Jesus Christ, and him crucified. And I was with you in.

4 weakness, and in fear, and in much trembling. And my speech and my preaching was not with enticing words of man's [om. man's¹] wisdom, but in demonstration of the 5 Spirit and of power: That your faith should not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God.

² Ver. 2.—The received τοῦ εἰδέναι τι is not well authenticated, and the order τι εἰδέναι is confirmed by B. C. D. E. A. and many other decisive authorities. (Wordsworth says: "τι," which is emphatic, is rightly placed before εἰδέναι by B. C. D. E. and by Griesbach, Scholz., Lach., Alf., Meyer. Indeed εἰδέναι τι ἐν ὑμῖν would have been liable to an inconvenient interpretation: to know what is in you.")

³ Ver. 4.—The received ἀνδραγαθίαν has the balance of authorities against it [and is omitted by Griesb., Scholz., Lach., Tisch., Meyer.]. Other variations in this ver. (e.g. καταβολήν for κτίσιν, etc.), can hardly be regarded as any thing more than conjectures of an older or a later date. (See below.)

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The connection.—Paul here affirms his own conduct to have been in strict accordance with the nature of the Divine calling. [His views were sustained by his practice and at the same time justified that practice.] "As the Lord chose no one among you on account of his wisdom, so I did not come to you with wisdom."—BURGER.

VER. 1. AND I.—κἀγώ: "I also." So God has dealt with you, and I have conformed to his method. [Or: "I also, like all true Christian preachers."—DE WETTE. Or: "I accordingly," consistently with the revealed purpose of God just mentioned."—HODGE.] The connection with the preceding paragraph is close and direct, though a remoter reference to i. 17, 23 is not thereby excluded.—on coming to you, brethren, came not.—He has in view here his first long residence at Corinth, although a second shorter visit had been paid them just before writing this Epistle. The repetition "coming," "I came," is not foreign to classic usage, nor is it mere tautology. The former expresses the fact of his appearing among them [or the occasion of which he was about to speak,] while the second with its qualifying adjuncts states the way and mode of his appearance.—with excellency of speech and of wisdom.—["As speech and wisdom (λόγος and σοφία) are here distinguished, the former probably refers to the manner or form, and the latter to the matter of his preaching. It was neither as a rhetorician nor as a philosopher that he appeared before them."—HODGE. In i. 17 what he disavowed was wisdom of speech (σοφία λόγου), the emphasis being on "wisdom." Here, the two are distinguished as separate elements, and the idea of rhetoric is added to that of philosophy.] This clause some make the sole adjunct to "I came," leaving the rest of the sentence distinct, as adducing the proof of his appearing as he did, q. d., "I came to you thus and so, inasmuch as I proclaimed," etc. ["This mode is generally preferred not only because of the position of the words, but also because of the sense."—HODGE; and so Alford, Stanley and others.] But the whole clause is to be taken together, and the adjunct before us to be connected with—proclaiming to you the testimony of God.—The sense is 'I did not come preaching with highly wrought eloquence and philosophic subtleties.' To take the present participle here in a future sense is neither necessary nor suitable, since he is here speaking not of intention but simply of his mode of conduct. The matter of his preaching is "the testimony of God." This is essentially the same as "the testimony of Christ," i. 6, and what was there said holds good also here. It is the testimony which God bears concerning Christ (1 Jno. v. 9), or the revelation of his plan of salvation which He makes out of His own consciousness, originally through Christ, and then through the Apostles. This is what it is incumbent on the servant of God simply to proclaim. In this work there is no need of rhetorical ornament and philosophic art. The very object of the proclamation itself precludes the applicability of eloquence and wisdom. (Comp. Osi.) ["The Gospel is in its essence not a theory, or an abstraction, or a comment, or an image of the fancy, but it is history, and indeed, Divine history. The preaching of the Gospel is therefore a proclamation of the doings of God, and especially of that one great act of love, viz., the sending of His own Son to die for the sins of the world. This may become a matter for theory and science in the bosom of the Church after faith in it has become established, but even then it is only as a development from faith. Science can never beget faith. Faith comes only through the regenerating power of God's Spirit, who reveals Himself efficiently and in the most direct manner through the proclamation of the Gospel story."—OLSHAUSEN.]

VER. 2. His conduct in the particular above-mentioned shown to be deliberate—the result of a settled purpose. For—confirmatory—I did not determine.—[The negative particle, by its position here, is more naturally connected with the main verb. So Alf., who interprets: "the only thing that I made it definitely my business to know, was;" and Meyer says that the common connection of the "not" with "any thing" (τι), as in our E. V., is contrary to the phraseology. But Stanley translates: "I determined to know nothing," making οὐκ ἔκρινα like οὐ ἤμην. The difference of import is somewhat. In the one case, Paul tells us how far his mind was made up, that his determination did not go beyond one point; in the other case, his determination was a positive one, covering the whole ground and excluding from that all but one thing.] κρίνεν with the inf.—to conclude upon, resolved, decide, as in 2 Cor. ii. 1; 1 Rom. xiv. 13.—to know any thing among you except Jesus Christ and him crucified.—i. e. to mingle any other sort of knowledge with the preaching of Christ. His one sole aim was to portray before their eyes this one person, and that too in His deepest humiliation, as He had suffered for them the shameful death of the cross. [So far from seeking to conceal his ignominy, so offensive to the worldly spirit, he would make it prominent and glory in it.] Hence it was that he would not indulge in any rhetorical or dialectic arts, in any high-flown discourse or philosophic argumentation. In this way certainly he might fail to attract the educated classes, so called, but he would be the better able to bring to light men's actual religious needs and satisfaction. And this, with him, was the great point, for which he was willing to renounce every attainment in which he excelled, for he knew that those who wilfully neglected the revelation he brought could be gained by no reasonings from the light of nature. (See Bengel in loco.) [Furthermore, it must be observed, that it would be to mistake entirely the drift of the Apostle's discourse, were we to take the name of Christ here, according to the fashion of many divines, as put by metonymy for the whole system of divinity, or for the doctrine of the Atonement. The purpose of Paul here is to avoid theorising of all kinds, and to adhere rigidly to Christianity in its most concrete form as seen in the person and work of its founder. In his view, preaching was to act the part of a herald, to proclaim, not opinions, but the facts and messages as intrusted to him, and to let them speak for themselves. Hence we are here to take his language most literally. What he resolved on proclaiming to the Corinthians was Christ in His person and work, as the living revelation of the Father, as the Truth and the Life, as the One in whom were hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge, as the source of all salvation and blessing, whom to believe in, love and serve was life eternal. His Gospel was not theory or science, but history, and the glory of this history is, to use the words of Olshausen, that "it lives and repeats itself in the Church as a whole and in every member of the Church. It therefore never grows old any more than God himself can become antiquated; and it maintains itself to this day in all that fullness of power which it manifested in the first establishment of the Church."—"To know any thing." There is a force in the use of the word "know," instead of "preach," or "teach," which is not to be overlooked. It shows that his determination covered not only the range of his words and acts but also of his thoughts. He meant that Christ should fill his consciousness.].

VER. 8. "Describes the preacher, as the former verse did his theme." Bengel.—And I was with you, ἐγενόμην πρὸς ὑμᾶς. This might be rendered: I came to you, as 2 Jno. xii. (according to the better reading). But Paul is here speaking not of his coming, but of his residence among them (ver. 4). In like manner γενέσθαι πρὸς occurs also in xvi. 10. (πρὸς: before, in presence of, xvi. 6, 7; Gal. i. 18; Jno. i. 1.) How he was with them he proceeds to state in three substantives. a. in weakness. Since he is here speaking of his personal bearing, we are not to understand by this any physical infirmity, such as weak organs, or feeble chest, or ungainliness of form [as Stanley]; nor yet any sickness, or feebleness, bringing with it depression of spirits [as Rückert and Stier], though this would be more plausible; and, least of all, any thing happening from without, like persecutions, and sufferings inflicted by others [as Chrysostom], which would be inconsistent with the use of the singular number. In view of the expressions of Paul himself (2 Cor. x. 1, 10; xii. 10; iv. 7-12) it were better to refer this to inward weakness, but not so much to any sense of defect in science and education (so de Wette, Osi.), as to a feeling of utter inadequacy for the greatness of the work and for the resistance he would have to encounter (see Acts xviii. 9, ff.). [Bengel says: "opposed to power (ver. 4). We must not suppose that the Apostles were always in an agreeable frame of mind or quite free from perturbations.] b. in fear and c. in great trembling.—Terms expressive of great timidity as contrasted with a bold and confident demeanor maintained by the overweening consciousness of his own abilities, "such as appeared in the eyes of ancient Paganism to be the highest morality." NEANDER. It has been justly observed that such anxiety, arising from a sense of insufficiency for the work on hand, is a marked characteristic of the most distinguished servants of God (see Osiander). The interpretation of Olshausen and others is less consistent with the idea expressed in the foregoing term ("in weakness.") They understand Paul as intimating a modest fear lest he should corrupt the Divine truth with a mixture of human elements, and fail in the proper discharge of his duty. The sense of the phrase, "in fear and trembling," which is a proverbial one (Gen. ix. 2; Ex. xv. 16; Is. xix. 16) is determined by the connection. Elsewhere, as in Eph. vi. 5; 2 Cor. vii. 15, it denotes: sollicita reverentia; or, as Bengel: "A fear which abounds so as to effect even the body in its gestures and movements."

VER. 4. Describes the mode of preaching.—And my speech and my preaching.—The "and" in ver. 3 and the "and" in ver. 4 are not so related as to be rendered: "As well I myself—as also my speech." But the first of these conjunctions simply joins ver. 3 to the preceding, and the second, ver. 4 to ver. 3, putting the matters stated in harmonious connection. On account of the repetition of "my," we are not at liberty to take the two words here as identical, nor yet are they so related as to indicate the first the form and the second the substance of his preaching [so Stanley]. It were better to distinguish them as denoting, the first (λόγος), his private discourse, and the second (κήρυγμα), his public discourse [so Olsh., Rück., and most others]; or, the first, discourse in general, and the second, discourse in particular, viz., the proclamation of the Gospel [so Hodge]. Less probable is the opinion of de Wette [adopted by Alf.], who takes the two words as designating the same thing but in distinct aspects; the former his style and course of argument, the latter his announcement of Gospel facts and conviction of their certainty.*—was not.—The verb here has to be supplied; either ἐγένετο for ver. 3, or

ἡν, meaning: was not furnished with (Luke iv. 32); or: did not consist in. The character of his speech and preaching is described, 1, negatively—not in the persuasive words of wisdom, οὐκ ἐν πειθοῖς σοφίας λόγοις.—[ἀνθρωπίνης: man's, is a gloss, inserted most probably through a failure to perceive that the word thus far has been used in a strict and single sense, and from the consequent opinion that it needed some qualification. "Wisdom" is, all through, "synonymous with philosophy."] The adjective πειθοῖς has, from the earliest times, proved a stumbling block. It is found no where else in all Greek literature, though its use is warranted by analogous forms, as φειδός from φείδομαι. But the explanation, which would take πειθοῖς as a substantive, in the sense of: persuasions, and put σοφίας λόγοις in apposition, is inadmissible, if only for this reason, that the plural of πειθῶ no where occurs. Hence have arisen manifold conjectures for changing the ordinary reading, none of which are well grounded, not even the suggestion so acutely maintained by Semler, Rincke, Fritzsche, that the original read thus: οὐκ ἐν πειθοῖ σοφίας in fitting antithesis to ἐν ἀποδείξει πνεύματος, since it is decisive against this, that this reading no where appears alone without λόγοις or λόγων. Even in the ordinary reading, "wisdom" may be regarded as expressing the main idea, inasmuch as ver. 5 demands this. πειθός, otherwise πιθανός [and as Meyer suggests, "probably a word in common, oral use."] =convincing, winning, enticing, comp. πιθανογῶν, Col. ii. 4. [Corinthia verba, pro exquisitis, et magnopere elaboratis et ad ostentationem nitidis. WETSTEIN ad loc.] 2, positively—but in demonstration of the Spirit and of power.—"Demonstration" stands in strong contrast with "persuasive words," since the word is often used elsewhere also to denote strong, cogent proof in opposition to winning speech. The way in which it is to be taken here, depends upon the manner in which we construe the associated genitives. These express either the object of the demonstration or its subject. In the former case the phrase would mean the practical exhibition of the spirit, as the source of spiritual life, renewing, enlightening and sanctifying, and of the power which resides in this spirit and which it imparts to man. In the latter case, the Spirit must be regarded as dwelling in the Apostle himself, and working through him, displaying His power in the facts he proclaimed, by rendering them effective to salvation. What ability he had to convince and convert would thus be ascribed to the living energy of the Spirit whose minister he was. In this way, as Neander says, "the demonstration furnished by the Spirit would be in contrast with that presented through words, and the demonstration of power with that of logical argumentation. It is the testimony of the Spirit which alone Paul admits as valid." This interpretation is to be preferred, since in the antithetic clause "wisdom" is to be regarded as the subject or source whence the persuasive words originate, or which begets and presents them. Hardly deserving of more than mention are expositions like that which takes "Spirit and power" as equivalent to: powerful spirit, or which explains the "demonstration of the Spirit" to consist in the proof afforded by prophecies, and that "of power" in the miracles Paul wrought (Origen and Grotius). Even were prophecy and miracle to be thought of in this connection still they could not by any means have been exclusively intended. In any case, the reference must primarily have been to that moral power from above which ever accompanied the preaching of the Apostle, and which acted upon the hearts and consciences of his hearers, awakening, agitating and quickening them to a new life. In all this there was a demonstration of a higher sort, more influential for faith than the strongest arguments of philosophy.

VER. 5. Expressive of ultimate intent both of God in sending Him to preach as He did, and of Himself acting in compliance with it,—that your faith should not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God.—The end of preaching is faith in Christ. But if this faith was grounded upon human wisdom and its arguments and persuasions, which were only a superficial assent, then would the foundation be loose. It could remain only until assailed by strong arguments of a contrary sort. But if, on the other hand, faith rested upon a Divine demonstration, which while it convinced, converted also, and so took possession of the whole man, it was then fixed and immovable, and could victoriously withstand all the assaults of human power and art.

[“Longinus alludes to the abrupt and unsystematic style on which the Apostle prides himself. ‘Paul of Tarsus was the first who maintained positive assertion without elaborate proof.’”—STANLEY].

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The nature of faith in Christ.—It is a trustful surrender of soul to Him; a conviction concerning Him, which involves at the same time a union with His person, even as He is offered unto us for our salvation—hence, with Him as "the crucified." It is a reception of Him in such a way that He dwells in us and we in Him. But this pre-supposes a renunciation of all self-confidence, and of all trust in any thing creaturely and human, whether it be in the line of action, or permission, or of suffering, as available before God for working out or earning salvation, or for establishing and restoring our fellowship with God. It is an act which can proceed only from a mind renewed and strengthened by the might of Divine love, since God's Spirit and power are operative in it, showing and convincing the sinner on the one hand of his own guilt and insufficiency for himself, and on the other hand of the holy and compassionate love of God, His saving righteousness and His almighty grace in Christ; and this, too, in a way to take down all boasting, and beget an implicit reliance upon God alone.

2. The sole means to produce faith.—This is a style of preaching which presents the great facts of redemption directly to the heart in their simple Divine energy, without the accessories of human science and art. In such preaching, God's Spirit and power can bear testimony, and glorify Christ, and bring to man's consciousness the greatness, and holiness, and wisdom, and glory of His redeeming love in such a manner as to qualify the heart for an exercise of faith. Wheresoever, on the contrary, human rhetoric with its artifices, and human philosophy with its speculations, are mingled up with Gospel truth, there offered some obstruction is to the operation of the Divine power; there some purely human influence, such as the charm of style or of fine reasoning, it may be, supersedes the Divine influence, and we fail of being drawn into the sphere of the truth itself, "as it is in Jesus;" there human selfishness and pride still have free scope. As the result, we have instead of a firm and lasting faith, only a feeble, sickly opinion, which is ever ready to yield to counter-influences, or to changed humors, or to new systems of thought; which does not carry in itself the life of man in Christ, or of Christ in man; which is not heavenly, but earthly, not deeply rooted, but superficial, and ever ready to vanish away.

3. The mood and attitude of the Christian preacher. He who clearly perceives what faith is, and what is requisite for it, and what depends on it; who sees what barriers of every kind, especially of false culture and foolish pride, oppose themselves to it; who understands how the pure and artless preaching of Christ alone has power to awaken faith, and yet what prejudices there are against such preaching, and how little it is acceptable to men, especially to the highly educated classes, and to those who either practise or tolerate the grosser or more refined forms of wickedness, and how the whole life and being of a man strives against the truth which seeks to slay their selfishness and their sensuality,—a person who comprehends all this as he ought, will recognize and feel it to be a task transcending all human ability, and too difficult for him in the imperfection of his spiritual life, to go abroad into the world, especially into the circle of the refined and learned, as a simple preacher of Christ crucified, and there maintain his stand. The persons he there meets, seek their satisfaction in art, and science, and learning; they take delight in luxury and sensual enjoyment; and the knowledge of this fact abates confidence, takes away boasting, begets timidity, awakens anxiety, yea bows a man to the very dust with a sense of his own weakness. But for this very reason does he become all the more suitable an instrument for Christ. The more emptied he is of self, the more can God impart to him of His spirit and power, and work in him and through him, the more will he be disposed to cherish a holy courage and confidence in God. With "the foolishness of preaching" he will be ready to encounter a world full of obstacles, and find himself strong enough to overthrow all its bulwarks, while he will feel ashamed to resort to secular arts for gaining an entrance for himself. And the earnest endeavor of every one, through whom God achieves exploits, is to become just such a simple instrument of the Spirit in subduing the hearts of men through the word of truth, and winning them to Christ.

[1. Paul the pattern of an Evangelical preacher. On entering Corinth Paul was confronting his severest task. He had just left Athens, where, notwithstanding his brilliant audience and great speech on Mars Hill, he had met with comparatively small success. We read of no Church having been founded there. And now he is to offer the Gospel in a city that presented in many respects far greater obstacles than Athens did. In addition to the pride of philosophy there was to be encountered here a degree of luxury and vice no where else to be found. And if there was failure at Athens, how much more the likelihood of failure at Corinth? It is in view of these discouragements, that the picture which the Apostle has given us of himself obtains its peculiar interest. The main features of it are 1. His inward feelings. He is not bold, defiant, self-assured, as an earthly warrior pushing up to an assault. On the contrary, he is much cast down, conscious of weakness, full of fear. To the outward sight, there is every thing against him. But while the flesh trembles, the spirit has courage to go on, being trustful in God. 2. His determination as to the course to be pursued. a. He will not cater to the tastes of the Corinthians, and think to win them by gratifying these. Fine oratory and subtle philosophy, however capable of these, he lays aside. They are not the means for winning faith, for saving souls. b. He will simply proclaim the testimony of God, holding up Christ in all His glory, and in all His shame, as the only means which God hath appointed to make man wise and holy, believing that however much this might scandalize the natural heart, it was the demonstration of God's spirit and power which would alone prove mighty for the overthrow of Satan, and the setting up of God's kingdom. 3. His aim. The faith he might awaken should rest in nothing he might say or do of himself, but solely in the exhibition which God should make of Himself through the Son whom He had set forth, and whom Paul was intent on holding up before the minds of men even to the utter hiding of himself from view].

2. HEUBNER:—The Christian must first unlearn in order to learn. To preach Christ the Crucified is to put Him and His atoning work at the top, to set all truth in connection with these, and to derive all good from these (ver. 2). Self-diffidence in a preacher helps more than self-confidence. It is a great thing to stand in place of God and proclaim His word in presence of angels and men (ver. 3). Christianity is sufficient for itself and needs no adventitious aids. No preacher should so far humble himself as to seek these, nor should the people expect them. What is the demonstration of the Spirit and of power? (ver. 4). It is the conviction of sin and of the need of a Saviour, which the Spirit works in the heart through the Gospel. This is something which no man can effect of himself. Hence what the preacher has preëminently to strive for, is that the Spirit may operate through his word; and the hearers, that they may experience this heavenly power. In order that the preacher may make "demonstration of the Spirit," he must have the Spirit. A faith which rests upon regard for a philosopher is 1, impure—a man's name is put for Christ's; 2, unsafe and fickle—human systems crowd each other out; 3, inoperative—the Spirit of God is not its source; 4, not genuine—science has no faith-begetting power. Therefore a Christian's faith should not rest upon scholastic wisdom, but on the power of God renewing the heart. What a person has experienced within cannot be argued out.

HEDINGER:—Christ Crucified the preacher's Alpha and Omega. Away with finery and feathers! Let the Spirit of God speak in thee. He knows how to hit the heart (ver. 2). Those conductors to salvation who have been proved in the furnace of affliction are the best approved. To the mariner on a wild sea, experience is every thing. To have only studied maps at school will prove of little account (ver. 3).

GOSSENER:—The death of Christ must be recognized and credited. This is what captivates the heart, and kindles the fire that burns. Faith in the Son of God is the greatest miracle of grace. It is a great consolation that here and there one soul that hears us is made to experience the power of Christ's blood for the forgiveness of sins. He who preaches Christ crucified must himself be ready for a crucifixion. Paul trembled while preaching that which blessed the world. Many false teachers, who betray the world and lull it into a death sleep, speak with bold front and without sense of danger.

RIEGER:—It is a question whether ministers do not try too much to conceal their weakness and fear, and are not too assiduous in filling up the gaps and pauses with artificial efforts; whether they do not shrink too much from the criticism of the world, when it insists so strenuously upon calmness, fluency and ease in a speaker. But where there is life, there will be fluctuations. Living growth has to break through obstructions.

[CHALMERS:—A minister has no ground to hope for fruit from his exertions until in himself he has no hope; until he has learned to put no faith in the point and energy of his sentences—until he feel that a man may be mighty to compel the attention, and mighty to regale the imagination, and mighty to silence the gainsayers, and yet not mighty to the pulling down of strongholds].

III.—THE GOSPEL, WHICH ABJURES HUMAN WISDOM, HAS NEVERTHELESS A WISDOM OF ITS OWN.

CHAPTER II. 6-16.

6 Howbeit we speak wisdom among them that are perfect: yet not the wisdom [a wisdom not] of this world, nor of the princes of this world, that come to naught: But we speak the wisdom of God [God's wisdom]¹ in a mystery, even the hidden wisdom, which God ordained before the world unto our glory; Which none of the princes of this world knew: for had they known it, they would not have crucified the Lord of glory. But as it is written, Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which² God hath prepared for them that love him. But God hath revealed them unto us³ by his⁴ Spirit: for the Spirit searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God. For what man knoweth (οἶδεν) the things of a man, save the spirit of man which is in him? even so the things of God knoweth [εἰδωκεν]⁵ no man, but the Spirit of God. Now we have received, not the spirit of the world, but the Spirit which is of God; that we might know the things that are freely given to us of God. Which things also we speak, not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost [the Spirit]⁶ teacheth; comparing spiritual things with spiritual. But the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God: for they are foolishness unto him: neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned [judged of]. But he that is spiritual judgeth⁷ [of] all things⁸, yet he himself is judged of [by] no man. For who hath known the mind of the Lord, that he may instruct him? But we have the mind of Christ⁹.

² Ver. 9.—ἡ is better than σοφία [the former, as it is found in A. B. C. Meyer, Stanley and Lach. prefer. But the Text. Rec. is supported by D. E. F. G. Cod. Sin. and is adhered to by Words. and Alf.]

⁴ Ver. 10.—Many good authorities omit αὐτοῖς: his. The omission is more explicable on the ground of what follows (ὅτι γὰρ πνεῦμα) than the omission of αὐτοῖς. [Yet it is omitted by A. B. C. Cod. Sin., doubted by Alf., rejected by Stanley.]

⁵ Ver. 11.—Instead of οὐδὲν. So the best MSS. and editions. ["There is a difference between the two words οὐδὲν and ἐνθεν." The former simply means "knoweth;" the latter "to know by acquisition." Words. Yet we have in III. 20 οὐδὲν γινώσκον.]

⁶ Ver. 13.—ἅγιον, holy, is not well attested. A Gloss. [Omitted by A. B. C. D¹. F. G. Cod. Sin. and rejected by Words, Alf., Meyer.]

⁹ Lech. Instead of χαρὰς reads εὐφροῦ. This is neither paramountly supported nor internally probable. [So also Stanley; but Meyer, Alf., Words., sustained by A. C. Cod. Sin., adhere to the received text. Meyer regards it as a mechanical repetition of τοῦ εὐφροῦ above.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

[In this section we have the other side of the matter under discussion. In view of Paul's repudiation of "wisdom," it might be inferred by the Corinthians that Christianity was a narrow, partial, one-sided religion, suited only to one particular portion of human nature; that while it professed to be the friend of true piety and sound morals, it was at the same time a foe to science and free thought; yea, that it stood in entire antagonism to that which both universal opinion and the declarations of the Old Testament esteemed "more precious than rubies," and was the ally of ignorance and barbarism. Such inferences it was important to obviate for the credit of Christianity, and in the interest of truth. Hence the Apostle goes on to state that the Gospel, which ignored human wisdom, and in some of its aspects carried the appearance of folly, did not abjure all pretense to wisdom, nor put contempt on the human intellect. He shows furthermore that while he deemed it expedient to confine himself when with the Corinthians to simple preaching, there was a sermonizing which went beyond this, and before fit audience could expatiate largely on the deep things of God].

VER. 6. Wisdom however we do speak.

—[The ὅτι here as is in the E. V. is to be taken as strongly antithetic]. Σοφία—the higher religious wisdom of Christianity. By this we are to understand not what merely concerns the form of discourse, such as an inspired way of speaking; nor yet what concerns its subject matter, such as the future relations and events of the Kingdom of the Messiah, to which the immediate context is said to point. (Meyer). The correct view has been given by Osiander, and Bengel says: "Wisdom here denotes not all Christian doctrine, but its sublime and secret principles (capita sublimia et arcana);" he also puts λαλεῖν, to speak, in antithesis with κηρύσσειν, to preach, making the former to mean private instruction and the latter public speaking. But his interpretation of the word "wisdom" is too atomistic, and of the word "speak" too restricted. There is no reference here to any system of secret doctrine. [What he does mean will be more fully considered hereafter, when all the characteristics given of it have been surveyed]. But traces of this true wisdom are to be seen in several of Paul's Epistles, especially in those to the Romans, Ephesians and Colossians, also in 1 Cor. xv. Its foundation is Christ (i. 30; comp. Col. ii. 3).—among them that are perfect, ἐν τοῖς τελείοις,—the audience for this wisdom. The "perfect" stand opposed to the beginners, "the babes in Christ" (iii. i.), and are identical with "the spiritual." He means that what he had not been able to deliver to the Corinthians in the immaturity of their Christian life, because they could not as yet apprehend it, he did announce among those of riper Christian experience. Thus we see that wisdom is the same as that which he calls "meat" (iii. 2) as contrasted with "milk." The same antithesis appears in xiv. 20; Eph. iv. 13 ff.; Heb. v. 11-14. To the Corinthians, as they were, he could only communicate what was suited to their yet weak powers of apprehension, viz., the great facts of redemption, with their immediate practical consequences, with their christological presuppositions and their theological foundations. And this was done in the simple form of preaching, or of bare statement that the things were so, or had been so, or would be so as declared, accompanied by Scripture proofs, such as are found in the book of Acts, and with applications to the inner and outward life of the hearers. But where, on the other hand, a greater maturity of Christian life and a capacity for the deeper comprehension of truth existed, there he was able to set all this forth in their fundamental proofs and in their intimate connections. There he was able to unfold the whole Divine economy in accordance with its eternal principles and its progress through time and its fixed laws and in relation to its final consummation, so that that which Grecian wisdom was in search of within its own sphere was actually attained in a way that was incomparably higher and Divine, and better fitted to satisfy the deepest needs of a thoughtful spirit.

The interpretation we have here given, which would seem to be decisively confirmed by what follows, is opposed by another on the ground, 1, that it is one entirely foreign to the Apostle, since he nowhere in his Epistle contemplated "the perfect" as his readers (but how of Phil. iii. 15: Let us therefore as many as be perfect, etc.)? 2, that it is in contradiction with ver. 2, (where, however, he is only speaking of the first proclamation of the Gospel); and the sense given is this: that the simple, scandalizing doctrine of Christ crucified contains in itself the profoundest wisdom, encloses a Divine mystery which is intelligible only to the perfect. But this explanation, which is conveyed also in Luther's translation, 1, has no sure grammatical support, since the preposition ἐν carries the idea of "in the judgment of," only when the persons are mentioned, who appear to decide a case by their own opinions (comp. Passow Wörterbuch, I. 2, p. 910), and especially in connection with such verbs as denote to be and to appear; 2, it does not correspond with usage elsewhere to understand "the perfect" to mean true Christians who seek true wisdom in Christ, or as Calvin does: "those who possess a sound and unbiased judgment."—[The view just given is in the main that which is advocated by Calvin, Olsh. and Hodge, who in favor of it argues, "I. that those who regarded Paul's doctrine as foolishness were not the babes in Christ, but the unrenowned, "the wise of this world;" consequently those to whom it was wisdom were not advanced Christians, but believers as such. Throughout the whole context the opposition is between "the called," or converted, and the unconverted, and not between one class of believers and another class. 2. If "the perfect" here means advanced Christians, as distinguished from babes in Christ, then the wisdom which Paul preached was not the Gospel as such, but its higher doctrines. But this cannot be, because it is the doctrine of the cross, of Christ crucified, which he declares to be the power of God and the wisdom of God, i. 24. And the description given in the following part of this chapter of the wisdom here intended, refers not to the higher doctrine of the Gospel, but to the Gospel itself. The contrast is between the wisdom of the world and the wisdom of God, and not between the rudimental and the higher doctrines of the Gospel. Besides, what are these higher doctrines which Paul preached only to the élite of the Church? No one knows. Some say one thing and some another. But there are no higher doctrines than those taught in this Epistle and in those to the Romans and Ephesians, all addressed to the mass of the people. The New Testament makes no distinction between (πίστις and γνώσις) higher and lower doctrines. It does indeed speak of a distinction between milk and strong meat, but that is a distinction, not between kinds of doctrine, but between one mode of instruction and another. In catechisms designed for children the Church pours out all the treasures of her knowledge, but in the form of milk, i. e., in a form adapted to the weakest capacities. For all these reasons, we conclude that by "the perfect" the Apostle means the competent, the people of God as distinguished from the men of the world; and by wisdom, not any higher doctrines, but the simple Gospel, which is the wisdom of God as distinguished from the wisdom of men." The argument is not convincing. It seems obvious on the very face of his exposition, that the Apostle is here making a distinction between that simple "preaching" of Gospel facts which he had been adhering to among the Corinthians, and what he calls "wisdom" which he had thus far held in reserve at Corinth by reason of the incapacity of the converts there to apprehend it. And surely the distinction is one which is practically observed by all preachers. There is a Christianity embodied in facts which a child may learn and profit by; and there is a philosophy of Christianity, a system of doctrine, a theology, which is dispensed only to those of mature intellect and experience. And so far from admitting the custom of the Church in teaching children the Assembly's Catechism, which surely cannot be called "milk," as a valid argument in support of the exposition, it may be a question whether the custom itself does not fall under condemnation through the Apostle's argument. The contrast is indeed between the wisdom of the world and the wisdom of God; but there is also another contrast indicated by the "however" with which the verse is introduced—a contrast between κῆρυγμα and σοφία, preaching and wisdom]. Accordingly we hold to the first exposition as the only one well established: "In order to obviate all misapprehension of his language, Paul here asserts that the Gospel does include in itself the true wisdom. It is altogether foreign to his intent to set up an opposition here between reason and revelation. On the contrary he here distinctly expresses the validity of a demand for a science that is to be unfolded out of Christianity; a science which must be the sole, true and all-satisfying science." NEANDER.—But a wisdom not of this world.—He here distinguishes that profounder development of the fulness of Christian truth designated as "wisdom" from all that which passes for such in the world without. It was not anything which sprang up in the natural progress of the race, either before or apart from Christ. The ὅτι as in Rom. iii. 22. "Like the German aber, it is used in particular when something is annexed in illustration as the complement of a sentence. That by "this world," he does not mean simply the great mass of mankind, the commonality only, but has in mind especially its leaders as those to whom this Christian wisdom was utterly foreign, is shown in the added words—nor of the princes of this world.—Does he mean by this the demons mentioned in Eph. vi. 12, as κοσμοκράτορας? Hardly. Ἀρχων with this sense appears only in the Sing. John xii. 81; Eph. ii. 2. And in any case these are not intended in ver. 8. According to Bengel the expression embraces the leaders both of the Jews and of the Greeks. Not simply influential, learned men, philosophers; also not merely the members of the Jewish Sanhedrim, but all those of high station in general, the multitude of those who bear sway either by their authority or by the respect which they command. These are described as persons who come to naught.—That is, they are bereft of all authority and consideration in the kingdom of God, in the world to come. He is not speaking here of their being overcome by the higher wisdom and power of Christianity, but of the utter destruction of their importance as leaders in that higher economy, at the institution of which everything which springs out of this lower order of things is done away, however respectable it may appear.

VER. 7. Now comes the positive part of the description, which is introduced by an emphatic repetition.—But we speak God's wisdom, i. e., a wisdom which He has, and which He has imparted to us.—In a mystery.—It is doubtful with what this should be connected. Certainly not with the following participle, "hidden," which would be hardly grammatical and also tautological, but rather either with "we speak" or with "wisdom." The first is to be preferred, because in connecting it with "wisdom" the article in the Greek should be put before it for the sake of distinctness; and then the sense would be: we speak the wisdom of God as a mystery, i. e., as "something which does not proceed from the human understanding, but from the Divine revelation."—NEANDER. Or "handling it as a mystery."—MEYER. Not however in the sense of any esoteric communications analogous to the Grecian mysteries to which neither here nor yet in the expression "perfect" (= initiated) is any allusion to be sought. But does not the explanatory participle following, viz., "the hidden," which certainly relates to wisdom, require us to connect the words "in a mystery" with "wisdom?" The article after the anarthrous σοφία is neither necessary nor admissible if we translate it: "a wisdom consisting in mystery" [although, as Meyer says, "its omission would be at the cost of perspicuity." Paul would, in that case, have expressed himself ambiguously which he might easily have avoided by the use of the article." But, it may be asked, whether it is not quite in the Apostle's style to put nouns in relation through a preposition in this way? Is not the σοφία ἐν μυστήρῳ exactly analogous with σοφία ἀπὸ θεοῦ in i. 30. What is meant by "speaking a thing in a mystery," we cannot comprehend, unless it is speaking it secretly or in a dark and obscure manner. Such must be the meaning of the term when made to qualify a verb. But certainly this was not what Paul intended to say, nor is it in accordance with the use of the term in the N. T. Here "mystery" denotes not a quality or condition of obscurity but a fact or truth which is made known by revelation. Hence it would exactly express the very thing in which Paul's mission consisted, and instead of being connected with "speak" seems to us most naturally associated by the preposition "in" with "wisdom." This view would seem to follow from Kling's definition of the word "mystery." This in the N. T., and especially in Paul's phraseology, denotes something unknown to man—shut out from his comprehension, and which is made known only through Divine revelation. It is used in particular of the Divine purpose of redemption, especially in respect to the participation of the Gentiles in the salvation wrought by Christ (Eph. iii. 3 ff.; Col. i. 26 ff.) of the final restoration of Israel (Rom. xi. 24), and of the physical change which is to take place at the resurrection (1 Cor. xv. 51).—the hidden means either that which was concealed or is concealed. It is the first, when a statement is added of the thing having been made known as in Rom. xvi. 25; Eph. iii. 9; Col. i. 26. But it is the second, when it is meant, that the thing in question is withdrawn from human knowledge. In our passage, where the fact of concealment is first enlarged upon (ver. 8), and then afterwards a revelation to the elect of God is spoken of in contrast with a concealment from others, the latter meaning is to be preferred.—which God ordained.—This expression shows still more conclusively that "wisdom" is to be understood in an objective sense, not of the knowledge of the enlightened and of the doctrine flowing from it as such, but of its subject matter, that which elsewhere is called "a mystery;" the Divine plan of salvation itself, in reference to the wisdom revealed therein; or we may say, the work of redemption including in itself its chief end and the sure means of accomplishing it.—before the ages.—He here goes back to the original ground of this redemptive scheme in the eternal purpose of God formed before the world was (comp. Rom. viii. 29 ff; and Eph. i. 5). The supplying of "to make known," or "to reveal," for the purpose of filling out a supposed ellipsis, is not necessary. On the expression, "before the ages," compare the similar expressions in (Rom. xvi. 25; Eph. i. 4; iii. 9, 10; Col. i. 26; 2 Tim. i. 9). "God determined on redemption before creation, i. e., already at the very foundation of creation there existed a Divine purpose to establish a kingdom of God in the world and therefore He made it." NEANDER.—unto our glory.—From the eternal ground of salvation he here turns to its final end, which also stretches forward into eternity. The glory he here speaks of is not the glory of the Church of the New Testament as compared with the Old, but as everywhere with Paul, when discoursing of believers, it denotes their full restoration to the Divine image. It is the state of redemption completed, wherein the spiritual life shines out in the effulgence of an incorruptible state. (Comp. Rom. v. 2; viii. 18, 21; ix. 23; Col. i. 27; iii. 4; 1 Thes. ii. 12; 2 Tim. ii. 10.) What is said in 2 Cor. iii. 18 does not justify us in including here that inward glorifying of the soul which is involved in our regeneration, and which takes place in this life. If, with Meyer, we interpret the wisdom of God to mean "His spiritual philosophy which He has revealed to His ministers," then we must understand this clause thus: which God has fore-ordained so that it should redound to our glory. This glory, which stands in contrast with the utter evanishment of this world's princes, is supposed by some to be that destined to be revealed at the coming of Christ in which Christians are to be partakers through that Divine wisdom. But is this thought Pauline? It may be doubtful. Unquestionably, however, this thought is, that God's eternal purpose, which comprises His plan of salvation, or in other words His wisdom, which proposes salvation for its object and devises the best means for its accomplishment, has for its final end our glorification. (Com. Rom. viii. 29 ff.)

VER. 8. Shows more fully how thoroughly hidden this wisdom was—which none of the princes of this world (or age) knew.—[The relative "which" is taken by Billroth and Stanley and others to refer to "glory." "That which belonged to eternity and was before the ages, was not likely to be known to those who lived in time or in this age," and this is still further justified by supposing an allusion to this in the expression "Lord of glory." But we are neither compelled nor justified in adopting this construction. The main thought of the passage is "God's wisdom," and it is to this that the relatives refer both in this and in the previous verse. What the Apostle here brings to view is the concealment in which God's wisdom was kept, by showing how entirely it remained unknown and unsuspected by even the leaders of this world, who were deemed persons of keen insight and took the management of affairs, and the argument for this was,—they would not otherwise have crucified the Lord of glory.—For it was through Him that this Divine wisdom, which devised the plan of salvation and aimed at the glorification of believers, was made known and carried out. And this, it were fair to suppose, they would not have done could they have seen the fulness of Divine wisdom and power which shone in him and which was flowing out upon others. "Paul here contemplates those who directly took part in the crucifixion as the representatives of that worldly spirit which was exhibited in the Greek philosophy. They acted in the name and in the entire spirit of the ancient world."—NEANDER. "The Lord of glory."—So also in Jas. ii. 1. This expression is not to be taken as equivalent to 'glorious Lord,' but, as in the analogous expressions, "Father of glory" (Eph. i. 17); "The God of glory" (Acts vii. 2); "The Lord is the possessor of glory." The genitive case used here in the Greek is the genitive of possession. "Lord of glory" is a title of Divinity. It means possessor of Divine excellence. "Who is the King of glory? The Lord of hosts, he is the King of glory" (Ps. xxiv. 10; Acts vii. 2; Jas. ii. 1; Eph. i. 17). The person crucified, therefore, was a Divine person. Hence the deed was evidence of inconceivable blindness and wickedness. It was one that could only have been done through ignorance. "And now, brethren," said the Apostle Peter to the Jews, "I wot that through ignorance ye did it, as did also your rulers," Acts iii. 17. The fact, that the princes of this world were so blind as not to see that Christ was the Lord of glory, Paul cites as proof of their ignorance of the wisdom of God. Had they known the one, they would have known the other. This passage illustrates a very important principle or usage of Scripture. We see that the person of Christ may be designated from his Divine nature, when what is affirmed of Him is true only of his human nature. The Lord of glory was crucified; the Son of God was born of a woman; He who was equal with God humbled Himself to be obedient unto death. In like manner we speak of the birth or death of a man without meaning that the soul is born or dies, and the Scriptures speak of the birth and death of the Son of God without meaning that the Divine nature is subject to these changes. It is also plain that to predicate ignorance, subjection, suffering, death, or any other limitation of the Son of God, is no more inconsistent with the Divinity of the person so designated, than to predicate birth and death of a man is inconsistent with the immateriality and immortality of the human soul. Whatever is true either of the soul or body may be predicated of a man as a person, and whatever is true of either the Divine or human nature of Christ may be predicated of Christ as a person. We need not hesitate therefore to say with Paul, the Lord of glory was crucified; or even in accordance with the received text in Acts xx. 28, "God purchased the Church with His blood." The person who died was truly God, although the Divine nature no more died than the soul of man does when the breath leaves his body."—HODGE].

VER. 9. Confirmatory citation.—But, as it has been written, what things eye hath not seen, and ear hath not heard, and into the heart of man have not entered, what things God hath prepared for them that love Him."—[We have here given a literal translation of this passage as nearly as possible in the order of the Greek text]. The first point to be considered here is the connection both logical and grammatical. This has been attempted in various ways. One is, by supplying a supposed ellipsis after "but," either by inserting the words "it has happened," so as to make it read, "but it has happened as is written" (Bengel); in which case a demonstrative clause would have been required after the relative clause; or by inserting "we speak," taken from ver. 7. It would be more correct, however, without supplying any thing, to go back directly to ver. 7, and connect there, and to find in ver. 9 an expansion and enhancement of what is said in ver. 8. "which none of the princes knew," so that ἀλλὰ instead of being translated "but" might be rendered "yea, rather." [This rendering is adopted by Stanley]. The reading would then be, "we speak God's wisdom, which none of the princes knew, yea, which no eye hath seen." In this case the clause, "for if they had known they would not have crucified, etc." would be taken as a sort of parenthesis, in order to facilitate the connection with what precedes. We would then connect ver. 10, "but God hath revealed them to us" directly with the previous words, "what things he hath prepared," inserting only a comma after "him." In this case, only, the repetition of the name "God" would appear strange, and would have to be regarded as done for the sake of emphasis. If this does not suit, then we may either assume an anacoluthon, so that in this break the sentence would seem to lose itself in mystery and distance inaudible (so de Wette and Osi.), or we may find the sentence completed in ver. 10, the proper antecedent being introduced with δὲ, but, as in ch. i. 23, to signify the antithesis there to ver. 8. It would then read "but what eye hath not seen, etc.;" these, "on the contrary, God hath revealed to us" (so Meyer and Alford).—Since the last mentioned mode of connection seems forced, and the reason assigned for the anacoluthon is not very clear, we prefer to assume a climax as above stated, introduced by "yea, rather," without joining ver. 10 directly to the preceding clause. [Hodge prefers the anacoluthon, and very justly says, in reference to this citation and to that in chap. i. ver. 31, "in quoting the Old Testament the Apostle frequently cites the words as they stand, without so modifying them as to make them grammatically cohere with the context."].—There is yet another difficulty to be considered. Whence is the citation taken? Since no passage in the Old Testament is found exactly corresponding to it, the patristic expositors supposed that the words were taken, either from some Old Testament Scripture now entirely lost, or from some apocryphal prophecy; and Z. Chrys. asserts that he had read these words in the apocalypse of Esaias. Grotius, however, supposes that they were taken from the writings of the Rabbis who had preserved them out of an old tradition. But in opposition to these opinions it must be regarded as settled that Paul uses the formula "as it is written" only in introducing citations from the Old Testament. Accordingly Meyer has adopted the solution that Paul quoted an apocryphal passage under the idea that the words were in the Old Testament. But before we resort to any such explanation, it is to be seen whether the dissimilarity between our passage and the Old Testament texts in question is so great, as to prevent us from supposing that he quoted freely here, as he has also done elsewhere, and as other New Testament writers have also occasionally done. Certainly Paul could hardly have had in mind Isa. lii. 15. "For that which hath not been told them should they see, and that which they had not heard, should they consider;" nor yet lxxv. 17; "For behold I create new heavens, and a new earth, and the former should not be remembered nor come into mind," unless perhaps the last clause, in the ring of the expression. But he may have had in mind Isa. lxxiv. 4, according to the original text: "For since the world have men not heard, nor perceived, nor hath an eye seen, O God, besides Thee; he will do it for him who waits upon Him"*—here there is a transition from the second person to the third, as is frequently the case in prophetic diction—since the formula, "as it is written," admits of a free quotation, and Paul is not always precise in adhering to the words (i. 19, 31; xiv. 21; Rom. ix. 33). We therefore unhesitatingly accord with Oslander in maintaining a reference here to Isa. lxxiv. 4. The sense common to both passages is, that God has prepared for His people who wait for Him, things far exceeding all human experience or observation. ἐν καρδίᾳ ἀναβαίνειν

Heb. עֲלֶה עָלָי lit. to come upon the heart, to become a matter of experience and thought.—In the word, "prepare" we have the carrying out of the "fore-ordination" mentioned in ver. 7.—But what does the Apostle mean by "the things prepared?" Meyer says the salvation of the Messianic kingdom (comp. Matth. xxv. 84.) Very well, but not simply in its future glories. What is intended is the whole work of redemption in all its essential particulars, from the foundation laid for it in Christ, on unto its final consummation. They are the benefits never before known or imagined, and far transcending all conception and surmise which are contained in God's revelation, and the glory aimed at and procured by it. "They are the gracious gifts and disclosures of blessedness, an insight into which, and an enjoyment of which are afforded us even here in faith, whose full fruition is reserved for a higher world." OSLANDER. That deliverance from exile to which the passage in Isaiah primarily refers, is in truth only a faint image of that which is to be considered as the literal fulfilment of all such expression (comp. also Matth. xiii. 17).

Vers. 10-12. The revelation of this wisdom and its means.—But to us God hath revealed them through His Spirit.—"To us," that is, Paul himself and his fellow-Apostles; for of Christians in general he is not speaking. See vers. 6 and 16—also iii. 1. [So Hodge; Stanley, however, says "believers generally, but with a special reference to himself"]. The communication here is not of an external, but of an internal sort. (Comp. the expression, "to reveal in me," Gal. i. 15). This is clear also from the agency employed. This agency is the Spirit, who executes God's purposes of redemption and is the means of enlightening them in the knowledge of their nature. He does this work so far as He is "freely given of God," ver. 12. The possibility of this revelation by the Spirit is shown in the following words—for the Spirit searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God.—"The Spirit" here is evidently, by reason of the connection, the same as "His Spirit" in the previous clause. Only there He is introduced as proceeding outwards and working ad extra, but here and in what follows as imminent or existing within the Godhead. An analogous expression occurs respecting the Son of God in Jno. i. 18, where the phrase "who is in the bosom of the Father" corresponds with "the Spirit searcheth all things," etc.; and the word "declare" with "hath revealed by His Spirit." The ability to make known the thoughts of God unto the Apostles is here grounded upon the knowledge the Spirit has of these things in their inmost source and profoundest depths. This is expressed by ἐρευνᾶν lit. to explore, to search through and through; but here, and wherever else it is used of Divine knowledge, it denotes the result of that exploring, i. e. a complete and thorough knowledge (comp. cxxxix. 1; Rom. viii. 27=καρδιογνώστης of Acts i. 24; xv. 8 and Rev. ii. 23. Chrys. ἀκριβὴς γνώσις κατὰληψις.) Βάθη θεοῦ: inmost recesses of God, the otherwise unexplorable depths where His thoughts and volitions have free play, the hidden mystery of His personality which correspond to those mysteries of His kingdom and of all His works and ways which the Spirit reveals. The image is drawn from the sea, whose depths are supposed to be unfathomable and bottomless. (Ps. xxxvi. 7; xcii. 6; Job. xi. 8). Meyer says: "The entire abounding fulness which God has in Himself, every thing which goes to make up His being, His attributes, thoughts, plans, decrees." (Not the latter exclusively). See also the phrase "depths of Satan," Rev. ii. 24. That such must be the office of the Spirit, and of Him alone, is now illustrated by an analogy.—Vers. 11. For who of men knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of man which is in him? Even so the things of God no one knoweth save the Spirit of God.—The logic is this: "The Spirit and only He can know the depths of God. For as the spirit of man which is in him can alone know what is of him, so only the Spirit of God can know what is of God." The Apostle puts the first member of the comparison in the form of a question. "Who of men

[* The margin of the E. V. renders the last part of this verse, "neither hath seen a God besides Thee, that doeth so for him, etc." This version is given by Ewald, de Wette, and Lowth. It is found also in the lxx. Luther's version, following the Vulgate, gives it as in the English text. Unquestionably the former are correct in putting "God" in the accusative case. It is also noteworthy that the clause "nor perceived by the ear," is not in the lxx., and Lowth thinks either that this passage has been corrupted by the Jews, or that Paul quotes from some apocryphal book, either "The Ascension of Isaiah," or "The Apocalypse of Elias," in both of which the passage is found as cited by Paul. It will be seen, likewise, that this clause is omitted by Paul, and that he has inserted another phrase instead—"Neither have entered into the heart of man;" and these words are so similar to οὐ μὴ εἰσέλθῃ αὐτοῦ εἰς τὴν καρδίαν found in the lxx. Is. lxxv. 17, that one can hardly avoid the belief that the two passages were blended together in the Apostle's mind, and were freely quoted to suit his case.]

knoweth, etc.?" Here the gen., ἀνθρώπων, of men, is not superfluous. The ignorance here implied is not an absolute one, inasmuch as God is to be excepted from it (Osi.); or, we may say, it carries a prominent emphasis: "no MAN knows what is of man" (Meyer)—τὰ τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, not βάθος: "the things of a man" in general; not his "depths." According to the context, the things alluded to must be limited to those of his inner life, his secret thoughts and purposes. The "spirit" of man is the breath of God in him, "the candle of the Lord searching all the inward parts of his belly" (Prov. xx. 27), the inner eye or light (Matth. vi. 23), that whereby he becomes evident to himself, recognizes his own distinct individuality, is conscious of himself, and of his thoughts and acts as belonging to himself, the Divine image in man, the principle of his personality. (See Delitzsch, Bibl. Psychologie, S. 116 ff.; Beck, Bibl. Seelenlehre, S. 947). By the words "which is in him," the spirit, as the principle of self-consciousness, is distinguished from the spirit in others, as the principle of objective knowledge. A like additional qualification to "the Spirit of God" would be out of place, either because God is absolutely one, or because His Spirit is also dispensed to others, as seen in the next verse: "which is from God" (Meyer). De Wette says: "Paul conceives of the Spirit not as being in God, as though He were the principle of God's self-consciousness; but he very wisely says merely 'the Spirit of God' in order that he might thus hold the way open for saying afterwards 'the Spirit from God.'" The substance of the comparison is this: as the knowledge of the inward man is possible only through self-consciousness, so is the knowledge of God possible only through the consciousness of God obtained by means of the Holy Spirit. De Wette, however, overlooks an important element in the Apostle's course of thought, in that the Apostle makes the immanent beholding of the depths of God on the part of the Spirit the ground of his function as a revealer. But the Spirit of God (in accordance with the analogy of the human spirit which is derived from Him and is his image) is the principle of the Divine self-knowledge, the ground of God's life as a self-conscious existence—that whereby God is personal life, is the One who is eternally and absolutely cognizant of Himself in all His thoughts, volitions and decrees, in His doing and working,—the One who is revealed unto Himself and then reveals Him abroad to others—the One who sees through Himself and also shines through the human spirit and so qualifies it for looking into the work of God. ["The analogies of Scripture, however, are not to be pressed beyond the point they are intended to illustrate. The point here is the knowledge of the Spirit. He knows what is in God as we know what is in ourselves. It is not to be inferred from this that the Spirit of God bears in other points the same relation to God that our spirits do to us." HODGE.] Having thus shown the ability of the Spirit to reveal the things of God, he reaffirms and corroborates the declaration of ver. 10.—Now we have received, not the spirit of the world, but the Spirit which is from God.—The expression is antithetic. But what are we to understand by

"the spirit of the world?" Certainly not any mental peculiarity; as most imagine, (Beza: ingenium humanum, [Barnes and others]: doctrina humana; [de Wette and Stanley: spirit of human wisdom; Hodge: a paraphrase for human reason]), since the thing contrasted with it cannot be explained in this manner. Neither can it be construed ironically, as denoting an utter want of that which is spiritual, or that show of spirit which the world calls spirit (see Osi.), nor yet as the finite spirit, in so far as it sets up independently for itself (Billroth). But it means that principle which controls the world in its thought and volition, and which is elsewhere termed "the prince of this world" (Jno. xii. 31); also "the god of this world" (comp. Eph. ii. 2; vi. 11 ff.; 1 Jno. iv. 3; v. 19). Meyer says: "The diabolic spirit under whose control the world is held, and which profane humanity possesses." Osiander discovers in it "a demonic element, blending in with, however, and manifesting itself in connection with splendid natural powers—a principle of selfish curiosity which excites and stimulates the mental faculties to knowledge, but does not overcome their weakness, and which, while alienated from God, ever remains involved, not merely in weakness and ignorance, but also in perverseness and error."—but—Inasmuch as he is treating no more of operations imminent in the Godhead, but of acts of external revelation, the subject in contrast is denominated—the Spirit which is from God.—"He brings to view the spirit as having been already bestowed." NEANDER. This spirit, coming as it does from God, and the bestowment of which conditions the knowledge of Divine things, and which belongs only to the children of God (comp. Rom. v. 5; viii. 9 ff.; 14 ff.; Jno. xv. 26), is to be entirely distinguished from the "spirit of man" which belongs to us as men, and makes us akin to God (Acts xvii. 29), and which constitutes our personality (ver. 11), and which is the immediate organ of the Spirit of God, needing, however to be renewed, and, because of its weakness, requiring to be strengthened. (Eph. iv. 23; Rom. vii. 22 ff.; 1 Thess. v. 23; comp. Matth. ii. 15, 16). The object of the bestowment of the Spirit is—that we might know the things which are freely given to us by God.—These things are the same as those spoken of in ver. 9 as having been "prepared" for us (comp. i. 30; Rom. viii. 24; vi. 28; Eph. ii. 8, 9). τὰ χαρίσματα, (from χαρίζεσθαι, as Rom. viii. 32)—gifts of free grace. By these are meant the blessings of God's kingdom which Christians already possess in faith and hope, but which they will enjoy in full perfection when the kingdom of God has been set up in glory. [Hodge very singularly says: "not so. The connection is with ver. 10, and the subject is the wisdom of God, the Gospel as distinguished from the wisdom of this world." But what are the topics of this Gospel but the spiritual blessings here seen and known in part, but afterwards to be known as we also are known? A distinction here is untenable]. The persons to whom they are given (ὑμῖν) are Christians generally, as must appear from the very nature of the case [and the knowledge they obtain is "the assurance of confidence." CALVIN. Those who receive the Spirit not only have a clear apprehension of the blessings God hath provided, but discern them as "freely given unto them." This must be so, as knowledge in the Scriptures is one with experience. There is no real perception without possession].

VER. 13. Having indicated the source of Gospel-wisdom, Paul proceeds to show how he proclaimed it, taking up the thought of ver. 4.—Which things we also speak.—That the speaking here is directly connected with the fact of having received of the spirit from the purpose of knowing and declaring, and proceeds from it, and is of a sort corresponding to the nature of the objects received, is shown by word, καί: "also." How he spoke is exhibited antithetically.—Not in words taught of human wisdom, οὐκ ἐν διδακτοῖς ἀνθρωπίνης σοφίας λόγοις.—The Gen. here is governed not by λόγοις but by διδακτοῖς. (Comp. διδακτοὶ θεοῦ, taught of God, Jno. vi. 45). [Most of the older English versions and Calvin construe the other way. Wiclif: not in wise wordes of mannes wisdom. Tyndale: not in the connyuge wordes of mannes wysdome. Rheims: not in learned wordes of humane wisdom. Cranmer and Geneva translate very nearly as the authorized version]. He means not in an artificial style of discourse, fashioned after the rules of scholastic rhetoric and dialectics, but in those taught of Spirit.—Πνεύματος without the article as in ver. 4, because it is to be taken qualitatively as denoting a principle higher than that of human wisdom. We are not here to suppose that any actual dictation of the language is intended, but only an operation of the Spirit upon the mind, "which strongly pervades and controls even the speech and modes of exhibition:" in short a simple discourse which proceeds directly from a heart possessed by the Spirit of God. [Hodge says: "This is verbal inspiration, or the doctrine that the writers of the Scriptures were controlled by the Spirit of God in the choice of the words which they employed in communicating divine truth. This has been stigmatized as the mechanical theory of inspiration. It is objected to this, that it leaves the diversity of style which marks the different portions of the Bible, unaccounted for. But if God can control the thoughts of a man without making him a machine, why not also his language?—rendering every writer infallible in the use of his characteristic style? If the language of the Bible be not inspired, then we have the truth communicated through the discolored and distorting medium of human imperfection. Paul's direct assertion is that the words he used were taught by the Holy Ghost." Wordsworth adds: "Here is a sufficient reply to the assertions of those who allege that the inspiration vouchsafed to St. Paul was limited to a general perception of divine truth and that he was left himself without divine guidance as to the form in which that truth was to be expressed. A caution also is thus supplied against the notion that there are verbal inaccuracies, and blemishes, and defects in St. Paul's representations of the supernatural truths which he was commissioned to deliver. Comp. Hooker, II. viii. 6, and Serm. v. 4; also Routh, Reliquiæ Sacræ, Vol. V. pp. 836-841"]. This is clear from the explanatory clause [which we render—Combining spiritual things with spiritual].—πνευματικοῖς πνευματικὰ συγκρίνοντες. The interpretation of this depends on the explanation we give to συγκρίνοντες. This signifies originally, to combine together with judicious selection, then to unite in general, to join, the opposite of διακρίνειν; with this then comes the idea to hold together, i. e., by way of comparison (2 Cor. x. 12), [this is the meaning adopted in the E. V.]; out of this there follows the idea of measuring, estimating according to something; and then of interpreting or expounding, as it is used in Gen. xl. 8 and Dan. v. 12 in reference to dreams, in which cases the signification to judge must be referred back to the idea of holding together the various elements of the process so as to get a proper view of them. At any rate there is nothing in these last passages to justify our taking the word in the text to mean unqualifiedly to explain [as Stanley does] whether we take πνευματικοῖς as Masculine [rendering as Bengel, Rückert, Stanley: "to spiritual men"] (which is by no means required by the ver. 14, since a new paragraph opens there), or as Neuter; rendering it "by spiritual things," meaning thereby either the Old Testament types used to explain the New Testament (as Chrysostom and others), or the testimonies of the Prophets, which, being inspired by the Spirit, are the fit illustrations of the things which Christ has revealed by His Spirit (as Grotius and others), both which ideas are remote from the connection, or "with spiritual words" (as Elsner and others). [Wordsworth interprets this clause comprehensively. "Blending spiritual things with spiritual," i. e., not adulterating them with foreign admixtures (2 Cor. ii. 17; 1 Pet. ii. 2) also "combining," for the purpose of comparing and explaining, e.g., the things of the New Testament by the Old Testament, or one spiritual truth by another]. Nor yet do we agree with Neander's view, "that which has been communicated to us by the Divine Spirit we explain in a form which is suited to that communication." The only correct interpretation is to take συγκρίνειν in its original import, and πνευματικοῖς as Neuter, and to render as above, carrying the meaning: uniting the spiritual matters which are the subject of our discourse (λαλοῦμεν, ver. 12) with words and forms that are taught of the Spirit. So Castalio, Calvin, Osiander, Meyer. [Hodge and Barnes]. Thus understood the clause serves to illustrate still further the suitableness of the style of discourse just before advocated, and as Osiander rightly observes, contains no tautology, since rather "the thought is here stated in the form of a fundamental principle, and is taken up and set forth with stronger emphasis."*

[* The view given, but not advocated by Bengel and Stanley, seems deserving of more attention than Kling has bestowed upon it, and may fairly dispute the ground with that he has given. Συγκρίνειν, whatever may be its classical meaning, is used in the LXX. in six places at least, with the unquestioned signification of: to explain, to make that which was mysteriously hinted in visions clear to ordinary minds. This was what Joseph did to the chief butler and chief baker, and to Pharaoh, and what Daniel did to Belshazzar. And Paul is here speaking of dealing with things of like nature, i. e., supernaturally revealed, which eye had not seen, etc. And what more natural than for him to use

VER. 14. [Explains the reason why this higher spiritual wisdom is not indiscriminately imparted, but "spoken only to the perfect." It is seen in the incapacity of multitudes to apprehend it, and to discern "the Divine impress it bears both on its contents and style of delivery." It is an inability arising from "their essential character, which is as opposed to the Gospel as it is in every respect harmoniously consistent with itself."].—But the natural (or psychical) man.—ψυχικὸς δὲ ἄνθρωπος. Here we have the character described. Luther explains it thus: "the natural man is one who, though he stands apart from grace, is still endowed to the fullest degree with understanding, sense, capacity and art." He is the opposite of "the spiritual man," see Jude ver. 19. ψυχικοί, πνεῦμα μὴ ἔχοντες, lit.: "psychical, not having the spirit." ψυχή: Psyche, soul, Latin, anima, is the intermediate between πνεῦμα, spirit, and σῶμα, body (1 Thess. v. 23). It is the personal life of the individual (Ichleben) arising from the entrance of the spirit into the earthly organ of the body as its breath of life, in which personal life the spiritual and the sensuous elements are combined, the one entering into the other. The spiritual element, by becoming psychical or natural, forms a power of consciousness and volition, sinks into the life of sensation and impulse and embodies itself in the man and becomes organic. The sensuous element on the other hand (which taken out of the world of sense the soul fills with its life of sensation and impulse), being possessed by the spiritual power, becomes itself spiritualized in conscious self-directed activity and made capable of intelligent knowledge and volition. By reason of this its double nature, the soul becomes dependent on springs of life that belong as well to the world of sense as to the spiritual world. But, with particular individuals, the soul exercises a free choice in regard to the degree and order in which from time to time these influences from συγκρίνειν in precisely the same sense as in the former cases. The allusion is almost palpable. Rendering the word then explaining, the train of thought requires that we take πνευματικοῖς as Dative Mas: to spiritual persons. Here, then, we see the Apostle reverting back to the thought with which the paragraph opens, "that of speaking wisdom among the perfect." "The spiritual things" here are the contents of this wisdom, "the perfect" are "the spiritual." And thus we have a hinge on which the course of thought passes easily over into what follows, and the δε of ver. 14 has its natural antithetic force. "Explaining spiritual things to the spiritual, but the natural man," etc. This, it is interesting to note, is the first construction given of this passage in an English version. Wiclif renders: "Maken a liknesse of spiritual things to goostill men, for a bestell man persuyed not through thingis," etc. Here, however, we have a new meaning to συγκρίνειν, equivalent to: making spiritual things match with spiritual men. And is this the meaning of the Rhemish version: "comparing spiritual things to the spiritual?" This evidently is a literal transferring of the Vulgate "comparantes," which is derived from "compare," and has for its first meaning to match to pair. Calvin has still another interpretation: "adapting spiritual words to spiritual things," which Beza substantially adopts. Here there is simply an inversion of ideas.]

[† It is to be regretted that there are no adjectives in English which distinctly preserve the important distinctions observed in Scripture between body, soul, and spirit. Much obscurity oftentimes arises in consequence, and we fail to perceive the profound philosophy which underlies Paul's doctrine. The adjective corresponding to the noun soul our translators render "natural." This is not a bad translation if we bear in mind the equivocal use of the word nature: that it either may mean, the course of things as they are, or the course of things as they ought to be," and that it is in the former sense the text takes it.]

above and below shall be appropriated and employed. It depends on its pleasure whether it shall isolate itself, and, with this, sever its own spiritual part from the Divine life of the Spirit, or whether it shall receive this life into itself. Now in separating from the life of the spirit, man, as a natural or psychical creature, gets divested of his spiritual character and becomes fleshly. There is, indeed, in him still a spiritual element; but then it no longer rules as a controlling principle, regulating his impulses and desires. On the contrary, being in subjection to the soul (ψυχή), the spirit becomes more and more subservient to the soul's perverse and carnal tendencies, from whence there springs deceit, falsehood, defilement in spirit, through contact with corresponding evil, and also that earthly and worldly wisdom spoken of in Jas. iii. 15. The soul, in itself robbed of the spiritual element, as a personal life (as spirit), is also unable to work out the spiritual things into a clear, intelligent apprehension by a free conscious effort of its own. Hence the mere soul-man, in other words the psychical or natural man, has neither inclination nor eye for the spiritual. He is closed up against all higher wisdom as if it were but folly. (Comp. Beck, Bibl. Seelenlehre, § 14 ff, 33 ff; Lehrweis, §§ 207 and 213. From all this it will be seen that the translation "sensuous," "sinnlich," is not exhaustive. With this there is included also the idea of the selfish. Besides, both the intellectual and ethical aspects are also to be taken into account. See Osiander, de Wette, Meyer*.—The ethical side of "the psychical man," viz., his disinclination towards the higher sphere of life, appears in what is affirmed of him.—receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God.—For δέχεται here is not to understand, which thought is afterwards expressed by γινώσκειν, but it means: to accept, to receive, as always in the N. T. (Luke viii. 13; Acts viii. 18; xi. 1; xvii. 11; 1 Thess. i. 6; ii. 13, etc.). οὐ δέχεται—ἀνυπόδετα, Acts xiii. 46. "He will not accept them, although they are offered."—BENGEL. The phrase, "the things of the Spirit of God," combines what was distinguished in ver. 13, the Divinely spiritual both in form and substance. The reason of this rejection is explained,—because they are foolishness unto him.—"Whereas," adds Bengel, "he is seeking after wisdom." And these things seem foolish, because they conflict with his narrow, foregone conclusions and prejudices.—

[* See also Owen, vol. iii. p. 257, where, basing his exposition on 1 Cor. xv. 44, he says: "The ψυχικός (i.e.) the natural man, is one that hath all that is or can be derived from the first Adam, one endowed with a rational soul and who hath the use and exercise of all his rational faculties." He takes strong ground against those "who tell us that by this 'natural man' is intended 'a man given up to his pleasures and guided by his brutish affections and no other.'" See his citations from Augustine and Chrysostom to the same effect. A profound analysis of this important subject, in all its connections, is given also in Müller on Sin. vol. i. p. 457, vol. ii. p. 367. Calvin: "The natural man (i.e.) not merely the man of gross passions, but whoever is taught only by his own faculties." And Bengel quotes Ephraim Cyrus: "The Apostle calls men who live according to nature natural, ψυχικός, those who live contrary to nature, carnal, σαρκικός; but those are spiritual, πνευματικοί, who even change their nature after the spirit." An able disquisition on the "Tripartite Nature of Man," in all its bearings on Christian doctrine has lately been issued by Rev. J. B. Heard, of England.]

and he is not able to know them.—This clause is either to be joined to the previous one, as assigning an additional reason for the natural man's not receiving spiritual things, q. d., "he considers it absurd, without being able to understand it" (Meyer, [Alford, Stanley, Tischendorf]); or to be taken as parallel to the clause, "he receiveth it not," and expressing the intellectual side of the case in an independent manner, so that the following words stand related to it alone ([Calvin, Hodge, Barnes, and others, in accordance with l. e. v.]). The first is the more correct. The natural man contemns spiritual things through prejudice and lack of apprehension,—because they are spiritually judged of.—The reason here assigned bears upon both the previous clauses which together explain why the Gospel is rejected. It appears all foolish and incomprehensible, alike from the fact that it requires to be looked at in a way for which the natural man is unfitted. ἀνακρίνειν, to judge of, as in iv. 8; ix. 8; xiv. 24. It denotes the result of investigation and proof, which it primarily in fact signifies (Acts xvii. 11; iv. 9; xii. 19.) πνευματικῶς: spiritually (i. e.) either by the spirit of man (not soul: ψυχή) quickened and filled by the Spirit of God, or in a spiritual manner, so that the Holy Spirit, whose are the things to be judged of, both as to form and substance, directs likewise in the judgment of them by His illuminating grace. In either case, the sense is essentially the same, although the latter comports better with the use of the word "spirit" in the context. [While it is the office of the Spirit to take of the things of Christ and show them unto us, it is His also to purge the mental vision so that it can see the objects presented, for the eye of the natural man is blinded by the god of this world, and to him, however presented, the Gospel is hidden. Hence the manifestation towards the man must be supplemented by a change in him, rendering him spiritually minded, and so producing "a congeniality between the perceiver and the thing perceived."]

Vss. 15. Presents a contrast.—But the spiritual man. i. e. he who, in conformity with the image of God (Col. iii. 10), has been renewed to an existence in the Spirit, Who, in turn lives in him as his life and to a constant exercise of his power in the strength of the Spirit; in other words, he who has the Spirit as rule, guidance and might (Beck, Seelenl. S. 35 ff.):—judgeth of all the things—τὰ πάντα [see Crit. obs.] all the things. By these we are to understand in accordance with the context, at least for the most part, or preeminently the things of the Spirit which the natural man is not in a condition to judge of. This reference is indicated yet more distinctly by the article τὰ: the [if genuine]. Besides the saying of Beck (Lehrwiss. S. 210) here holds good. "Only by being made spiritual is a man capacitated for the apprehension of spiritual objects. Such as God and Divine things, and only by the energy thus obtained is he able critically to test, and spiritually to govern all the remaining portion of his being as something inferior and subservient to the Spirit." So also Meyer (ed. 3) [only giving the passage a much broader scope, since he refers the "all things" not simply to those of the Spirit, but includes under it "all objects which come within the sphere of his judgment"]. "On all this can the spiritual man pass a correct estimate by means of a judgment enlightened and controlled by the Holy Ghost." [In illustration of this, Meyer alludes to instances of Paul's nice spiritual discrimination, exhibited "in matters not belonging to doctrine, and under the most varied conditions, e. g. in his wise improvement of circumstances amid persecutions and prosecutions, and during his last voyage, etc. also in his judgments respecting marriage cases, judicial causes, slavery, and the like; in all which he understood how to place every thing under the level of a higher spiritual point of view with wonderful clearness, certainty and impartiality; also in his estimate of different personages, etc."] But it may be fairly questioned whether Meyer does not here go beyond the proper scope of the passage. The object in view throughout the whole of it is a Divinely revealed spiritual "wisdom," which transcended the apprehension of "the natural man;" and it is not easy to see how affairs altogether prudential could be brought into the account]. The acceptance of πάντα as Acc. Sing. Masc. is against the previous context (see Meyer).—But he himself is judged of by no man.—The previous clause leads us to supply here, "who is not spiritual." For such as these the position of the spiritual man is too high. They cannot comprehend the inner life, or pronounce suitable judgment upon it. "Undoubtedly Paul said this with special allusion to such in the Corinthian Church as took the liberty of criticising him." NEANDER. Of course what is affirmed in this verse of the spiritual in general, must in particular cases be limited according to the measure and degree of perfection attained in the spiritual life (comp. Calvin and Osiander). One proof of the sense perverting exegesis of the Romish Church may be seen in their reference of this passage to the hierarchy and its judicial office in doubtful questions (Corn. a Lapide, Estius).

Vss. 16. Proof of the foregoing.—For who hath known the mind of the Lord, that he may instruct him?—The question is taken from Is. xl. 13; according to the lxx., with the omission of the words καὶ τίς συμβούλος αὐτοῦ ἐγένετο "and who hath been his counsellor," which come in between the words "Lord" and "that." The "mind of the Lord" is here identical with "the mind of Christ" in the following clause. We might, indeed, on looking at the passage in Isaiah, refer it to God; but since the words are introduced freely without a formula of citation, there is no necessity for this, and the identification of them with "the mind of Christ," is more in accordance with the course of thought. The νοῦς, mind, is the spirit as the source of thoughts, counsels, plans. The spirit, not however, as shut up within itself, but, so far as what is contained therein, is imparted and operates abroad. Hence it is not absolutely the same as πνεῦμα, spirit (as Billroth and Neander). ["This is rather the substratum of the νοῦς,—mind, and which being imparted to the man, makes his mind one with the mind of Christ." MEYER. "Ὁς συμβιβάζει = ὅτε συμβιβάζειν [Buttmann, § 143, I., or Kühner § 884, 2]. Συμβιβάζειν, to bring together, metaphorically, to put one's self to rights, to make oneself intelligible; and hence transitively, to prove, to instruct; elsewhere with $\tau\epsilon$, in the Hellenic idiom, also with a personal object; to teach some one. [This use of the word, Alford says belongs to the lxx; in the New Testament it means to conclude, to prove, to confirm]. The object in this case is not any spiritual truth, but the Lord,—but we have the mind of Christ.—[“We,” the Apostles, himself included, and in the view of his issue with the Church, perhaps emphasized. Of course other spiritual persons are not excluded, but they are not now brought into the account]. Hence, $\epsilon\chi\omicron\mu\epsilon\nu$, not—perspectum habemus. The word denotes that inward possession which is founded upon communion with Christ, upon having “put on Christ” (Gal. iii. 27).—The thought now brought out is this, the judgment of the spiritual man on the part of him who is not spiritual, would require such a knowledge of the mind of the Lord as would qualify a person to instruct the Lord Himself, since the persons who are to be judged are such as have the mind of Christ, inasmuch as His Spirit dwelling in them, and directing their thought, fashions them to His mind, and identifies their thinking with His thinking. [“Syllogistically stated, the argument would stand thus: no one can instruct the Lord. We have the mind of the Lord. Therefore no one can instruct and judge us.” HODGE.]

[Obs. We are now prepared to consider what this wisdom is, that is spoken of in this passage, according to the characteristics given by the Apostle. 1. It is a system of objective truth analogous to that taught by the Greek philosophers, and destined to supplant it: the true σοφία sent to supersede the false. 2. It is one that can be advantageously taught only to persons who by a practical faith in the rudimental facts of Christianity, have made some advances in the Divine life. 3. It is a wisdom beyond the reach of human reason or conjecture to discover—a veritable mystery preserved in God’s keeping until He should choose to make it known. 4. It is one which has been revealed by the Holy Spirit out of the depths of the Godhead; hence 5. It must comprise such things as are found there, and carry the mark of the Divine personality, viz.: the nature, attributes, and constitution of the Divine Being, His plans and purposes as Creator, His laws as the Supreme Ruler, His aims and methods, and decrees, and works as Redeemer; all these more particularly as bearing upon man, and shedding light upon his condition and destiny. And these are truths both ontological and ethical; truths for the intellect and moral sense at once; truths spiritual and eternal in their highest and broadest sense. 6. The forms in which this wisdom is communicated, are also Divinely cast. They are they the words and illustrations suggested to the minds of the Apostles by the Holy Ghost, who inspired them, and which must ever constitute the best statements of this wisdom. It is a wisdom whose truth and excellence are not directly obvious to the natural man. In order to discern intuitively its force and beauty, and to perceive its Divine character, there is required the spiritual eye that is conformed to the light of the glory of God as it shines in the face of Jesus Christ, and can by direct vision recognize its truth and heavenly source.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

[1. There is and must be a Divine philosophy in Christianity. The historical facts on which the Gospel rests embody living and eternal truths, which it is the life and joy of the spiritual man to contemplate and explore. In Jesus, the Son of man, there is incarnated the Word of God the Logos, from whom emanate all those Divine archetypal ideas which inform and regulate the whole created universe. By Him all things consist. His province it is also, as the Son of God, the Father’s express image, to reveal that Father in the glory of His perfections, in His laws, purposes and workings, and thus to exhibit the principles on which the world is governed. Moreover, as the Son of Man, it is His office to show what man properly is in his true ideal, and what are the problems of his destiny. Still further, as the Son of God and the Son of man combined to constitute the mediatorial King, He becomes the centre of all human history, the Head of that kingdom with reference to which all things in the world are controlled and governed. Christianity, therefore, carries in itself the substance of all sound theology, and anthropology, and ethics, and historical science. Jesus Himself being the absolute Truth and Life, in Him there must be hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge, and these treasures it will be the province of an enlightened intelligence to explore, and bring forth, and make known to the apprehension of mankind as that which is alone worthy of study and fitted to nourish alike the mind and heart. Thus it will be found in the end that the researches of right reason are directly in the line of faith’s leading—that the scheme of Christianity as set forth in the doctrines of the Gospel is in accordance with true science—yes, its very substance—and that “religion passes out of the ken of reason only when the eye of reason has reached its horizon, and that faith is but its continuation,” revealing to the devout worshipper the things which eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor hath entered into the heart of man to conceive].

[2. This Divine philosophy is distinctly apprehended only by a renewed sanctified intelligence. Here life and light coincide. We believe in order that we may understand, and experience becomes the only fit guide and teacher. Sin and the remains of sin prove a disqualification for knowledge and beget folly. Hence it is that the communication of this Divine wisdom is suited only to such as have made attainments in piety, and must be measured out in proportion to their attainments by a wise economy. Christ being our light, so far as He is our life, it must follow] that with the unfolding of this new life in us, and to the degree in which the principle of this life, even the Divine Spirit, mortifies the works of the flesh and breaks down our narrow-minded selfishness, and clears our intelligence of all prejudices, and emancipates us from human authorities, and from our self-complacency, and from our delight in whatsoever flatters and pleases self, will this Divine wisdom dawn with ever-growing clearness upon our apprehensions, and our understanding of God's thoughts and ways become enlarged, and our susceptibility for still further disclosures be increased. If on the awakened conscience of the sinner there arises at the start the light of God's pardoning and restoring grace beaming from the person of Christ evidently crucified before his eyes, and under its radiance he sees the follies of the past and the obligations of the future, and learns his indebtedness to redeeming love, and experiences its saving and gladdening influences, and feels in himself the quickening of a new and higher principle with all its uplifting powers and emotions, then in all this there will be laid the foundation of a knowledge of Christ, and what He is, and what is the nature of the life that proceeds from Him, to which each day's experience and reflection will constantly contribute. As his piety matures, the more he will come to understand something of the riches that are to be found in Christ—of His relations to the Godhead as the Eternal and Only-Begotten of the Father—of His relations to humanity as its Prince and Head—of the atonement founded upon the intimate union of His two natures—of the method and means by which His redeeming work was begun and is carried on and will be perfected at last—of the operations of the Holy Spirit in the instrumentalities of the Gospel—of the gifts of grace—of the foundation and increase of the Church—of God's superintendence over the race in guiding it to a participation in the blessings of his salvation—of the way in which these things condition each other, and how they all come to rest upon the decree of the all-wise and merciful God which infinitely exceeds all human imaginings, and to the realization of which the whole history of the race in all its main branches, both before and after Christ, must tend—of the manner in which God will consummate His redeeming work, both in its direct progress and in its remoter connection with what precedes, and in its resemblances to the work of creation (1 Cor. xv.), and finally of the immanent relations of the Godhead which lie at the foundation of this whole process. These are some of the truths which will gradually unfold their glorious meanings upon the mind of the growing Christian, making his path shine brighter and brighter until the perfect day. Mere beginners cannot be expected to comprehend them. They transcend the apprehension even of the most distinguished sages of the world, and range beyond the scope of man's natural experience and observation—yea, beyond the flights of human imagination and hope. But to the sincere believer they are made known with ever greater clearness through the illumination of the Holy Spirit.

3. The office of the Holy Spirit as the revealer rests upon essential distinctions in the being of God. His external operations and His indwelling in the hearts of men are owing to an earlier and independent existence in the Godhead, by virtue of which He is called "the Spirit of God" in a manner analogous to "the spirit of man which is in man." Hence he must be supposed to exist in God not merely as a power or an attribute, but as an essential life-factor in the Divine nature, maintaining at the same time that independence which is already seen to follow from His independent activity abroad, and from the perfection of the Divine nature. He is God's proper self, as certainly as man's spirit is his own self; yet not however the entire God, just as the spirit of man is not the entire man. More exactly defined in the light of ver. 11, He is God as looking through and recognizing Himself, even as we may define the Logos to be God imaging and expressing Himself objectively. And if the Divine fiat which creates life abroad is, when contemplated inwardly as the Logos, a self-subsistent and creative Life, so is the Divine cognition which illuminates and creates truth abroad—when contemplated inwardly as Spirit, an independent and creative truth or light. God's being and begetting as Spirit, i. e., the Spirit in God and the Spirit from God, is Truth—is the Light and the Father of Lights. On the ground of these essential distinctions within the being of God, there is ascribed to the Spirit in ver. 18 a vision and a knowledge, which not only penetrates all God's works in their profoundest depths, and comprises in its scope all creaturely perception and all the mysteries of the kingdom of God (ver. 9), but also comprehends the inmost secrets of the Divine personality and most hidden attributes of God's own self. And precisely because He is this inwardly illuminated inmost self of God, and the all-penetrating vision of God, is He the Truth. Spirit is God (Jno. iv. 24) as being a personality which is in itself invisible, but which is conscious of itself in the whole circumference of its being and which thoroughly discerns and reveals every thing external to itself. And the Lord is that Spirit, in so far as He taketh away the veil from the heart and discloses His glory unto the believer, from one degree of splendor unto another, until the fulness of His light shines upon them (2 Cor. iii. 17 ff.; cf. iv. 6)." Accordingly inasmuch as God is throughout transparent to Himself, and manifest in His own peculiar and hidden self, shining through every thing, and glorifying all who are devoted to Him in Himself, He is Light in Himself, Light through Himself on all abroad, and Light to Himself. This is the inward significance of the Divine Spirit, and such is He in godlike self-subsistence as the living and creative truth," etc. (Beck, Lehre., S. 108 ff.).

4. While the psychical (ψυχικός) man imprisoned as he is in his own natural selfishness, living and moving ever outside of the sphere of God's enlightening Spirit, has no sense to receive the Divine spiritual communications so that they all appear to him irrational and absurd, the spiritual (πνευματικός) man, who has received the Spirit of God and is controlled by him, carries in himself a standard for determining that which is of the Spirit; so that he is able to estimate it, both according to its substance and its form of expression, and is therefore qualified to judge of everything which comes within his sphere, by this the highest measure of all true worth. But he himself is exalted above the judgment of the unspiritual. Persons of this sort are capable of comprehending or instructing him so far as he is governed in his conduct by the Divine spirit, about as little as they are in condition to know the mind of Christ, which the spiritual man hath, and so to instruct Christ Himself. But the spiritual man judgeth of all things, because he hath received the anointing of the Holy One, even Christ, and knoweth all things (1 John ii. 21, 22). These are they who are "taught of God." (θεοδιδασκoi, Jno. vi. 45.) This exalted state is maintained in the same manner in which it is won, in true, humble self-denial, in poverty of spirit, in steadfast, determined mortification of all selfish desires and unrestrained devotion to do what is good and wise, and in that simple-hearted abandonment which allows the Spirit of God to work in the heart, to will and to do of his own good pleasure. So far as these qualities fail, and self is suffered to hold sway, the man is betrayed into spiritual pride and into gross errors which arise from commingling and confounding what is human with what is Divine.

1. Rieger: The great distinction between the wisdom of this world and the wisdom of God.—1. a. The former changes its opinions and principles well nigh faster than its fashions. b. It is ambitious to give the tone to that which shall be esteemed proper and conducive to the public good, and to fill every sphere with its own taste and judgment so as to be in favor with the princes of this world. c. But, alas! those to whom it so devotes itself soon fade and pass away but too apparently. The greater part of them outlive their own credit for wisdom, and a false garnish of their youth is soon succeeded by the lustrelessness of an old age which is all the more wretched from the contrast. 2. a. The hidden wisdom of God emerges out of eternity, and is on this account liable to no change. b. Its benefits also stretch onward into eternity, and when the work of redemption shall be completed it will be found in glory long after the fashion of this world has utterly vanished. c. Its instruction flows with such purity that only those who lay the foundation for it in the fear of God are introduced therein, step by step, along the path of obedience. d. Against its demands the heart of man is so apt to be hardened that it is a rare thing for one of the princes of this world to attain unto the knowledge of it (vv. 6-8).

2. The mystery of the Divine wisdom.—What is here held up to faith transcends the sight and hearing, the knowledge and understanding of men (s. g.) the manifestation of the Son of God in this world, the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven declared by Him, His sufferings, death, and resurrection, the setting up of His Church through the power of the Holy Spirit dispensed in such lowly vessels, the ways and judgments of God with His people on earth hitherto and the numerous humiliations of the cross which yet issue in the clearer victory of the truth. Nothing of all this could have entered the heart of man, had it not been first declared by the Son, who is in the bosom of the Father, and afterwards more fully disclosed by the Spirit (ver. 9).

3. The revelation through the Spirit of God.—1. Its indispensableness to the knowledge of God, because God is alone, and is known only to Himself, therefore less capable of being "searched out" than men are by each other, since they possess a common nature. 2. Its sufficiency; what the Spirit searches out and can consequently impart is perfectly substantiated, since He as certainly belongs to the being of God as our spirit belongs to our human nature, and knows every thing respecting God with as much certainty as our consciousness reports to us what is in us. 3. Its contents and operation; what God has in mercy ordained respecting us, the reason why He has made us His children, and what He prepared for us for all eternity, this we learn from the Spirit of God. He teaches it; He awakens also our desires for it; He works faith in us, and He establishes and quiets the heart in this knowledge (vv. 10-12).

4. The preaching that is acceptable to God.—a. Is one that follows the lead of the Spirit, and b. It is attainable by the diligent perusal of the words of the Apostle, learned from the Holy Ghost, by inquiring into their meaning, and also by submitting our hearts and minds to the discipline and guidance of the Spirit. In other respects at the same time we are not to omit reflection upon the suitable construction of the discourse and the right use of all human aids, yet aiming, however, always to keep aloof from all that is purely our own, or is prized by the world, or is extravagant in diction, and to bring forth whatever is impressive and soberly considered, according as the Spirit of God has expressed it to us in the Scriptures. c. But even for this reason, can the true preacher not expect to please every person; for in preaching spiritual doctrines he is obliged to direct his attention largely to the spiritually-minded, who are assisted in the apprehension of his message by the help of the Spirit working in them also (ver. 18).

5. The natural man neither receives nor apprehends what the Holy Spirit teaches in the Gospel.—Such is every person who rests in his own natural powers and has not bowed his heart to the influences of the Holy Ghost, since in his love of self he trusts too much to his own understanding, whose insight and evidence he over-values, and is thereby betrayed into an aversion to Divine things. But such corruption is not simply a bondage to carnal lusts. It is also a wisdom that is after the flesh (vv. 12, 18); and the words of human wisdom excite an opposition to the doctrines taught by the Spirit, as well as to the simplicity of preaching. But this has its degrees: a. strong prejudice even to the avowed rejection of Divine truths; b. neglect of spiritual things, so as not to deem it worth while to lay aside prejudices and candidly to confer with any one in reference to them; c. assent to the truth, but without any strong faith wrought by the Spirit of God to the entire change of mind, hence accompanied still by hostility to the light, and by an incapacity to judge spiritual things spiritually.

6. The spiritual man: a, his ability to judge; b, his elevation above the judgment of others.—a. He who has been brought by the Spirit of God to the knowledge, faith and obedience of the truth, and daily learns, under Divine tuition, the things which are given us of God, judges everything which is presented to him appertaining to the knowledge and service of God, not indeed with entire infallibility, yet according to correct grounds. b. But in this he is neither subject to the judgment of any man, nor bound to allow himself to be governed by it. For with the force of the declaration, "Who has known the mind of the Lord? but we have the mind of Christ," he can swing himself clear of all human judgments and repose in that which Christ has revealed. But it must be remembered, that in order to be able properly to boast that we have the mind of Christ there must be in us daily communion with the word of God, an entire indifference to human glory, fervency in prayer, and a patient love towards others. O God, teach me by thy Spirit, for thus it is I live.

7. STARKER:—The longer and more truly a Christian serves God, the more spiritual wisdom he obtains (ver. 6). Christ and everything that is in and with Him, is an incomprehensible mystery; fail but to explore it, and thou art but a fool; but believe what is revealed to thee of it, and it is enough for thy salvation (ver. 7). Wonder not that the greatest in the world, the most gifted, the wisest, do not only not accept Christ, but on the contrary altogether torture and crucify Him. They understand no better, and think themselves able by means of their reason to comprehend the faith and religion of Christ, just as they do everything else (ver. 8). The royal dignity of the children of God is shown in the fact, that they perceive and spiritually judge all things, especially the internal state of the godless, while they themselves are wholly unknown to the latter; and hence it is that they will one day become, as it were, occupants of the great judgment seat as Christ's associate judges in the world's assize (Lg.). Oh, how unqualified is the unconverted teacher for the office of the Spirit, especially for judging correctly of the true state of the souls of his hearers (Lange), (ver. 15). The mind of Christ is the mind of the Father and of the Holy Ghost, and it is revealed in the Scriptures. Whoever then wishes to know the mind of Christ need not climb on high and seek it from far (Rom. x. 7), but let him hold fast to the revealed word. There he will learn what God means and what he intends to do with us (ver. 16).

8. HEDINGER:—Listen how a man ought to preach: Not in the stilted phraseology of romance, nor in the use of wretched wit; but he should utter the mysteries of God in the form of sound words (1 Tim. vi. 3), and as the Holy Ghost lays them to the heart and brings them to the tongue of His faithful servants (Matt. x. 20). (Ver. 13).—Is he that judges unregenerate? What better is he than a blind man undertaking to judge of colors? Is he regenerate? Then he has a mind akin to that he judges. And although opinions in reference to topics that are aside from Christ, the foundation (iii. 11), may be divided, yet will he pass no judgment on these contrary to love and mildness, much less set himself up to be the lord and judge of another's faith, in an arrogant, unbecoming manner (ver. 15).

9. GOSSENER:—It is not well to communicate everything to all. There are truths which can fitly be expressed only in certain circumstances and in certain degrees (ver. 6). Only to those who have come to the just consideration of their sin and misery will the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sins of the world, become the foundation and centre from which everything proceeds and to which everything returns (vv. 7, 8). Best of all is it to preserve everything in a pure, still heart, and let there be for every pulse a thanksgiving and for every breath a song, until all come together at last, and we can praise our Redeemer for everything with one accord in the right place and in society of the right persons (ver. 9). A glance into the deep things of God might awaken in us proud thoughts, as if it were possible for us to scan the Divine Majesty. But within this depth there is nothing else to be discovered but infinite love; that love whereby God condescended so low and stooped to commune with wicked, fallen, degraded humanity. These are the deepest depths and the most indescribable mysteries of the Godhead. This is what the natural man cannot understand—that God should make Himself so small. A glance into this mystery therefore does not elate, but it humbles (ver. 10). As we are obliged to learn men through men, so can we learn God only through God, or through His Spirit (ver. 11). The spirit of the world is at bottom the evil spirit, Satan, the god of this world, who has his seat in the hearts of the children of disobedience, and rules the world from thence. He must be expelled by the Spirit of God. He who has this Divine Spirit knows out of his own experience and inward observation what is given to him of God. He believes not at random, but what he believes that he knows, possesses, and enjoys (ver. 12). If a preacher surrenders his whole heart and mind and conduct to God, he will become so possessed by the Holy Ghost that it will be obvious to all that the Spirit speaks through him (ver. 13). There are honorable people with whom we can converse on many truths of Christianity, such as the omnipresence of God, etc., and they will hear and understand gladly. But as soon as we speak a word concerning the Saviour and His meritorious sufferings and death, then they say: "Ah, that I don't understand; that is too high for me." This doctrine does not suit one who has not the Holy Spirit. To the old man in us it is only foolishness (ver. 14). If we "have the mind of Christ," think as He thinks, will as He wills, put all matters before us as He puts them, then will it be granted us to understand the mysteries of the kingdom of God (ver. 16).

9. HEUBNER:—The man who is enlightened by the Spirit is able to estimate and judge all things, even the moral worth of the principles and acts of the unconverted, and the vanity of the earthly mind with its pursuits, because he knows what sin is from his own experience, and has torn himself loose from it, and because in the knowledge of the will of God, the absolute Good, he has a standard to measure everything else according to its real value (ver. 15).

10. On vv. 10-12. Schleier. Serm. 5th coll. Vol. 2d. From what the Apostle has said of the inmost nature and origin of the Spirit of God, it follows 1. that the operations of the Spirit are unique in their kind; 2. that every thing which comes to us from the Spirit is perfectly certain and reliable; 3. that it is amply sufficient for all our spiritual needs. On 1. To all other matters the world arouses us by means of our common understanding; but to "search the deep things of God," and to cry "Abba Father," this is vouchsafed to us only by the Spirit when He descends into our spirits. On 2. Since the knowledge imparted by the Spirit, respecting what is in God is as eternal and unchanging as the Spirit of God Himself, the conviction thus obtained that "God is Love" becomes also the deepest and most reliable truth of our existence, etc. On 8. There is nothing wanting to our most blessed communion with God,—if only the Holy Spirit reveal to us the love of God as the innermost depth of his nature,—if only we are made to see that benevolent purpose of God, which has been actuating his paternal heart towards the race from the beginning,—if only it become evident to us that all the wounds of our nature may be healed through the fulness of the Godhead which dwells in Christ as He has become partaker of our nature,—and if only through Him the Spirit of God, who is poured out upon all who believe in Christ as a quickening and strengthening power, glorifies the Saviour in their view and causes them to realize the presence of Christ in Him.

11. [We must be cautious not to pervert these statements into arguments for the disparagement of human reason and learning in the matters of religion. See this point argued in extenso by Richard Hooker (III. viii. 4-11). So Wordsworth].

IV. THE UNFITNESS OF THE CORINTHIANS TO RECEIVE TRUE WISDOM.

CHAPTER III. 1-4.

AND I, [I also¹] brethren, could not speak unto you as unto spiritual, but as unto 2 carnal, [fleshy²] even as unto babes in Christ. I have fed you with milk, and [om. and³] not with meat: for hitherto ye were not able to bear it, neither [nay, not even⁴] yet 3 now are ye able. For ye are yet carnal: for whereas there is among you envying, and 4 strife, and divisions, [om. divisions⁵] are ye not carnal, and walk as men? For while one saith, I am of Paul; and another, I am of Apollos; are ye not carnal [men⁶]?

* Ver. 1.—The Rec. has σαρκικοί according to ver. 3, where a preponderance of authorities declares for σαρκικοί, and only a few, governed by the original reading in ver. 1, have σάρκινοι. Here as in Rom. vii. 14; Heb. vii. 16 we must read according to best authorities σαρκικοί. [So A. B. C. D. Cod. Sin.—followed by Gries., Lach., Tisch., Words., Alf., etc.].

* Ver. 2.—The καὶ, according to the best manuscripts [A. B. C. Cod. Sin.], is rejected by the great majority of translators and by the old church fathers.

* Ver. 2.—The Rec. οὐκ instead of οὐδέ is feebly supported and verbally incorrect.

* Ver. 3.—καὶ ἁγιογραφία is wanting in good authorities, A. B. [C. Cod. Sin.] and in the majority of versions and church fathers. Its omission is not to be explained. Probably inserted as a gloss from Gal. v. 20. [Wordsworth retains it].

* Ver. 4.—Rec. οὐκ ἔσονται ἄνθρωποι ἵστε. [Instead read οὐκ ἄνθρωποι ἵστε So A. B. C. Cod. Sin. Alf., Stanley, Lach., Tisch., etc.] οὐκ is better attested than οὐκ and ἄνθρωποι still better. The Rec. reading is probably taken from ver. 3.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

VER. 1. As in chap. ii. 1, so here Paul turns from his more general exposition to the consideration of his own ministry at Corinth. The points of connection are furnished in ii. 6, 14. The communication of wisdom on the part of the Apostles belonged only to the sphere of the perfect, of the spiritual; it could not be extended to those who were natural psychical (Seelische) and unreceptive of that which was of the Spirit. As every other person must have done therefore, I also was obliged to treat you as persons of the latter class.—was not able to speak unto you as unto spiritual, but as unto (merely) fleshy (persons), as unto babes in Christ.—Instead of ψυχικός, natural, lit. psychical, Ger. seelisch, he now uses σάρκινος and σαρκικός, fleshy and fleshy or carnal, the ordinary antithesis to πνευματικός, spiritual. The sense, however, is not changed by this, for the natural or psychical man is also at the same time a “fleshy” and “carnal” man (comp. ii. 14), and we can neither say, with Bengel, that these latter expressions are milder, nor with Rückert, that they denote simple weakness, while the former implies hostile opposition; nor with Theophy. that they are stronger epithets than “psychical,” nor that the latter refers to the intelligence, while the former apply to the moral side of human nature, such as the desire and passions. Meyer 2d ed., “ψυχικός denotes the category to which σαρκινός and σαρκικός belong.” 3d ed., “ψυχικός: one who stands outside of the influence of the Spirit, who either has not received Him at all, or has been again deserted by Him.” Such a person is also σαρκικός. But not every σαρκικός as such is still a ψυχικός, because a σαρκικός may be also one who experienced the influences of the Spirit, but is not sufficiently actuated by his enlightening and sanctifying power to overcome the hostile power of the flesh; he still thinks, feels, judges, acts κατὰ σάρκα (according to the flesh). “He is here not speaking of Christians as distinguished from the world, but of one class of Christians as distinguished from another.” HODGE.—Again it is a question how σάρκινος, fleshy, and σαρκικός, fleshy, stand related to each other. The former elsewhere is used to denote made of the flesh, carnal. [Barytones in ωος denote the material of which a thing is made, λίθινος of stone, ξύλινος of wood, etc.]. The LXX. employs it to signify partly the earthliness and weakness of man in contrast with God (2 Chron. xxxii. 8), and partly what is tender and easily impressed in contrast with what is hard and stony (Ex. xi. 19; xxxvi. 26). In like manner it occurs in 2 Cor. iii. 3). But σαρκικός is used in the New Testament, and afterwards by the church fathers, to designate the disposition and character as contrasted with πνευματικός. [Denominatives in κός express that which pertains to the noun from which they are derived, and are like our adjectives ending in ly]. Bleek in Heb. vii. 16 is of the opinion that in the first introduction of these terms they were used alike, and that it was not until later that the ordinary ethical signification was limited to the form σαρκικός which occurs but rarely in the classics. Meyer on the contrary sharply distinguishes. According to him σάρκινος designates the unspiritual state of nature which the Corinthians still had in their early Christian minority, inasmuch as the Holy Spirit had as yet changed their character so slightly that they appeared as if consisting of men flesh still. But σαρκικός expresses a later ascendancy of the hostile material nature over the divine principle of which they had been made partakers by progressive instruction. And it is the latter which, as he thinks, the Apostle makes the ground of his rebuke. In so far, however, as both epithets are of kindred signification, he could, notwithstanding the distinction between them, affirm, “for ye are yet carnal.” So Meyer. The distinction between an intellectual weakness and narrow-mindedness in the first beginnings of Christianity (to which also the parallel expression νηπίους, babes, refers), and a moral impurity and perverseness manifesting itself in the progress of Christian development, and involving also an intellectual incapacity for a true heavenly wisdom, is a distinction fully justifiable and consonant with the use of the terms σαρκικός and σάρκινος by the Apostle elsewhere. But that the term σάρκινος is to be here understood relatively, and as not denoting an entire lack of the πνεῦμα is clearly indicated by the phrase “as unto babes in Christ.” The time here referred to is that when they had just begun to receive Christian instruction, and were but recently admitted into fellowship with Christ by faith and baptism, and so become the children of God. They were of course then wholly immature and spiritually dependent, so that their conduct did not indicate the full impress of the Spirit. Their conscious will, the I, was still fettered by carnal and selfish habits, and their ability to comprehend the deeper grounds and relations of Christian truth was yet undeveloped. In short the allusion is to that crudeness which is seen in children. [And does not the word “fleshy,” seeing that the Apostle had in mind the image of babyhood, also clearly refer to the appearance of the babe also—a little lump seemingly of mere flesh, as yet evincing but little signs of mind or conscience, although containing these elements in the germ? One can hardly avoid discovering here one reason of the use of the word “fleshy” instead of fleshy, which is an opprobrious epithet, applicable only to later years. That mere animalness, which is one of the beauties of the babe, becomes deformity and a disgrace in an adult. Hence the change of terms when the Apostle comes to speak of their after condition. They were σάρκινος at first, but not developing their spirituality they become σαρκικοί. That fondness for showy eloquence which was natural at the first passed over into the vanity and corruption of an egotistical partisanship, and so instead of attaining progressively a confirmed Christian character, they become carnal. In like manner the Rabbins also speak of little ones and sucklings. Schoettgen in loco. Wetstein 1 Pet. ii. 2; Matth. x. 42. On νηπιόεις comp. xiv. 20; Heb. v. 13; otherwise Matth. xi. 25.

VER. 2. The figure introduced in the previous verse is still further carried out.—I gave you milk to drink.—That is, he gave them nourishment suited to their age. To the beginners in the Divine life, He imparted such instruction as was easy to be understood, the rudiments of Christian knowledge (Heb. vi. 1), not strong meat such as adults only could digest, not the deeper truths of wisdom, which only those who had advanced in religious experience could properly receive, ii. 6 ff.—not meat.—This is connected to the foregoing in the way of a zeugma. [Winer, § lxvi. c.]. Instead of ἐπόσια, have given to drink, which can only be asserted of the "milk," and not of the "meat," some other verb, such as ἔδωκα, have given, is to be supplied. "The distinction between 'milk' and 'meat' can lie only in the formal treatment of the same fundamental truth." NEANDER. "To refer the distinction here to the subject-matter of the preaching, is required neither by the figure used, nor by the connection." BUÄGER. ["The same truth in one form is milk, in another form, strong meat." HODGE. "Christ is milk for babes, and strong meat for men." CALVIN]. The reason of the above precedence was,—for ye were not as yet able to bear it.—The time here referred to was the commencement of his ministry, and that of their first conversion, and the verb ἐδύνασθε, able is to be taken in an absolute sense, as it is used also in the classics, "ye were not strong or capable enough." MEYER.—nay, nor yet now are ye able.—The ἀλλά [which we render "nay"], is climacteric: not only were ye unable, but indeed ye are so still." It might appear inconsistent with this declaration that Paul proceeded in the xv. to expound to them the doctrine of the resurrection which certainly is strong meat rather than milk; but there was a special demand for such an exposition, which saved him from the charge of contradicting himself.

VER. 3. [Assigns the reason of the inability.—For ye are yet carnal—here we have σαρκικοί—not σάρκινος, as the word of censure applicable only to their advanced stage, and showing that though they had been Christians for a long time, they had yet the fleshiness of children upon them, now become fleshliness. The proof of this]—for whereas there is among you envying, and strife, and divisions [?], are ye not carnal, and walk according to man?—Here he refers back to what was said in i. 10, ff. In Gal. v. 20 he also counts these same things as among the works of the flesh, comp. likewise Rom. xiii. 13. Ζήλος, envying; in classic as well as in Hellenic usage, this word occurs in a good sense, zeal, emulation, and in a bad one, jealousy, envy. Here it signifies partisan rivalry. Out of this arose ἐρις strife, i. e. verbal disputation. If διχοστασίαι, divisions (see Crit. notes) were genuine, we should have in this a climax, indicating the schisms before referred to. Ὅσον, whereas, occurs in the classics, also in a causal sense, because, in so far as, since. Passow. According to de Wette, it is like ei, a conditional designation of the reason, "if there be," etc. According to Meyer it implies a local conception of the conditional relation: "where there is" (comp. Heb. ix. 16: x. 18).—Κατὰ ἀνθρώπον (also Rom. iii. 5)—σαρκικός. It is the opposite to "walking in the Spirit," Gal. v. 25. What he means to say is, 'your conduct conforms to the ways of men as they ordinarily are in their apostate and irreligious condition.'

VER. 4. A further confirmation.—"For when one says, 'I am of Paul'; and another, 'I am of Apollos.'"—The allusion to the parties is not as full as in i. 12, inasmuch as he has in this paragraph only to do with that of Apollos, or rather with the opposition existing between this and that called after himself. MEYER. "These were at the same time the most important parties at Corinth." OSIANDER. Here likewise the distinction is not stated according to grammatical rules. The ἐγὼ μὲν, however, brings out the contrast with emphasis: "I, on my part;" or, "I, at all events." (Comp. Passow μεν, A. I., II. 7; vol. II. I. p. 175 and 177).—are ye not men.—The same usage as in ver. 3: κατ' ἀνθρώπον. "after man's fashion." It was natural for the Jews to see in man (ὄν), the earthly, an implication of what was defective, imperfect, indeed the exact antithesis to God, and whatever was god-like. Hence the expression in the Old Testament: "the children of men," and especially "the daughters of men" (Gen. vi. 2), in opposition to "the sons of God." (This is, according to the only interpretation suited to the connection and the spirit of the Old Testament, which sets the sanctified portion of the race over against those who represent men, human nature severed from God). The expression as here used, is certainly unique, but entirely in accordance with the analogy of Scripture. "It means people who have not been lifted above human infirmity, and in whom the Divine element is utterly wanting." MEYER.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

Comp. on i. 12 ff.; ii. 6 ff.; ii. 1 ff.

1. [Christian truth is of different grades, and suited to different capacities. It has rudiments for the simplest child, and profundities which the angels desire to look into, and can never fully penetrate. It begins with the plainest facts of history, furnishing in these the foundation of a saving faith, but every one of these facts conduct us down into the deep things of God. Thus the Gospel is adapted to all classes of mankind. Its storehouse is furnished with all kinds of provisions, from the milk for babes to the strong meat for adults. In this we have one token of its Divine wisdom, and of its celestial origin and eternal destiny. Infinitude lies back of all its lowliest approaches to man in his fallen state, and in all it presents to faith, it furnishes that on which mind and heart shall feed for evermore].

2. The vanity of man apart from God. Human nature, originally so exalted in its likeness to God, so glorious in knowledge and voluntary power, has sunk so low by reason of sin, that God's word, uttering ever the language of truth, associates with man (when regarded apart from the person of Jesus, and from what may be realized through Him) the conception of something small, weak, incapable, transient, vain, false; in short, of such imperfection and depravity as results from a rupture of our communion with God. Hence the inquiry, "who art thou, O man?" (Rom. ix. 20; comp. ii. 1, 3); and, "what is man?" Ps. viii. 4; cxliv. 3, ff.; and the saying, "all men are liars." Rom. iii. 4. Indeed, as used in common parlance, the term is often one of contempt. Luke xxii. 60: "Man, I know not what thou sayest." Matth. xxvi. 72: "I do not know the man." On the contrary, in Christ everything wins a different aspect. While in the Old Testament the term, "children of men," is a disparaging epithet, Christ on the other hand, as "the son of man," wears the honors of One, who, though He entered into all the weakness of human nature, and incurred its worst ills, yet rose again, and on this very account became the Mediator of a perfect communion with God, and the vehicle of all its consequent blessedness to the human race. By His righteousness He counterbalanced the sin of the old Adamic nature, and averts all its bitter results. He becomes also the sole Mediator between God and man, and appears as the One who from the lowest depths of humiliation, has been raised to utmost height of majesty. Comp. xx. 18; xxiv. 27, 30; xxv. 31; xxvi. 64, etc. All this was foreshadowed in the vision of Daniel, where the Son of man is seen to come in the clouds of heaven, and to whom is given eternal power and a kingdom without end (vii. 13), and where human nature thus honored by God, is contrasted with the brute nature, the beast, which develops itself in the kingdoms of this world. The oft-repeated title conferred on Ezekiel, בן אדם:

thou Son of man, may also be regarded as typical of this One who is preëminently the Son of man. It was bestowed on the prophet as the receiver of the Divine communications, and was as honorable as it was humiliating (comp. Gerlach on Ezek. ii. 1). Of the same sort was the epithet, "Man of God," which was conferred on the prophets and other messengers of God, and passed out from the Old Testament into the New Testament. In fine, it may be affirmed generally that wherever, and to the degree in which communion with God is in any way predicable, the designation "man" at once obtains a higher signification, and becomes one of honor, and is prophetic of exaltation. Elsewhere it carries the opposite import.

HUBNER:—1. The wisdom of the Christian teacher is shown in knowing how to adapt himself to different ages, and to regard the necessities of his congregation; and to build up beginners unto perfection (ver. 1). 2. To the carnal nature belong self-love, vanity, ambition; these traits are exhibited in strife and partizanship. There is a zeal which is nothing more than an eagerness to maintain our own opinion, cause, or party, simply because it is ours, and we expect to stand or fall with it, and not because conscience bids. From this comes strife, contention about points of difference. The issue is division. Since neither will yield, they separate. This accords with man's fashion. Just as if Christianity were an affair of schools and sects, or as if one could act in the Church just as he does in the political world where factions and jealousies abound (ver. 2).

RIEGER:—1. God's method of instruction requires that we do not overload. Novices are to be treated as children. We are to be considerate of their weaknesses, and not to crowd upon them those deeper doctrines which can be properly judged of only by such as are spiritual and strong. 2. In regard to "milk" and "strong meat" let us not err. "Milk" is a designation not of cheapness and meanness, but of what is most truthful and most nourishing to the spiritual life.—"Strong meat" signifies not every thing which our intellectual curiosity may lust after, but the deeper disclosures of the fundamental verities of God's kingdom, the knowledge of which promotes growth in grace. 3. The carnal mind, suspicious, opinionated, and thus divisive, not only begets oppositions in doctrine, but also diversities in practice, which end in schism.

STARKE:—1. Cr: to become a believer is not the result of a fit of enthusiasm, as if the wind were to blow upon a person and he straightway became perfect; but we must hear, learn, pray, read, inquire until we are transformed from one degree of conviction unto another. 2. HED: God's children often have gross and unacknowledged faults which linger in them until they have waxed in faith and grown strong to overcome. 3. To discourse to young converts of the deeper mysteries of Christian doctrine were as irrational as to give strong meat to babes. And since with the majority growth is slow and difficult, we must often continue longer to deal out to them "the sincere milk of the Word."

GOSSNER:—Every one thinks his party has the kernel and others only the shell. Whereas they all are apt to let the kernel alone and dispute about the shell, as if that were the kernel (ver. 4). So is it with those who, having begun in spirit, go back to the flesh. Mistaking incidentals for essentials, they grow weak in the inward man and are soon puffed up (vv. 1, 21).

W. F. BESSER:—The mind of Christ tolerates no party-spirit, and no love of divisions. The conscience of many in this day is not sufficiently tender on this point. Indeed there are numbers who consider their Christianity so much the purer in proportion as they disregard the visible exhibition of Church unity, and are reckless in breaking the bond of peace which outwardly unites companions in one faith.

[R. W. ROBERTSON:—"Strong meat" does not mean high doctrine such as Election, Regeneration, Justification by faith, but "Perfection," strong demands on Self, a severe and noble Life.

The danger of extreme demands made on hearts unprepared for such is seen in the case of Ananias.]

CHAPTER III. 5-15.

5 Who then is Paul, who is Apollos,¹ but ministers by whom ye believed, even as 6 the Lord gave to every man? I have [om. have] planted, Apollos watered; but God
7 gave [was giving] the increase. So then neither is he that planteth any thing, neither 8 he that watereth; but God that giveth the increase. Now he that planteth and he 9 that watereth are one: and every man [each one] shall receive his own reward accord-
10 ing to his own labour. For we are labourers together with God: ye are God's hus-11 bandry, ye are God's building. According to the grace of God which is given unto 12 me, as a wise master builder, I have [om. have] laid the foundation, and another 13 buildeth thereon. But let every man take heed how he buildeth thereupon. For 14 other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ.⁴ Now if 15 any man build upon this⁵ foundation gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay, stubble;
Every man's work shall be made manifest: for the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire [itself: *αὐτὸς*⁶] shall try every man's work of what sort it is. If any man's work [shall] abide⁷ which he hath built thereupon, he shall receive a reward. If any man's work shall be burned, he shall suffer loss; but he himself shall be saved; yet so as by fire.

² Ver. 5.—Before διάκονοι the Rec., which Tisch., 6th ed., follows, has ἄλλ' ἤ. This makes the question continue to ἐπιστάταις. But the best authorities are against this reading, and it is therefore rejected by Lach. Tisch. and others. [For the true rendering see the Exegetical comment.]

⁶ Ver. 13.—αὐτό is inserted after ῥῆς by Lachmann, Meyer, Tisch. [Alford, Wordsworth, Stanley] according to the best authorities. [A. B. C. Cod. Sin. Origen, Chry. Eus., etc.]

⁷ Ver. 14. μενεί, future, is better authenticated [Latin version]. Received μένει [see note].

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

"From this point onward to ver. 28, Paul proceeds to explain in what light the Corinthians were to regard their spiritual teachers, and the work which these performed among them. And first, from vv. 5-9, he deals with the relation which the human instrumentalities sustain to the Lord who employs them; then, from vv. 10-15, with the responsibility which they have for their work and the decision to which it is liable; and, finally, from vv. 16-28, with the position which the Church holds and ought to pursue towards them."—BURGER. Ver. 5.—Who then is Apollos? and who is Paul?—The reading τίς: what, is at least as easily explainable on the ground that the answer given appears to point rather to "what?" than to "who?" as the reading τίς is capable of being accounted for from the effort to assimilate the genders.—["οὗν: then, follows on the assumption of the truth of their divided state."—ALFORD.] The question here put is not to be regarded as coming from the readers (Rückert) q. d. "Who are Apollos and Paul, if we may not have them as our leaders?" This thought would have been expressed in quite a different manner—more his own.—(Comp. xv. 84; Rom. ix. 19 ff.) It is simpler to understand the connection thus: "You call yourselves after Apollos and Paul. Who are these persons, then? From the answer given, it is clearly implied that the partisanship of their followers does not accord with the spirit of the leaders they have chosen, and is condemned as a carnality.—Ministers, through whom ye believed.—Were ἀλλ' ἤ: but, to be taken as genuine (see under the text), then we should have here an emphatic implication that Apollos and Paul were nothing else than mere ministers. There is in these words a mixture of two constructions: οὐδὲν ἄλλο, ἀλλά: nothing else but; and οὐδὲν ἄλλο ἤ: nothing else than. So Meyer on 2 Cor. i. 13. Fritzsche, according to Hermann on Viger, construes it otherwise: "but either—or I know not what." The phrase is to be found in Luke xii. 16, where its correctness is undisputed. It was plainly, therefore, not rejected because of its objectionableness. διδάκοντες: deacons, ministers, is here to be understood in its broadest sense, as contrasted with leaders. We may supplement "of your Church," comp. ver. 21, and Matth. xx. 28; or "of God," or "of Christ," comp. ver. 6 ff; 2 Cor. vi. 4, etc. The words following would favor the one as well as the other, or perhaps hint at a combination of the two—"ministers of Christ in your behalf." (Col. i. 7).—through whom ye believed.—Bengel says briefly and forcibly: "Through whom, not in whom" (Jas. i. 7). They are thereby designated as instruments in God's hand for the production of faith. And such they were in their function as preachers and teachers of truth. But this instrumentality was of different kinds; that of Paul, for the exercise of the faith, of Apollos, for its further development. This process is expressed in the aorist tense, as in Rom. xiii. 11; Gal. ii. 16.—even as the Lord gave to each one.—This statement is made to bring forward prominently the fact of the dependence of the ministers on the Lord, both for their gifts and their ministry, and so to dampen the disposition "to boast in men." καὶ ἕκαστῳ ὡς ὁ κύριος ἔδωκεν, not an instance of attraction, as if ἕκαστος so. διάκονος ἔστιν, ὡς—ἔδωκεν αὐτῷ. But ἕκαστῳ stands first by way of emphasis, as in Rom. xii. 3, because having spoken of them in general, he wishes next to designate what is peculiar to each one. There is no need of taking "the Lord" to mean God, instead of Christ [so Hodge], contrary to the usage of Paul, nor are we compelled to this by vv. 6, 9, 10. The endowment of ministers with manifold gifts is also ascribed to Christ in Eph. iv. 7 ff. In what follows, when "God" is introduced, the Apostle is speaking of something else, viz. of the Divine blessing, and of the dependence on God for desired results.

VER. 6. I planted, Apollos watered, but God was giving the increase.—Under these figures Paul exhibits partly the diversity of operation between him and Apollos, and partly their equal dependence on Divine favor for success. Paul labored for the founding of the Church, for the planting of the spiritual crop; Apollos for the further development of the life of faith thus begun, for the edification of the Church; he watered and helped to mature the growing crop. But after all it was to God, as the efficient cause, that both owed the results obtained. It was His power, working in them and through them, that caused the faith to strike root, and spring up, and bring forth fruit. "Αὐξάνειν: to increase, a designation of the attainment of an object which had been furthered by the Divine powers at work in the instruments, and by divers other auxiliary operations of grace which accompanied or prepared the way for them. ["ῥιζάνειν: was giving. Observe the force of the Imperfect, intimating a continued bestowal of Divine grace as distinguished from the transitory acts of His ministers whose operations are described by aorists."—WORDS.]

VER. 7. So then ["ὥστε: an illative particle of frequent occurrence" WORDS.] neither is he that planteth any thing, neither he that watereth, but He that giveth the increase, even God.—The inference here drawn goes to the discrediting of all human organs taken by themselves, and to the rebuking of all partisanship. ἐστὶ τι: is any thing, either in numero est: in account (comp. Acts ver. 86) or yet more strongly, is absolutely any thing. On the other hand, to the last clause we naturally supplement τὰ πάντα ἐστίν: is all (xv. 28; Col. iii. 11). Bengel: "is something, and, because He is alone, all things." What is here viewed separately for the purpose of counteracting the tendency to unduly exalt the instrument is elsewhere taken together; the agency of the instrument and the agency of God in their concrete unity (Rom. xi. 14; 1 Tim. iv. 16). ["In this passage ministers are brought into comparison with the Lord, and the reason of this comparison is, that mankind, while estimating grudgingly the grace of God, are too lavish in their commendation of ministers, and in this manner they snatch away what is God's, with a view of transferring it to themselves." CALVIN.]

VER. 8. Now He that planteth and He that watereth are one.—["ἐν: one thing neuter. God is ὁ εἷς, mas. He is the one agent; they are an instrument in His hands; and they are one as united together in Christ. But they are not what you would make them by your party factions to be, separate persons and rival heads and leaders of opposing sects." WORDS.] Paul does not here intend to deny the different merits of ministers or their separate worth, as though they all stood at par (Bengel, Billroth); he is referring only to their office and services. They are alike ministers. And in so saying he means to counteract all rivalry and all exaltation of one over another. The unity and mutual connection, which he asserts, do not, however, exclude diversities both in their labors and in the recognition of these labors, on the part of the Lord, in ways corresponding thereto.—And each one shall receive his own reward according to his own labor.—The words “his own”—“his own” stand in contrast with “are one.” Bengel styles it “an appropriate repetition antithetic to the “one.” κός denotes not the result, but the labor, the effort put forth. This, however unsuccessful, involves a fidelity and devotion which can be estimated by God alone. κατὰ indicates also the qualitative, and not merely the quantitative relation—ιδιον: own, that which especially belongs to each one, both in the labor expended and in the reward. The μισθός, as the context shows, signifies the Divine recompense. The full λήψεται (λήμψεται, Attic Ionic form) points to the reward which will be conferred at the coming of Christ. (Comp. iv. 5; 1 Thess. ii. 19; 2 Tim. iv. 8; Dan. xii. 8; Matth. xxv. 20 ff.; 1 Pet. v. 4). This reward is praise bestowed for the labor done. According to Bengel, “Something more than salvation.” It is an addition to the blessedness common to all the subjects of grace, which, as Osiander observes, consists in the various degrees of glory (δόξα) conferred on them (comp. Luke xix. 17 ff.); moreover it is a reward of grace, since the whole thing rests upon the plan and promise and operation of grace. Yet it is apportioned in righteousness, “to each one his own.” “Relatively to redemption nothing can be said of desert. But within the sphere of redemption, the question comes up, ‘how faithfully has a person employed the grace received and wrought with it. Here it can be asserted ‘To him that hath shall be given.’ This is what Paul means by reward.” NEANDER. That such a reward is to be expected appears from what follows:—

VER. 9. For we are God's fellow-laborers, God's husbandry, God's building are ye.—The emphatic word here is θεοῦ, God's. Since it is God's work to which we devote our labor, each in his own part, we are therefore to expect it from His truthfulness that He will not refuse to us the corresponding reward. This reference to what precedes (Meyer) has a decided advantage over that interpretation which regards these words as a comprehensive exposition of the calling of spiritual teachers, and their debt of service to the congregation (ver. 5 ff.), and especially of their oneness in it (ver. 8). In this case the γάρ, for, in relation to the first clause, would be explanatory and in reference to the second, causal (Osiander). “It is also preferable to that interpretation which, in order to make out here a rebuke of party spirit, takes the sense to be: Every thing is to be ascribed to God; therefore to God be all the glory.” BURGER. Inasmuch as the idea of a reward recurs also in what follows, it perhaps would be more proper to regard these sentences only as confirmatory of what was said respecting the reward. [Stanley takes the “for” as giving the reason for the oneness among the teachers. “Their object is the same (though their modes of working are different), for it is God who is our fellow-laborer, etc.; therefore they cannot be set against each other.” Hodge combines the two ideas]. Θεοῦ συνεργοί=God's helpers, who work with God.—not: “who do God's work associatedly” [as Olshausen], for this would be etymologically inadmissible. Even so συνεργόν ἡμῶν, 1 Thess. iii. 2. Although God works all in all, yet He works through His servants, whom He recognizes as helpers in His work, and whom He suffers to work, each one in his own peculiar way. Calvin: Eximium elogium ministerii, quod, quum per se agere possit Deus, nos homunciones tanquam adiutores adiscat, per quos ita solus agit, ut tamen vicissim cum eo laborent (cf. Osiander in loco). Here we have a hint of the dignity of the ministerial office, and of our obligation to keep in view God's objects in it. [Though, indeed, it must be said that the design of the argument is not to dignify the teachers, but to abate the excessive estimate put upon them]. Θεοῦ γέωργιον, a field belonging to God; so also θεοῦ οἰκοδομή, God's building. The Genitive of cause (=it is God who built you) [so Alford] is less fitting here, since Paul is speaking in the context concerning the performance and the reward of teachers, and in these statements he is establishing the expectation that God will grant to them their reward on the ground that that on which they are at work, belongs to Him. Γέωργιον (also in Prov. xxiv. 30; xxxi. 16)=titled land, a field, a garden, a vineyard; οἰκοδομή, a word of the later Greek=οἰκοδομία, οἰκοδόμημα. Both indicate the kind of labor pursued by God's co-workers: the cultivation of a field, the rearing of a building. But in making God (θεοῦ) prominent, the subjects on both sides retire into the background in a corresponding degree. Hence neither “we” (ἡμεῖς) nor “you” (ὑμεῖς) is expressed. Taking the whole context in its broader scope, and considering the aim of the whole paragraph, we might suppose with Chrysostom, that in the repeated mention of God in the last clause there was an implied rebuke of the tendency in the Church to call themselves after men [so Words.] (ver. 4) (cf. Osiander). The figure in οἰκοδομή (building), analogous to that in the “temple of God” (ver. 16; 2 Cor. vi. 16; Eph. ii. 21) is carried out still further in what follows.

VER. 10. Paul here proceeds to state what he himself had done towards erecting God's building.—According unto the grace of God, which was given unto me.—By “grace” he means not the Apostolic office as such, but those peculiar endowments which qualified him for laying the foundation (comp. i. 8, 4). Lit. ‘by virtue of the favor shown unto me.’ And this favor was manifest both in the call to office and in the bestowment of those gifts which enabled him to become a co-worker with God. By this acknowledgment of his indebtedness in advance, he obviates all misconception with a wise humility, and avoids all appearance of arrogance. The same expression occurs in Rom. xv. 15; xii. 8; Gal. ii. 9; Eph. iii. 2.—as a wise master master-builder I laid the foundation.—This was done in that preaching of Christ crucified, which had first elicited their faith (ver. 11; ii. 2). [“θεμέλιον, a foundation.” St. Paul uses the masculine form, ver. 11, and 2 Tim. ii. 19. St. Luke the neuter (Acts xvi. 26); which is Attic. The masculine is very appropriate here, because the foundation is Christ.” Words. In saying that he laid this “as” a wise masterbuilder, “he does not vaunt himself, but propounds himself as an example.” CHRYSOSTOM]. The wisdom he claims, might be regarded as that betokened in the act of laying a foundation, since the attempt to build without such preliminary work would indicate a lack of sense. Yet ver. 11 seems to imply that he had reference to the nature of the foundation, in that it was the only one suited for a "building of God," and such a one as a wise builder would alone lay. [Why not both?]. Σοφός, wise, skilful—thoroughly understanding his art. The same usage occurs in the classics. The claim here made, tells against the partisan disparagement of his labors.—and another bulideth thereon.—ἄλλος another, not merely Apollos, but also every person who had engaged in the work of the ministry at Corinth, "more especially those successors of his who were still laboring in the Church." OSIANDER. (Comp. iv. 15). To such, he, as the Apostolic "masterbuilder," gives the caution.—But let each one look how he bulideth thereon.—"How," i. e. in what way, and with what material. He thus warns them of the greatness of their responsibility, and of the importance of making the edifice correspond with the foundation. On this point he explains himself further by showing what is the only proper foundation of a church.

VER. 11. For other foundation can no man lay besides that lying there.—He here explains why he speaks simply of building the superstructure, and says nothing in regard to the foundation. This had been already laid, and was confessedly all right. There could possibly be no idea of changing or modifying that. ["In taking this for granted, he implies the strongest possible caution against attempting to lay any other." ALF.]. The emphasis here rests on "foundation," which is accordingly put first in the sentence. διναται, not may, but can. Paul here wishes to express the absolute impossibility of change, without entirely destroying the character of the building. And hence there naturally follows the utter inadmissibility of attempting to lay any other foundation. The thing is so contrary to the nature of the case, that no Christian teacher can be supposed willing to undertake it. παρά, alongside of, and yet not touching; hence, besides, beyond, contrary to. In regard to κεῖμενον, lying there it may be asked, whether the idea involved in τέθεικα, I laid, of ver. 10, is here resumed, so that it refers to what Paul had done ["in which case it would have been τεθέντα." WORDS.], or whether it implies what had been done by God in sending His Son to be our Redeemer, and laying him as the precious corner-stone of His Church [or whether it is with Words. to be taken in the middle sense as lying there "by His own free will and act."]. Adopting the second of the above interpretations, the verb "I laid," in ver. 10, would indicate Paul's accordance with the Divine procedure. He had laid in its place at Corinth that foundation which God had provided for the Church universal, by proclaiming Christ there as the only proper object of faith. This would accord better with the more general form κεῖμενον, and also establish the impossibility declared in the words, "can no man." "If God has laid a foundation, then surely no Christian teacher will think of laying any other. Accordingly, I also have made this the basis of the Church at Corinth, and could do no otherwise." ["This word, κεῖται, from which κεῖμενον comes, descriptive of Christ's character as the one foundation of His Church, is applied to Him in His first presentation in the material temple at Jerusalem. Luke ii. 84, οὗτος κεῖται εἰς πᾶσιν. It is observable also that the man of sin, who places himself as a foundation of the Church, in the room of Christ, is called ὁ ἀντικείμενος. 2 Thess. ii. 4." WORDS.]. What this foundation is, is expressed in the relative clause, —which is Christ Jesus.—By this he means Christ in His own person, not simply the doctrine of Christ as being a fundamental doctrine. ["The former interpretation which is adopted by many distinguished commentators (de Wette, Alf., Stanley), is more in accordance with the common representations of scripture, and perhaps also with the form of expression here used. The second, however, is certainly more consistent with the context. In saying that he had laid the foundation, Paul could only mean that he had in Corinth taught the doctrine concerning the person and work of Christ." HODGE. But surely it was not the doctrine as such that was the foundation. The doctrine availed only as it brought Christ directly and personally present to the mind of the Church, and induced them to build on Him. The distinction Kling maintains is a very important one. There is constant danger of persons mistaking the doctrine of Christ for the person of Christ. The former is the foundation of a theology, the latter of a life.]

VER. 12. The nature of the foundation being settled, he now proceeds to consider the several ways in which superstructure might be carried up.—But—["The δέ implies that though there can be but one foundation, there are many ways of building upon it." ALF.].—If any man build upon the foundation, gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay, stubble.—He here illustrates the various kinds of material that might be employed in the edifice, either worthy and durable, that could stand the test of fire, or worthless and incapable of passing the ordeal. Both sorts are mentioned in lively succession, without any express exhibition of the diversities implied. According to the best and largest number of commentators, from Clem., Alex., down to Oslander and Meyer, Paul here intends to denote by this building material, not persons, but doctrines, such as when joined with faith in Christ may or may not suit the foundation; such as in worth and durability do or do not correspond with the precious indestructible corner-stone. That the wood, hay and stubble were designed in general to signify such teachings as mingled the weak and disfiguring products of human wisdom, art, philosophy and Jewish traditions with the truth of God, is very evident. But any attempts to particularize, either as to the dogmas referred to, or as to the parts of the building they were intended for, would be futile and out of taste. Moreover, we are to hold fast to the idea of but one building contemplated, into which all the different kinds of material specified are worked, and not to imagine [as Wetst., Billr., Stanley] that two sorts of building are had in view, such as a palace and a hut; or that a whole city was intended, "the city of God," for instance. We might also very appropriately, but rather by way of accommodation, bring under consideration here the distinctive practical fruits produced under the different kinds of teaching and the different sorts of church members brought in and trained under the same. [So Theodoret adopted by Stanley, who deems the practical fruits the main thing referred to, and adds, "He is here preparing the way for the accusation of the incestuous person."]. To suppose, however, with Olsh., that there is any allusion to the private work of personal sanctification, would be untenable, inasmuch as the entire context treats solely of ministerial functions. Rückert's interpretation is too abstract and general. Proceeding on the ground that "work" (ἔργον) with Paul signifies the entire business of life, he takes the sense to be: "only he who builds upon the true foundation in a right manner, so that his work will abide the test, is entitled to a reward. He who builds on it unsuitably, can expect none. This only, however, can be said for his comfort, that he will not forfeit his salvation since it was his will at least to further the work of the Lord." On this whole subject, consult Osiander and Meyer. ["Precious stones" here means stones valuable for building, such as granite and marble. "Gold and silver," were extensively employed in adorning ancient temples, and are therefore appropriately used as symbols of pure doctrine. "Wood, hay and stubble" are the perishable materials out of which ordinary houses were built. Wood for the doors and posts, hay mixed with mud for the walls, and straw for the roof. These materials, unsuited for the temple of God, are the appropriate symbols of false doctrines."] HODGE.]

VER. 18. Every man's work will be made manifest.—The worth or worthlessness, the durability or perishableness of what a man has wrought is not to remain concealed.—For the day will declare it.—i. e., will make evident what is genuine or not genuine, what is truth and what mere show. This is a matter which often remains for a long time uncertain. But what are we to understand by this day of revelation? Not certainly the time of Jerusalem's overthrow [as Starke], for the Apostle is not speaking here of Jewish traditions, the vanity of which would then be exposed. Nor yet time in general, or any prolonged lapse of time, for the term "day" is never used in this sense by the New Testament writers, nor would it suit the following context. Ever since the period of the Reformation, Calvin's view has widely prevailed, that the allusion here is to the time when the pure knowledge of the Gospel should spread over the earth. So others also. But the apostolic usage and modes of thought warrant our understanding it only of the day of Christ's second coming (comp. iv. 5; Rom. ii. 16; 2 Cor. v. 10). This is the period of that searching, sifting trial which is to begin at the house of God (1 Pet. iv. 17), and which after manifold preludes will reach its consummation in the appearance of our Lord. In this sense the word "day" stands without any explanatory term in Heb. x. 25; 1 Thess. v. 4 ss.—Because it is revealed in fire.—What is revealed? The work of which he has just said "it shall be made manifest." To this it is objected that the sentence would in that case be tautological. But a repetition of this prominent thought will appear less strange in view of the fact that it is more distinctly defined by the additional words, "by fire," and that the following clause appears to be a fitting further development of them. It would indeed be most natural to regard "day" as the thing revealed. [So Alf., Stanley, Words., Hodge]. But nowhere is it said that the day of the Lord is revealed. Such a mode of speech would be unusual. It were better, with Bengel, to supply "the Lord" as the nominative, since indeed it is the day of the Lord that is referred to, and this construction would have its parallel in 2 Thess. i. 17: "When the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven in flaming fire." Here fire is represented as accompanying the manifestation of Jesus, (not, however, as a means of vengeance). But such a supplying of a word is warranted only in case no other suitable explanation can be found. If then "work" be the proper subject, "the fire" must be taken to denote that by which the work is tested. The relation of this clause to the foregoing then would be this: because fire is the agency by which the work is tried, therefore will the day of the Lord, who is to appear in flaming fire (2 Thess. i.), the day which is to burn as an oven (Math. iv. 1), make this work manifest. ["To show the certainty and perpetual imminence of that fiery trial of the Last Day, Paul uses the present tense (ἀποκαλύπτειται) is revealed." WORDS.]—And each one's work, what sort it is this fire itself shall prove.—This clause stands independently of ἔστι, because, and sums up the whole truth, stating once more the ordeal contemplated and the peculiar means of its accomplishment. It is the fire that is to try the work, and demonstrate its quality—τὸ πῦρ αὐτό, the fire itself, by its own specific action. That this means neither the Holy Spirit nor yet persecutions of any sort is evident from the interpretation given to the word "day." Still less tenable is the Roman Catholic interpretation, which discovers herein an allusion to purgatory. (Council of Florence). ["The fire of which St. Paul speaks is the Fire of the Great Day; not a Fire of any intermediate state. And the Fire which he describes does not cleanse, as that intermediate fire is feigned to do, but tries and destroys. It is not a Purgatorial but a Probationary Fire." WORDS. Besides "Paul is here speaking of ministers and their doctrines, and not of believers in general." HODGE, 9, v. 1]. "We deny not that anticipations of the judicial fire of the Last Day may be traced in the fiery trials with which God will visit His own house (1 Pet. iv. 12-17); but the fire by which Christians will be refined and purged before the end comes will burn not on the other side but this side of death." W. F. BEESE. NEANDER on the contrary says: "The fire is an image of the progressive purifying process which goes on along the course of the development of the Church. This process will allow only what is genuine and Divine to stand." It is, however, the outward and substantial manifestation of the judicial energy of the Lord, who will work as a purifying flame, so that everything in the labors of those who have been endeavoring to build up the Church, that does not carry the Divine impress, but is the vain and perishable invention of man, will be brought to nought. Of this manifestation we have a prelude now in the continuous judgment of the Holy Ghost, and in the persecutions which the Church here suffers. The effect of it is exhibited antithetically in VERS. 14, 15. If any one's work shall abide which he built thereon, he shall receive a reward.—This is the positive side. Μετὶ, shall abide (the future corresponds with κατακλησεται), shall stand the fire which is to consume all that is unworthy. "Reward," as in ver. 8. By this we may understand on the one hand, a presentation before Christ as a faithful and true workman, whose work is honorable to the Master (1 Thess. ii. 19 ff.; Phil. ii. 15 ff.); and on the other hand, an appointment to higher trusts in the kingdom of God (Dan. xii. 8; Matth. xix. 28; 2 Tim. iv. 8; Matth. xxv. 21-28). "The abiding of his edifice will be itself his great reward, just as Paul terms the fruit of his labor, and of his founding the Church his boasting and his crown in the day of the Lord (2 Cor. i. 14; Phil. ii. 16; 1 Thess. ii. 19). Still we do not in this completely gauge the reward of a true builder." W. F. BASSER.—Next comes the negative side.—If any one's work shall be burned, he shall suffer loss.—The omission of the conjunction is owing to the rapid rush of the thought, and renders the style more vivid. The "loss" spoken of is not of "the work," but "the reward." True, the judicial fire, which consumes all impure and untenable doctrines, will also consume his whole performance; but the consequence will be that he will forfeit his reward, and so incur damage (comp. ζημιωνεται, 2 Cor. vii. 7-9; Phil. iii. 8; Matth. xvi. 26). ["It is possible that this whole image, as addressed to the Corinthians, may have been suggested or at least illustrated by the conflagration of Corinth under Mummius; the stately temples (one of them remaining to this day) standing amidst the universal destruction of the meaner buildings." STANLEY].—But he himself shall be saved;—αὐτὸς δὲ, he himself, as contrasted with the reward [and also with the work]. Here it is presupposed that the individual has been building indeed upon the true foundation, Christ, but has failed only in respect to the manner of his building (from infirmity of the flesh or from ignorance, as Calvin suggests). Altogether superfluous and incorrect would it be to translate it 'he can be saved.' To supply the condition, 'if it be possible,' is wholly arbitrary; and still more so to assume that by 'work' is meant the scholars of a good teacher who perish without his fault. Many of the Fathers interpret σωθησεται, be saved, in the sense of τηρηθησεται, should be preserved, as if it meant: shall be not annihilated but kept alive in eternal torments and in fire. But this, apart from all other objections, is contrary to the usage of the word in the New Testament. It can only mean: he shall obtain salvation in Christ. "Here we have one clear evidence that salvation is not a reward, but is freely given to us through the merits of Christ." W. F. BASSER.—Yet so as through fire.—(ὡς διὰ πυρός). Herein is expressed the narrowness of the person's escape. He will be snatched as a brand from the burning, saving nothing but his bare life (comp. Zach. iii. 2; Amos iv. 11; Jude 28). The image is not that of a man living in a house, but of one occupied with the building of it, and who just delivers himself with great effort from the conflagration that has caught his work, and sees in sadness and anxiety the loss of all he has done, to the marring of his blessedness. And such a person attains only to a lower stage of bliss (comp. Matth. xx. 16; Mark x. 31, last clause). So Meyer, rejecting however, the idea that words embody anything of the nature of a proverb, since Paul is here speaking literally of a consuming fire. But nevertheless the use of the word ὡς, as, constrains us to regard it as such. For although we should interpret "as" in the same manner as we do in Jno. i. 14, and render, 'just as one would expect in the case of a conflagration,' still it would amount to about the same thing. Only we might say it is not to be understood as a proverb merely (comp. Osiander, p. 174 f).

I. Ministers are co-workers with God.—It is in this that the highest dignity of the Christian teacher consists. To wish to be nothing but an instrument for performing the Divine will, to aim at nothing but the fulfilment of God's designs, to desire to have and to exercise no power save what this line of action includes, to covet no reward, no honor, no enjoyment, excepting what comes from such labor, and helps to the more complete discharge of this calling, this is the characteristic of a servant of God, who follows Christ in self-denial and love, and purposes only to save souls for God and consecrates to this all his faculties, and is diligent to present to God a work pleasing to Him and honorable to His holy Son, and neither seeks nor strives after any glory for himself, but is content that God be exalted Supreme over all, and that His will alone should prevail. To such a person, nothing is too insignificant to be undertaken, provided it serves this end. No work will he be ashamed of or shun, even though it be among those who are low, or despised, or degraded, provided the gracious designs of God may be accomplished thereby. Such servants are, in truth, co-workers with God. He takes them into a fellowship of labor with Himself. He shares with them His exalted work of renewing, blessing, sanctifying and glorifying lost creatures. He shares with them also His authority, His power, His honor, His joy in this work. And this He is able to do because they have entered into a fellowship with Him in His thoughts and intentions by the operation of the Holy Ghost; because the spirit of Christ, God's perfect servant, animates them; because His mind is also their mind; and because the holy will of a self-denying, self-devoted love is alive and strong in their hearts. For this reason, they will have nothing to do with partisanship. It sickens them to see poor lost souls clinging to them and wishing to make them masters alongside of Christ, or in His place; to see people following their directions, and exalting their merely human and personal peculiarities into a standard of authority by which to regulate their conduct. Such proceedings they repel, and they strive with all their might instead to fasten souls upon Christ as their only master. The higher God places them, the more intent are they on being nothing, and passing for nothing, in themselves. Then and thus the Church of God is built up in truth.

2. This Church is God's field.—This truth controverts all party action in the same way that the view just given, of teachers being God's servants and co-laborers, controverts it. The Church belongs to God; He it is who tills the field—externally, by the preaching of the Word—internally, by His Spirit. What teachers do is to plant and to water. But the word sown is His seed; all the ability employed in its first planting and after culture is His gift; on Him depends all success. Without His blessing, all planting and all watering, however skilful and careful, amount to nothing. What thus belongs to God is a sacred possession, which must be secured for Him. To wish to introduce another there as co-possessor is a wicked ignoring and contemning of God's right. Indeed, not to acknowledge this right in its entireness, is virtually to deny it altogether. And such denial takes place when we adopt human teachers as our masters, and follow them, and call ourselves by their names. Then God is robbed of what is His (Rom. ii. 22).

3. The Church is God's house.—Christ the foundation-stone, laid by Him.—This is the ground and measure of all sound teaching. The foundation is of Divine worth and of lasting duration. To build anything on this, which is not according to the mind of Christ, which does not carry the impress of His Spirit, which does not spring from Him, but which originates in a foreign spirit, and is the product of human art, or science, or opinion—this is to introduce into God's building something, which, however highly it may be estimated by man, is in truth worthless. It cannot stand in the day of God's judicial purgation, however skillfully we may be able to vindicate it on human grounds. When Christ reveals Himself as the One to whom all judgment is given, when, by his majesty as Judge, he sifts out and destroys everything that is not His, then will this be found not proof. The fire of His judgment will annihilate it. Thus will the work of such a person come to naught. He can not be honored as one who has assisted in God's building. He cannot confront the Lord his judge with joy,—beholding in Him the Rewarder of his fidelity. On the contrary, he will shrink back in sorrow, pained at the thought of having wrought foolishly and to no purpose. Yet with all this, he will still have reason to congratulate himself that he may nevertheless snatch his soul from the flame which devours his unprofitable work. Thus it happens that the person himself may be saved, while all his doings prove worthless. From the common salvation, indeed, he may not be excluded, since he held fast to the foundation; but he forfeits the glory of being accounted a co-worker with God.

[4. Every believer's work in life awaits a searching ordeal, which is to prove its genuineness. The times of such ordeal are called in Scripture "days of the Lord." They occur for individuals and for communities all along the course of human history, and are the preludes to a final "day" when the Judge in person shall appear to purge His Church—the living temple—of all that is corrupt, and to set it up complete in the perfection of its beauty. Then will the value of each one's labor be fully manifest.

But what the specific means of this ordeal will be is a matter of question. Whether it will be by literal fire or by some other more spiritual instrumentality, of which fire is but a symbol, it were hard to determine. The latter seems the more probable in view of the declaration of the Baptist that Christ would "baptize with the Holy Ghost and with fire." Such a baptism of purification is observable even in this age to some degree; yet it is not by material fire. We see the chaff of false doctrine and hypocritical performances, consuming and passing out of sight, as if perishing in consuming flames, while the golden truths of God, wrought out in the experiences and doings of the true believer, grow brighter, and live on to be a blessing to subsequent ages; and who can tell in what way the precious shall be taken from the vile at the last day? Sufficient to be assured that the ordeal will be applied in the most searching manner, and that it awaits every member of the Church. Judgment is to begin at the House of God.]

* HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

RIGER: 1. Mischievous zeal. a. How kindled? By making too much of diversities of gifts in ministers. Here one is blamed if the Church be not edified, and there another is extolled, if by his preaching the light begins to burn more brightly, and people consider not that with the one as well as with the other, "the increase" depends on God, and that the inequality of results, so far as it lies with men, may be attributed not so much to the preacher as to the peculiarity of times and circumstances. b. How shall such evils be guarded against? Safety will be found just in proportion as the minister follows the simple word of God, and resolves to be nothing, and seek nothing for himself; just in proportion as he endeavors to improve impartially every thing that God sends, without attempting to determine prematurely to his own injury what the distinctive importance of it is in the sight of God.

2. Co-workers with God.—God has chosen laborers, a. not because he needs assistance, but b. out of his own good pleasure, inasmuch as he desires to work on men through men, so that each person's love for the truth, and readiness to obey may be more signally manifested.

3. Caution in building.—a. In building each one must take heed not only that he builds on the foundation, but that he uses good material and builds well. He must speak the truth in love, bring sound doctrines into their proper connection, employ suitable aids to discourse, and learn the art of seizing upon the hearts and consciences of men. b. The hearers, too, have need of care rightly to improve their advantages, since much of the preacher's success depends upon their fidelity in receiving and practising what they hear.

4. Differences in the superstructure, though resting upon the right foundation, are found according as a person a. either adheres to that which is closely akin to the foundation, selecting that which promotes the salvation and edification of souls, b. or prefers what is alien in character, resorting to what pleases men, or promotes his renown, or gratifies a vain curiosity, rather than to what is of solid worth and promotes vital godliness.

5. [Preparation for the final ordeal. If there is to be a day of visitation and trial, how important to be examining our own work in advance and subjecting it to the most rigid tests, lest we be overwhelmed at last with utter dismay at our loss, and have the mortification of discovering too late that we spent our strength for naught, and have only our souls for a prey. Ver. 13 ff.].

STARKS:—All good comes from God and must be ascribed to him. No boasting. No exaltation of one at the expense of another (10, 11). Not wrong to prefer listening to enlightened and regenerated preachers, rather than to such as are carnally minded. Wrong comes when amid diversified gifts in genuine ministers we cleave to one and condemn the rest. This is to sin not only against those contemned, but also against God. This is to evince a lack of just spiritual taste, and to bring to the sermon, the ear rather than the heart. The preachers office an effective instrumentality for saving souls. The gifts and labors of the ministry diversified yet inseparable. One plays into the hands of the other. Preaching must be followed up. Instrumentalities are needed in the spiritual as much as in the temporal husbandry. Their efficient power, however, comes from God. It lies in the word as it lies in the seed. God works through the word on the heart. (Ver. 6, 7). Be satisfied with planting and watering. Should no crop ripen accept it as God's will. Let not those more richly endowed and occupying more elevated positions exalt themselves above those holding a lower station. Nor let those below be troubled because they are there. All alike are servants of God (2 Cor. xii. 11) (ver. 8). Ministers labor with God, not as though associating their power with His, but as having His power working in them, (by the grace granted them of God, ch. xv. 10; 2 Cor. iii. 5 ff.); yet according to the degree of culture enjoyed by each one, and also according to the native talents possessed which the Lord sanctifies (Hedinger). He who wishes to have part in the heavenly paradise, must first consent to form a part of God's earthly farm, and suffer himself to be ploughed, and sowed, and reaped (Ver. 9). As a house is not built in a day, so neither is the Church. It rises gradually (Ver. 9). Christ is the foundation, 1. in His Person, as God (Col. i. 17), and man, (Acts, iv. 12), and in both his natures; the whole Church (Eph. ii. 20) and each believer is firm only when resting on Christ. Yea, since believers are "living stones" (1 Pet. ii. 8) and Christ a living foundation, all the stones must be supposed to derive their life from Him. 2. in doctrine, by means of which we are brought to Him as the sole Life-giver (Jas. xiv. 6), and by faith are justified, sanctified and glorified. They who would build a church for Christ by insisting only upon a reputable conduct, erect a structure without a foundation. It must, therefore, fall of itself (Ver. 13).

Better erect no superstructure and stop with the foundation, than to go on piling wood and stubble. Better simplicity in Christ with a little knowledge, than much learning without Christ, and a brain full of the fine spun cobwebs of worldly wisdom (Hedinger) (ver. 11). Fire tests and destroys. By the cross, by persecutions, by death through the judgment it will be shown what is wheat and what chaff, what is a pithy saying and what the dry lifeless conception of some subtle logician or wrangler of the schools (Hedinger) (ver. 13).

HEUBNER:—The Christian Church is a garden; ministers the gardeners. The analogy may be carried out to the full, both as to labor and dependence (ver. 6). God's Spirit has his times and seasons for operation (Ver. 7). Ministers, however various in character and office, have one problem to work out, and therefore should be harmonious. Hereafter all will enjoy the work of all (Ver. 8). What an honor to assist the Almighty! God's part in the work, however, is the chief thing. If He leaves the field—the human heart, waste, it lies eternally waste. But He does work on us. And how faithfully oftentimes on one single soul! Ministers come in as instruments. They work under Him upon the field, which has to be broken up by the ploughshare of the Law, sown with the seed of the Gospel, warmed by the influences of the Holy Spirit, and fructified by the dew and rain of divine grace (Ver. 9). An ordeal is coming. Anticipate it. Examine thyself in all that thou thinkest, teachest, preachest. Inquire whether thou art trusting to thyself for vindication at the bar of God (Ver. 13).

GOSSNER:—The love we show to ministers should be very different from that we show to Christ. They only proclaim grace; He bestows it. Hence while they are welcomed, He should be beloved. With them it is an honor if they may only preach, but He saves at the cost of His own blood (Ver. 6.) God is so gracious that although He is the source of all goodness, yet He rewards His servants as if they had done it all (Ver. 14).

[F. W. ROBERTSON:—The preaching of Christ means simply the preaching of Christ. Recollect what Paul's Christianity was—how he sums all up. "That I might know Him and the power of His resurrection," etc. Settle it in your hearts; Christianity is Christ; understand Him, breathe His Spirit, comprehend His mind. Christianity is a life—a Spirit (Ver. 11). There is a distinction between the truth of work and its sincerity. In that day nothing shall stand but what is true; but the sincere worker, even of untrue work, shall be saved. Sincerity shall save him in that day, but it cannot accredit his work (Ver. 15).

M. HENRY:—The ministry is a very useful and a very gracious institution; and faithful ministers are a great blessing to any people; yet the folly and weakness of people may do much mischief by what is in itself a blessing].

[VER. 5. If Paul and Apollos were nothing but servants, and refused the position of party leaders, how much more should this modesty appear in their successors. Who will arrogate the honors in a church which a Paul declines?]

[J. SAURIN. 11-15:—The different methods of preachers. I. The occasion of these words, as shown in the Epistle. II. The design of the Apostle,—to rectify our judgments in regard to three different classes of preachers; a. such as preach the word of man not only different from, but directly opposite to the word of God (ver. 11); b. such as preach the pure word of God free from human admixtures (ver. 12); c. such as indeed make the word of God the ground of their preaching, but mix with it the explications and traditions of men (ver. 12³). III. Explain the metaphors. a. Christ, the foundation. b. Gold, silver, and precious stones—doctrines sublime, excellent, demonstrable. c. Wood, hay and stubble—doctrines less considerable, uncertain, unimportant. d. The revelation by fire—the examination and disclosures of the last judgment, not the destruction of Jerusalem, nor the fire of purgatory. IV. Application—in what manner we are to regard the three classes of ministers].

CHAPTER III. 16-23.

16 Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, [God's temple¹] and that the Spirit of 17 God dwelleth in you? If any man defile [destroy] the temple of God, him² shall God 18 destroy; for the temple of God is holy, which temple ye are [of which sort are ye]. Let no man deceive himself. If any man among you seemeth to be wise in this world,³ let him 19 become a fool, that he may be [become] wise. For the wisdom of this world is foolishness 20 with God: for it is written, He [that] taketh the wise in their own craftiness. And 21 again, The Lord knoweth the thoughts of the wise, that they are vain. Therefore let no 22 man glory in men: for all things are yours; Whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come; all are [om. are⁴] 23 yours; And ye are Christ's; and Christ is God's.

³ Ver. 18.—[The proper order is, “If any one thinketh to be wise among you in this world.” See exegesis].

⁴ Ver. 17.—om. is to be omitted according to preponderant authorities [A. B. C. D. F. Cod. Sin.].

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

[“He passes to another argument against the sin of ranging themselves in opposite factions under human leaders, particularly such as corrupt the essential purity and fundamental soundness of the spiritual fabric of the Church.” Words.].

VER. 16. Know ye not that ye are God's temple?—It will hardly do to connect these words directly with the preceding—if for no other reason than simply because the threat of destruction made in the following verse stands in direct contradiction to the promise of salvation there held forth, showing that Paul has a new case in mind. [Olshausen, however, regards the Apostle as simply intensifying and carrying out still further his previous figure. The edifice is now spoken of as God's temple, and the guilt of desecrating or injuring the building by introducing incoherent materials into its structure is enhanced in proportion. And still further, the taught as well as the teachers are also here brought into view. So substantially Hodge, Alf.,

Stanley; Calvin says more correctly: “Having admonished the teachers as to their duty, he now addresses himself to the pupils.”] Οὐκ οἴδατε: know ye not? This phrase is not to be confounded with ἡ οὐκ οἴδατε: or know ye not?—and it might very well serve to introduce a new turn of thought, indirectly suggested by what precedes. Thus far, Paul has contemplated the Church as a building belonging to God, and has exhibited the great responsibility attendant on the work of erecting it, after the only proper foundation has been laid. Now he describes its sacred character more fully by likening it to a temple inhabited by God's Spirit, the violation of which incurs condign punishment. By the question: Know ye not? he appeals directly to the consciousness of Christians and intimates to his readers that in that spirit of partisanship which they cherished and which was so destructive to the integrity of the Church, there was a strange and criminal obscuration of true Christian feeling, inasmuch as they were conducting themselves just as if they possessed it not, and knew not what belonged to their profession. In the objective clause the emphasis lies on temple (ναός), marking an advance upon the more indefinite term, building, used before. ναός, according to its derivation, (ναίω) means indeed a building in general. But the Greeks used the word only to denote the dwellings of gods, and especially that room where the image stood. [“ναός is more holy than ἱερόν.” WORDS.]. Here it denotes the spiritual sanctuary, the place where the true God reveals His presence, and bestows blessings, and is worshipped, forming one complete whole, and consisting of all such as carry in themselves the Spirit of God. This appears from the explanatory clause following—and (καί explicative) that the Spirit of God dwells in you.—Hence Christians are called “a spiritual house” (1 Pet. ii. 5), also “a habitation of God through the Spirit” (Eph. ii. 22); comp. also 2 Cor. vi. 16 ff.; Rom. viii. 9, 11; 2 Tim. i. 14; Ex. xxxvii. 27, etc. οἰκεῖν, to reside permanently (comp. Jno. xiv. 23.) The words ἐν ἡμῖν, in you (not, ‘among you’), refers, like the statement: ‘ye are the temple,’ to the Church, or to individual believers, not, however in their separate capacity, but in their organic connection. Here the law of all organization obtains, that every organ is a complete whole in itself. As Christendom unitedly is a ‘temple of God,’ so is also every Christian congregation and every individual Christian. But as the whole is to be understood and apprehended only in its parts, so are the parts to be understood only as connected in the whole. The translation: ‘the temple of God’ is by no means needed for the sake of setting aside the idea of a plurality of temples. We can employ the rendering: ‘a temple of God,’ simply as signifying the kind of building implied. [Meyer on the contrary more justly says: “ναός θεοῦ is the temple of God, not a temple, for Paul does not conceive of the various churches as various temples of God, which would be inconsistent with the Jew’s conception of God’s temple; but of each Christian church as in a mystic sense the temple of Jehovah. So there are not many temples, but one only, and many churches, each one of which is ideally the same temple of God.” So Stanley and Alford].

VER. 17. If any one destroy the temple of God, him will God destroy.—This is the first clause in an inference which rests upon the undoubted recognition of the inviolability of the temple of God, as maintained also in the Jewish Scriptures. All injuring, or desecrating, or even disturbing the sanctuary of God’s manifested presence, was deemed a sacrilege, which incurred the Divine vengeance. This is strongly indicated by the immediate succession of the same word in the two forms, φθειρεῖ and φθερεῖ. “If any the temple of God destroyeth, destroy him shall God.” See a like case in Rev. xxii. 18. The punishment here implied as related to the old temple was that of temporal death. Used, however, in relation to the spiritual temple, the word, in the first instance, signifies the rupturing of the Church by violent partisanship, which must finally end in its entire dissolution; and in the second instance, as indicating the consequent punishment, it denotes exclusion from salvation (ἀνάληψις). [Stanley says that “φθειρεῖν, in the LXX. and in the New Testament, seems to have lost the sense of ‘defile,’ and merely to retain that of ‘mar’ or ‘destroy.’”

And so Hodge, who says “the passage may be rendered ‘If any man injure the temple of God, him will God injure.’” Olshausen goes still further: “The connection shows that the word cannot be understood of absolute destruction. Probably the Apostle chose the strong word only on account of its having been used just before for the purpose of intimating that God would requite like with like.” But such modification of its plain meaning is certainly contrary to the parallel which the Apostle introduces. The violator of the sanctuary of the ancient temple was unquestionably punished with death. And to preserve the analogy, we ought to maintain the word φθειρεῖν in its original signification].

Next follows the proof with the application of the penal principle just stated to the case in hand.—For the temple of God is holy.—It lies in the very idea of a temple that it is holy and inviolable, and that therefore all injury done to it is a crime.—And of this sort are ye—οἱ τινες ἐστέ ὑμεῖς ὁσίαι refers to the object generally as one of a class, and not definitely, thus serving to render a proposition general; here it means: of which sort, viz., “holy.” The antecedent here is not “temple,” but the adjective “holy.”* That they were the temple of God he had already asserted in ver. 16. “Recurring to ch. i. 1 he hereby awakens a feeling of reverence and a holy communion of Spirit in opposition to that unworthy servility engendered by a divisive regard for human authorities.” OSIANDER. [“Meyer well remarks that this clause is the minor proposition of a syllogism: Whoever mars the temple of God, him will God destroy, because His temple is holy: but ye are are also holy as His spiritual temple: therefore whoever mars you shall be destroyed by God.” ALFORD].

VER. 18. The Apostle now proceeds to point out the real source of the mischief he rebukes. The rupture of the unity of the Church by a party spirit, sprang from a pride of knowledge, and a vain conceit of that wisdom which belonged to this world, and not to God’s kingdom. This was especially the case with the party of Apollos, which the Apostle seems chiefly to have in his eye, throughout this chapter. As it took pride in Apollos, because of his dialectic and rhetorical skill and learning, and clung to these qualities in him, so also did it seek to imitate his manner, and signalized itself for laying a great stress upon secular wisdom, and for no little conceit in that respect. This tendency Paul denounces as unfounded in truth, and unsuited to such as strive for the kingdom of God. In his view it involves a self-deception, more or less gross, against which he felt constrained to warn them.—Let no one deceive himself.—The deception here consisted in a person’s imagining himself to possess a profound insight into the truth and ways of God, when in fact he was utterly devoid of it, yea, was involved in entire misapprehension and gross blindness in reference to it. Such delusion passes away only when all conceit of wisdom is given up, and a person is willing to be regarded a fool, or consents to renounce all secular wisdom in the exercise of that simple faith which he before had regarded as folly, and which passes for folly with the world. And this is what the Apostle requires when he says:—If any one thinketh to be wise among you in this world, let him become a fool that he may be wise.—δοκεῖν may mean either: to think, or to appear; hence the clause may here be translated, “if any one passes for a wise man, either in his own estimation,” or “in others’ estimation.” The former rendering is best sustained by what has been said before. Hence the exhortation, “let him become a fool,” must be understood as relating to his own, and not to others’ judgment, and in such a way that either the words παρ’ ἑαυτοῦ, in his own esteem, shall be supplied; or that the person be regarded as passing over to a standpoint, which had until then appeared to him and to others like-minded as folly. The latter sense best suits the word. [And here it must be borne in mind that this renunciation of our own wisdom, or of the world’s wisdom, is required because all such wisdom is one only in appearance, and not in reality. It is its intrinsic worthlessness that renders it discreditable]. The phrase “in this world,” lit. “in this age,” is not to be united with the clause following. [as Origen, Chrysostom, Luther, Rosenmüller] as though it meant, “let him become a fool in this world;” the order of the words forbids this. But it belongs to ‘wise,’ as designating the sphere where this wisdom prevails; q. d. ‘wise in this world’ (comp. ver. 19). [Alf. following Meyer says: “it belongs not simply to ‘wise,’ but to the whole clause going before; to the whole assumption of wisdom made by the man, which as made in this present world, must be false; “for,” adds Meyer, “those very persons who thought to become eminent among Christians through their wisdom in this premissianic period, when the knowledge of Divine things is yet in its infancy, and exceedingly limited, were not really wise, but were ensnared by their own self-decit.” Such a limitation, however, of the meaning of the word αἰών, age, here is very questionable. It is plain from the following verse, that “this age” is to be interpreted not temporally, but qualitatively, as synonymous with “this world” (κόσμος). Ἐν ὑμῖν, among you, designates the sphere in which the person supposed hopes to shine by his wisdom.

VERS. 19, 20. Sustain the previous exhortation, and shows that in becoming a fool a person but coincides with God’s judgment.—For the wisdom of this world is foolishness with God—As such, therefore, it deserves to be cast aside. “Wisdom of this world” (κόσμος), comp. i. 21; ii. 6. “It is a wisdom ruled by the spirit of this world that oversteps its proper bounds, seeks to satisfy itself about divine and human things, is tainted with error, and therefore stands in direct opposition alike to the highest reason, and to God, and to great objects for which the world and man were created (μυστήρια).” OSIANDER. [παρά τῷ θεῷ—παρά is used with the Dative “to express standing before a person as a judge, and submitting to his decision or sentence.” Hence the expression ‘before God’ carries a deeper meaning than simply ‘in his sight.’ God has passed upon it and condemned it.]—The proof of this.—For it is written, “He taking the wise in their own craftiness.”—This passage is cited from Job v. 13, and is a part of the speech of Eliphaz. It accords with the original text, and agrees in sense with the Septuagint. [The phraseology of the latter, however, is changed for stronger terms. δραστήριος, catching for καταλαμβάνων, taking and πανουργία, craftiness for φρονήσεαι, prudence]. The sentence is incomplete, since Paul quotes only the words suited to his purpose, omitting those on which these grammatically depend. Hence they need no supplement. Human wisdom, art, cunning are here stated to be incapable of standing before the wisdom of God, since God catches those who rely on these aids, in their own craftiness, and the very excellencies on which they pride themselves, are turned into a snare through which they are entrapped. By thus causing them to be destroyed by their own devices, God shows them up to be nothing less than the veriest fools. This citation, the only one in the New Testament, taken from the book of Job, like much which Eliphaz spoke, belongs to that wisdom which uttereth her voice in the streets, and is marked as here with the stamp of Divine truth.—And again.—“The Lord knoweth the thoughts of the wise that they are vain.”—This second passage, taken from Ps. xciv. 11, was originally directed against those proud contemnors of God, who acted as if there were no God above, observing and noting down all their unrighteous deeds. In accordance with the object he has in view, Paul here employs the word “the wise,” instead of “men,” as it stands both in the original Heb. and in the Sept. But this is no arbitrary alteration, since the whole Psalm treats of those vain sophists, who pride themselves on their perverse and groundless notions respecting God. Διαλογισμοί in Hellenic speech, was used to denote all those capricious reasonings and reflections which either opposed Divine truth or tended to render it doubtful, comp. Rom. i. 21; Eph. iv. 17. Μάταιον, groundless, void of truth, therefore, counter to wisdom, and belonging to folly. Whether this word in the original belongs to the wise themselves, or to their reasonings, is questionable. The essential meaning is the same in either case. [“It appears from these two verses thus placed in juxtaposition, that St. Paul followed the LXX., but uses his own discretion in doing so, and sometimes substitutes for it a translation approaching more nearly the original.” WORDS.]

VERS. 21–23. From all this a warning is derived.—So then—Ἔστε.—[“This word is used by St. Paul to introduce the summing up and conclusion of his argument here and elsewhere in this Epistle, iii. 7; iv. 5; viii. 38; xi. 33; xiv. 39; xv. 58.”—WORDS.] It serves even in classical writers to introduce an imperative clause when this follows upon another which contains the reason why such command is given. (Comp. Passow, ii. 2.) [Also WINEB, N. T. Gr. Pt. iii. 5, note 1; also Jelf. Gr. Gram., § 867, 1].—Let no one glory in men.—That is, so far as they set up for themselves, and rely on their natural powers—not as possessed of spiritual gifts and because of such. In the latter case the boasting would be in the Lord. The caution is addressed to those who are inclined to make much of men in consequence of their education or supposed wisdom, cleaving to them in partisan attachment, and disparaging other servants of Christ in comparison, to the overlooking of the unity of the Church. Such persons are guilty of putting the highest value on what is merely a natural advantage. And all such should be avoided by reflecting, that the wisdom of this world is folly with God. For this there was an additional reason:—For all things are yours.—Here he exhibits to us the dignity of Christians, [in contrast with the world and its folly], as persons who, by virtue of their union with Christ and, through Him, with God, are precluded from dependence on men, and have a direct claim on every thing which belongs to God and Christ, so that all things serve their advantage and promote their exalted destiny (Rom. viii. 28)—even as all things are compelled to serve Christ (Matth. xxi. 3; xxvii. 60; xi. 27). As Neander well says: “The sovereignty over the world was indeed conferred on man in his original estate. But this, being lost through sin, was restored again by redemption. The spirit which is bestowed on Christians, carries in itself a principle which every thing must eventually obey, and which will subjugate the world ever more and more, until at last the promise, that ‘the meek shall inherit the earth,’ is fulfilled, and the world has become the theatre of the Divine kingdom.” From the drift of the passage we may see the utter groundlessness of Billroth’s view, who supposes the warning here to be addressed to teachers, cautioning them against boasting on account of their partisans. In such a case, we should be obliged to interpret ‘yours’ of the teachers, which would be impossible. It is to the Church in general that Paul is here speaking. Instead of glorying with a one-sided partiality, in the fact that this or that person belonged to them as their master, he would have them maintain a blessed consciousness of the privilege, that all things and persons belonged to them alike.

What in particular these things were, he goes on to specify, beginning with the teachers whom they had made the occasion of their strifes.—Whether Paul, or Apollos or Cephas.—(Comp. 2 Cor. iv. 5.) Each one of these they were all to turn to their own advantage, instead of adhering to any one exclusively. Here he could not add, “or Christ,” for this would be to reduce Christ to the same footing with his servants. The Christ-party do not come into view here, and could not, “since their relation to the Apostles was only a negative one” (comp. on i. 12).—or the world.—“This leap from Peter to the whole world gives a sudden breadth to the discourse, as if he were borne on with a sort of impatience to set forth his theme in its fullest scope.”—BENGEL. Comp. Rom. viii. 28. There is here neither a climax, as if he were proceeding upward from the lowest point, nor an argument from the less to the greater, [as Calvin, when he says: “If Christ has subjected to you also the world and life and death, how much more men, so that they should serve rather than rule you?”] Nor is the term ‘world’ to be understood as denoting: ‘the university of the learned;’ nor yet: ‘the knowledge of all natural things’ wherein the learned boast; nor: ‘unbelieving teachers as contrasted with the aforementioned believing ones;’ nor: ‘all the rest of mankind.’ But the word is to be taken in its most comprehensive sense; Christians, who are the destined “heirs of the world” (Rom. iv. 38), have even now a claim upon the world. It belongs to them. It must serve them. Yet in order not to make the term synonymous with the expression: “all things” (ver. 21) we shall have to limit it (with Osiander) to mean the visible world, with a special reference to mankind dwelling in it. [“The present order of things,” says Hodge, “is maintained and directed to the promotion of the great work of redemption.” And Barnes well expands the thought, ‘the world is yours,’ under four particulars: (1) The world was made by the common Father, and all His children have an interest in it as His work. (2) The frame of the universe is sustained and upheld for their sake. (3) The course of providential events is ordered for their welfare. (4) They have the promise of as much of this world as is needful for them (Matth. vi. 33; Mark x. 29, 30; 1 Tim. iv. 8)]. With this view the following members of the sentence best accord.—There we have indicated the most momentous states and changes belonging to this visible sphere.—or life, or death.—The former expresses the fullest exercise of all our vital energies in all its varied influence and bearings; the latter denotes the entire suppression of this activity. And both these must promote the advantage of believers and help onward their salvation. [“They are dispensed and administered so as best to fulfil the designs of God in reference to the Church. The greatest men of the world, kings, statesmen and heroes, ministers, individual believers and unbelievers, live and die just as best subserves the interest of Christ’s kingdom.”—HODGE. “‘Life is yours’: (1) Because believers enjoy it. It is a real life, not vain show. (2) Because its various events tend to promote their welfare and work together for their good.” “‘Death is yours’: (1) Because believers have peace and support in their dying hour. (2) Because it is the avenue which leads to their rest. (3) Because they should triumph over it, in that it will be swallowed up in the glory of a higher life, releasing us from what is mortal to put on immortality.”—BARNES.]—Or things present or things to come.—These terms alike refer to the present life, and include all its vicissitudes from the passing moment onward, whether joyful or sorrowful.—All are yours.—A summing up and emphatic reassertion of what he opened with. And from this he passes on to state the ground on which Christians possess such wealth. But ye are Christ’s.—[“Here the category changes; Christ is not yours in the sense in which ‘all things’ are—not made for and subserving you—but (de) you are His.”—ALFORD]. It is this fact which gives to believers their royal power over all creaturely existences. By partaking in Christ’s redemption, they once more attain unto a dignity which originally belonged to man (Gen. i. 26; Ps. viii. 6) and which is promised God's people (Ex. xix. 6). And this is a dignity far transcending all that ever was surmised by Pagans or is expressed in their most famous sayings—such as: 'the wise alone are kings—are rich—are free.' "The analogousness of such language to that of the New Testament indicates the remaining traces of the nobility of human nature; but without Gospel redemption the dignity of man thus set forth would be wholly unrealized. Antiquity planted itself upon self-exaltation, Christianity on self-humiliation."—NEANDER. (Comp. ii. 15; 1 Jno. v. 1; Rev. iii. 21; 1 Pet. ii. 9). By belonging to Christ, the Church and all its true members become partakers of his glory as the One to whom all things have been given by the Father. In their fellowship with Him—a fellowship involving entire dependence on their part—they are made independent of all else, and all else stands at their service. By the fact expressed in: "ye are Christ's," all partizanship is out off, all generic differences are dissolved, and a proper relation to all teachers established. Meyer says finely that the active relation of possession mentioned in ver. 22 ('all things are yours') and the passive relation of being possessed here brought out ('ye are Christ's') are both alike opposed to the disorders arising from subservience to human authorities. We may, perhaps, detect here a slight intimation intended for the Christ party, that in their partizan appeal to Christ there was an ignoring of that connection which all alike sustained to Him, and a disparaging levelling of their Lord to an equality with human leaders.—But Christ is God's.—["And even being Christ's does not reach the highest possession: He possesses you not for Himself, but (de, again) the head of Christ is God," (xi. 3).—ALFORD.] Thus it is shown that by belonging to Christ we indirectly belong to God, and are planted upon an immovable basis of independence and power (comp. Jno. x. 28–30). And so, on the one hand, we see our union to God to be mediated by Christ, and, on the other, that Christ is subordinated to the Father, as shown in xi. 3. To consider this subordination however as belonging solely to His human nature, would not accord with a correct view of the whole subject. It is the whole Christ that is here spoken of, and that too not simply as in His state of humiliation, but also in His state of glory (comp. xv. 28; Phil. ii. 9). In His essential equality with God, He is at the same time subordinated to God (comp. Jno. v. 23–26; xiv. 28; xvii. 3). ["There is," says Alford, "a striking similarity in the argument in this last verse to that in our Lord's prohibition, Matth. xxiii. 8–10, 'But be not ye called Rabbi, for one is your Master, even Christ; and call no man your father upon earth, for one is your Father, who is in heaven.'"] "This last clause gives to the whole course of thought a most exalted close, and to the argument presented its strongest and noblest foundation, and rounds off the whole paragraph by a most fitting allusion to the idea of the one holy temple of God with which it opened (ver. 16, comp. ver. 9), in order to show Christians that by virtue of their union to God through Christ they are really taught of God."—OSLANDER.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The sacredness and inviolability of the Church. It is God's temple. If so, then it is the place of His gracious presence—His sanctuary, to be treated with tender reverence and awe. To introduce strange fire (Lev. x. 1, 2) into it is a sacrilege which incurs the heaviest judgment, even an exclusion from the communion of saints. Of this crime they are guilty who bring into the Church some other authority than that of God's word, and pin their faith to something else than that which God has given, and prize another wisdom beside that which is in Christ. By such conduct the Church is desecrated, and robbed of its true character as the temple of God. In fact it is as such destroyed. And this occurs whenever party spirit prevails. In such a case man's word and wisdom usurp the place of God's word and wisdom. Then adhesion to some particular human leader is made a test of Christianity and a condition of brotherhood. Then Christ, "who of God is made unto us wisdom," etc., (1 Cor. i. 80), is crowded out of His supremacy. In place of this one holy image of God, the only proper pattern for believers, there comes in the idol of some human personality to be copied as the true standard of character, and this not for the sake of any resemblance it may bear to Christ, but for the sake of some natural peculiarities it may happen to possess. Instead of the flame of a holy love kindled by the Spirit and warming toward all, there burns the fire of human partialities, which begets alienation and hostility towards all who do not cherish like preferences; and when such are the results of party spirit, it must be seen that he who engenders or furthers this spirit mars the work of God, and desecrates His sanctuary. And can such a person hope to escape condign punishment from Him who is thus insulted in His own temple?

2. The Christian's regal glory in its nature and grounds. "All things are yours and ye are Christ's, and Christ's is God's." Since God is love itself, He keeps nothing for Himself, but imparts to others all—yes, His very Being in the fulness of its perfections and blessedness. This He does in an original and eternal way within the sphere of the Godhead, to his only-begotten Son, who, by virtue of this communication, is, has, and can do every thing the same as the Father. He does it also in an indirect manner towards all creatures made in His image, according to their measure. Hence the appointment of man to lordship in his own province. [This lordship he indeed lost by reason of sin, and became the slave of the circumstances which he ought to have ruled. But in the work of redemption it has been restored to him through the interposition of this Son, who became the second Adam, and, in His assumed humanity, re-established this supremacy for all who should believe on Him. "Fear not," He says to His own, "for I have overcome the world." Hence it is] in Christ that we see this appointment to Lordship actually fulfilled; and how it was fulfilled may be seen, both during His life of humiliation, when He controlled all things by the word of His power, and in His exaltation to universal power and authority at the right hand of God in this power believers are now invited to share by union with Him. Through Him the whole creation stands subject to their disposal. Every thing He has is made to subserve the purposes of His love in them and promote their sanctification and glory.

But since now, for a period, their life is, to a certain degree, hid with Christ in God, so also is their power. Nevertheless this power is to be experienced even here in striking ways, and ever more and more through the prevalence of their prayers. And the terms on which they receive it show the ground on which it rests, viz.: the fellowship had with Christ, and through Him with God. Prevailing prayers are such as are offered in the name of Christ or according to the will of God (Jno. xiv. 13 f.; xvii. 28; 1 Jno. ii. 14), or as are presented in faith (Matth. xvii. 20). In them there is an identifying of ourselves with God through Christ, so that all private preferences are given up, and we keep ourselves in exclusive dependence on Him. Besides, as in Christ Himself there was manifested this same demeanor towards the Father; as He, the Divinely equal Son, kept Himself in perfect dependence on God, and determined to be nothing else but the revealer and executor of the Father's will; as He, the first man, was obliged to qualify Himself for the exercise of Divine power in the way of obedience,—just so it is with believers. Their voluntary and complete dependence on Christ and through Him on God is the condition and source of their all embracing power. The fact that they belong to Him is the ground that all things belong to them.

[8. All sound title and right to use the creatures of God, together with the ability to use them to advantage, are conditioned on faith in Christ. He, having by His obedience recovered for man his lost sovereignty, makes those who believe on Him joint heirs with Him to this inheritance. And He also imparts to them that purity by which all things are pure to them. Hence to them every creature of God is good, when received with thanksgiving and sanctified with the word of God and prayer. And in the ordering of His providence all things are made to work together for their good. Not so is it with the wicked. A kind of natural right to possession and use they may indeed have in the present condition of things; but—it is under God's toleration and only for a time. If they continue unbelieving to the last, they are finally despoiled of all. While even in this life the good they seem to have is no real good, and "nothing is pure, since even their very mind and conscience is defiled." This is what Origen seems to teach. "All things belong to the saint. The whole world is the possession of faith. But the unbeliever has no claim to even an obolus; for the goods which he has he holds as a robber, since he knows neither how to use them nor yet the God that made them." (Taken in substance from Wordsworth)].

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

STARKE:—To be "the temple of God," inhabited by the Holy Spirit, is the highest dignity of Christians. It ennobles the humblest to a greatness that far surpasses all secular honor and glory. The Spirit dwells in us: 1, through faith in Christ; 2, through peace with God; 3, through hope; 4, through love; 5, through special gifts and powers; 6, through comfort, cheer, patience, joy in the cross; 7, through true life in the soul, continuing even when it passes out of the body, which itself also partakes of this life, whether it be in this or in the future state, (Selnecker) ver. 16.—How fearful the woe which awaits those who mislead and destroy souls, either by false doctrines or by an ungodly life (ver. 17).—"Let him become a fool." What a paradox! A fool first—then wise! The world seeks to be wise and then becomes foolish. But what is this "becoming a fool?" Not the losing of our understanding and will, [but the confession of ignorance, the avowal of our knowing nothing, that we may be willing to be taught, so as truly to know every thing] (ver. 18).—God sometimes lets "the wise" run their course, accumulate their knowledge, construct their cunning systems, so as at last to be caught as in a snare by their own devices, and be the more thoroughly convinced of their folly. [Few are so profoundly sensible of the incompetency of the human intellect and the meagreness of human attainments as those who have most profoundly and honestly explored and discussed the great problems of nature, humanity and God] (ver. 19). The Church is not for the teachers, that it should be subject to them and called by their names; but they are for it, to serve its welfare and build it up. Hence no man or set of men has power over Christians to prescribe laws for them and bind their consciences. Let no one therefore choose a mere man for his guiding star unconditionally, or follow his lead blindly; much less should any one count himself blessed in having adopted this one rather than that as the controller of his life and conscience. Nor yet let him provoke dissensions and divide the Church by asserting his partialities to an undue extent (ver. 21).—"All things are yours"—[all true Christian teachers of every name, whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, or Calvin, or Wesley, or Leighton, or Fuller. Every faithful minister profits the whole Church; and every member of the Church may and ought to derive benefit from the teachings of all. It is thus the mind is expanded beyond party limits into a true Catholicity]. And "this world,"—sun, air, water, fire, earth, all stand at your service, and ye can use them and praise the Creator for them. Your natural "life," too, preserved by this world's goods, [is, while preserved, for your advantage, even though it may be passed amid pains, and privations, and disabilities, that seem worse than death]. Finally, "death" is yours, as it opens an entrance into eternal blessedness and glory (ver. 22).—"Ye are Christ's." He has bought you with His blood, and is your proper Lord and Master. He is the Head—you, the members. Hence cleave to Him only. Be called after him only. "Christ is God's," as the appointed Mediator and Ambassador of God to men. Likewise, as Head of the Church, He became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross, and acted ever in the Father's service and to His glory (ver. 23).

HAUBNER:—The indwelling of the Spirit is opposed to all party strife. Hence in moments of holy inspiration, [in times of religious awakening], sectarianism melts, [and the hearts of believers of every name flow together], ver. 16.—The conceit of our own unimpeachable wisdom is self-deceit or self-betrayal (ver. 18).—The wisdom which would know nothing of God and would discard a Saviour, will be finally exposed by God in all its nakedness, and all its aims baffled and punished (ver. 19).—To be proud of our own denomination or of our own leaders is nothing but a concealed self-love, which seeks to shine in the glory of another. And this is derogatory to the Christian name, for the believer is servant to no man (ver. 21).—Since all things are ours through Christ, all things should conduct the Christian to Christ. [Failing in this, their use and enjoyment become so far prejudicial and unlawful. They are then not properly "ours"]. (ver. 22).—"Ye are Christ's," then ye should serve Him, even as He, the image of God, served God in all things and conducted all to God (ver. 23.)

W. F. BESSER:—VER. 18. "Be not deceived." Self-deception is an injurious thing; it renders much labor useless, and despoils us of our reward. But worst of all is that self-betrayal which hardens the heart against brotherly admonition.—"Let him become a fool." Such is the power and wonder working of God's word, that it moves me to become an enemy to myself; and to empty myself of all that which best pleases my flesh; and to become a fool in this world, to give up the reputation of being a sagacious man, who moves on with the party of progress, and stands upon the apex of the civilization of the time; and so to pass into obscurity and contempt.—(Ver. 19). God weaves a snare for the wise out of their own craftiness, wherein he catches them while they think to slip from Him by their arts: e. g., explaining away His miracles through their rationalism.—(Ver. 21). The building here does not belong to the builders but the builders to the building.—Ver. 22 as compared with i. 12. Christ does not stand in the second rank with His servants. He is the Lord of Glory. The declaration "all is yours" promises the world to Christians preëminently in this sense, that all secular art and service help to furnish mortar for building the temple of God. Christians are called not to curse the world, but to overcome and rule it for God. The world is nothing but a scaffolding that will be broken up when it has served its end in assisting to construct God's house. But this house, which is destined to be eternal, are we.—All this world's wisdom is folly with God, if it insists in playing the mistress in His house; but if it act the part of handmaid, it is in its place.—(Ver. 28). Though Christ may employ His servants for bringing all those who have been purchased by His blood to become His by faith; still the saints thus called hang upon Christ, independently of any man, just as needles are drawn and held by the power of the magnet, even though some other needle, which had been first attracted, should sustain them by virtue of the magnetic power streaming through it.

[BARNES:—VER. 20. "Words of the wise, vain." This admonition especially applicable to ministers. They are in peculiar danger on this subject, and it has been by their yielding themselves so much to the power of speculative philosophy that parties have been formed in the Church, and that the Gospel has been so much corrupted].

We are obliged to render all adoration to the majesty of the Divine Spirit. 2. The consideration of His presence and work should awaken devoutest gratitude. 3. VII.—THE TRUE STANDARD FOR ESTIMATING MINISTERS. THEIR WORTH TO BE MADE KNOWN IN DUE TIME. OUR JUDGMENT TO BE SUSPENDED TILL THEN.

CHAPTER IV. 1-5.

LET a man so [So let a man] account of us, as of the ministers of Christ, and stewards
2 of the mysteries of God. Moreover [Here ὡς] it is required¹ in stewards, that a man be
3 found faithful. But with me it is a very small thing that I should be judged of [by] 4 you, or of [by] man's judgment [lit. day]: yea, I judge not mine own self. For I know nothing by [against] myself; yet am I not hereby [not by this am I] justified:
5 but he that judgeth me is the Lord. Therefore judge nothing before the time, until the Lord come, who both will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and will make manifest the counsels of the hearts: and then shall every man [each one] have [from ἀντὶ] praise of [his εἰς] God.

² Ver. 2.—ὑποτάσσας is sustained mainly by the old versions, and is decidedly preferable to ὑποτάσσας [which is found in A. C. D. Cod. Sin. and others.] Stanley remarks that the confusion arises from the similarity of sound in Rom. between ε and α. The Cod. Sin. inserts τι before ὑποτάσσας, and would be rendered, "Moreover what do you here seek in stewards? That a man," etc.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

VER. 1. [Having thus exhibited the regal title of Christians to all things, to the benefits to be derived from all Christian ministers, and from all objects and events in this world, he now turns to present, as a corollary from this, the view which they ought to take of ministers, and the manner in which they are to treat them; and thus, as it were, to remind them of certain limitations in the prerogatives of those whom they were disposed unduly to honor].—So let a man account of us.—ὡς ὅτι, so. This does not serve to connect the following with what precedes, as Meyer (3d Ed., but not 2d Ed.) supposes, rendering it: so then, or, accordingly. No such connection is here implied.* Rather Paul here intends to hold up the proper mode of estimating teachers in contrast with that "boasting" in them reprobated in iii. 21; and the "so" here refers to what follows.—"So as servants 'of Christ.'—not as leaders taking His place.† ὑμῶν, us, primarily or chiefly, Paul and Apollos, as ver. 6 and iii. 4, show. λογίζεσθαι, to bring to account, to reckon, to esti-

the formation of a sound, well-weighed estimate, as contrasted with the partisan judgments which the Corinthians formed respecting their teachers." OSIANDER. ἄνθρωπος, = not, every man, but, man generally, according to the Hellenic and Hebrew usage. ὑπηρέτας as δούλους, iii. 5. The word properly denotes a servant of subordinate rank, an understrapper. In patristic parlance it was used of sub-deacons. The New Testament employs it for helpers and attendants. Luke iv. 20; Acts xiii. 6. The verb from which it comes, occurs in Acts xxvi. 16, to signify David's working for the fulfilment of God's purposes. In the text the word carries the idea of one laboring for the cause of Christ. To adopt its fundamental meaning, that of a rower [as Valok.: "Christ is Pilot of the vessel of the Church, we are rowers under His command." Words.], would be just as appropriate as to render it: adjutants or orderlies, according to the precedent in Xenophon. If not precisely equivalent to "deacon," yet it certainly is brought in here to indicate a very subordinate position under Christ, in contrast with the leadership ascribed by the Corinthian partisans. Nevertheless the idea of honor is not excluded, since this comes from being connected with Christ, whose work is performed. The dignity of the office is, however, more prominently exhibited in the second designation—and stewards of the mysteries of God—οἰκονόμους μυστηρίων θεοῦ. Rom. xvi. 23; 1 Pet. iv. 10. The article is not prefixed, because the word stands qualitatively, to indicate that what has been entrusted to their charge is something very important and weighty. And by these "mysteries" we are not to understand the sacraments, thereby following patristic usage. [In which case Paul could hardly have been a steward, for he was sent not to baptize, but to preach the Gospel]. Rather they are "the mystery of God" in its manifold variety and fulness; or as Luke viii. 10: "the mysteries of the kingdom of God;" in other words, the revelations of God, as matters which could be known only by Divine communication. [Such is the meaning of the word "mystery" in the New Testament—not, as in common parlance: something uncomprehensible; but: something which, being beyond the reach of man's intelligence, has been made known to him in some special Divine way]. The "stewardship" consists in [preserving and administering the truth revealed through] preaching and teaching,—no less in properly didactic instruction than in prophecy. The "steward" belonged among the "servants," and his business was, not to manage one particular branch of the household economy, but to take the whole in charge. He was therefore put over the rest of the servants. The stress here, however, is not to be laid upon the preëminence enjoyed by the steward, but upon the responsibility accompanying the goods entrusted." NEANDER. To suppose that the Apostle used the term "stewards," with some vague idea of provisions floating before his mind, to which he would liken the truth,—as if the persons thus denominated were regarded by him in the light of family providers, would be rather far fetched, and Luke xii. 42 gives no countenance for such a thought in our passage. "Between the father of the household and the stewards, there stood the son, who had from the father a power of control, so that the stewards were in fact his servants likewise." MEYER.

* [This is not so clear. ὅτι does often have reference to what precedes. And here certainly Paul seems to be applying the principle, he had just been laying down in general, to himself and his associates in particular. The very position of ὅτι ὑμῶν so us, too, seems to require this. As they were Christ's, so it was to be borne in mind that he and Apollos were also Christ's, and that, too, in their official capacity. They were Christ's servants—stewards of God's mysteries, and were to be respected accordingly. ὅτι, so, therefore points back to what has been said, and also forwards to εἰς, as, which resumes and makes the implication more definite].

VER. 2. Here, moreover.—We must first consider what the true reading is here. The Rec. has $\delta\delta\epsilon\lambda\omicron\upsilon\pi\omicron\nu$. But this is not by any means so well supported as $\omega\delta\epsilon\lambda\omicron\upsilon\pi\omicron\nu$, which is the reading that prevails throughout the codices, versions, and church fathers in equal degree. If it be not the original reading, then it must have come in either by mistake, or by intentional correction, since the phrase $\delta\delta\epsilon\lambda\omicron\upsilon\pi\omicron\nu$ nowhere else occurs. But neither case is probable, considering the numerous, and at least partially independent authorities which attest it. The Rec. text, apart from its unusualness, is evidently the easier reading, [and therefore may be the more readily accounted for as an intended emendation]. It would be rendered, but finally; lit. as for what remains: i. e. after setting aside all your unsuitable claims. But $\omega\delta\epsilon$, which occurs nowhere else in Paul, save in Col. iv. 9, though very common in other parts of the New Testament, means, here; i. e., in this connection, or in this matter, where we are treating of the administration of the mysteries of God, comp. Rev. xiii. 10, 18; xiv. 12, xvii. 9. [Alf. translates it locally: here, on this earth, "It is," he says, "emphatic, and points to what follows, that though in the case of stewards inquiry was necessarily made here below, yet he, God's steward, awaited no such inquiry, $\text{ὑπὸ ἀνθρωπίνης ἡμέρας}$: by man's judgment, but one at the coming of the Lord." Stanley follows Lachmann in connecting $\omega\delta\epsilon$ with the previous words, "stewards of the mysteries of God here," and makes it mean, in this matter (as in the references above given). Wordsworth adheres to the Rec. He considers $\omega\delta\epsilon$ as harsh, and accounts for it as arising from the confusion of \omicron and ω , than which, he says, nothing is more common in the best Mss. Hodge, on the contrary, says it yields good sense]. $\Delta\omicron\epsilon\pi\acute{\omicron}\nu$ might serve for making the transition, like ceterum, moreover, and belong primarily to $\omega\delta\epsilon$. Or it may be joined to "is required," (which is favored by the order of the words), and so as to imply, that with this consideration the whole matter is wound up; or to express something further in relation to that mentioned in ver. 1, which was specially worthy of consideration.—it is required that.— ἵνα has a telic sense, and shows that the purport of the requirement is at the same time its purpose. The investigations in regard to such persons, aims at this, that one be found faithful.—This is why great trusts: ῥ reposed in a person, that he might conduct himself in the management of them according to the mind and will of God, who has committed them to Him, for the glory of His name and the welfare of His Church, and not for the legatees' own benefit (comp. Luke xii. 42). Εὕρεθῆναι , be found by the result as shown at the time of trial OSIANDER. Τῆς , according to Meyer, every one ["Faithful," emphatic. "The great requisite for the office of a steward is fidelity. As a servant he must be faithful to his master. As a disciple, he must be faithful to those under his oversight. He must not neglect to dispense to them their food, nor adulterate it, nor substitute anything in place of that given to be distributed. So in regard to ministers." HODGE].

VER. 3. Having stated the point of view from which alone a proper judgment could be formed in regard to him and his associates, Paul next proceeds to state his own feelings as to the judgment that might be formed of him by men. [Alford adds, "in contrast to the case of the stewards, into whose faithfulness enquiry is made 'here' on earth."] Very naturally the Corinthians would think that a good deal of weight attached to their judgment.—But [$\delta\epsilon$ indicates a transition to the application of what was said in general to his own particular case] for me it amounts to the very least thing.— $\epsilon\iota\varsigma\epsilon\lambda\acute{\alpha}\chi\iota\sigma\tau\omicron\nu\epsilon\sigma\tau\iota\nu$. The $\epsilon\iota\varsigma$ here, according to Greek usage, shows the result to which the thing comes—that I be judged by you.— $\text{ἵνα}\epsilon\delta\upsilon\alpha\kappa\tau\iota\theta\omega$. The objective clause in telic form. It certainly is not equivalent to $\delta\tau\alpha\nu\epsilon\delta\upsilon\alpha\kappa\tau\iota\theta\omega$: when I am judged; nor perhaps precisely the same as $\tau\acute{o}\epsilon\delta\upsilon\alpha\kappa\tau\iota\theta\eta\sigma\alpha\iota$, to be judged. ["Here and always ἵνα is more or less the conj. of purpose." ALFORD*]. A weakness of its force in the later Greek is not to be denied; but here the idea of intention or tendency lies in this, that something is about to happen or impends: 'I am not at all disturbed that I shall be judged by you as to my merits.' [Stanley, on the other hand, says that "the substitution of ἵνα with the subjunctive for the indicative is in the modern Romaic," and seems to take it so here]—or by man's judgment—lit.: 'by human day.' This is neither to be taken as a Cilicium nor as a Hebraism. It designates a day of judgment, analogously with the phrase dicem dicere, and here comes in correspondingly with the expression: "day of the Lord." We are not to understand by it a private decision ("by you") in contrast with a public one. But it is a generalization of the phrase: 'by you,' and by an obvious transition, the day of the act is put for the act itself, and the judgment as a whole for the judges themselves; or as Meyer: the day is personified, and hence ὁ is used in accordance with ἐφ' ὑμῶν, by you. There is something of solemnity in this phraseology; nor is it without a slight touch of irony or rebuke at their presumption in being supposed to fix upon a day of trial, and to sit upon a judgment-seat in order to pronounce upon Paul's merits or demerits. All appearance of haughtiness in this disparagement of other's opinions is removed by what follows.—Yea, I judge not of mine own self. Lit.: 'But neither do I judge myself.' The ἀλλά here is like that in iii. 2. Before ἐμᾶν we would naturally look for an οὐρά. But this is not necessary. The judgment on himself, which he here disavows, is a final decision as to his own merits, such as he is willing to abide by. ["Paul is here speaking not of the actions of men whether good or bad, but of the eminence of each individual, which ought not to be estimated by men's humors."] CALVIN].

* But Jelf in Gr. Gram. § 803, obs. 1, shows in full argument the gradual modification of meaning until it comes to have the force only of the accusative infinitive. And this, he says, is frequent in the New Testament. There seems to be a great effort among some critics to avoid the admission of this, and to show the telic force of ἵνα in every instance].

VER. 4. Instead of the expected antithesis, there follows first a confirmation of what precedes, in the way of a parenthesis.—For I know nothing with myself.—This first clause is concessive, [the force of for, as Winer says, falling upon the subsequent clause]: q. d. 'For although I know,' etc. So also Meyer, [who says, however, that the force of the proof does not lie in the second clause, so that the first would be only concessive, but in the antithetic relation of both clauses. He yet gives the sense thus]: "The clearness of my conscience as to my official duties is nevertheless (doch) not the ground on which my justification rests." [The phraseology here is peculiar, but thoroughly idiomatic, both in the Greek (οὐδὲν ἐμᾶν ὁνομα) and in our E. V., which almost literally translates it:—"I know nothing by myself." So also the Latin—nil conscire sibi. All expressions alike mean: I am conscious of no wrong. (See Jelf, Gr. Gram., § 682, 2). The English phrase is to be found in the early writers, and Stanley asserts: 'it is still a provincial form of speech for the same thought'. 'Know nothing,' i. e., so far as my official conduct is concerned. ["Elsewhere he speaks of himself as the 'chief of sinners,' which is perfectly consistent with his saying, that his conscience acquitted himself of failure as a Christian minister." HODGE.]—Yet not in this am I justified.—i. e., before God. It is a question, however, whether this justification is to be understood in the dogmatic sense, [of imputed righteousness], as Meyer, and Billr., and others maintain, or in the legal, ethical sense [as the early fathers, Calvin, Hodge, Alford, and others assert]. If the former, then the meaning is: that since his justification did not depend on the verdict of his own conscience but upon Christ, therefore his conscience could not furnish the ground on which he was to judge himself. If the latter, then the sense would be: that his acquittal of all blame does not rest on the fact that his conscience charged him with no official derelictions; since conscience pronounced only in regard to particular actions and not to the whole moral character as it appears in God's sight, so that of course a clean conscience could afford no certain basis of estimating the real worth of any person. Of these interpretations the latter is to be preferred, since there is no allusion in the context to the Gospel doctrine of justification by faith.—but he that judgeth me.—[Observe, not: "that justifieth me," which language would have been the term employed, had Paul here had in mind the matter of his general Christian estate, but: "judgeth" (ἀνακρίνων), i. e., holds an inquest and decides on the merits of the case which may be brought into issue.]—is the Lord.—i. e., Christ, [who looked deeper than conscience; and of course deeper than all outside observers], and who alone could comprehend all the data by which his official conduct was to be estimated. ["This inward allegiance of the conscience is the highest form of worship. The Lord Jesus was to the Apostle the object of all those sentiments and feelings which terminate on God. And He must be so to us, or we are not Christians. What makes a man a Christian is to feel and act towards Christ as God."] HODGE.].

VER. 5. Practical inference from the foregoing. So then (ὥστε), judge nothing.—μητι κρινέτε. Ti is not the object of judgment but its contents. It is equivalent to κρίων τινά. Hence the meaning is: "do not judge any judgment." The logic may be presented thus: "Since my judgment belongs to the Lord, therefore refrain from all premature decisions respecting me." BILLROTH, with less simplicity, says: "Since I do not even judge myself, therefore follow my example, and do not yourselves judge." He alludes here not to the mutually disparaging censures cast upon each other by the several factions (Billr.), but to the judgment of the Corinthian brotherhood upon himself.—before the time, —which is more fully explained in,—until the Lord shall come.—The time of His advent to judgment—His "appearing," or "epiphany" (2 Tim. iv. 1; 2 Thess. i. 7). The ὥς ἂν is used with the subjunctive ἔλθῃ, because an end to be reached is fixed upon from the standpoint of the present, but the reaching of which (here in respect of time), is still undecided. Or, according to Meyer: "The coming is thereby designated as problematical, and dependent on circumstances; not indeed, as it is doubted; also not, as it is dependent upon subjective determination, but, as it is an object of expectant faith." [The uncertainty indicated by ἂν is not as to the fact of Christ's coming, but as to the time when He shall come: q. d., "until the Lord shall come, whenever that may be." (See Jelf, Gr. Gram., § 846, 2.)] (Comp. Matth. xvi. 28; Luke xiii. 35).—That a correct judgment will then, for the first time, be possible is shown from what follows.—who also.—The καί here is neither to be taken in connection with the καί in following clause, as if it were et, both, and: nor has it a mere strengthening force, even; but it serves to single out from among the functions of the Lord, as He comes to judgment, that one with which he is here concerned: ["also," inter alia, as part of the proceedings of that Day." ALFORD.]—will bring to light.—φωτίζεν, with the accusative, to enlighten, illuminate, as the sun does the world, and hence to disclose, bring to light (comp. 2 Tim. i. 10),—the hidden things of darkness:—i. e., such as belong to darkness, or which darkness veils. (In Rom. ii. 16, we have simply: "the hidden things.") ["This includes acts now unknown, and those principles of action which lie concealed in the heart where no [human] eye can reach them. This is all that the context requires. In other connections, the secret things, or the works of darkness, means wicked works, works done in the dark to avoid detection. But the Apostle is here speaking of the reason why judgment should be deferred until the coming of Christ. The reason is that He alone can bring to light the secret acts and motives of men." HODGE.]—and will make manifest the counsels of the hearts.—Exegetical of the former, or a specification under the general head just mentioned. One function of the Judge will be to lay open the inner determinations of the will—the motives and purposes by which men are governed, and which are withdrawn from human sight. It is on these that the decision respecting our merits and our fidelity must at last turn. All depends upon the simplicity of our temper—upon such a service of the Lord as excludes all by-ends, and is upright and sincere. "The thought here is this: In this life our inward character can only be inferred from our acts; at the judgment it will be directly laid open by the Lord." NEANDER.—and then,—as contrasted with the present, when so much is veiled, and when men are disposed to exercise a premature judgment—shall each one have his praise:—ἐκάστω δὲ ἐταίριος. Literally: "to each one the praise," i. e., the praise which is his due, according to its various measures and degrees, corresponding to his worth. He here speaks of praise only, since he has in view primarily Apollos and himself, and not any Judaizing opposers. Hence there is no necessity of taking ἐταίριος as vox media, contrary to all usage, or even to regard it as an euphemism (with Theophylact). Paul's statement here, as CALVIN says, "arises from the assurance of a good conscience." He knew there was laid up for him a crown of righteousness (2 Tim. iv. 8).—from God.—This stands emphatically at the close. By this he gives us to understand that the judgment of the Lord, which would be pronounced upon his servants, was the judgment of God himself. Thus does he appeal from those partisan judgments, which exalt one at the expense of another, to the absolute and impartial judgment of God, who will give to each one his due. On the adjudication of Christ in its relations to God see Rom. ii. 16; Acts x. 42; xvii. 31. On "the praise from God" see Matth. xxv. 21. ["The command not to anticipate the judgment of the Lord is consistent with Paul's frequent recognition of the right and duty of the Church to sit in judgment on the qualifications of her own members. He is here speaking of the heart. The Church cannot judge the heart. Whether a man is sincere or insincere in his professions, whether his experience is genuine or spurious, God only can decide. The Church can only judge of what is outward. If any man profess to be holy, and yet is immoral the Church is bound to eject him, as Paul clearly teaches in the following chapter. Or if he profess to be a Christian, and yet rejects Christianity, or any of its essential doctrines, he cannot be received, Tit. iii. 10. But 'the counsels of the heart' only the Searcher of hearts can judge." HODGE.]

DOGMATICAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Christ's ministers stewards of the mysteries of God.—In this we see the high significance and solemn responsibility of the ministerial office. In a preëminent sense, CHRIST is the servant of God. It is through His hand that the pleasure of the Lord prospers; and on Him has God poured His Spirit without measure, and to His control given all things, and on Him conferred power over all flesh that He should give eternal life to as many as God has given Him. Subordinate to Him in this work are Apostles, Evangelists, Pastors and Teachers, acting the part, so to speak, of handworkmen (ὑπηρέται). They labor under His direction, undertaking and executing all those various offices by which the redemption and the guidance of souls are accomplished. The more completely they put themselves under Him, preferring His will and His plans to their own, seeking no glory but His, asserting His authority as the only rule—the more exalted will they appear in God's sight, as persons who are worthy to coöperate with "His Servant" in this, the most important of all concerns, and to become the organs of his gracious purposes.

The lofty significance of their office appears enhanced by the fact, that in this service they are made "stewards of the mysteries of God." To them has been committed the wondrous plan of salvation—a plan which from all eternity had been hid in God, and was concealed from the researches of the wisest in this world, and was at last revealed in Jesus Christ, and hence is well termed a mystery—even this plan, with all the means requisite for its execution, in reconciling sinners to God, and awaking the spiritually dead, and enlightening the benighted, and originating, preserving, confirming, and perfecting the life of faith in God's dear children. Their business it is, therefore, to employ this wealth of Divine instrumentalities for the extension of the kingdom of God on earth, and in behalf of each and all of God's people; and to discharge this trust publicly and privately, towards all classes and conditions in society without partiality:—to inquire out the ways through which God leads souls to the truth, and to construct such ways, by examining into the tendencies and characteristics and wants of individuals and communities, and by investigating their circumstances and inward conditions in life; and then to urge men to enter them:—to be unwearied in beseeching men in Christ's stead to become reconciled to God, warning, exhorting, rebuking, reproving, in the consciousness that God is acting in them and through them and in the exercise of something of His holy earnestness and pitying love. This, this is to act the part of a faithful steward; this is to fulfil the obligation which rests upon the office-bearers of a Christian church. In order to be thus faithful they must be instructed by the Spirit, and follow in the footsteps of Him who, as the Son of God, was faithful in all His house, and who said of Himself that He could do nothing except what He saw the Father do. But if, instead of this, they go their own ways, employ methods to their own liking, conduct themselves so that the mind and counsel of God are not to be discerned in them—if they allow themselves to be carried away by carnal zeal and impatience, or yield to disgust and slothfulness, or suffer sensual gratifications, whether refined or gross, or a love of honors and authority and applause to slip in and betray them into unhallowed courses,—then are they chargeable with a faithlessness which incurs a fearful accountability.

2. The Lord is Judge.—This truth is, on the one hand, a source of comfort to all true servants of God, amid the various criticisms and censures passed upon them; and, on the other hand, it serves to abate the confidence of their own self-estimation. In the great day of account the Searcher of hearts will bring to light all that has been stirring within them, their longings and strivings, their secret motives and inward struggles, their inarticulate sighs as well as their uttered prayers; and in view of these things, all unknown to men, will He judge them. However others, who judge according to appearance, may find occasions for censure, or may misconstrue their doings and omissions, they can accept it all in peace and look away in calm assurance from these hasty decisions to the righteous sentence of an All-seeing Judge.—Yet, with all this, there is at the same time something very subduing in the anticipation of this only valid adjudication. However unconscious of blame they may be in the discharge of their duties, still this can afford them no certain ground for hoping to be acquitted before their Lord. His all-piercing eye detects faults that are hidden from their own consciences; and in His all-illuminating light much may appear unclean which to their clouded vision seems stainless. Hence it becometh them to be modest and leave to Him the final award.—Yet from him, who has been diligent in his endeavors to be faithful, the due praise will not be withheld,—however much men might criticize. From the mouth of his Lord he will receive the sentence: “Well done thou good and faithful servant, thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things. Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.”—But even as when on earth every tribute of honor had the effect only to humble him the more, by bringing out in contrast a sense of his own unworthiness; so, too, will he receive this approval of his gracious Chief Shepherd in utmost lowliness. The crown of glory will ever be cast at his feet.

STARKE:—Christ's servants should perform their service, not so as to please men, but as the Lord requires. As stewards of the Gospel treasures, they have the right to open these treasures, and to close them against the wicked (Matth.

xvi. 19). The higher the Lord, the higher the servant; yet the latter is ever subordinate.—Ministers are servants, not lords, of men's faith. One is our Master, even Christ. Both pastors and flock are brethren (2 Cor. i. 24), (Hed.), ver. 1.—A minister must be faithful: 1, to God, in looking to Him with single eye, seeking His honor, acting according to His will and maintaining His rights; 2, to the Church, in withholding from it nothing essential to its welfare, and in declaring the whole counsel of God, so that no person shall suffer or perish through his fault or neglect; 3, to his own office in not acting the part of a lord, but of a servant who is ready to listen and labor. Fidelity in office grows out of fidelity to one's self. A true preacher preaches Christ not only with the mouth but from the heart. He speaks from experience and confirms his doctrine by his conduct, ver. 2.—A minister of God must be deaf, alike to the praise and the blame of men. His rule is the will of his Master, not the opinion of men. If he follows the latter he will never be faithful in his office, ver. 3.—It is one thing to have a good conscience before God for our consolation (1 Jno. iii. 21) and another thing to have it for our self-justification. The one requires a sincerity and diligence such as David could claim, the other a faultless perfection such as neither David nor Paul dare arrogate (Ps. xix. 13; Phil. iii. 12).—Blessed state, to be conscious of no wrong, and yet not to be disposed to justify oneself, ver. 4.—How unlike the judgment of God and the judgment of man. The former comes at the end of probation, is impartial, comprehensive in its data; the latter is ordinarily premature, rash, and grounded only on the outward appearance.—What must be the disclosures of the last day! God holds the key to the inmost thoughts of all men; and when they are all open to inspection, how fearful will then be the outcry! Take heed, O hypocrite; the Lord knows thee. Rejoice, thou sincere heart; the Lord will come and be thy witness (Job xxxiv. 21), ver. 5.

RIEGER:—The office of the preacher springs out of Christ.—As the Father sent Him, so He sends forth His ministers in order to proclaim the power which has been committed to Him in heaven and earth. This is their service and stewardship, ver. 1.—If distinctions are to be made among ministers, better look to their fidelity than to their gifts or reputation; and in judging of fidelity, that must often be taken into account which is least apt to strike the notice of men.

HEUBNER, A.:—The worth of true evangelical ministers consists: 1, in the purpose of their office; a, to serve Christ and be wholly dependent on His word; and hence, b, to promote the salvation of the congregation as stewards of God, ver. 1.—2, In their fidelity, which is seen; a, in the actual discharge of their duties; b, in a sincerity of spirit which ever stands as in God's sight and cares to be approved by Him alone, ver. 2.—3, In the humility, which; a, refuses to justify self, ver. 3 ff., and, b, awaits in confidence the Divine award, vv. 4, 5.—B. Ministers and congregations will one day together stand at the bar of God:—1. They will so stand, for; a, Paul implies this; b, it is necessary to the revelation of the Divine righteousness. 2. The fact is a momentous one; a, for ministers—it ought to shame them of their unfaithfulness, prompt them to walk conscientiously, and lift them above the opinions of the world; b, for the congregation—it should keep them from judging before the time, and cause them to take heed rather that the Word of God brings forth fruit among them; c, for both—they ought to conduct themselves as if already before the judgment seat.—Man is often unconscious of the deepest motives which actuate him; hence he can give himself no assurance that he has omitted nothing due, or done nothing sinful, ver. 4.—So set always that thou canst at any moment have thy heart exposed, ver. 5.

GOSSENER:—As a general thing, the natural man loves to hear what people think of him. It is harder to despise praise than blame.

[HODGE:—"VER. 1 contains two important truths: ministers have no arbitrary or discretionary authority in the Church; neither have they any supernatural power such as is attributed to them in the Romish Church. Their authority is merely ministerial, and therefore to be judged by the standard of those commands which are known to the whole Church. And, secondly, they are not, like Aristotle or Plato, the originators of their own doctrines, or the teachers of the doctrines of other men, but simply the dispensers of the truths which God has revealed."]

W. F. BESSER:—VER. 2. It is a comfort that nothing but fidelity is required of stewards, not talents, nor inventive powers, nor manifold activity, nor success. The daintiness and fanciful taste of the vain and luxurious Corinthians, in whose sight fidelity seemed a small virtue, are no rarity in these times. But worse still is the rebellion shown by many congregations, who style themselves churches of Christ, against the fidelity of their pastors and teachers.

[G. C. A. HARLESS:—VER. 2. What is here asserted of ministers holds good also of all Christians. Compare the parable of our Lord on "The talents," Matth. xxv. 14ff. The peculiar nature of the fidelity demanded is determined by the peculiar character of the blessing of salvation intrusted. It is not fidelity to a duty outwardly imposed, to a precept, rule, maxim or the like, but fidelity to an inwardly active vital principle—personal fidelity to a personal fellowship with God, wrought by the power of the Holy Ghost. It is the fidelity of a new-born child of God in whom the Spirit testifies to what the word promises].

[CALVIN:—VER. 4. Conscious of no wrong, and yet not justified. "Papists abuse this passage for the purpose of shaking the assurance of faith; and truly I confess that if their doctrine were admitted, we could do nothing but tremble in wretchedness during our whole life. For what tranquillity could our minds enjoy if it were to be determined from our works whether we are well-pleasing to God. I confess, therefore, that from the main foundation of Papists there follows nothing but continual disquietude for consciences; and accordingly we teach that we must have recourse to the free promise of mercy which is offered to us in Christ, that we may be fully assured that we are accounted righteous by God"].

[A. THOLUCK:—VERS. 1-5. The characteristics of a faithful steward.—I. All he has he regards as belonging to his Lord. II. He is as faithful in small things as in great things. III. The source of his fidelity is his love for his Lord.—TH. CHALMERS:—Vt. 3-4. The judgment of men compared with the judgment of God.—I. God has a right to prefer greater claims against us, than men can. II. God has a clearer and more elevated sense of moral worth and holiness than men have].

VIII.—APPLICATION OF THE FOREGOING CONTRAST BETWEEN THE SELF-SUFFICIENCY OF THE CORINTHIANS AND THE ACTUAL CONDITION AND DEPORTMENT OF THE APOSTLES.

CHAPTER IV. 6-13.

- 6 And these things, brethren, I have in a figure transferred to myself and to Apollos for your sakes; that ye might learn in us not to think of men [om. to think of men'] above that which [the things which'] is [are] written, that no one of you be puffed up for one against another. For who maketh thee to differ from another? and what hast thou that thou didst not receive? now if thou didst receive &, why dost thou glory, as if thou hadst not received it? Now ye are full, now ye are rich, ye have reigned as kings without us: and I would to God [om. to God, and insert indeed, etc.] ye did reign, that we also might reign with you. For I think that God hath set forth us the apostles last, as it were appointed to death: for we are made a spectacle unto the world, and to angels, and to men. We are fools for Christ's sake, but ye are wise in Christ; we are weak, but ye are strong; ye are honorable, but we are 11 despised. Even unto this present hour we both hunger, and thirst, and are naked,² 12 and are buffeted, and have no certain dwellingplace; and labor, working with our

³ Ver. 11.—[The Rec. has κατασκευαζόμενοι, with B. & but A. C. D. F. Cod. Sin. all have κατασκευάζομενοι. And this is the reading of all good editions now. See note].

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

VIII. 6. [Having laid down certain principles in regard to the Church and its relations to its teachers, and illustrated them in the case of Apollos and himself, Paul now proceeds to show their more general scope and bearing].—And. —δ ε, [in the sense of now], indicates that he is approaching the close of what he has to say on party strife.—these things.—ταῦτα, refers back to iii. 5.—It is from that point that he has spoken of himself and Apollos. [So Hodge, de Wette, Meyer and others. But Alford says: "There is surely no reason for limiting its reference within that point." He accordingly extends the reference back to ch. i. 12, and infers that all the names mentioned there were only used "as samples," behind which the real persons intended were hid].—brethren,—addressed to the Church as a whole, but primarily (de Wette) to the party leaders and their followers. "By this title he lays hearty hold upon the Corinthians, who had been showing themselves very un-brotherly." Blass.—I have transferred in a figure.—μετεσχημάτισα. There is some difficulty in determining the sense of this word. It elsewhere appears with the meaning: to transform, to change, Phil. iii. 21. The simple σχηματίζω is used to denote that form of speech, where a person, instead of saying directly what he means, hints it in ways for his hearers to reflect upon and puzzle out the meaning of—allegorizes. It is used also of transformations, false movements, feint attacks, disguises (comp. 2 Cor. xi. 18). Neander explains it: "to transfer something to any one by a figure of speech. The μετεσχηματισμός here consists in this, that Paul develops in reference to himself and Apollos what holds good also of all the Corinthian teachers." Hence arose the old interpretation, that Paul had only by supposition represented in himself and Apollos what really belonged to others who were the actual party leaders, putting his own name and that of his friend for theirs. But this is a groundless assumption, irreconcilable with i. 13.—Still less admissible is the idea that the word refers to the figures of "planting" and "watering," under which he had exhibited the nature of his work (iii. 6); for these were used only for vividly illustrating his point, and had nothing to do with the main object in hand.—Undoubtedly he means "a transfer" of such a sort,—that, what was true of teachers in general, and so was calculated to bring down the pride of the party leaders at Corinth, he had applied especially to Apollos and himself. It was in fact a transforming of the general into the specific, the relation of which to the parties concerned is expressed by εἰς.—unto myself and Apollos, for your sakes.—Why he did this is at once explained,—in order that in us ye may learn.—By exhibiting himself and Apollos of so small account (suitably no doubt to the feelings of the latter also), he would by example teach them that modesty which does not seek to exalt itself.—not above what is written.—τὸ μὴ ὑπὲρ αὐτῶν γέγραπται. Were ῥησιν genuine [see under the text], then it would read: "not to think of yourselves above," etc. But, as it is, the brief clause, converted into a substantive by the article τὸ, is very forcible, and is to be rendered imperatively: "not beyond what is written;" i. e., exceed not this measure, hold to the Scripture rule both in your inward judgments and in your pretensions. Thus this short expression, so abruptly brought in, conveys more than the gloss, "to think." ["The ellipsis of the verb is significant as giving greater largeness and general comprehensiveness to the proverb, which would be limited by the insertion of a particular verb with a special idea. Compare a similar ellipse in Terence, ut nequid nimis, and in Milton: 'Observe the rule of, not too much, by Temperance taught.'" Words.].—But what does he mean by αὐτῶν γέγραπται: "what things are or have been written?" Does he allude here to his own previous declarations? [as Luther and Calov. assert, and Calvin allows]. Hardly; for then it would have been προέγραφα, I have before written (comp. Eph. iii. 3). According to Paul's usage, the formula: "it is written," refers to the Holy Scriptures, especially to the Old Testament: since we find no allusion to any New Testament, or to any life of Christ in any of Paul's writings, ["though indeed, as Chrysostom supposes, St. Matthew's Gospel had been written at this time, and there the Corinthians would find cautions from Christ himself against the sin of calling and being called, Rabbi." Words.]. Undoubtedly Paul here has in mind, not individual expressions of Holy Writ, but its collective tenor, which all points to this truth: that all honor belongs to God; and that all self-boasting, all cleaving to men, and priding oneself in men, must be given up. This doctrine we find summed up in apophthegms like Jer. ix. 23, to which reference has already been made. The sense, therefore, cannot be doubtful. This is exhibited more clearly in what follows:—that ye be not puffed up one for one against another.—The Ind. φουφισθε after ἑκα occasions no little difficulty. The Ind. after ἑκα first appears in the later Greek, nowhere else in the New Testament. [Winer, however, adopts the view that it is the Ind. and is to be regarded as an impropriety of the later Greek. § xli. 1. b.; and so does Jelf, Gr. Gram., § 806, ver. 2.] Some (Bengel, Oslander) assume here a peculiar or mistaken form of contraction for φωτισθε (as in ζηλοῦτε, Gal. iv. 17); others (Fritzsche [Origen and Theod.]) change iva into ἐνα; others give to iva a local signification: where, whereby, under which circumstances, and render the clause: "in which case, i. e., while acting according to Scripture rule, ye are not puffed up," (present for the future). So Meyer. Since the correction, which was designed to restore the supposed original text, is untenable,—for the reason that the change of ἐνα into iva would have drawn the subjective after it (but which nowhere appears, save in one MS. of Chrysostom); and since the use of iva, in the sense proposed by Meyer, does not reach back to the prose of this period, we must in consequence decide for Bengel's view, and all the more, for the reason, that iva stands just before in its telic sense. The second clause with iva stands either coördinate with the first, or subordinate to it. The latter can be understood as denoting, equally with the former, the purpose of the Apostle, yet so as to be included in it—defining the point more exactly. [To avoid the appearance of solecism, Wordsworth suggests that φωτισθε be taken as imperative, thus involving a change from the indirect to the direct style. Examples of this sudden transition he finds in Acts i. 4; xxii. 8; xxiii. 32; Luke v. 14; Mark vi. 9; also in this very Epistle, i. 31.—Accordingly he would translate: "in order that—(you may practice this precept)—be not ye puffed up." This is ingenious, but harsh, especially as we have iva with the subj. in the clause immediately preceding, and we would naturally look for the same construction here. Instead of "liveliness," we should have "raggedness," of style as the result.] The meaning, however, is plain. We have here a striking exhibition of the partisan spirit. "It is the definition of a sect, where individuals admire individuals." BENGE. The adherents of one party are here represented as seeking mutually to exalt each other to the prejudice of those of another party (comp. ἰνὰ τὸ ἀλλήλων, 1 Thess. v. 11). ὑπὲρ: to the advantage of, in favor of (not [as Winer] "above the one," both on account of the Gen. and of the contrast in κατά, against). Τὸν ἑνός, the one, denotes a person belonging to the same party; τοῦ ἑτέρου, the other, a person belonging to another party. Interpreting, however, in the light of facts, we must suppose that the leaders and not private members are particularly intended. ὑπὲρ then would stand as in 2 Cor. vii. 4. It implies that party pride which would prompt a person to puff his own chief and look down with contempt upon the chief of another party. De Wette, without sufficient grounds, insists on referring this to the Christ-party, who also had exalted their leaders above the others.

VER. 7. FOR.—Paul goes on to give the reason for his protest against their emulation, in the most energetic style, addressing a series of questions to those who were "puffed up." The first,—Who maketh thee to differ?—"This has been commonly taken to imply distinction of some sort; either actual distinction, by office and the like, in which case the answer would be: 'not thyself, but the Lord;' or assumed distinction by a claim to preëminence, in which case he would imply: 'no one does this, but thyself; it is an arbitrary self-promotion;' or at least: 'there is no judge qualified for doing this.' But thus interpreted, the Apostle would be regarded as addressing properly the party leaders [so Words.], while it is clear that he was just before addressing the partisan followers. Besides, in the construction, first suggested above, the second question would be already anticipated. Finally, these interpretations would transcend the demonstrable use of διακρίνω, whether in the New Testament or elsewhere. The rendering best suited to usage and to the connection is: 'Who separates you?' This, then, would refer to the party position which the person spoken to assumed, and in which he proudly stood aloof from other parties and their leaders. What the Apostle means to ask is: 'What is the reason you say'—or 'Who justifies you in saying: "I am of Paul, and I of Apollos," and in priding yourself in such partisanship? This party separation, in which you boast, is altogether arbitrary and unwarrantable.' [Bengel, Words., Alf., Calv. give the meaning: 'Who distinguisheth thee,' as if by reason of some excellence which is supposed to exist. And for this use of διακρίνω Words. refers to Acts xv. 9. The propriety of this, also, Hodge concedes. And it was the construction on which Augustine proceeded in his argument with Pelagius, and in his maintenance of the doctrine of sovereign grace. It seems better, therefore, to abide by the ordinary interpretation given in the text].—In the second question,—What hast thou which thou didst not receive?—he alludes to the advantages which a person might possess, and which stood connected in some way with the quickening and informing influence of this or that teacher. [But is not this limiting the scope of the question too much? which plainly bears upon the leaders also]. 'These advantages,' he implies, 'could only be the ground of pride in case they had been self-attained. But thou hast only what thou didst receive. All thine insight, thy gifts for speaking, etc., are a bestowment from God, even though imparted through human instrumentalities.'—To this question the next directly joins, since it presupposes that something has been received; and this not problematically, but as actually existing,—and yet it designates the boasting as something contradictory to this supposition, and therefore wholly unsuitable. Its import is,—if—as I grant—thou really didst receive—something—why dost thou boast, as if thou hadst not received it?—but all were due to thine own exertions or to thy connection with this or that teacher?" The καί here belongs, as usual (Passow II. p. 1540), not to the entire hypothetical clause, but to ἐλαβεῖς, and may be translated, actually, indeed, really.—But may we not obtain a fuller meaning, and one more comporting with the words and aim of the Apostle, if we suppose the Apostle to imply in the second question that nothing had been received, by punctuating it, either so that τί δὲ ἔχεις shall be taken alone: 'and what hast thou?'—or so that τί δὲ shall stand separately: 'how now?' or: 'what then? hast thou that which thou didst not receive?' He would thus be pointing to their vain conceit, their empty boasting, their pride in the gifts of their teachers, in which they had no part themselves. The third question would then first treat of a case wherein they were supposed to have received something, and which as such excluded boasting. So Bengel: "There are many things, which thou has not received, and therefore thou hast not these things, and canst not boast of them; either thou hast received, or hast not received; if thou hast not received, thou possessest not; if thou hast received, thou possessest it not, except as received, and so without cause for glorying. The latter sense renders the meaning of καί, even, which immediately follows, more expressive, and shows the antanaclassis (repetition in a modified form) in the clauses: 'thou hast not received' and 'hadst not received.'"

Vm. 8. Already ye are full, already ye are rich; ye have reigned as kings without us.—[Having before rebuked, he here proceeds to deride, as Calvin says,] their false contentment, vain self-sufficiency and lofty bearing, as if they had already reached the goal of all Christian hope and effort. Especially has he in mind certain persons who always aspired to pitch the tune, and the parasites, who were ever ready to strike in. The clauses here are not questions, but declarations charged with keenest irony. Only when so understood do the words carry their proper emphasis. To deny him the right to use such irony, and to impute lordly desires to Paul in consequence, is one of Rückert's false assumptions. And to this Meyer fairly replies, that the Apostle must have been the best judge as to the mode in which it was necessary to discipline the Corinthians, and that it was precisely because of his very purity of conscience that he was able to yield to his justly roused feelings without rendering himself liable to suspicion. Neander says: "The conceit of a narrow-minded bigotry can best be attacked with irony and sarcasm;" and Besser: "The servant of Christ need not be ashamed of any outburst of indignation that springs from a hearty love, and the biting salt of derision, which spices his language, does not detract from his amiability;" [and Hodge: "The prophets especially employ these weapons freely in their endeavors to convince the people of the folly of idols"]. In what precedes, Paul has just exhorted them to modesty in accordance with the pattern set by himself and Apollos, and reminded them of their dependence on God for all their endowments—a dependence which excluded boasting. Now he reminds them, not only that they were unmindful of this dependence, but that they were also cradling themselves in the vain conceit of their own perfection—they, the very persons whom he had just before convicted of great imperfection and moral perversity.—ἤδη, already, i. e., so long before the proper time for it. It points to a goal remote, and hints that all true satisfaction, and true riches, and true kingship, belonged not to the present period of the world; and hence it implies that they were vainly anticipating the glory which was to come hereafter. The word is put first for the sake of the emphasis.

The three verbs following form a climax: "ye have enough;" "ye enjoy a superfluity;" "you have attained to lordship." κεκορεσμένοι ἐστέ=επλουτήσατε (comp. Rev. iii. 17); the former implies the full possession and enjoyment of salvation; the latter, that they had this in superabundance. We have here a picture of that self-conceit, that sense of sufficiency and fullness which the sectarian spirit generally engenders, and by which all disposition to receive spiritual good from any quarter outside of the party circle, is entirely destroyed. The sectarian always feels himself perfectly supplied in all respects, and in no time or way needful of any thing further.—It must be acknowledged, indeed, that the Corinthians were enriched by God's grace, "in all knowledge and in all spiritual gifts" (i. 5-7), yet the consciousness of this fact was disfigured by their pride; and that sense of their poverty in themselves, and of their manifold defects, which ought to have kept them humble, was in like manner suppressed.—In the verbs επλουτήσατε and εβασίλευσατε, the Aorist form leads us out of the idea of simple being into that of becoming (having become) comp. 2 Cor. viii. 9. By the word "reign" we are not to understand either the enjoyment of any high degree of knowledge, authority, safety and happiness [as Calvin and Barnes]; nor yet the supremacy attained by party leaders [as Billroth]; nor yet the pre-eminence of one party over another. Paul here refers to that regal state which Christians were to enjoy under the future reign of the Messiah, and which is alluded to in 2 Tim. ii. 12; Rom. viii. 17; Jno. xvii. 24; Rev. v. 10; xx. 4;—a state in which they should be delivered from all the restraints of this life, and introduced into the full possession of all the gifts and powers of the heavenly kingdom. This it is which he says the Corinthians had begun to assume already, so prematurely. [So Alf., Stanley, Words., Hodge]. "That which afterwards developed itself in the Papacy on the one side, and in the fanatical sects, like that of the Anabaptists, on the other, had already begun to prevail in the Corinthian Church. When both the bottomless depths of sin and the glory of divine grace are alike uncomprehended, then people dream themselves into a supremacy, whose kingdom, with all its show of spirituality, is of this world, and where the holy Apostles enter not." Besser.

There remains to be considered the cutting expression—without us—i. e. without our presence or coöperation. He does not here mean to charge them with having given him any personal affront; but he only states with emphasis the fact as it was, viz., that in all their boasting, and in all their supposed attainment of their goal, himself and associates, ["who had been looking forward to present them on that day as their glory and joy" Alf.], had no part, and were not needed.

From this point he turns to speak in another tone ["and with solemnity" Alf.].—I would—δοξαζον, according to later usage, a participle with the Indicative. [The addition "to God" found in our version, is not authorized, or at least not demanded by the original. The Scriptures do not authorize such appeals to God as seem to be in common, when our version was made" ἮΘΟΝ].—indeed;—ye strengthens the wish—that ye did reign.—The irony can hardly be supposed to continue here, as if he insinuated as the object of his wish: "that you might give us some share in your kingdom, [and that we might be of some account among you." So Lightfoot, who interprets this as a "bitter taunt"]. This would have been indeed too bitter. Rather we must take it as the expression of a glorious and sincere wish, that they had already reached the goal; so that the Apostles, their teachers, might enjoy their glory with them, inasmuch as both parties were inseparable in their final fruition of glory when this was actually obtained. "When you shall be perfected, then we shall have ease, and the end of Apostolic trouble." ΒΕΝΟΛ. This is implied in the clause—that we might reign with you.—In thus speaking of them as the original possessors of glory, and of the Apostles as only partners with them, he adopts a humble phraseology, which at the same time conveys an indirect rebuke at their pride (comp. Osiander in loco).

VER. 9. For.—He here proceeds to state what reason he had for the wish just expressed, and how closely it lay on his heart. This reason might be seen in the miserable condition which he and his fellow Apostles were in. The connection may be stated thus: 'for we, the Apostles, ("founders of churches, which these high-swalling pseudo-apostles are not," OSI.), are so persecuted and afflicted, that this fellowship in the kingdom cannot but be greatly desired by us.' This is a more simple interpretation than to insert a parenthesis here, implying: 'but this cannot happen until the kingdom of God is revealed; for I think,' etc. Ruckert is mistaken in supposing that the irony is still continued, as if it meant: 'very probably God has appointed us last; you naturally go in first, then, after all the rest, we follow suit.' This interpretation (which supposes that what immediately precedes is ironical likewise) presents the Apostle in a too ignoble aspect for even the utmost candor to admit. There is no implication of this sort in the opening word:—Ἰ think—δοκῶ—God has exhibited—ἀπεδείξεν, as in 2 Thess. ii. 4, comp. θέατρον—us.—To interpret this of Paul alone [as Calvin, Beza] is forbidden by the article before ἀποστόλους—the Apostles.—And in case any would wish to translate: 'God has appointed us, the last Apostles, unto death [as Calvin, Chrys.], an objection arises to this, apart from all other reasons, in the fact, that then the article would have been put before ἐσχάτους:—last.—In this word [which is here a predicate, attached to the verb defining its operation] there is expressed in a general manner what is afterwards stated more definitely—last, not in point of time, but in grade of society (homines infirmos sortii).—as appointed unto death.—ὥς ἐπιθανάτους, Chrys.: κατάδικους; Suid.: προσδοκίμους τοῦ ἀποθανεῖν, comp. 2 Cor. xi. 23-27. No allusion is here made to bestiarii, or to gladiators [as Stanley after Tertullian, Chrys., Calvin and others]. That they, as malefactors condemned to death, were also exposed to public contempt, is still further set forth in a causal sentence—for we are become a spectacle.—ἡ εἰσβολή, which is elsewhere called θέαμα. So θεαρίζεσθαι, Heb. x. 33—to the world.—["not to a single city, but to the whole world" CHRY.].—corresponding to the range of the Apostles' labors, which embraced all nations and lands (see Col. i. 6, 23; Rom. x. 18).—But this general term is so specialized as to include also the dwellers in heaven, the angels; and so he seems here to pass, in thought, beyond the direct sphere of his personal activity.—As well to angels as to men.—By "angels" does he mean good or evil angels? Undoubtedly the former, since no epithet is applied; and, according to New Testament usage (with but one exception—vi. 3), the term denotes good angels, never the bad only, nor yet the two classes together. Only in case we take the word "spectacle" in a bad sense, indicating an object for mocking and malicious enjoyment, can we suppose bad angels to be intended. We should then be compelled to take the term "world" as a designation of the entire realm of beings hostile to the Gospel. This, however, would be an arbitrary interpretation (see Meyer). While then by "men" we understand all on earth, of every sort, who observe the Apostles' wants and suffering, the "angels" can only mean those who from above look down in loving sympathy and wonder at the Apostles' steadfastness. Such are the cloud of witnesses in the midst of which Paul feels that he and his associates are exhibited for a spectacle. Comp. Osi., and passages like Luke xxii. 43; Matth. iv. 11; Heb. xii. 22; 1 Pet. i. 12. On the contrary, Luther, Neander, Bising, Besser, interpret the word, of angels and men, both good and evil. Besser says: "So the world, both angels and men, are divided in respect to the Apostles and their ministry. It is a spiritual battle, to which the Gospel trumpet summons the hosts in heaven and on earth, in the atmosphere and the whole visible circuit. The scene presented to the eyes of men, is but an image of that which goes on behind the curtain."

VER. 10. ["Again the bitterest irony: 'how different our lot from yours! How are you to be envied—we to be pitied!' ALFORD]. He begins with a contrast lying nearest his thought.—We, fools for Christ's sake.—"Are" is understood. He means: 'we pass for fools, because we preach Christ crucified, and propose to know nothing else.' Osiander's explanation transcends the simple meaning of the words: 'I am content out of love for Christ and his cause to pass for a fool.'—but ye, wise in Christ,—i.e., they, in their union with Christ (not, "in the Church," nor, "in the doctrine" of Christ), are very knowing, full of insight. This is ironical. They fancy themselves such, and seek to pass for such, in their efforts to combine Christianity and secular wisdom.—we, weak,—ἀσθενεῖς signifies a lack of energy, which any superficial observer might suppose to characterize the Apostle, by reason of his modest reserve on the one hand, and of his suffering condition on the other. (Comp. 2 Cor. xiii. 4; x. 10). "The word expresses the prevailing tone of the Apostle's mind—a consciousness of weakness, by virtue of which he was the better able to receive strength from God." NEANDER. (See ii. 3).—but ye, strong.—Ισχυροί suggests the idea of a bold, energetic forth-putting, which carried the appearance of assumption, and "a proud parade of abilities that were derived from the Lord." With this, there is closely connected the condition, which, by reversing the order of the contrast, is presented first.—ye, glorious.—Ευδοχοί i. e., in honor and authority, by reason of your wisdom and power.—but we, despised.—Ατιμοί, i. e., void of esteem, in disgrace, as seen in the shameful treatment received. To supply the words: "on account of Christ," and: "in Christ," in the second and third antithesis, is unnecessary, although it would yield fitting sense.

VERB. 11-13.—He here leaves the antithesis, and goes on to enlarge upon the destitution and ignominy endured by the Apostles. [His irony, too, gives way to deep, earnest feeling, awakened in view of all he had encountered for Christ and for the Church; and his spirit mellows to the kindlier mood which speaks in ver. 14].—unto this present hour.—The designation stands in contrast with the "already" of ver. 8. [While they seemed to have got through trials into triumphs, he was still in the midst of trouble].—we both hunger and thirst and are in want of clothing.—Γυμνίσθεν, 2 Cor. xi. 27; Matth. xxv. 36; Jas. ii. 15; Is. lviii. 7. [On the form of this verb see Winer, § xvi. "From γυμνός one would expect γυμνίτης and accordingly the best odd. have in this place, γυμνίτευομεν, which we must not, with Fr. and Meyer, take for an orthographical error."].—and are buffeted.—Κολαφίζεσθαι, to be beaten with fists (comp. Matth. xxvi. 67; 1 Pet. ii. 20.—and have no certain dwelling place.—ἀστα-ροῦμεν. The word occurs only here,—lit., are without fixed abode—and points to flights amid persecutions [such as Paul often was obliged to make; and why not also to his perpetual journeyings, having given up home to be the continual missionary that he was?].—and we labor.—From pains he turns to toils. (Comp. ix. 6; 2 Cor. xi. 7; 1 Thess. ii. 9; Acts xviii. 8).—working.—i. e., as a hired person.—with our own hands.—According to Greek notions, this involved a sort of disgrace (αἰσχύνη).—Being reviled we bless.—He here goes on to exhibit his self-denial in still other forms, as shown in his deportment under ill usage. "In requital for wicked words of execration (λοιδόρειν), we give good words of benediction (εὐλογεῖν)."—Being persecuted we suffer it.—i. e., under a persistent and active hostility (διώκειν) we exhibit a patience, which refrains from retaliation or resistance, and lets all pass (ἀνεχέσθαι).—being defamed, we entreat.—For slanderous speeches (δοσσημείν) we return dissuasions (παρακαλεῖν), entreaties that such things may not happen, not intercessions before God [as Calvin; but Stanley says: (1) 'we offer consolation,' or (2) as in ver. 16, 'we entreat men to follow our example,' comp. 2 Cor. i. 8]. The reading βλασφημοῦμενοι, is indeed well supported [see under the text], and it means essentially the same thing.—Whether godless cursings are also therein im- plied, is at least doubtful, since this idea comes in only when God is the object of the blasphemy. [But why should not this idea enter here as well, when Paul carried on himself the name of Christ which was blasphemed in him? This was the sorest spot on which a true Apostle could be attacked. Hence in this word his statements reach a climax]. In these declarations Paul gives us to understand, not (as Meyer) that the Apostles were so very destitute of honor among men, that they did not care to vindicate themselves against their villifiers (as persons do who have honor to maintain), but that they sought honor itself by thus requiting and overcoming evil with good. (Comp. Matth. v. 44; Luke xxiii. 34; Acts vii. 60; Rom. vii. 14, 17; 1 Pet. iii. 9).

Finally, he returns to the simple exhibition of the dishonor into which they were cast, and sets it forth in deepest colors and at the extremest point.—as the refuse of the world have we become.—Mey.: 'It is as if we were the scum, the vilest dregs of mankind.' This idea, however, would not be lost if, with Luther and others, we were to translate the word περικαθάρματα: sin offerings, in allusion to an ancient custom (the continuance of which, however, to the time of the Apostle cannot be confidently asserted, or that it was so far held in popular remembrance that the expression would be readily understood in this sense), viz., that of devoting to death the vilest men, such as slaves and malefactors, in seasons of public calamity, for the purpose of conducting off from the rest the wrath of the Deity. These homines piaculares were indeed designated by the simpler word κάθαρμα; but in Prov. xxi. 18, the LXX. gives περικαθάρμα for the Hebrew כִּפּוּר; sin offering. It denotes purification, remotely, expiation; but also, that which is purged away, filth, refuse, offal; in Arrian, a reprobate man, an outcast. [Calvin says that "Paul, in adding the preposition περὶ, seems to have had an eye to the expiatory rite itself, inasmuch as those unhappy men, who were devoted to execrations, were led around through the streets, that they might carry away with them whatever there was of evil in any corner, that the cleansing might be more complete." Hodge thinks any such allusion improbable, in consequence of the uncommonness of the custom. "Paul," he says, "certainly did not consider himself or his sufferings as a propitiation for other men. The point of comparison, if there be any allusion to the custom in question, is to the vileness of the victims which were always chosen from the worthless and the despised."] Luther's interpretation, given above, accords well with what follows.—and of all things the off-scouring unto this day.—περίσφημα, that which is wiped off (περίσφιν) in cleansing, scrapings and flings. This word also occurs in the formulae with which the human victims, who were put under the curse, were ordinarily consecrated: περίσφημα ἡμῶν γίνου—ἦτοι σωτηρία καὶ ἀπολύτρωσις: be thou our expiation, that which by us is set apart for the purification of the rest (Suidas). Meyer's objection that in this case the plural, περίσφηματα, would be required, because each individual would be regarded as a separate sin-offering, hardly suffices to set aside this objection, since all the Apostles may be taken collectively as composing one such offering. The Genitives, κόσμων, πάντων: the world's, —of all (which stand first as emphatic) by this explanation, denote those whose curse lights on them, and in behalf of whom they are sacrificed. [In the second edition, which is posthumous, the editor adds], nevertheless without the περι, in περικάθαρμα, having anything to do with this (analogously with the phrase περι τῆς ἀμαρτίας), or without any support being given to the assumption of any expiatory virtue in the Apostle's sufferings. But although the idea of expiation and deliverance through another's sufferings, especially of the guilty party, comes elsewhere prominently forward, and this is the strongest designation of fellowship in the sufferings of Christ, who was reckoned among the transgressors; and although the Apostle speaks of his official sufferings in images drawn from the sacrificial phraseology, in order to express the greatness and sanctity of the end they furthered, viz., blessing for the Church and the world: yet this thought is foreign to our context, and, all things considered, the explanation given in the translation deserves the preference.—Here we have a description of the deepest disgrace. [Wordsworth ingeniously argues for the sacrificial idea].

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

[1. The promised glory of believers not to be realized here on earth, as the Corinthians seemed to imply by their conduct]. The true view of Christ and of Christianity combines an Idealism and a Realism. On the one hand, in Christ old things have passed away and all things become new. (2 Cor. v. 17). He who believes in Christ has eternal life (Jno. iii. 36); God has quickened us in Christ, and has raised us up together, and made us to sit together in heavenly places in Christ (Eph. ii. 5 ff.). But on the other hand, it doth not yet appear what we shall be (1 Jno. iii. 2); our life is hid with Christ in God (Col. iii. 3); we here walk by faith, not by sight (2 Cor. v. 7); we are indeed saved, but it is in hope (Rom. viii. 24).—This latter side of Christianity, which is betokened in the very cross-bearing character of Christ's kingdom, is utterly misapprehended by a false idealism, which would anticipate in this life the glory of Christ's kingdom, shrinks from all manner of sufferings and trials, loves to luxuriate in self-satisfaction and in the enjoyment of the riches and the glory which are in Christ, and seeks to make an impression abroad with the show of higher learning and science, so that Christianity shall attain to honor and authority and influence in the world, in accordance with the truth that Christ is the Lord to whom all power in heaven and upon earth belongs—a truth, which it is claimed, must manifest itself more and more in the outward condition of those who are his. This idealism is the fruitful source of various forms of fanaticism, from the anticipation of the regal glory of Christ by the Romish hierarchy, and from the grossest Chiliasm which aims to set up a sort of secularized kingdom of God (as seen in the Anabaptists of the 16th century), down to the most refined theories of a progressive spiritual transformation, according to which Christianity is gradually to pervade the whole human race in all spheres of life, and to overcome all opposition, until at last it get possession of, and assimilate to itself, all governments and social customs, and art and science, and thus appear in full glory. In all this we see a Pelagianizing ignoring of the sharp contrast, which exists between the present condition of the world, rooted as it is the life of nature, and the spirit of Christ; also, a vain self-sufficiency, which hopes to find in the attainment of certain results, in the relative improvement of our earthly conditions, in the glow which the sun of truth and righteousness may cast over human affairs, in the reformation effected by the Gospel in all departments of human society,—in short, in the modification of the natural by the spiritual, a form of life springing out of, and developing itself from the spiritual unto the natural, and so dreams of a progressive realization of the kingdom of God on earth. Of an apostasy, of a fearful catastrophe, of antichrist and his overthrow, of a new heavens and a new earth following upon the destruction of the old, it evinces no knowledge. All this it quietly ignores. Hence all that glory which the promises of God's Word exhibit to our hope, and reserve for a future age altogether different from the present, it assumes to have already in this, by a gradual, ceaseless, progressive development. The beginnings of such notions were already discernible in the Corinthian Church during the life of Paul, and with great soberness he encounters it by an exhibition of the actual state of things with the Apostles themselves—a state of things which was of a far different sort. According to the mind and precedent of Christ, he shows them that the passage to glory lies through sufferings. (Luke xiv. 27; Acts xiv. 22; Jno. xii. 24). But this the worldly-minded would fain overleap, passing round the vale of humiliation, trouble, persecution and self-denial, to enter at once into the full possession of glory. They shrink from the cross. Hence when it comes to hard conflicts and severe tests, they are readily shaken, and are scandalized, and seduced into error, and exposed to apostasy.

2. A spectacle to angels. An encouraging thought, rooted in the idea of a one-all-embracing kingdom of God. As in Christ and through Him and to Him all things were created, which are in heaven and on earth (Col. i. 16 ff.), so has it pleased God to gather together in Him all things, which are in heaven and upon earth (Eph. i. 10),—in Him, through whom the angelic as well as the human world shall be restored to their original harmony with God (comp. Meyer on Col. i. 20),—and through whose church unto principalities and powers in heaven shall be made known the manifold wisdom of God (Eph. iii. 8; comp. 1 Pet. i. 12). Hence these heavenly spirits are full of liveliest interest in God's redemptive work on earth. Those very beings, who have by God's grace, been set in such close relations with earth's little ones as to be called "their angels," who have been sent "to minister for them who should be heirs of salvation," and who "rejoice over the sinner that repenteth," are also sympathizing witnesses of the conflicts and sufferings of God's co-laborers in the work of redemption. And while human observers are differently impressed with these same scenes, yet in this heavenly host there is felt nothing but astonishment and joy in view of the steadfastness and patience exhibited. Moreover, as an angel from heaven was seen to strengthen our Lord in the hour of His agony, so in the darkest hour of the conflict will angels be near to quicken and strengthen the soldiers of the cross. The encouragement and confirmation accruing to these oppressed sufferers and fighters of the good fight, from the consciousness of sympathy from such witnesses, corresponds to that which is said in Heb. xii. 1, in reference to the great cloud of witnesses, composed of the ancient heroes of the faith, and of the believers looking to Jesus the author and finisher of our faith.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

[1. Spiritual pride, self-sufficiency, vain-glorying, assumption of superiority, are so unbecoming and absurd as to be the fit objects not only of severe rebuke, but also of ridicule: for: 1. they are contrary to a Christian's dependence on God for what he is and has (ver. 7); 2. they proceed upon the false assumption, that the glory and the crown belong to the present age, whereas they are only to be enjoyed after Christ comes, and the whole church can possess them together (ver. 8); 3. they are contrary to apostolic example. The Apostles were cross-bearers all their lives through, and looked for the crown hereafter. (ver. 9-13)].

[2. Indignant reproof, irony, sarcasm, satire, are legitimate means for correction and discipline. But like the instruments of a surgeon, they are as dangerous as they are keen and useful, and can be safely employed only by skilful hands and loving hearts. When badly managed they kill rather than cure. Let none attempt to handle them, unless like Paul they are conscious only of the sincerest paternal affection towards those on whom they are used. Malice in the heart is sure to poison their edge, while love conveys healing balm through the wounds they make].

STARKE:—VER. 7. Whose is the fine plumage? Hast thou borrowed it? How then, supposing the wind should carry it away? Where is thy boasting then? Give then to God his own, and do not serve either thyself or the devil with thy gifts. (Hed.).—VER. 8. Desire not here in time what is only to be had yonder in Eternity. Here is strife; there alone is perfect rest and glory.—VER. 9. They who are adorned with greatest gifts, have the greatest trials for their humiliation.—VER. 10. External influence, happiness, glory, are no signs of a true Church. Who are the best Christians? The wise, the strong, the lordly? No. They are the weak, the despised, those who for Christ's sake are willing to be as fools.—VER. 11. Thou complainest of persecution in thy office? Consider, has it come to hunger, thirst, nakedness, blows? Hast thou "resisted unto blood?" The crown is given to the soldier who has "endured hardness."—VER. 12. A person is not required to preach without pay. Yet be content. Do not desert thy office because of a small salary. To do good and to suffer evil are the peculiar tokens of a true servant of Christ. The Christian's proper weapons in persecution are patience and prayer.—VER. 13. The true children of God understand well the greatness of their spiritual nobility, and that this, so far from being sullied by the base treatment of the world, is only made more illustrious thereby.

RINGER:—Instead of courting admiration for Christianity, and admiring in turn those who admire us and our cause, it becomes us to root ourselves more deeply in a self-denying spirit. One chief characteristic of godlessness is lowliness of mind, which gives to God all the praise, and counts men for nothing.—When we are willing to rend the bond of peace for the sake of aught we prize, we act not as if we had received it from the Lord whose gifts are to be appropriated in love, but as if we were at liberty to turn it all to our own selfish uses and advantage.—Where danger is greatest, there oftentimes presumption and self-confidence are at the height. The faithful performance of duty in the midst of shame, and detraction, and persecution, is a spectacle which angels cannot but admire, and men regard with honor. How many are disposed to leave cross-bearing to the Apostles and early Christians, and to maintain a Christianity in which the world will find nothing to hate.

HEUBNER:—VER. 7. True humility springs from a sense of our absolute dependence on God. This guards from pride. With this there belongs also a clear recognition of God's greatness and glory; we must feel that God is every thing, and we nothing. Only an exalted nature can be truly humble. How foolish our pride over advantages that we did not procure. The more gifts received from God, the greater the cause to be humble. Pride is not mere folly; it is wickedness also, because it robs God of His glory.—VER. 8. Judging from their outward condition, God appears often to treat believers, not as if they were His children, but as if they were the vilest of the race. But the more He puts on us, the more we are observed. The holy angels, unseen, rejoice when they see us victorious. Devils look on, hoping that we may succumb.—VER. 10. Christians, when most deserving, are often the most derided. The dishonor put upon the primitive believers is a mortifying rebuke to our pride. What a contrast between the cross-bearing Apostles and the later clergy, with their costly tables, splendid array, their pomp, and retinues, and palaces!—VER. 12. Paul an example of noble independence. He earned his own bread.

GOSSENER:—VER. 6. We were made to be humble, and should be kept short. Too much honor should not be shown us in this life. If you see a person exalting himself above others, look for no further evidence of his folly.—VER. 8. Even in our time, there are among the awakened some, who feel already perfect, and satisfied, and rich, from mere knowledge, while their fellowship with the Saviour and love for Him has grown cold.—VER. 11. The disciple of Jesus moves through this world always a stranger, nowhere tolerated, nowhere at home; and even should he settle anywhere, it is uncertain how long the world and his foes would allow him to remain. In such a case comfort comes from Christ.—Ver. 18. It is better to be the offscouring, than the honored of the world; better a castaway, than the bosom-child of a wicked race. The Saviour chose shame, the Apostles also, and we should arm ourselves with the same mind.

W. T. BESSER:—VER. 7. Nothing is mine but my sin; nothing, not saving knowledge and sanctifying wisdom, not repentance, not faith, nor love; in short, nothing Christian, have I from myself. It is all grace received—a gift from God (Jas. i. 17). To have received and then to boast is a hateful inconsistency. Gratitude and praise alone are becoming to recipients—accordant praise from all recipients of the manifold grace of God. In scorning thy brother less gifted, take heed that thou findest not fault with God.—Ver. 8. What, already satisfied! This is self-deception. Satisfaction, without hungering and thirsting, comes only when we behold God's face in righteousness and awake in His likeness (Pa. xvii. 15).—Ver. 11. Christian fasting is of two kinds—one when a person fasts voluntarily for the sake of serving the Lord with lighter spirit; the other when one is compelled to it as a Christian for Christ's sake (2 Cor. xi. 27).—Ver. 12. If we cannot stop the mouths of our defamers with soft words of entreaty, we have still one resort: we can pray that God will 'not lay the sin to their charge.' The prosperity which the Corinthians sought upon earth was then, and is now, to be had only at the cost of separating from the Apostles and from the true Gospel.—While all the Corinthian glory is but as stubble, the crown of honor will rest ever fresh and green upon the heads of the despised Apostles, both in Heaven and upon earth.

IX.—PATERNAL ADDRESSES AND WARNINGS.

A.* The grounds, spirit and intent of his severity. As their spiritual father, he would have them imitate him.

CHAPTER IV. 14-17.

14 I write not these things to shame you, but as my beloved sons I warn¹ [admonish] you. For though ye have ten thousand instructors in Christ, yet have ye not many fathers: for in Christ Jesus I have begotten [begot] you through the 16 gospel. Wherefore I beseech you, be [become] ye followers [imitators] of me. 17 For this cause have I sent unto you Timotheus, who is my² beloved son, and faithful in the Lord, who shall bring you into remembrance of my ways which be in Christ³, as I teach every where in every church.

² Ver. 17.—Instead of the Rec. τίκτον μου. Tischendorf [Alf., Stanley] read μου τίκτον according to A. B. C. [Cod. Sin.] and others. ["The Rec. is a correction to the more usual order." Alf.].

³ Ver. 17.—Lach. reads Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ [after C. D⁸. Cod. Sin. Vulg. etc.]. Others, ἐν Χριστῷ [after D⁸. F.]. But the Rec. Χριστῷ is best supported [being found in A. B. D⁸. L. and in most citations of the Fathers].

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

VER. 14. Sinking now into a milder tone, 'not from motives of prudence, but in accordance with his own natural disposition,' (Neander), and in order to observe his own precept, 'not to provoke children to wrath,' (Besser), he here goes on to explain the ground and intent of the severity he had used. He had rebuked them, as a father would his children, out of paternal love, and as he had a right to do.—Not shaming you,—ἐντρέφειν. The participle here does not necessarily involve the idea of intention or design, as if it meant: 'not for the purpose of shaming you;' although the present part. may denote a purpose which one is already on the point of realizing. Meyer: 'I do not shame you by that which I now write,' (i. e., from vv. 8-13). Ruckert's idea, that Paul alludes here to his charges for not being properly supported (vv. 11 and 12) is too restricted, and unsustained by the context. Alike needless, also, is his explanation of ἐντρέφειν, to cast down, to shatter, as it occurs in Aelian. And at all events, the word cannot mean, as elsewhere in Greek, to restore to a right mind, to cause a person to come to himself. The Apostle commonly uses it in the sense in which it usually occurs in the LXX., for ἰδοὺ, to shame, in connection with αἰσχύνεσθαι (see Frommii Concord.) (comp. 2 Thess. iii. 14; Tit. ii. 8; also the subst. ἐντροπή 1 Cor. vi. 5; xv. 34).—do I write these things—ταῦτα, i. e., the things written from the eighth to the thirteenth verse,—but as my beloved children.—A tender and winning word, designed to remind them that, with all his severity toward their pride and false security, he yet regarded them with paternal affection, and was only seeking their restoration to a right mind.—I admonish you.—Nouðereiv, to bring to mind, to warn.—It may imply severe rebuke or friendly admonition. Here it is evidently the latter. [See more fully on this word Trench Syn. N. T. sub voce, and Wm. Webster, Syntax and Synonyms of the Gr. T.].

VER. 15. He justifies his right to admonish on the ground of the paternal relation he sustains to them. This he exhibits in contrast with the mere preceptorship held by their other teachers. To the latter they were indebted only for discipline, but to him they owed their spiritual existence.—For even though.—By virtue of the relation of the two clauses indicated by ἀλλ', ἐάν carries the significance of even though—ye have ten thousand.—Μυρίους implies only an indefinitely large number, as in xiv. 19. Bisp.: 'never so many,'—a hint, perhaps, that there were too many teachers there,—instructors—παιδαγωγός. This word among the Greeks designated those who were employed to look after, and train little children; and these were commonly slaves. Paul here applies it to the teachers who succeeded him (iii. 10 ff.), but without any bad implication [such as Calvin, Beza and de Wette suppose], since this would not best fit Apollos and others like him. Nor can we well conceive the term to imply that those whom it designated were holding the Corinthians back in rudimentary knowledge [Calvin] (Gal. iv. 2), or were acting upon a stand-point that sought to unite legal and evangelical elements. All he means is that his right over them was higher, his relation to them more intimate than that of any other could be; and that these allowed him the privilege of supervising their education in their new Christian life.—in Christ.—This adjunct shows the sphere in which these instructors were supposed to labor, that of the Christian life. [Hodge says, that "the words in the original show that they belong to the verb, 'Though ye may have in Christ, i. e. in reference to Christ, or as Christians, many instructors yet have ye not many fathers.'"]—yet not many fathers, for in Christ Jesus.—Here again, as before, the words "in Christ Jesus," denote the element in which Paul labored.—I begot you.—i. e. as Christians. On γενῶν comp. Phil. 10; Gal. iv. 19. Others connect the words 'in Christ Jesus' with 'I,' and make it mean: 'I in Christ,' i. e. as 'an Apostle in Christ.' But as this designation in the foregoing clause does not belong to 'instructors' in any such way as to mean, that they instructed by virtue of their fellowship with Christ, so here it is not to be similarly connected with Paul, although it was in itself true, that those labors of his, which begot in them the new life, and developed it afterwards, could have proved successful only so far as they had been wrought in Christ—through the Gospel.—Here we have the instrumentality employed. It was the proclamation of those good tidings which are briefly summed up in Jno. iii. 16; 1 Tim. i. 15, and elsewhere. The Gospel is 'the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth' (Rom. i. 16); 'the word of the cross;' 'the word of truth,' by which God begets us (Jas. i. 18); 'the living,' the undestructible seed of the new birth (1 Pet. i. 23). And the essential substance of this Gospel, that which gives it its quickening and nourishing power, is Christ Himself [the Word in the word.] The claim to paternity here put forth, is in no way prejudicial to the fatherhood of God, or the Lordship of Christ, since Paul is here speaking of the relation which the Church sustained to the different teachers in respect to the origin and growth of their spiritual life. The higher absolute relation to God is here presupposed, and even intimated by the phrases "in Christ" and "through the Gospel." The simple instrumentality, alluded to in the whole case, is evident of itself; just as in 1 Tim. iv. 16.

VER. 17. Therefore:—i. e. because I am to you as a father, and it accords with the analogy of nature, that children should resemble their parents.—I beseech you.—An affectionate entreaty to heed one brief request.—be ye imitators of me.—But how far? Not in general; but in those particulars which he has just been enumerating, wherein he stood in such striking contrast with them, viz., in humility and self-resignation; "in the renunciation of all ambition and conceit" MEYER; we might also add with Oslander, "in that self-devoted heroism with which he sealed his faith." ["Nor these only," says Alf., "but also, as in ver. 17, in his manner of life and teaching"].

VER. 18. For this cause.—This is to be referred back either to ver. 15, as expressing the motive of his sending Timothy: 'because I am your father, and feel towards you like one' [as Chrys., Theoph. and others]; or to ver. 16, as indicating the purpose of his sending him: to promote your imitation of me. The latter reference is to be preferred, otherwise ver. 16 must be taken parenthetically. Oslander combines both, and justly, in so far as what is said in ver. 16, rests upon the paternal relationship asserted in ver. 15. The meaning is: 'since I, as a father, must insist on your imitating my example, I have sent unto you my dear Timothy, who will aid you in this respect.'—I have sent to you Timothy—not as though Timothy was to be the bearer of the Epistle (comp. Acts xvi. 10), since he came later, being obliged to go through Macedonia on his way to Corinth (Acts xix. 22).—who is my son.—Timothy is here represented as one who, equally with the Corinthians, was converted by Paul, and had derived through him his spiritual life, and so held the same relations to Paul that they did. And the Apostle testifies to his tender care over them in the fact, that he sends to them this their brother, who was especially dear to him, and enjoyed his fullest confidence; one, therefore, whom they had peculiar reason to welcome cordially, as a person able to exhibit to them the mind of their common father in a most reliable manner. [It must be remembered also that Timothy was with Paul during his first visit to Corinth, and must therefore have been personally known to a large portion of the Church]. To explain the epithet 'my son,' on the ground that Timothy had been educated to his office by Paul, after the manner that the Rabbis called their scholars 'sons,' is not sufficiently sustained by the consideration that we have no further information of his conversion by Paul. Rather the intimacy of the relation between the two expressions in Tim. i. 2, 18; 2 Tim. i. 2, and also the application to him of the same title, 'beloved son,' which had just been applied to the Corinthians, would seem to confirm the opinion that Paul had also 'begotten him through the Gospel.'—beloved and faithful in the Lord.—The phrase 'in the Lord' belongs not merely to 'faithful,' (i. e. devoted to me, true to his calling, and therefore reliable) but also to all that is said of Timothy. The praise bestowed on Timothy appears also to have the incidental purpose of impressing upon the Corinthians, in a tender manner, the kind of conduct which they owed to their spiritual fathers.

Timothy's errand is expressed in the words:—who shall remind you of my ways in the Lord.—The ἀναμνηστικόν: to remind, presupposes the existence of a knowledge which has been repressed by adverse influences, so that it needs to be called up again and refreshed. "There is a slight implication here" (Osiander), and Chrysostom remarks that 'the word is finely chosen to quiet the pride of the Corinthians which might be aroused at the idea of being taught by a youth.' What he means by 'his ways in Christ' he goes on to explain.—as I teach every where in every church.—It was his mode of conduct as a Christian teacher; and this, as it regarded, not so much the subject of his teaching, or its manner, as his demeanor while doing it,—the humility and self-denial with which he discharged his calling. This is implied by the connection. The use of καθ' ἑαυτόν; here, as employed to introduce a defining clause, in the sense of: how, is somewhat remarkable. See Acts xv. 14; 3 John, 8 [where the word is clearly used in this sense, and where Alford somewhat arbitrarily asserts that it is alone thus used]. Hence Billr. joins it to the verb 'remind,' as if Paul meant: 'he will remind you, etc., just as I myself teach.' But from this 1, no good sense can be obtained, and 2, 'myself' is arbitrary. Osiander's explanation, though suitable in sense, is yet somewhat forced: 'who will remind you of my walk (my course of life), agreeably to which I teach everywhere.' The first explanation has the most in its favor, in spite of its grammatical difficulties. The 'reminding' could however refer to his activity in other churches also, since they undoubtedly had knowledge of this, from information which had been given by brethren on their travels. The reference to this uniformity of his conduct generally, strengthened the motive for their imitating him.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Spiritual paternity.—The awakening of the spiritual life in man is a Divine act. It originates in God's purpose of salvation, formed in reference to the individual (Jas. i. 18; Eph. i. 4; 2 Thess. ii. 13). Its ground is Christ, in His complex divine-human life as carried out in the work of redemption, which was effected through His death and resurrection and final glorification (Jno. vii. 89). Its immediate cause is the Holy Spirit, who imparts to the redeemed the new life of Christ, proceeding from his death; or, in other words, reproduces in us individually the new man of righteousness, born in Christ through a judicial process of death passed upon the old man or the flesh. The organ of this Spirit is the Word, viz., the testimony of Christ, and concerning Christ, which proceeds from Him; and the object and substantial contents of which He Himself is. By bringing this living Word forcibly to bear upon the heart, the Spirit opens the heart. Testifying to sinners of the love of God cherished towards them individually in Christ, he regains their lost confidence; and starts the fountains of all godly life, of all holy conduct towards God.—in obedience and patience; and puts an end to the old distrust, that was the source of all rebellion and sin. And he does this in a way to magnify God and belittle man, and to convert the sinner's pride to humility.

But inasmuch as in this process of renewal God employs human instrumentalities, he confers on these also the dignity of a spiritual fatherhood, and so takes them into a sort of fellowship with Himself. This holds good, however, not of those who have become, so to speak, the accidental instruments in this work, i. e., who have in some way brought about the conversion of souls either by speaking or writing saving truths, the force of which they have not practically felt, but only of those who have the life of Christ in them as an energising power, and who can, out of their own personal experiences, testify of Him, and of His enlightening and regenerating grace, and who are therefore in a condition to beget a kindred life in others. Standing in Christ as the ground of their life, and moving ever in Him, such persons are enabled to introduce others into the same communion, by presenting to them, in quickening power through the Gospel, Jesus Christ in the fulness of His holy love and in His redeeming work, and by thus inducing them to come out from themselves and give themselves up to Him who has given and will yet give Himself for them. In this way they become spiritual fathers; for it is by virtue of the living power of Christ dwelling in them that they are capable of engendering life in others, just as in the sphere of the physical life, the natural creative power, resident in the individual as a personal property, involves in its generative exercise the character and dignity of the paternal relation.

But the more clearly and simply this spiritual paternity is recognized and maintained upon its Divine ground, the more decisively will all further educational efforts on the part of the earthly parent result in bringing these spiritual children out from their first dependence on him (a dependence which often involves an unworthy attachment to his personal idiosyncracies), and fastening them more exclusively upon Him, who is the eternal and absolute ground of this relation, even God in Christ. The children are thus liberated from all that is limited and imperfect in the human parent, to enter upon a freer and more independent development in Christ, and thus to make purer advances in knowledge and holiness.

But this spiritual paternity carries with it a high authority, a holy right to discipline, to rebuke, to exhort, to purify, with severity or mildness, or both commingled, as circumstances may demand. And this right is exercised as one of love, and under love's strong impulses, and with that ingenuous wisdom which is peculiar to love, and with which it devises all sorts of methods for alluring, urging, restraining, arousing, and softening children, restoring their disturbed confidence and reëstablishing over them a weakened authority.

["A father never is afraid
Of speaking angrily to any child
Since love he knows is justified of love."]

All this is illustrated for us in the Apostle Paul.

2. [Apostolic piety is the standard for the whole Church, even to the end of time. The Romish theory, which distinguishes between the clergy and laity, and imposes on the former a degree of sanctity and a mode of life not exacted of the latter, is here plainly condemned in advance. Paul puts all believers on the same footing with himself. He lays claim to no special grace, and recognizes no obligation to self-denial and sacrifice which does not equally rest on the whole Church. In his office as an Apostle, he became indeed a spiritual father; but in point of that Christian character, which underlay his Apostleship, he would have his children resemble him. Here we learn that the Spirit of Christ aims to pervade His entire body, and seeks to mould all, pastors and people alike, to a common type. And this spirit is a cross-bearing spirit. It is a spirit, which it devolves on every minister to exemplify and enforce, and on every Church to imbibe and cultivate. There will be no abatement of this requisition until Christ shall come].

3. [Christian example is an important means for instructing and edifying the Church. Its uses are: 1. For illustration. It is the living Epistle, accompanying the written Epistle, in the way of comment and explanation. The truth stated in doctrine, example embodies in solid substantial forms, that are more fraught with meaning, and more vivid in expression than words can be. The duty enforced in the precept, it exhibits in the operations of a holy life, that teach the true method of its performance. Thus the understanding is helped to right conceptions of the Word; and the life of God in the Church proves the light of the world. 2. For persuasion. "Words teach, but examples draw." So says the proverb, and the reason is, that that inward conviction and force of will, which are the secret of personal influence, express themselves most significantly in the conduct. It is through this, therefore, that man acts most powerfully on man. 3. For encouragement. The lives of eminent believers show the possibility of high attainment, and a certainty of the divine promises; and by the shout of "victory at last" animate the spirits of observers to enter the fight of faith, and to do and endure in like manner, with the full assurance of like results. 4. For rebuke. The zeal, energy, courage, patience, self-denial and sufferings of every devoted believer, presents a disparaging and mortifying contrast with the conduct of those who, while professing a like devotion, evince only an easy idle, self-indulgent, self-satisfied spirit, or aspire only after honors and applause.

To set a worthy example is the duty not only of Apostles and ministers, but of all Christians alike. As Paul called upon the early converts to 'imitate him,' so were they instructed to live so as to extend the same call to others coming after them. The guiding word which ought to be continually heard passing down the ever lengthening ranks of the Church, as it moves onward through darkness and through light, treading in the footsteps of its great leader, should be: 'Follow me, even as I also follow Christ'.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

1. [Church founders and all who have been instrumental in converting souls should: 1. love the subjects of their labors with a paternal affection, even as they stand towards them in the peculiar relation of spiritual fathers (ver. 16); 2. aim in their reproof, however sharp, a. not to mortify and disgrace their spiritual offspring, but, b. to admonish and so restore them to duty (ver. 14); 3. set an example of the Christian life which they shall be able to call on their children to imitate (ver. 16); 4. take pains to show them how they live in all their ways, so that there shall be no excuse for ignorance or mistake, (ver. 17)].

STARKE: Nothing is sharper and more penetrating than the rebukes of love, (ver. 14).—HEDINGER: Ver. 15.—It is the duty and the characteristic of a true minister to beget children through the Gospel, or to lead those, who have been thus begotten, to a further knowledge of Christ. No less is it the token of a right-minded hearer to suffer himself to be thus begotten through the Word, and be trained to maturity in Christ. (1 Thess. iv. 1, 10; 1 Pet. ii. 2). A preacher must build not only with words but also with his life, and so as it were with both hands, that he may be an example to believers both in word and conversation. It is a shame for children to run in strange paths and thus degenerate, (ver. 16). The visitation of churches by suitable persons is a useful and highly necessary practice (ver. 17).

BURL. BIR.:—It is no small thing to be a spiritual father and teacher. Only those who are mature in Christ are suited for such an office; for only according to the measure of our attainments in the divine life shall we be able to beget and fashion other souls. It is, therefore, a presumption in those, who are as yet but children, to wish to become fathers and teachers, before they themselves have rightly learned (ver. 15). Who would wish to exhibit himself as a pattern for others, before he has himself patterned after Christ? (ver. 16).

HEUBNER:—Fathers, who carry their children on their hearts, mourn over the transgressions of their children, long for their reformation, and strive to make them blessed. Yea, they would be willing to pluck out their own hearts for their sake, if so be they might in this way do them any good (ver. 15). What joyousness of spirit is required to warrant a person in holding himself up as a pattern for others (ver. 16).

[CALVIN:—The first token of return to a right state of mind is the shame which the son begins to feel on being reproached for his fault. Yet he who admonishes in a friendly spirit will make it his particular care that whatever there is of shame, may remain with the individual admonished, and may in this manner be buried. In reproofs use moderation, mixing honey and oil with the vinegar. Let it be understood that nothing is sought but the welfare of those reproofed (ver. 14).—How few there are that love the Churches with a fatherly affection and lay themselves out to promote their welfare. Meanwhile there are many pedagogues who hire out their services as it were to discharge a mere temporary office, and hold the people in subjection and admiration. When I say pedagogues, I do not refer to Popish priests, for I would not do them the honor of reckoning them in that number (ver. 15).—Uniformity and steadfastness of conduct “in every place,” most important for a minister, so that no objection can be brought against him, as though he conducted himself differently in different places. (Ad sensum) (ver. 17)].

B. Anticipation of misconception as to his motives in sending Timothy and of consequent arrogance on the part of some. Such to be tested in point of power. The kingdom of God a thing of power.

CHAPTER IV. 18–21.

18 Now some are [have been] puffed up, as though I would not come [were not coming] 19 to you. But I will come to you shortly, if the Lord will, and will know, not the 20 speech of them which are puffed up, but the power. For the kingdom of God is not 21 in word, but in power. What will ye? shall I come unto you with [ἐν] a rod, or in love, and in the spirit of meekness?¹

¹ Ver. 21.—The Rec. has πράξεις [with D. F. L. Cod. Sin.]; but Tisch. [according to A. B. C., = τ] reads πράξεις [so Words., Alf., Stanley].

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

VER. 18. He here obviates an inference which might be drawn [and, it would seem from the Apostle's language, had actually been drawn], from his sending Timothy to Corinth. It was, that he was not coming there himself. And some were elated, in consequence, with the idea, that it was because he dared not come.—SOME have been puffed up.—By ἐφυσισώθησαν, puffed up, we are not to understand that conceit of wisdom, spoken of before, which lifted certain of them high in their own esteem, above the simplicity of the Apostle. He alludes rather to that arrogant manner, that overweening insolence, which is a common feature of party spirit. Whether any declarations of theirs, respecting his not coming to Corinth, had been communicated to Paul; or whether he only inferred from their conduct that they must be indulging in such expectations; or whether he only intended to say that they were puffed up, as though he were not to be present among them again, may be left undecided. Bengel's idea, 'that a Divine inspiration discovered to him the thoughts which would arise in their minds on reading his letter,' is ingenious, but hardly suitable.—as though I also were not coming.—ὡς μὴ ἐρχομένου δέ μου.—The δέ relates to the sending of Timothy, and puts μου in conjunction with him. ["ὡς expresses the assumption in their minds: the present participle ἐρχομένου refers to their saying—οὐκ ἐρχεται: 'he is not coming.' And, inasmuch as ὡς—ἐρχ. forms one idea, the δέ is placed after it all. See HART. Partikellehre 1, p. 190." ALF.].

VER. 19. Counter-statements.—But I will come to you shortly.—Paul's courage here speaks out resolutely in an emphatic, 'I will come' (ἐλεύσομαι), which is put first. The 'shortly' (comp. xvi. 6), [but why not also the entire fact of his coming also?], he makes dependent on the will of the Lord (xvi. 7), whose servant he is, and who might appoint him tasks, the discharge of which would prevent him from executing his purpose.—if the Lord will.—Thus courage and assurance are coupled with a humble consciousness of dependence, and with submission to the control of a higher power. ["So constantly did Paul live in communion with Christ as his God, submitting to Him and trusting to Him at all times." HOPK.—and I will know, γινώσκω.—This denotes, not a judicial finding upon a previous trial, nor yet a simple taking knowledge of by observation (Meyer), but a consciousness attained by experience, and by tests applied. It implies that Apostolic discernment, which penetrates through all outward shows into the very essence of things, which does not suffer itself to be deceived by lofty phrase, or high sounding threats (i. 17; iii. 4), but which accurately detects the presence or absence of a true capacity for energetic and successful labors in the kingdom of God (comp. ver. 20).—not the speech of them that are puffed up, but the power.—There is the same contrast between λόγος and δύναμις here, that we have 1 Thess. i. 5; comp. 2 Tim. iii. 5, where instead of “speech” we have “the form of godliness” contrasted with “power.” “Δύναμις is the essential power, or true nature and efficacy of a thing in opposition to mere external show.” NEANDER. To explain it of the power to work miracles [Chrys., Grotius], or of moral virtue [Theod., Pelagius], or of the influences of doctrine upon life [Calvin], would not suit the context. [“It is power to work for the furtherance of God’s kingdom—a power conditioned on the possession of true inward spiritual energy (which de Wette makes it to mean). Examples of this are seen in Paul himself, in Luther and in others.” MEYER. It was such power as the Apostles were commanded to wait for at Jerusalem, ere they went forth to be witnesses for their Lord, and which was exhibited so wonderfully at the day of Pentecost; such power as Paul speaks of, when to the Thessalonians he said: ‘Our Gospel came not unto you, in word only, but also in power, and in the Holy Ghost’ (where we see that the antithesis in the text is not to be taken absolutely but relatively); such power as is mentioned in Rom. xv. 18, “the Gentiles being made obedient by word and deed, through mighty signs and wonders, by the power of the Holy Ghost.” It was an essential attribute of the Church, and especially of the ministry of the Church, as energized for the conquest of the world by the indwelling spirit of God, and so made mighty to the pulling down of strongholds. The lack of power, therefore, indicated an absence of the spirit,—the want of a Divine commission and of a heavenly union].

VER. 20. Reason for the foregoing. The eye of an Apostle must be directed to the kingdom of God, and to whatever promotes its advancement. And this kingdom is not built up by beautiful and high-sounding speeches, but by that spiritual energy which awakens and develops the inward life of the spirit.—For the kingdom of God.—By this is meant the Divine kingdom of the Messiah as a life in communion with God, or as a social state pervaded and regulated by the Divine will. It must, therefore, bear upon itself the signature of righteousness, holiness and blessedness. Or, as the Old Testament describes it (e. g. Ps. 72), it is a ‘kingdom of righteousness and peace; in which character it is spoken of again in Rom. xiv. 17. This is also the ruling idea in historical Christianity, whose primitive form is the Church. Its full realization, however, where the living law penetrates and pervades all that is phenomenal, or, in other words, where the archetypal idea and the fact wholly correspond, belongs to the future age. To exclude the ethical element from the conception, is just as incorrect as to hold by it altogether. In the New Testament both are united, prominence being given, sometimes to one, and sometimes to the other, in different passages. But that only the truly pious and believing can properly be members of this kingdom (Col. iii. 3; Phil. iv. 21; Eph. v. 5), is seen in the fact, that it is a fellowship in holiness. [For a good exposition of this important term, see FAIRBAIRN’S Herm. Man. p. 56. OLSEN. Com. Matt.

iii. 21].—is, ἐστιν—is to be understood and associated with ἐν, in, and is to be taken as in ii. 5, to mean, consists in, stands in.—not in word, but in power.—From this it is evident that the ethical element of God’s kingdom is mainly considered. But whether the Apostle is here speaking of the ground or condition upon which a person participates in this kingdom, or of its direct active advancement, may be questioned. In the former case the sense would be: that, whereon participation in God’s kingdom is conditioned, viz., faith and love, is not brought about through word, but through the power that is at work in its behalf, i. e. of the minister or teacher (Meyer); in the latter case it would mean: he only is able truly to advance God’s kingdom, in whom this power exists. The latter interpretation, which includes also the idea, that such a person alone can be regarded as rightly belonging to God’s kingdom, is simpler and more suited to the context. “It must be said, however, that the distinction here made between word and power, is not for the purpose of separating the latter from the former, and attributing to it an operation that manifests itself apart from and independent of the word, as fanatics teach; but in order to contrast with the empty declamation of false teachers that true preaching which is filled with the spirit,—to oppose to their mere artificial rhetoric the power of God which resides in the simplicity of the Gospel.” BURGER.

VER. 21. Having expressed his determination to go to Corinth, he here leaves it for them to decide in what form his authority shall be exercised (2 Cor. x. 6; xiii. 2 ff.). This verse some commentators [Calvin, Beza, Lachmann, Stanley Words.,] connect with the following chapter as opening a new topic for rebuke. But, as no allusion is there made to his coming to Corinth, and there is no particle to connect it with what follows, it is better to take it as concluding this chapter. [So Meyer, Alf., Hodge].—What—τὸ ἰσχυρότερον, but is more forcible, inasmuch as the alternative presented does not appear at once.—will ye?—[“As Chrys. strikingly says, ‘The whole thing lies with you.’” MEYER].—Shall I come.—The verb ἐλθω is not dependent on θέλετε—to you with a rod, ἐν ῥάβδῳ—[The use of ἐν to express the relation of accompaniment or instrumentality, is not a Hebraism, but a genuine Greek idiom. So Meyer. But Winer, § xlviii. d. says, it is also used like the Hebrew ב in cases where Greek authors employ the Dative alone. Its significance in the text is well given by ALF. “not only with a rod, but in such purpose as to use it. The preposition here gives the idea of the element in which, much as ἐν δόξῃ”]. Here also he presents to view his paternal relation. The rod is the symbol of fatherly severity. [It means the rod of His mouth. For the word of God, spoken by such as Paul, was sharp and powerful. There is an intimation here of Paul’s consciousness of power]. In contrast with this, and as the alternative before them, love is mentioned—or in love.—This indeed is not excluded from severity; but it forms an antithesis to it, inasmuch as in severity the natural expression of love is kept in abeyance, and it is compelled to manifest itself in ways alien to itself. This idea is more fully brought out in the associated clause—and (in) the spirit of meekness.—LUTHER says: “with tenderness of spirit,” so that πνεῦμα would then mean the subjective disposition. But Meyer, following the analogy of such passages as John xv. 26; Rom. viii. 15; 2 Cor. iv. 18; Eph. i. 17; Rom. i. 4; [where, as here, πνεῦμα is followed by the abstract genitive and evidently denotes the Holy Spirit, whose specific working is expressed by the noun in connection], interprets the word here in like manner. [But, as Alf. shows, Meyer is mistaken when he affirms, that this meaning attaches to πνεῦμα in all kindred passages of the New Testament. There is plainly no fixed usage compelling this interpretation here. It were better, therefore, with Calvin, de Wette, Stanley and others, to understand by the phrase: a meek, gentle spirit. See Winer § xxxiv. 8 b]. Πατρὸς denotes sparing, forgiving mildness. In this winning way he gives them to understand that he would much rather be spared the necessity of discipline. [“It is plain from this, as from numerous other passages, that the Apostles exercised the right of discipline over all the churches. They could receive into the communion of the Church, or excommunicate from it at discretion. This prerogative was unseparable from their infallibility as the messengers of Christ, sent to establish and administer his kingdom.” HODGE. “For nerve and vigor, for dignity and composed confidence, this passage cannot be easily paralleled even in Demosthenes himself.” BLOOMFIELD].

DOGMATICAL AND ETHICAL.

The kingdom of God, a thing of power. This kingdom, formerly typified in shadowy outlines (σκιά) through the promise and the law, and through a series of special providences, and prepared through miracles and signs, and through the gracious, wise and holy guidance and training of a chosen people, was first exhibited in its original principles, and perfectly realised as the kingdom of heaven upon earth, in the person of the Son of man, come from Heaven (comp. Luke ii. 14; Matth. xii. 28). He was the first to fulfil all righteousness, always doing that which was well pleasing to the Father (Jno. viii. 29; Matth. iii. 15). In the plenitude of the Spirit's might, which rested on Him, (Jno. i. 32), He exercised a constraining and subduing power over the hearts of men, and in word and deed evinced a Divine puissance of love, that overcame the hostile spirits of darkness, proved invincible to Satanic assaults, loosed all manner of bonds, and removed evil of every kind. Though externally weak and depressed, we find Him emerging victorious out of that judgment and death, to which He had freely subjected Himself, and, as the one to whom all power in Heaven and upon earth had been given, rising far above all creaturely limitations into the right hand of the Majesty on High.

Having thus in His own person and history laid the foundations of the Kingdom of God, and illustrated its character and career and triumphs; we behold Him gathering a Church, through the dispensation of the Spirit, out of that apostate race, (whose nature He had assumed and had, essentially as well as morally, united to God), and exhibiting in it, as in a germ, the kingdom of righteousness and peace, in the exercise of a lofty power over the hearts of men and in the manifestation of ability to redeem and save. This Church, which, from its unseen beginnings, has, after a lapse of ages, spread out into a mighty tree, continues to exist now, precisely as it originated, only through the might of the Divine Spirit, who works in its members—especially in those who are active in its cause—for the continued illumination and sanctification of mankind. And only by the same Divine agency is the kingdom of God, which is enclosed in the Church, advanced, and that period hastened, when it shall be made manifest in all its glorious reality, and when the Lord shall reign King over all the nations. (Zach. xiv. 9). The powers which rule in the Church are, in fact, the powers of ‘the world to come,’ the αἰὼν μέλλων (Heb. vi. 5); and while these powers display their Divine energy, in cleansing the heart more and more from the filthiness of the flesh and the spirit, in promoting knowledge and sanctification, and in strengthening the will to endure under all assaults of temptation and persecution, the Church is ripening towards that glorious epoch when, in the union of all the holy in Heaven and upon earth, it will appear supreme in Christ, over all things, as the true Kingdom of God, wherein God shall be all in all (1 Cor. xv. 28).

[1. The carnal-minded in the Church, 1, are apt to gather presumption, and take courage for self-display, during the absence of their Divinely appointed guides, ver. 18; 2, need to be thoroughly tested as to their really spiritual qualities, and exposed, ver. 19; 3, are deserving of rebuke and discipline, ver. 21.

2. Since the Kingdom of God is not in word, but in power, its ministers must be, 1, full of courage and fearless of opposition, ver. 19; 2, dependent on the Lord, from whom their power comes, for direction in all their movements, ver. 19; 3, capable of testing human pretensions, ver. 19; 4, prepared for severe or lenient dealing, as circumstances may require, yet disposed in spirit to the latter, rather than the former, ver. 21.

3. In the truth, that the kingdom of God is not in word, but in power—the power of the Holy Ghost, we have, 1, A lesson of instruction. It shows us to what source ministers and all Christian laborers are indebted for the success of their words and efforts; 2, A criterion for judgment. We can ascertain whether the kingdom of God is present in any person, or church, which claims to possess it, by the ability shown to achieve those results for which the Divine power is given; 3, A ground of encouragement. Weak as believers are in themselves, and great as is the work to be accomplished, the kingdom of God in them can strengthen them to do all things; 4, A lesson of duty. If we would do great things for God, we must trust, a. not to our own skill in persuasion, but b. in the power which the Holy Ghost imparts; 5, A rebuke. Lack of achievement for the kingdom of God cannot be charged upon a lack of power in it, but upon a lack of faith in Christians to use the power given].

LUTHER:—Ver. 20. Faith is a living, essential thing; it makes a man entirely new, changes his disposition, and turns him completely about. Wilt thou continue to remain in thy pride and immodesty, in avarice and anger, and wilt thou boast and prate much of faith? then comes Paul to thee and says, 'Listen, good friend; the kingdom of God does not consist in words, but in power and in deeds.'

STARKS:—The point to be looked at is not how a person talks about religion, but whether the essentials of Christianity—truth, experience, action—are in him (ver. 19). O, precious declaration! It is power—power—not prating and show that makes the Christian.—HED. Where the kingdom of God is, there Christ is, and the Holy Spirit also, who regenerates men (ver. 20).—If soft words won't serve, then the minister must rebuke sharply.—Love remains the same when it is severe, as when it is mild, provided it only leads to God. Its various arts of regulation must first be thoroughly learned and then practised when needful.—Righteousness, holiness and love exist in God combined; and as both Law and Gospel have alike issued therefrom, so should every evangelical minister rightly employ both. 2 Tim. ii. 15 (ver. 21).

BERL. BIBLE:—The whole kingdom of our God is pervaded with Divine and heavenly powers. And although indeed He utters words from thence, yet these words are spirit and life, yea, the words of eternal life (Jno. vi. 63, 68). Hence words, fraught with the spirit and quickening in their influence, are also a fruit of the kingdom of God, which consists in power. In short, every thing which God speaks, works and does, in and through his Son, carries in itself a kind of power, and manifests this power wherever it is not hindered (ii. 5; Rom. i. 16), (ver. 20). People say sometimes: 'Where is love? More is accomplished by love than by severity.' True, provided we are not compelled to use severity. Then severity itself is also an effect of love (ver. 21).

HEUBNER:—The "puffed up" are mighty in words, but weak in deeds. Inward spiritual power lies in humility. The Church of Christ does not need braggarts, but true workers (ver. 19).—The unction of the true preacher is detected in the power he exerts upon the hearts of men (ver. 20).—Man determines for himself the treatment he shall receive, whether it shall be severity or mildness. Well for him, who is still enjoying the gracious period of discipline. He is better than one altogether reprobate. God has a two fold staff, the staff of mildness and the staff of woe (Zach. xi. 7-14) (ver. 2).

X.—A SECOND INSTANCE OF DEFECTIVE CHRISTIAN SENTIMENT.—TOLERATION OF IMPURITY.—NEED OF CHURCH IN PURIFICATION.

[A case of incest stated.—Call for Excommunication.—Its form and intent].

CHAPTER V. 1-5.

It is reported commonly that there is fornication among you, and such fornication as is not so much as named [*is not even*¹] among the Gentiles, that one should have his
2 father's wife. And ye are puffed up, [?] and have not [did not] rather mourned, [mourn], that he that hath done² this deed might be taken away [*om. away*³] from among
3 you [?]. For I verily, as⁴ absent in body, but present in spirit, have judged already, as though I were present, concerning [om. concerning] him that hath so done⁵ this deed,
4 In the name of our Lord Jesus Christ [*om. Christ*⁶], when ye are gathered together,
5 and my spirit, with the power of our Lord Jesus Christ, [*om. Christ*⁶]. To deliver such a one unto Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus⁶.

¹ Ver. 1.—The addition of ἐννοητέον in the Rec. has the best authorities [A. B. C. D. F. Cod. Sin.] against it, and is perhaps a supplement according to Eph. v. 3.

² Ver. 2.—It is doubtful whether we ought to read ἡνέκα with Griesbach, Meyer [Alford, Words.], or ἡνέκα with Ruckert, Tischendorf. Both are equally suited to the sense, and are about equally supported.

⁴ Ver. 3.—The Rec. ἔσθ' ὡς, before ἀνών, absent, has indeed the oldest MSS. [A. B. C. D. Cod. Sin.] against it, and hence is rejected by Lechmann, Meyer [Alf. Words.]. But there are also many and good authorities in its favor. [D. F. L. Syr. and many of the Greek Fathers]. And it might as easily have been omitted for the sake of avoiding the repetition (ἡνέκα), or, as not suited to ἔσθ' ὡς, as admarginated, and then afterwards inserted according to the analogy of ὡς ἡνέκα. We retain it with Tischendorf. [We, on the contrary, omit it as badly supported and wholly needless, and wait for Tischendorf's last Ed. See comments below.]

⁶ Ver. 5.—This reading (Rec.) is the most probable. Both the omission of ἡνέκα (Tisch.) as well as the addition ἡνέκα after ἐκείνῳ and of ἡνέκα after ἡνέκα are not sufficiently accredited.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Paul here turns to a second topic for animadversion, and what follows might well serve to take down still further the self-conceit of the Corinthians. ["This, practically speaking, forms the crisis of the whole Epistle. It is, as it were, the burst of the storm, the mutterings of which, as Chrysostom observes, had already been heard in the earlier chapters, and of which the echoes are still discernible, not only in this Epistle, but also in the second Epistle, the first half of which is nothing less than an endeavor to allay the excitement and confusion created by this severe remonstrance." STANLEY]. The passage is introduced abruptly without any conjunctive particle.

VER. 1. States the specific ground of complaint.—Commonly ὅλως: not indeed, nor, at all, as it can mean only in negative clauses; [nor "absolutely, as simply adding force to the assertion." STANLEY; nor, in short (Clericus), which Ols. says is the only second meaning that can be justified]; but, as in chap. vi. 7; xv. 29: Matth. v. 84, in general. It belongs not to πορνεία, fornication, but as an adverb to ἀκούεται, is heard, and so to the whole clause. ["It implies, however, the general prevalence of the practice spoken of." OLSHAUSEN. So Meyer, de Wette; and Hodge allows it. "The signification, certainly, implying that the matter was no doubtful rumor, but an evident fact (as Calvin, Beza and others), is contrary to the meaning of the word." MEYER]—there is heard among you, ἀκούεται ἐν ὑμῖν.—By this it is not simply meant, that there was some talk of the subject mentioned in their circles generally, but that the thing, of which the talk was, prevailed there; although this is only to be inferred from the context, and is not directly expressed. (It would then mean: ἐν ὑμῖν ὄσα, or εἰναί; the former, in case it was a correct report; the latter, if it were only a vague rumor). [The names of the informants are not specified, as in the former instance. It was a case of public rumor, and the sin so notorious as to need no vouchers. See Words.].—fornication, πορνεία.—"The word is used in a comprehensive sense, including all violations of the seventh commandment." HODGE]. Of these one in particular was singled out, of the grossest and most astounding sort, viz., of incest. This is introduced by καί, which points to something special under a general head, and brings it in as a climax,—and indeed, or yea even,—with the repetition of the general term for the sake of emphasis,—such fornication, as not even among the Gentiles.—The ellipse might be filled up most readily by: 'is heard,' or simply by: 'is.' [The Rec. text has 'is named,' which Alf. calls "a clumsy gloss taken from Eph. v. 8."] Paul here sets forth the unparalleled nature of the crime he was about to speak of, and the greatness of the disgrace which thereby fell upon the Christian Church—"a holy people."—That one has his father's wife, i. e., his step-mother (μητρὰ)—comp. Levit. xviii. 7, 8—and this either as wife, or concubine. The word ἔχειν, to have, is used of both relations, as is seen by such passages as vii. 2, 29; Matth. xiv. 4:

xxii. 28; Jno. iv. 18. In this case it most probably stands for an illegitimate concubinal relation (comp. Osiander), which was also a 'having,' inasmuch as it was a habitual thing, as well as an act consummated (πράξας: having done, ver. 2; and κατεργασάμενος: having perpetrated, ver. 8).^{*} By the expression—"his father's wife," the wicked violation of the relation sustained to the father, is brought out more conspicuously than if he said simply 'step-mother.' The father, moreover, is to be considered as still living, (against Besser), and as a Christian. See 2 Cor. vii. 12, where the father is spoken of as one 'that had suffered wrong' (ἀδικηθεὶς), and where Paul says 'he did not write on his account.' The son, at all events, must have been a member of the church; the woman, however, not, since he, and not she, is made the subject of censure. Further questions, e. g., as to whether the man was a proselyte, and had proceeded on the Jewish maxim, that a person who had become "a new creature," had severed himself from all former connections, and was at liberty to enter into new relations otherwise forbidden? may be suffered to rest. In speaking of the crime here mentioned as something not existing among the Gentiles, Paul does not mean to say that it never occurred in their history. Cases of this sort are indeed recorded, and tragedies have been founded upon them; but they are always spoken of as rare exceptions, that excited the utmost public horror. Cicero pro Cluentio: "Scelus incredibile, et præter hanc unam in omni vita inauditum." (comp. Wetstein and others on this passage).

VER. 2. Expressions of astonishment at their conduct in view of the above fact.—And ye are puffed up?—[This and the following clause should be read as questions. So Calvin, Meyer, Alf., Words., et al.]. The ὅτι, ye is emphatic, and points back to ἐν ὑμῖν, among you, q. d. 'such a thing has occurred among you, and you are, etc. Questions of this sort are often introduced by καί, and, which here does not take the emphasis as though equivalent to: 'and yet,' but throws it forward on the word following. The assertion that they were puffed up, refers, not to iv. 18, where this is affirmed only of some, but to iv. 8, where he describes the whole Church as filled with the conceit of their spiritual perfection. A great mistake it would be to suppose (with Chrys., Theod., Grot.) that the incestuous person himself was the subject of their pride, on the ground that he was some distinguished teacher among them; or that Paul here alludes to the boasting of other parties over that to which the incestuous belonged.—The proper state of feeling which they ought to have manifested, is expressed in the negative question.—And did not—when ye first knew of the crime—rather mourn—i. e. mourn, that a member of their body had sunk so low, and the Church of the Lord, which ought to have been kept holy, had been thus defiled and dishonored. (The Aorist ἐπεσθῆκατε indicates the act, expressed by the present, as past and finished, as in ἐκπορεύεσθε iii. 5). This mourning, which has its source in a lively sense of the common interest which all have in what affects all, implied also a combined and energetic movement for the removal of the evil deplored,—in order that he who had done this deed might be removed from among you? ἵνα ἀρῶ ἕ.—The ἵνα here is not eebatic, but retains its proper telic force, “unto the end that he,” etc. The removal pointed to, must not be regarded as implying any Divine visitation, a cutting off by death for example, or the like; since it is clear from ver. 18, that he only contemplated the excommunication of the guilty party by an act of the Church itself—an act to which their sorrow should have prompted them. Bengel says: “Ye had no sorrow to stir you up for the removal,” etc. The manner in which the party under censure is designated, carries force: “he that hath done this deed”—τὸν ποῦν, facinus, this wicked deed.

^{*} ["It is not credible that the Corinthian congregation would have endured that one of their body should live with a harlot, especially his mother-in-law. But because this illicit connection had been palliated by the name of matrimony, therefore they might console at it, especially if there were any who were the man's zealous friends, and endeavored to soften the baseness of the thing." CÆLIUS. And this is the view of Meyer, whose arguments Kling does not seem to have thought it worth while to refute, and which undoubtedly ought to be admitted.]

Vers. 3-5. That such sorrow, leading to such results, should have prevailed in the Church, he confirms by stating the decision, which he, on his part, had reached in the case. [“There is something in the involved structure of this sentence, which gives a strong impression of the emotion, anguish, and indignation with which it was written, and which vented itself in broken and disturbed periods, as it were per singultus.”—Words].—For I, for my part, ἐγὼ μὲν.—The μὲν puts Paul in strong contrast with the Corinthians, who were so indifferent and remiss in the case. If we are to retain ὡς, as, it must be regarded as embracing in its force the two following participles, and belonging especially to the latter, “though absent in body, yet as present in spirit.” This then reappears in the next clause without any qualifying term, and as carrying the emphasis: κέκρικα ὡς παρών. The same contrast occurs in Col. ii. 5: “For though I am absent from you in the flesh, yet in spirit I am present with you.” [Meyer, Words., Alf. omit the ὡς, as unauthorised. The sense is clearer without it—‘for I being absent in body, yet present in spirit.’ The participles state the facts in the case, and require no as implying similitude. This appears only in the next clause, where it properly belongs.—Absent in body, yet present in the spirit.—By “in the spirit” we are not to understand the Holy Ghost (as Chrys. and others), but his own spirit, as contrasted with his body. Yet the spirit of the Apostle must not be thought of apart from the Divine illumination and energy which he enjoyed, and by means of which, even in his absence, he looked into and influenced the state of the Corinthian Church; although the τὸ πνεῦμα, the spirit designates even his spiritual nature in contrast with his physical. A similar case occurs in 2 Kings v. 26, where Elisha says to Gehazi: “Went not my spirit with thee?”—have already judged, ἤδη κέκρικα.—(comp. on ii. 2). “Already,”—this energetic and prompt conduct on the part of an absent person forms a contrast all the more striking with the slackness of those among whom the shameful scandal had occurred,—as present,—[Not, in spirit, for he was there already in spirit, but in body; ‘as though he were visibly among them to control and direct in the matter.’ So Meyer, Alf., Hodge].

[As the words which follow are brought under discussion as to their grammatical construction, it seems best, for the sake of perspicuity, to give them in full and translate them as they stand:—τὸν ποῦν τοῦτο κατεργασάμενον ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι τοῦ κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ συναχθέντων ἡμῶν καὶ τοῦ ἐμοῦ πνεύματος οὖν τῇ δυνάμει τοῦ κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ παραδοῖναι τὸν τοιοῦτον τῷ σατανᾷ. lit.,—him so having perpetrated this thing, in the name of our Lord Jesus being gathered together, you and my spirit, with the power of our Lord Jesus, to give such a one to Satan.—The first question is as to the proper connection of the first clause here: “him having perpetrated this thing.” In the E. V. this is taken as governed by some preposition understood, e. g., κατα, concerning—so Words. Others (Stanley) construe it as the direct object of the verb κέκρικα, judge]. In this case the sentence would read: ‘I have judged or passed sentence on him who has,’ etc. The best way, however, would be to regard it as the object of παραδοῖναι in ver. 5, so that the τὸν τοιοῦτον, such a one, would then be merely the resumption of the same object under another form. [We should then translate, putting a colon after κέκρικα, ‘I have judged, that the person who has perpetrated this thing, ye in the name of the Lord Jesus, etc., do deliver such a one,’ etc.]. The reason for putting this objective clause first is to give it the emphasis, as bringing the guilty party more prominently in front. And the word ‘so’ is inserted for the sake of intensifying the enormity of the guilt incurred; and it points to certain aggravating circumstances well known to his readers,—“So shamefully, while called a brother.”—Bengel. We might also (with Osiander) here take in view both, the man’s shamelessness in perpetrating his crime and his utter disregard of his Christian obligations. The next question is about the proper connection of the subordinate clauses. These may be combined in four different ways. Either they may all be united with the principal verb παραδοῖναι, to deliver [Mosheim, Schrader and others], to which Bengel and others also join ὡς παρών, as present; or with the participial clause συναχθέντων, being assembled [Chrys., Theoph., Calvin]; or they may be connected partly with this and partly with the other, so that either ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι, in the name, etc., shall be joined to συναχθέντων, being assembled, and οὖν τῇ δυνάμει, with the power, to παραδοῖναι, to deliver [so Beza, Calov., Billr., Olsh.]; or precisely the reverse [Luther, Bengel, de Wette, Meyer, Alf., Hodge]. The last method seems the most suitable, viz: to unite the clause, “in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ” (which stands first by way of emphasis, and which otherwise the analogy of Matth. xviii. 20 would lead us to join with the participle, ‘being assembled’) with the main verb, as expressing the ground of the chief transaction, so that the act spoken of shall appear to rest on Jesus, the acknowledged Head of the Church, and upon His authority, and so pass for His act. (Com. 2 Thess. iii. 6; Acts iii. 6-16; and respecting the word 'name,' chap. i. 2). As for the clause, "with the power of the Lord Jesus," the very position of it makes it probable that this is to be connected with the participle, 'being assembled' and its adjuncts, since otherwise this participle would, in a most remarkable manner, be made to separate the more strictly qualifying terms of the main sentence. Besides it must be said that the phrase, "in the name of our Lord Jesus," better serves to qualify the act of 'delivering over to Satan,' and includes also the force of the other phrase, "with the power of our Lord," letting alone the fact, that in this way we avoid the accumulation of qualifying terms for the main verb (as well as for the participial clause, if both should be joined to this). Nevertheless, it is not to be overlooked that the phrase, "with the power of our Lord," also serves to qualify the act of "delivering over;" yet not directly, but only as a component part of the clause where it occurs. The entire parenthesis will then mean, that the whole case should be decided in an assembly of the Church,* where he would also be present in spirit;† and that in this gathering they would, moreover, be accompanied by the power of the Lord Jesus for their assistance, (Σὺν, with, designates association, where, however, the co-worker is not a simple instrumentality in the hand of the other; and δύναμις, power, denotes not merely: 'disposing influence,' as Meyer supposes, but: force, might, capability).‡

[* "The feeling of absolute control in the matter, which finds expression in ver. 3, the Apostle softens first by the use of 'in the name of our Lord Jesus,' and then by associating with himself, in the republican spirit of primitive Christianity, the whole Church, where he presides in spirit."—DR WETTE.]

[‡ Meyer, de Wette and Alford agree in taking the words, "with the power of our Lord Jesus," not as a third element in the proposed assembly, nor yet as something resident in the whole Church, but as belonging exclusively to Paul, and so connect it directly to "my spirit." But this seems arbitrary. If the act of 'delivering over' was to be the act of the whole Church and not one of independent apostolic authority, we must suppose that it, too, was fully empowered for the purpose by the Lord who had promised to be in it, when assembled in His name, to the end of time, giving force to its decisions. The grammatical question here will be apt to be determined very much in accordance with the preconceived theories of church government entertained by the interpreter. Hodge (e. g.) regards the Church as convened not for the purpose of voting and acting in the premises, but "as mere spectators," to impart "solemnity to the judicial proceeding." So he takes the words in question as connected directly either with "my spirit," or with 'to deliver'—the sense in either case being substantially the same. Wordsworth goes still farther, and regards the excommunication as not only "promulgated in the presence of the Church," but also as having "been done without taking council with them," and "probably against their inclination." And so the Rheims version:—"Though the act was done in the face of the Church, yet the judgment and authority of giving sentence was in himself and not in the whole multitude, as the Protestant and popular sectaries affirm." Owen, on the other hand, analyses the matter thus:—1. The supreme efficient cause of the excommunication is the power and authority of Jesus Christ. 2. The declarative cause of the equity of this sentence, the spirit of the Apostle. 3. The instrumental, ministerial cause, the Church. They were to "do it in the name of the Lord," and thereby "purge out the old leaven;" whence the punishment is said in 2 Cor. ii. 6 to be "inflicted by many." (See a full discussion of this in OWEN'S Works, vol. xvi. p. 160). And NEANDER forcibly observes: "The Epistles of Paul, which treat of various controverted ecclesiastical matters, are addressed to whole churches, and he assumes that the decision belonged to

But what are we to understand by 'the delivering of such a one to Satan?' That by this phrase excommunication is intended, is evident from ver. 2 ("that he might be taken away from among you.") and from ver. 13 ("Wherefore put away, etc."). But that this is all the expression involves, is improbable from the fact that it is not elsewhere used in this sense. We meet it again only in 1 Tim. i. 20, where it appears, as here, to imply something more. Rather it would seem to convey the additional thought that those, who were ejected from the Church of God—a realm which, as such, is exempt from the dominion of Satan,—were given over again into Satan's power, and unto his destructive influences; and that hence a certain control over these persons is granted him, viz., in so far as it may please the Lord, who ordains this lot for them through His Church and through the Apostolic office (Meyer). [But the question is, whether this was a miraculous subjection to the power of Satan, such as involved special evils and could be effected only by Apostolic authority, and so was peculiar to that age alone; or, whether it had regard to Satan only as the common source of the manifold miseries by which men are scourged, and as the unwilling instrument of a Divine discipline over God's children universally, and hence was something possible for all time, and takes place whenever a man is given over to suffer the bitter consequences of his vices, uncheered by the grace of God's kingdom? The former is the view which has prevailed in the Romish Church from the earliest times, and it was much used to enhance the terrors of priestly excommunication and justify the deliverance of ecclesiastical offenders into the hands of secular authorities for punishment. It is still advocated by many Protestant commentators, among whom are Meyer, Alford, Barnes, Hodge. The latter thus sums up the reasons in its support: 1. "It is clearly revealed in Scripture that bodily evils are often inflicted by the agency of Satan." 2. The Apostles were invested with the power of miraculously inflicting such evils, Acts v. 1-11; xiii. 9-11; 2 Cor. x. 8; xiii. 10. 3. In 1 Tim. i. 20 the same formula occurs probably in the same sense. 4. There is no evidence that the Jews of that age ever expressed excommunication by this phrase, and therefore it would not, in all probability, be understood by Paul's readers in that sense. 5. Excommunication would not have the effect of destroying the flesh, in the sense in which that expression is used in the following clause." The consequence of this view is to exhibit the act under consideration as one done solely by Apostolic authority and power, and therefore as an exceptional case of discipline, the whole body. Had it been otherwise he would have addressed his instructions principally at least to the overseers. When a licentious member of the Church at Corinth was to be excommunicated the Apostle considered it a measure that ought to proceed from the whole society, and placed himself therefore in spirit among them, to unite with them in passing judgment." Furthermore it might be asked, if the Church had no power to act in the premises, where was the ground for Paul to complain of their conduct, in not securing the expulsion of the guilty parties? Plainly his purpose here, in decreeing as he did, was to supplement their lack of duty; and we are not to construe his procedure as pro forma, but as extraordinary, and based upon that plenitude of power which he had as an Apostle.]

which can afford no precedent for after times. The opposite view is the one maintained by Calvin, Beza, Turretin, Owen, Poole, and many others. They regard the formula, 'to deliver a person to Satan,' only as a more solemn mode of stating the fact of excommunication as expressed by our Lord in Matth. xviii. 17,—one designed to exhibit more vividly the sad condition of him who has been cast out from the kingdom of God and so consigned into the hands of his great enemy, uncheered by the light and comforts of the Saviour. This seems the more rational interpretation, only that it does not take sufficient account of the malign agency ascribed to Satan in the Scriptures. For, 1, it accords precisely with the view of the Apostle, that outside the kingdom of God, Satan reigned as "the prince of the power of the air"—as the one that "had the power of death"—as the one who was the source of bodily inflictions, and had sent 'a messenger to buffet him,'—even as he had "bound the woman who had the spirit of infirmity," whom our Lord cured—and so was ever working in various ways to afflict mankind. And surely there is nothing in Scripture to warrant our believing that his agency in this respect has been restrained as yet. His power to tempt to sin implies a power also to inflict the evils which sin engenders. 2. The power of Satan, we are also taught, is subordinate to the power of God. He may be suffered to work an utter destruction, or be used as the unwilling instrument of a Divine discipline. Job and Paul are illustrations of the latter case. And we have every reason to believe, that Satan is still employed in God's hands for this very work of discipline or destruction. Now if this be true, there is nothing miraculous or extraordinary in the case under review, even though we may suppose that physical evils are understood. The instances of Ananias and Sapphira, and of Elymas the sorcerer are not parallel with it. It is no objection that this formula of excommunication has never been found to have been used by the Jews, for it is in keeping with the whole tenor of Paul's doctrine. Moreover, the results anticipated would be directly conducive to the end proposed, if, as was hoped for, the culprit was no reprobate, but one who promised recovery under this most humbling and chastening discipline].—The end to be subserved by this 'deliverance unto Satan' was,—for the destruction of the flesh—εἰς δόλεθρον τῆς σαρκός.—That by this no mere moral effect is indicated, such as the mortification of the selfish and sensuous propensities of our nature, is evident both from the connection with what precedes, which points to an operation of Satan, and from the use of the word δolethros, which nowhere occurs in the above sense (for which rather the terms θανάτου, νεκροῦ, στανῶν, and the like, are used), and from the antithesis made here between "flesh" and "spirit." Σάρξ here denotes the physical life in its depraved state, as an organism where sin is seated, and which serves sin. Now this, which had been used in so shameless a manner by the incestuous person as the instrument of sin, Paul wishes to have given over as a prey to Satan, that he might execute upon it a corresponding disorder, and so fulfil the Divine judgment.

[And it must be added that there is no vice so fearfully avenged in that which is its seat and source, as this very one under consideration. Its legitimate consequences, so terrible as to carry in them the aspect of Satanic malignity, are, in fact, a 'destruction of the flesh'.—But the ruin, thus to be wrought in the outer man, was not to be an utter and final one. There was in it a merciful design,—that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus.—The idea is, that through the penalties inflicted upon his body the offender might be brought to repentance, so that although the former might perish, yet his spirit—the centre of his personality—being still receptive of Divine impressions, might be snatched from destruction, and be found at last within the circle of the ransomed at the day of final separation and decision. That the Apostle here contemplated something more than a bare possibility, is apparent from the whole tenor of this passage; and he might express such hope without presupposing any irresistible operation of Divine grace.* [On the general subject of Satan—the nature and extent of his agency, and his relation to the kingdom of God, see the able articles in Kirby's Enc., 2d ed.; Smith's Bib. Dict., under the word "Satan," and the one in Hertzog's Re. Ency. Teufel; also an article by Moses Stuart in the Bib. Sac. for 1848, p. 117].

[Excommunication: its right, occasions, grounds, form, intent and results. 1. The right to excommunicate is both a natural and a delegated right. The right of any community to exist, involves also the right to eject from itself all elements that are inconsistent with its character and integrity and well being. This belongs, therefore, to the Church. But above and beyond this, the injunction of Christ (Matth. xviii. 17), and the example of the Apostles make it an imperative duty, for the preservation of the Church as a holy body, bearing witness for God and truth and righteousness. 2. The occasion which calls for the act must be some flagrant and habitual offence. Spiritual perfection is not to be looked for in the Church. The tares, which in outward appearance resemble the wheat, must be allowed to remain to the end. Hence many faults in doctrine and practice in the Church at Corinth, Paul was content with rebuking. But the incestuous person was to be cast out. In this forbearance of his towards the one, and severity towards the other, an example is set for all time. To distinguish when the one should end and the other should begin, belongs to the gift of wise government. 3. Its grounds]. The soul of a true evangelical discipline is Christ, His name and power—Christ dwelling in the hearts of believers by faith, and especially present with those whom he has made shepherds in it, with His living, powerful, all-enlightening, penetrating, sifting and dividing word, and hence with the energy of His Spirit operating therein. It is in the light of this word, that sin must be recognized as a reproach and a desecration of His name, and therefore as something which evokes a reaction against it from this Name—a reaction which is nothing else than a manifestation of the might of a holy, divine love.—[4. Its form]. The constraining power of this reaction must be felt and exhibited in the Church, which is Christ's body, and especially in those who are the stewards of the Divine mysteries, and ambassadors speaking in His name, urging them as by an irresistible impulse, and arousing them to a strong determination to make it effective upon the offender. And the Church in assembling for this purpose when occasion calls, should come together solemnly, attended by the presence and power of the Lord. Thus and thus only, in a manner truly valid, and with unfailing results, can he, who has desecrated the name of Christ, and has proved unworthy of fellowship in His body, be cast out from the sphere of life in Christ, and from a participation in His protecting grace, and given over into the power of Satan to suffer the merited penalties of his sins. [5. The intent of this act is not punitive, but remedial, in consistency with the design of the whole Gospel dispensation, which was "to save and not to destroy;" and with the object of the power intrusted to the Apostle, and so to their successors, "which was for edification and not for destruction." And this intent must be displayed in the manner in which the act is performed, and in the hopes and prayers with which it is accompanied. For though the act of excommunication is in one sense a cutting off from the means of grace, in another it may itself be made a means of grace through the blessing of God which may follow the offender in his exclusion and turn the very severity of his sufferings into a glorious benefit. And where this result is not hindered by the obduracy of the guilty party, and he has not sinned past forbearance, we may expect 6. as the result, repentance and restoration. Nor is this surprising]. In bringing about such issues Satan, the arch enemy of Christ, is employed as his servant, even while he, on his part, seeks only to gratify his own love of corrupting, plaguing and destroying men. Our sinful nature, the organ of sin and the seat of its impure impulses, is given over into his power to be wasted and destroyed. And while in doing this, his intention is utterly to ruin, Christ aims at the ultimate deliverance of the spirit, which, having been enthralled by the flesh, is to be liberated through its weakening and destruction. He who inflicts the judgment, prescribes the limits beyond which the Evil One may not pass; yea, compels him to subserve the purposes of his holy love. This is one truth taught us in the Book of Job, although the author there is speaking not of punishment but of proof and trial. The results of such discipline will be brought to light on that day when all things shall be revealed. And they will be brought to light in such a way that Satan will be put to shame, while God will be glorified in the midst of His own, even among those who have deeply fallen, as One who is wonderful in counsel and glorious in execution.

[As before we had the picture of a Church imperfectly united—still divided by the prevalence of ambition and conflicting opinions, so here we have a picture of one imperfectly purified, still carrying in itself the corruptions and spots of an earlier depravity. And here we see: 1. How sin may convert the very grace of God into a warrant for a lasciviousness even grosser than any which may be practised without, ver. 1.—How it shows more flagrant and abominable when seen in a body professing holiness, than elsewhere, ver. 1-3. The melancholy aspect of a Church unconscious of its defilements, and flaunting in the conceit of its own perfection and beauty; and 4. in contrast with this, the proper attitude of humiliation and sorrow that it ought to assume, ver. 2-5. The duty of observant and faithful ministers in the premises—to reprove remissness, and exhort the Church to self-purgation, ver. 3-6. The duty of the Church made alive to its disgrace—to cast out the evil it cannot cure, and consign the obdurate offender to the master he serves, a. with united action; b. in the name of the Lord; c. evincing a holy abhorrence of sin; d. yet a love for the offender that shows itself in the desires and prayers for his recovery, ver. 5].

STARKER:—Since the scandal of crimes committed in the Church is greater than that of those committed in the world, we should avoid them the more carefully, lament over them the more deeply, and punish them the more scrupulously. The Church must tolerate the public rebuke of open offences, ver. 1.—Christians should mourn over the sins of their brethren as if these were personal afflictions (Ps. cix. 186; Ez. ix. 4) ver. 2.—It is possible for us to promote the welfare of a Church even when absent, by prayer and by power [?] by writing and giving counsel, ver. 3.—HED.: 'How glorious the uses of excommunication!' By it many an offender, who would otherwise continue in sin, and have part with the devil, is saved; by it the Church evinces its abhorrence of evil, and shuns disgrace; by it she keeps from participating in others' sins, which, through connivance, would involve a whole people in guilt and punishment; and finally, by it she prevents the spread of iniquity, ver. 5.

BERLEN. BIR.:—Merely formal assemblies profit nothing; the spirits must be present, and they must first be united by the power of Christ, ver. 4.—A true church-censure flows from love. Its aim is the preservation of the spirit. It has ever been God's method to destroy a part, and that the least part, rather than to lose the whole. So the Gospel still keeps the preponderance. And though the act wears a legal aspect, it is evangelical in intent, aiming to save what belongs to Christ.—We shall obtain salvation at the appearing of our Lord, provided we first awake from sleep, arise from the dead, and let Christ give us light, ver. 5. The toleration of even small things, which originate from impure sources, endangers the whole obedience of faith, ver. 6.

RIEGER:—Conceit and self-satisfaction, whether in individuals or communities, open the way for carnal license.—A person must have dug deep in poverty of spirit, if he takes not occasion from others' trespasses to enhance his own reputation—He who spares the rod hates his child. The omission of a lesser discipline only exposes the guilty one to greater judgments.

HUBNER:—The abominableness of incest, from which even the heathen shrank with horror, must have a deep foundation in the nature of things, even in God, and not be sought for in the consequences alone, ver. 1. Public offences, when tolerated, involve the whole Church in guilt, even the better portion, partly because all are members of one body; and partly, because their toleration is a token of a want in the Church of zeal and watchfulness and care, for its order and welfare, ver. 2.—This power of censure i. e. of delivering over to Satan, which is now conceded to no one [?], is still invisibly exercised by Christ and His Apostles, over every Church, so that in their sight all unworthy persons are already excommunicated. Oh that we could ever bear in mind this scrutiny and judgment that is exercised over us from above!—The Christian Church is holy. It is a city set upon a hill, whose light shines far. Through offences and crimes its crown is trampled under foot. They are violations of the majesty of Christ.—The stringency of primitive Church discipline is no longer maintained. In congregations so mixed as ours, the consciousness of Christian communion has vanished, and public censure would be deemed a libel, and would fail of its end. Hence it only remains for the better members to withdraw their fellowship from every person who dishonors the Church, and refuses to reform, and so make manifest their displeasure at his conduct (Matth. xviii. 17). This would be a voluntary discipline wholly within the power of Christians, of which even the guilty party cannot complain, ver. 5.*

NEANDER:—It is well for the soul if it can be saved, even at the cost of bodily sufferings, ver. 5.

[* These remarks apply only to churches united with the state; and they bring to view one great evil of the state-church system, and afford evidence of its utter inconsistency with the whole idea of Christianity, and of its incompatibility with the Gospel requirements].

[W. F. BESSER:—It is not indeed granted the Church to know, or to determine what sort of evil Satan will inflict on one given over into His power. That he will not, however, slip the man on from one sin to another (Ps. lxi. 28; Rom. i. 24), but will, on the contrary, sensibly touch him with this or that external evil or misfortune, this the Church knows, because it recognizes Satan as the personal power of evil, and it purposes in Christ that the strokes of the destroyer shall smite the flesh of the condemned party, whether it be to the destruction of his bodily life, or to the loss of his earthly prosperity, in order that the spirit of the returning penitent (and so his body too at last) shall be saved in the day of the Lord].

[F. W. ROBERTSON:—The Church excommunicates in a representative capacity. Man is the image of God, and man is the medium through which God's absolution and God's punishment are given and inflicted. Man is the mediator, because he represents God. His acts in this sense are, however, necessarily imperfect. There is but One in whom humanity was completely restored to the Divine Image, whose forgiveness and condemnation are exactly commensurate with God's. Nevertheless, the Church here is the representation of that ideal man which Christ realized, and hence in a representative capacity condemns and forgives.—The indignation of society is properly representative of the indignation of God. God is angry at sin, and when our hearts are sound and healthy, and our view of moral evil not morbid and sentimental, we feel it too. And in expressing this we represent and make credible God's wrath. When the offender hears the voice of condemnation and feels himself every where shunned, then conscience, which before had slumbered, begins to do its dreadful work, and the anger incurred becomes a type of coming doom. Thus is there lodged in Humanity a power to bind; and only so far as man is Christ-like can he exercise this power in an entirely true and perfect manner. (Abbreviated*)].

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

[In this section the specific duty of excommunicating an incestuous church member is expanded into the broader one of individual and social purification in general. And this is exhibited under a familiar metaphor, and enforced by reasons drawn from it. In entering upon it Paul starts with alluding to that state of mind which presented so strange a contrast to their actual condition.]

VER. 6. That in which you boast is not good.—In view of the word here rendered, 'boasting' (καύχημα), the question arises, whether it is the act, or the ground of boasting that is intended. The latter meaning is certainly the one which prevails in the New Testament, even 2 Cor. ix. 3, [and this is in accordance with the passive form of the noun]. Then we should render it: 'that of which you boast;' and while with the other signification οὐ καλόν would mean: 'it does not become you,' etc., it would in the other case be rendered: 'is not seemly or beautiful,' implying that it is, rather, hateful. It is not, however, the incestuous person that is meant [as Hammond and Whitby singularly suggest, supposing him to have been a man of some reputation for wisdom and eloquence], but the whole condition of the Church, the complete corruption of which he proceeds to illustrate by a familiar comparison.—Know ye not that a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump?—In like manner, he implies, that the whole Church was infected by one crime, tolerated in the midst of it. The "little leaven" here refers not so much to the person in question, as to the vice of fornication, which had broken out upon him in its worst form. "It denotes some impurity of the former state, not yet purged out,—a little remnant of which, if allowed, was sufficient to corrupt again the salvation already obtained, and render it ineffective." BURGER. [It is not, however, says Alford, the "danger of corruption hereafter" by the future spread of the tolerated evil, that he here speaks of, but "the character already tainted" by its presence among them in this one instance." But are not the consequences merely anticipated in their certainty, and the future and present all included under one view? The leaven and its working must here be taken together]. The same comparison, used to illustrate a corrupting influence, occurs in Gal. v. 9, and Matth. xvi. 6, and the parallel passages. On the other hand, it appears in Matth. xiii. 33, and in the parallel passages, to illustrate the penetrating and pervading power of Divine grace.

In consequence of the contagious effects of tolerated evil, Paul gives the following exhortation:—Purge out.—Ἐκκαθαίρειν sometimes is followed by the Accus. of the thing cleansed, and sometimes, as here, with that of the thing removed. [Stanley calls it "a strong expression," and remarks that the duty it enjoins was "carried out in later times with such extreme punctiliousness, that on the fourteenth day they searched with candles into the darkest holes and corners to see whether any leaven remained."—The old leaven.—This, in accordance with what has been said, does not indicate the incestuous person, so that the command would only be a repetition of that in ver. 2 and 13, but the moral evil which was defiling the Church. This he calls 'old,' because it was the remains of their former unregenerate state which, like leaven, was still at work vitiating their character.—That ye may be a fresh lump. νέον φύραμα,—wherein there is no leaven, hence a complete whole, morally renewed by purification—a Church holy and free from sin, evincing its early love and zeal. (Starke). (Νέος, fresh differs from καινός, which means new, entirely different from what it was before).—What follows clearly shows that the Apostle had in mind the practice of the Israelites removing leaven from their houses before the Passover began.—As ye are unleavened.—Thus he designates the Church ideally considered, and as it can become only through the power of Divine grace, and shows the divinely postulated character of its membership; and hence it presents an argument for removing the existing evil, as he enjoins them to do. They are to come up to their true ideal. [Conybeare and Howson, however, interpret this clause literally, as alluding to the condition in which the Jewish portion of the Church were at that moment, it being the time of Passover: "Even as ye, at this Paschal season, are without the taint of leaven." This view Alf. combats at length. His strongest argument, and one which must be deemed conclusive, is that it is "wholly alien from the habit and spirit of the Apostle." "The ordinances of the Old Law," he says, "are to Paul not points, on whose actual observance to ground spiritual lessons, but things passed away in their literal acceptance, and become spiritual realities in Christ." Kling's view is the one generally adopted, and in refutation of the one above suggested, he adds further]. It would evidently transcend the meaning of the term, ἀζυμοί to make it mean those who eat no leaven, or observe the festival of unleavened bread, i. e., the Jews, nor would such a meaning be applicable to the case of a Church composed mainly of heathen converts. But it may be fitly used of all professing Christians, inasmuch as they are themselves supposed to be free from those sinful corruptions which prevail without in the world, and which are here denoted by the leaven. And such an interpretation accords with the previous phrase "a fresh lump." The translation of ἐστέ by: 'ye ought to be,' instead of by: 'ye are' [as Chrysostom, Theoph., and after them Billroth, Platt and Pott, and many others suggest], though in itself incorrect, would point to the ideal view of Christians expressed in the word 'unleavened.' [But the strongest argument for the interpretation given above of the clause before us, is in what follows, where we see that the Apostle's mind was moving not in the sphere of Jewish carnal ordinances, but among the higher verities which they typified].—For our Passover also has been sacrificed even Christ.—[Such can only be rendering of the words, καὶ γὰρ τὸ πάσχα ἡμῶν ἐτύθη Χριστός. The main subject is evidently τὸ πάσχα; and the intent of the Apostle is to show the propriety of speaking of Christians as unleavened, since they, too, had a paschal offering, which was Christ. Kling, however, goes on to raise the question]. Does this declaration furnish the ground of what immediately precedes? or is it a further argument for the whole exhortation? In the former case, the sense would be: ye are free from that corruption by virtue of that redemption achieved by Christ. But such connection would suit, provided only, that we took the term "unleavened" in the sense rejected above. [But why so? Why not consider it as justifying the application of the term to Christians also, on the ground that they likewise had a passover which obliged them to be free from the corruption which the leaven symbolized?] We, therefore, refer the clause to the whole exhortation, as furnishing an argument for that. [And such, no doubt, is the more extended bearing of it.] As among the Israelites from the first day of the feast to the slaying of the Paschal lamb, it was the rule to put away all leaven and all unleavened bread from their houses, so likewise were Christians under obligation to put away all former sinful practices—the leaven of wickedness—inasmuch as their Paschal lamb, even Christ, had been slain. And here we have an evidence that the ancient Paschal lamb was a type of Christ. And to this also Jno. xix. 36, plainly conducts us. The point of comparison is, primarily, the redeeming power of the blood of the victim. It was with this that at the time of their departure from Egypt, the lintels and doorposts of the Israelites were sprinkled, and by reason of this that those within were preserved from the destroying sword, while the Egyptians fell under its stroke. In like manner under the new dispensation, which fulfils the old, it is said the hearts of believers are sprinkled by the blood of Christ (Heb. x. 22; xii. 24; 1 Pet. i. 12), and thus saved from destruction. The slaying of the Paschal lamb accordingly obtains the character of a sacrifice (θύειν), and indeed of an expiatory, covenant kind, forming a distinction between the members of the covenant, whose sins are covered with its blood, and the others who are left to their doom. Worthy of consideration, though somewhat problematical, is Lücke's and Meyer's observation, that this designation of Christ accords with John's account of the crucifixion which places it on the day of the slaying of the Paschal lamb* (contrary to the account of the Synoptists), and can only be explained on this ground. But, however this may be, a powerful motive is found in this fact for moral purification. (comp. 1 Pet. ii. 24).—This is further carried out in

VER. 8. Let us therefore keep the feast.—The previous command in a milder form—that of an exhortation to a social solemnity, for which the expression, "our Passover," forms a fit transition. The whole context alludes to the Easter festival; and it is highly probable that the Apostle wrote the Epistle at or near the approach of Easter (comp. xvi. 8), and, being full of the idea, gave to his exhortation a corresponding form. That the Christian festival of Easter, commemorating the resurrection of our Lord, had already been established, can hardly be affirmed. But that Gentile converts united with the Jewish, to celebrate the Passover in commemoration of its fulfilment through Christ, is too probable to be denied. In any case, it is safe to assert with Osiander, that it was solemnized in spirit. As for the rest, the language is figurative. The duty indicated is not the outward, but the inward spiritual observance, namely, the united offering of praise to God for His redeeming grace, through the maintenance of a Christian conversation (comp. Osiander). [Hodge, Alf., Stanley, agree in the opinion that there is no reference here to the keeping of the Passover festival, nor yet to the observance of the Lord's Supper (though Wordsworth regards "the text as specially applicable to a consideration of the privileges and duties" connected with this), but, as Kling, to that "continued Passover feast," that "sacred festival" of a consecrated life, which should follow upon our union to Christ in

[* See this disproved, and the whole chronology of our Lord's last acts fully discussed in ANDREW'S "Life of our Lord," pp. 423-460; also LANGE on Matth. pp. 455 and 468].

His death, even as a feast, professedly of holy joy and gladness, protracted through seven days always followed upon the observance of the Passover among the Jews].

How the feast was to be kept is explained still further; first, negatively.—not with old leaven,—which he had just told them to purge out (ver. 7), and which he goes on further to describe in words which are to be understood, not as introducing a new thought, but as explanatory of the former.—neither with the leaven of malice and wickedness.—What, in point of fact is one, is here formally distinguished; or we may say with Meyer, that of the kind in general one particular is selected and made prominent. The preposition ἐν with, indicates that with which the feast was accompanied, or in which its character was violated. [The Genitives are those of apposition, 'the leaven which is,' &c. See Winer, § 59, 8, a]. Kakia denotes the opposite of that love which seeks the welfare of another—a desire and effort to injure a neighbor (Eph. iv. 31); πονηρία ["is a still stronger word" HODGE], and denotes wickedness, villany ["the performance of evil with persistency and delight. Hence Satan is called ὁ πονηρός"—HODGE]. In contrast with these we have the true method expressed.—but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth.—Εὐκρίνεια is purity—the quality of having been proved in the sunlight (εἰλη) and found (κρίνεται) genuine; ἀλήθεια, the harmony of man with himself, and with Divine truth, which is made known in the uprightness of conduct. To distinguish these terms as indicating, the one the substance, the other the manifestation of goodness, and thus as expressing the opposite to kakia, the substance, and πονηρία, the manifestation of evil would be too abstract. Bengel's distinction: "kakia is vice, as contrary to virtue, and that virtue unalloyed, or insincerity, and πονηρία, wickedness, as in those who strenuously defend and retain kakian, and is opposed to the truth"—is very uncertain. We can better accept the distinction he makes between εὐκρίνεια and ἀλήθεια—"the former takes care not to admit evil with the good, the latter not to admit evil instead of good." For other attempts to discriminate between these words, see Starke in loco. [Also TRENCH "Syn. of the New Testament," § xi., and W. WEBSTER "Syntax and Syn. of the New Testament," pp. 194, 195].

VER. 9-13.¹ We here have an episode to the proper subject of this paragraph, which is resumed again in ver. 13². The exhortation given above suggests the correction of a misunderstanding in regard to the meaning of a certain passage in a previous letter, which he had written to them about holding intercourse with fornicators.—I wrote to you in the Epistle.—The stringency of theological dogmatism, which refuses to admit the loss of any Apostolic writing, insists that the reference here is to a previous passage in this Epistle, viz., ver. 2 and 6. But such reference neither suits the expression "in the Epistle," nor yet the contents of the verses cited. The allusion must therefore be to some earlier letter now lost. [This is the conclusion of Calvin, Beza, Bengel, de Wette, Meyer, Wordsworth, Alford, Hodge, Barnes, and most other modern commentators, and as Words. argues, "is perfectly consistent with the position, 'that no Canonical Book of Holy Scripture has been lost.'" Stanley, however, ingeniously argues for the other view, advocated mainly by the Greek Fathers, also by Hammond and Whitby, and asks whether there are not indications that the whole passage from v. 9 to vi. 8 is, in some sense, a distinct note, a postscript not merely to v. 6-8, but also to vi. 9-20? This he says has been already conjectured by two Englishmen, J. Edwards and Dr. Thos. Arnold, and he alludes in the way of comparison to a remarkable passage in Livy. iv. 20, called by Niebuhr, the only instance of a note in any ancient author. Similar digressions he thinks he finds elsewhere, also in Paul's Epistles. To say the least, he makes a very plausible case, and his arguments, if not convincing, are very interesting].—not to keep company with fornicators.—Συναμικνέσθαι, to mingle oneself up with, as in 2 Thess. iii. 14; the Inf. after verbs of counselling, or commanding. The warning thus conveyed they had interpreted to mean, that they should hold no intercourse at all with persons of the sort mentioned; and they did this perhaps from a secret disinclination to follow Paul's instruction, and in their letter had pointed out the utter impracticability of the thing. He therefore goes on now to explain himself more exactly upon the subject.

VER. 10. Not altogether with the fornicators of this world.—The ellipse here is certainly to be supplied from the foregoing—"I wrote not to mingle with." But the question is, whether these words are to be inserted after 'not,' so as to separate it from 'altogether' (πάντως), or whether these two words are to be taken together; and then, in the latter case, whether the two are to be joined with 'I wrote,' or with the nouns following. In our opinion, the separation of 'not altogether' (οὐ πάντως), ought, if possible, to be avoided. But if we connect the words unitedly, to 'I wrote,' and render the clause: 'I did by no means write to you not to associate with the wicked,' then it has the appearance of promoting directly such intercourse. ["And this, although perhaps the more common explanation, does not give so good sense." HODGE]. They had better therefore be joined with what follows, in the way of limitation: 'not entirely and under all circumstances' with the fornicators of this world. By the epithet, 'of this world,' the persons alluded to are distinguished from those of the same class found in the Church.—Since he is treating, in this paragraph, of moral purification in general, he adds yet other sorts of persons who presented a decided contrast to the Christian character, and with whom it was unbecoming in them to associate—persons whom he had already spoken of in his previous letter.—or with the converts and extortioners.—These two classes go together, as may be seen by the καὶ and, which connect them—a reading better supported than ἢ, or of the Rec. The πλεονέκτης is one who means to have more than his neighbors, or, more than belongs to him, and who therefore indulges in frauds, and overreaching, and oppression. This trait is more prominently brought out in the second term, ἀρπαξ, which denotes one who manifests his greed of gain in robbery and plunder. [Conybeare renders the former of these words: 'lascivious person,' and says that "πλεονεξία in St. Paul almost invariably means impurity." And Stanley advocates this interpretation as being more in accordance with the drift of discourse. And there is not a little to justify the view taken. Sensuality and rapine most frequently go together as branches from the same root of covetousness, and stand in close connection with idolatry. The same view is also maintained by Hammond, who explains the πλεονέκταις to mean 'men of inordinate lusts;' and in consistency with this, supported by no small show of classic authorities, translates ἀρπαγες, rauishers. But there is no special reason why "the extraordinary sense" should be adopted here; and the conjunction 'and' seems to affiliate the words in meaning with the other to which it is thus connected. See TRENCH, N. T. Syn. § 24]—or with idolaters.—To those who violate the rights of neighbors, he joins such as violate the highest right—that of God. And in this religious aberration is found the source of all moral aberration. ["This is said to be the earliest known instance of the use of the word εἰδωλόλατρης; it is never used in the LXX., although εἰδωλον is constantly employed in that version to denote 'false gods.'" HODGE]. That the prohibition which he had formerly given could not have been meant in the broad sense supposed by his readers, he now shows apagogically by exhibiting the absurdity of the thing.—Since, indeed, ye must then have gone out of the world.—The ἀρα, in that case, following upon ἐπεὶ, since, shows yet more definitely the consequence which would ensue upon the interpretation put on his language. Properly a protasis is here to be supplied. 'If it were so as you say, why then in that case,' etc. [For the force of ἀρα, see WINER § LIII. a]. Κόσμος, world, in this last clause, is to be taken in its physical, not, as in the first clause, in its ethical sense. The world is full of bad people, with whom we are compelled to deal, in some form, in business or traffic, by the very exigencies of our earthly lot; and if we would avoid them altogether, we can only do it by quitting the world altogether.

Vers. 11. But now I wrote to you.—He cannot here be repeating what was in the former Epistle, for had the words which follow been there, the misunderstanding could not have arisen. Νῦν δὲ ἔγραψα must accordingly imply: 'but now my meaning was,' νῦν being taken in its logical sense, as referring back to the previous statement (comp. xv. 20; xii. 18; xix. 8). In like manner λέγω and ἔλεγον often stand for: 'this is what I mean, or meant, by what I say, or said.' So i. 12 and elsewhere. This interpretation is better suited to the context. We have here the positive explanation of a former declaration, following upon the negative one in ver. 10,—and not a new declaration made 'now' (νῦν), differing from that made "in the Epistle," ver. 10; in which case the aorist ἔγραψα: I wrote, must be taken after the old epistolary style as referring to what was said in process of writing (see Meyer in loco). ["Thus by the right rendering, we escape the awkward inference deducible from the ordinary interpretation, that the Apostle had previously given a command and now retracted it." ALF.]—not to keep company, if any one called a brother be a fornicator.—The participle ὀνομαζόμενος, called, forms an antithesis to ἡ, as, as contrasting profession with reality. To connect the participle with the following noun [as Augustine, Ambrose, Estius, and others], so as to read: 'be a reputed, or notorious fornicator,' would be alike opposed to the drift of the passage, and to the usage of language. ὀνομαζεσθαι can mean only: to be called, or, to be honorably mentioned. Besides in this case the text would have been: ἀδελφός τις,—or a covetous, or an idolater.—The term idolater, as applied to one called a brother, must denote, [not an open worshipper of idols, for such a person would hardly have been found among the brethren], but one who ate of the heathen sacrifices, and participated in the heathenish customs connected therewith—a practice alluded to in x. 14. Then enlarging his catalogue beyond that of ver. 10, he adds,—or a railer, or a drunkard,—μέθυσος, a term which in old Greek was used of women only,—or an extortioner; with such a one neither to eat.—This does not refer to communion at love-feasts, or at the Lord's Supper; but to association at ordinary meals, a practice which would indicate intimate companionship. The characters described, they were not to entertain as guests, nor visit as hosts, nor unite with them at a party in the house of a common acquaintance; but they were to cut them off from their society and give it to be understood that they would have nothing in common with them. "Here we learn what sins justify excommunication. We must also suppose that among the converts at Corinth, here and there, a reaction towards their former state had already taken place." NEANDER.

Vers. 12, 13. A further reason why he could have designed his exhortation only in a limited sense. The contrary would have been an assumption of authority over those not Christians, an application of discipline to them which was not allowed him.—For what have I to do,—τί γάρ μοι.—The expression is pure Greek. It means, 'what concern is it of mine? It does not belong to my office.'—to judge also those without.—Οἱ ἔξω, was a designation applied by the Jews to the heathen, and by Christians to unbelievers. The latter are without, because they are outside the pale of God's Church—not to be found among His people. In like manner Col. iv. 5, 1 Thess. iv. 12. His refusal to judge such he sustains by a reference to their own procedure.—do not ye judge them that are within?—The τοὺς ἐσω, holding the emphatic place, forms the antithesis to τοὺς ἔξω, and ὑμεῖς to μοι. Then the argument is: 'since you yourselves confine your jurisdiction to those within the Church, you had no reason to ascribe to me advice which went beyond this limit.' It would be clearly wrong to separate, as some [Theoph. Hammond, Michaelis, Rosenmuller] do, οὐχί from what follows, and then take the verb in the Imper. q. d., 'No, judge ye,' etc. It would then have read, οὐδέν, nothing, as the reply to the previous question; and ἀλλά, but, would have appeared after it. In saying 'ye,' Paul does not mean to exclude himself. This would be contrary to what he had just enjoined in vv. 3-5.—But those without God will judge, or judgeth.—This clause is best taken by itself, affirmatively, and not as continuing the previous question: 'The right to judge unbelievers belongs solely to God, not to you or me.' Whether the verb here is to be taken in the present or future is doubtful, for the accentuation is uncertain—whether κρίνει or κρίψει. If the latter—the future, the reference is to the last judgment. But this is not what Paul has exclusively in mind. Taken in the present, it corresponds best with the previous clauses. ["These remarks about judging form a transition point to the subject of the next chapter. But having now furnished his explanation of the prohibition formerly given, and with this subject of the fornicator among them, he gives, before passing on, a plain command in terms for the excommunication (but no more) of the offender. And this he does in the very words of Deut. xxiv. 7, from which the reading καὶ ἐξαίρει has come." ALV. and this he does without any connecting word, the abruptness being characteristic].—Put away the wicked one from among your own selves.—In this he but resumes the chief topic of this section, which had not been altogether abandoned. Even during the seeming digression, Paul clinches it. There is no sign of that momentary passionate outburst which Rückert detects. The reference in τὸν πονηρὸν: that wicked one, is to fornicator, not to the devil, as Calvin supposes, whose power was to be averted by the removal of what was evil and impure. Such a reference is disproved by the plain citation here from Deuteronomy.* Ἐξ ὑμῶν αὐτῶν is emphatic: 'from out of the midst of yourselves.'

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

[1. Christ the antitype of the Paschal Lamb. Thus the Old Testament pours light upon the New, and reveals to us the meaning of Christ's mission. As the Paschal Lamb saved the Israelites from destruction through the sprinkling of its blood upon their habitations, so Christ saves His people, not by instruction, not by example, not by the converting grace of His Spirit, though these means are included in His work—but primarily, by giving His blood for their ransom. He is our Redeemer in virtue of His having made Himself a sacrifice for us. This truth is involved in the very word employed to designate the nature of His death, ἐρῶδη—a word appropriated to denote the slaying of victims at an altar. And should it be objected that the Paschal Lamb was not, properly speaking, a sacrifice, it not having been offered at an altar, nor through a priest, nor in a consecrated place, thus answering to the requisitions of a sacrifice, it is enough to reply that it is so called in Scripture in various places (Ex. xii. 27; xxiii. 18; xxxiv. 25; Deut. xvi. 2, 4, 5, 6), and had all the effect of an expiatory offering. Indeed, it seems to have been the root out of which the whole sacrificial system grew. And as its offering was the very condition on which the Israelites escaped the doom of Egypt which set them free, and as its observance was the condition of continued membership in the ransomed nation, so is the death of Christ the ground of the sinner's exemption from the condemnation and curse resting upon the world, and the continued commemoration of that death is a duty imposed on all that would be numbered among His saints].

* And yet Calvin's interpretation is more in accordance with the enlarged course of thought pursued in the latter part of the chapter, and carries with it greater force. It also explains the abruptness with which the injunction is introduced. The grand finale of the whole matter is: 'Put the wicked one away from the midst of you—the wicked one and all that belongs to him.' This seems more natural than to suppose a recurrence to a matter already settled].

[2. Both the sanctification of the individual believer, and the purification of the Church as a body, necessarily follow from the fact of our redemption through the sacrifice of Christ. As the Israelites were redeemed to be a "kingdom of priests and a holy nation" (Ex. xxx. 6), so is the Church redeemed to be "a royal priesthood and a holy nation" (1 Pet. ii. 9). And this purpose is realized under the inspiring motive of grateful joy for the deliverance vouchsafed. Hence the whole of every truly Christian life becomes a holy festival, an offering of praise to God for the glorious works He hath done for us through Christ. His redemption was nothing less than the achievement of a Divine love that condescended to take upon itself the doom of the sinner, and expiate his guilt by the sacrifice of a life assumed in his nature. Now where this fact is known and felt, there the sin thus atoned for can no longer be tolerated in its selfishness and lovelessness. He who truly believes that Christ died for him in love, himself becomes "dead unto sin" (Rom. vi. 11). In him the body of sin with all its affections and lusts is nailed upon the cross of his Lord, and the life he henceforth leads, is maintained in fellowship with that Saviour who loved him and gave Himself for him. Thus it is that malice and wickedness are purged away, and instead thereof we see a life of simplicity and truth manifesting itself in word and deed; and this, not under the constraints of legal obligation and fear, but under the actuating power of devout gratitude and joyful devotion. Such is the ideal of a Christian life. And so far as this ideal is realized, both the Church as a whole, and every individual in the Church becomes a temple of God where He is perpetually worshipped and where a true and lasting festival goes on].

8. It follows from the above that wherever the Christian life is in full and vigorous exercise, there the Church will, as far as possible, maintain a discipline, which shall separate between the holy and the profane, and preserve its own consistency and integrity; there Christians will withhold the title of 'brother' from every professor that walketh disorderly, and will take heed how they countenance by their friendly society those who openly dishonor the name after which they are called; there the vices which stain the Christian character will be regarded with greater abhorrence and put under severer censure than those which are openly practised by the world. And this discipline will be the natural operation of that holy love which the death of Christ enkindles, manifesting itself both in the ordinary intercourse of life, and through official acts. Without this vital power, Church discipline, however exercised, may indeed succeed in maintaining a creditable external order, and in carrying on a creditable conflict with public immoralities, but it never can accomplish an inward renovation, or bring to pass deep and lasting results.

[1. The Church of God, as a body redeemed from condemnation by the death of Christ, is thereby put under obligations to purge itself from all sin and immoralities, and to preserve a saintly character and appearance. The inflation of vanity is one evidence of the working of the leaven of wickedness, and should excite suspicion of its presence ver. 6.—No immoralities should be tolerated under the pretext that they are small, because—1, the toleration of them indicates a general laxity of principle; and 2, endangers the purity of the whole body by a vicious infection ver. 6; and 3, is contrary to the ideal character of the Church ver. 7. The sins of our former state are especially to be guarded against, and the remains of them to be searched for and cast out. They both desecrate the purity and mar the joy of what should be the Christian's life-long feast ver. 7.—The Church, though separate from the world, is yet to exist in the world; and one of the problems it must solve is so to mingle with the ungodly and profane as not to compromise its character or countenance iniquity, and yet so as to maintain peace with all men and win the worst to Christ. The principles which should regulate its intercourse with the world are thus given by Barnes: 'a. The Church is not to be compared to the world in any of its peculiar and distinguishing features; b. It must treat all men justly and righteously; c. Its members must discharge all obligations and duties belonging to the social relations; d. They must do good to all men; e. They must so associate with sinners as to be able to work for their salvation' (vv. 9, 10).—Those that are justly liable to church censure, and must be excommunicated, are the openly immoral and profane. But while these characters in the Church are to be judged by the Church, the world without is to be left to the judgment of God. And this judgment is to be exercised in the Church in order that those who are judged by it may, if possible, escape the condemnation awaiting the world (ver. 12).]

STARKE:—If evil be allowed free course, the result will be a settled wantonness of character, leading the person to commit iniquity without reserve—yea, even with pleasure and determination; and then to ignore guilt, or so to varnish it over that the villain beneath shall not be suspected under the fair outside. Sin has its lurking holes, and must be hunted out through them all. Alas, for the few genuine Easter days which Christians enjoy, ver. 8.—Of what profit is it to leave the world and skulk away in the mountains and clefts of the wilderness? The old Adam will skulk with thee even there. Drive him out, and then will thy heart itself be a blessed solitude, where Christ will come and converse with thee. So associate with open sinners as to teach, not learn—warn, not confirm—help to life, not hasten to death (ver. 9-10).—Look out for home; God will take care of things abroad.—In order to effective Church discipline, the majority of the Church must themselves be sound ver. 18.

BERLEN. BIBEL:—If thy wrong is made public and judged, count it not as an injury; for a genuine purification requires that we do not withdraw our iniquity from condemnation and destruction. Now that Christ has died for our justification, and sent us His Spirit for our sanctification, this personal purification may be justly required. We ought to do it, because now we can do it—not, however, in our own strength, but in that of our risen Saviour (ver. 7).—The true Passover festival of Christians is followed by a constant succession of Sabbaths, wherein they daily rise with Christ to newness of life. He who has learned this, keeps Easter all the time. Christ's life is his life; and this life is peace and joy in the Holy Ghost. His festival will terminate only when Christ ceases to be ver. 8.—If we must be surrounded by the world, let us take care to abide with ourselves through a constant inward intercourse with God. In such a case the world will not harm us.

HEUBNER:—The Pericope on Easter. To the worthy celebration of Easter there belongs—1, repentance vv. 6, 7; 2, faith and joy, because of redemption ver. 7; 3, new resolves for greater sanctification (ver. 8).—The life of a Christian is a continuous Easter—1, in ceaseless repentance and sorrow for man's fall; 2, in constant looking to Christ, the risen, reigning Lord.—Easter as the festival of a spiritual resurrection—1. Its necessity as a memorial of the Apostacy, since from one sin the whole race has been corrupted vv. 6, 7. 2. It shows the possibility of redemption. Only One, Christ, can raise us from our fall ver. 7. 3. It is a general demand to walk in newness of life, in order to become fit for eternal life through sanctification (ver. 8). HEUBNER.

F. W. BESSER:—We, too, have a Paschal Lamb. It was a gift from God. What has God from us in return? We have the true Paschal Lamb. God requires of us the true Easter-cake. What vile ingratitude, if we are disobedient! (ver. 7). Daily would we celebrate Easter in spirit, provided we daily acknowledge, enjoy and praise our Paschal Lamb, 'who was slain for us once for all' (Heb. x. 10). "The time of the N. T. is a perpetual festival period," says Augustine. God's word exhorts you to purge out the old leaven, and if you refuse, you make your natural sourness altogether sourer through the vinegar and the gall of your opposition; weakness turns to stiff-neckedness and malice, and indolence, to spite and wickedness. But if, on the contrary, our old leaven is sweetened—if we admit the purifying influence of the Spirit, then instead of wicked resistance we show honest repentance; instead of cherishing malice, we accept the truth in love. In the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth we celebrate our Easter by allowing ourselves to be reproved by the light (Eph. v. 13), and by giving honor to the truth.

[F. W. ROBERTSON:—'Ye are unleavened.' Here is the true conception of the Church: regenerated humanity—new life without the leaven of old evil. The Church visible and invisible, however, to be distinguished; the former composed of the men who in this age or that profess Christ, the latter such as every Church is only potentially and conceivably, according to its idea. For want of keeping these distinct, two grand errors arise: 1. Undue severity towards the lapsed. 2. Wrong purism in the matter of association with the world, its people, its business, its amusements. Under, 1. The attempt to make the Church entirely pure must ever fail. Only as a Church visible she must separate from her all visible evil; she must sever from herself all such foreign elements as bear unmistakable marks of their alien birth. Her purity must be visible purity, not ideal; representative, not perfect. Under, 2. We are not to go out of the world, but only to take care, in associating with sinners, not to recognize them as brothers, or as fulfilling in any degree the Christian idea].

XI.—A LACK OF PROPER CHURCH SPIRIT IN THE MANAGEMENT OF THE CIVIL RELATIONS OF THE CHURCH-MEMBERS AMONG THEMSELVES. LITIGATION BEFORE HEATHEN TRIBUNALS.

CHAPTER VI. 1-11.

Dare any of you, having a matter against another, go to the law before the unjust, 2 and not before the saints? Do [Or¹ do] ye not know that the saints shall judge the world? and if the world shall be judged by you, are ye unworthy to judge the 3 smallest matters? Know ye not that we shall judge angels? how much more [to say 4 nothing of] things that pertain to this life? If then ye have judgments of things 5 pertaining to this life, set them to judge who are least esteemed in the church. I speak² to your shame. Is³ it so, that there is not a wise man among you? no, not 6 one⁴ that shall be able to judge between his brethren? But brother goeth to law with 7 brother, and that before the unbelievers. Now therefore there is utterly a fault among you, [a loss to you⁵] because ye go to law one with another. Why do ye not 8 rather take wrong? Why do ye not rather suffer yourselves to be defrauded? Nay, 9 [On the contrary, ἀλλὰ] ye do wrong, and defraud, and that⁶ your brethren. [Or ἤ] Know ye not that the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God? Be not 10 deceived: neither fornicators, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor effeminate, nor 11 abusers of themselves with mankind. Nor thieves, nor covetous,⁸ nor [not, οὐ]⁹ drunkards, nor revilers, nor extortioners, shall¹⁰ inherit the kingdom of God. And such were some of you: but ye are washed, but ye are sanctified, but ye are justified in the name of the Lord Jesus,¹¹ and by the Spirit of our God.

⁶ Ver. 8.—The Rec. has ταῦτα, which is not by any means so well authorized as τοῦτο [which is found in A. B. C. D. Cod. Sin.] It was changed for the plural probably to conform to the two verbs preceding.

⁸ Ver. 10.—[The order of these two is reversed in D. L., a large number of the cursive MSS. and in the Greek fathers. πλεονέκται οὕτε κληνταί.]

⁹ Ver. 10.—The Rec. with Lach. has οὗτε [according to B. D.² L. But οὗ is found in A. C. Cod. Sin.] But the authorities for οὗτε have the same also before the following words. A. C. Cod. Sin. and the best critical edition, however, read οὗ there likewise.]

¹¹ Ver. 11.—The variations of ἡμῶν after κνρ. and of χριστοῦ after ἰσροῦ are undoubtedly insertions.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

["The connection of this paragraph with the preceding, seems to be, 'As we have nothing to do with judging the heathen, so we ought not to go to law before them, or suffer them to judge us.' This question was not new. It was held unlawful among the Jews for any Jew to bring a lawsuit against his countrymen before a Gentile judge, on the ground that in Ex. xxi. 1, it is commanded: 'These are the judgments which thou shalt set before'—not the Gentiles, but 'them—the Jews.' 'If any one brings the judgments of Israel before the Gentiles, he profanes the name of God, and honors the name of an idol. They who so do give occasion to the strangers to say, 'See how harmonious they are who worship one God.' This right of settling their own disputes, was conceded to them by the Romans; and hence the speech of Gallio to the Jews who attacked St. Paul. In the first beginning of Christianity, the same rule would be naturally held to apply. The existence of separate courts for the disputes of Christians among themselves, is implied [?] in this passage. The Apostolic Constitutions (II. 4, 5, 46, 47) and the Clementines, in language evidently founded upon this text, imply the existence of such courts at the time when those works were compiled, i. e., apparently about A. D. 150. When one of the parties was a heathen, then it was thought lawful to prosecute before a heathen tribunal.

Under these circumstances, it was natural that the same controversy, which in a mixed society of Jewish and Gentile Christians ran through so many other departments of human life, should be felt here also; and that the Gentile Christians should still wish to carry on their litigations in the same courts to which they had been previously accustomed, and to indulge the same litigious spirit which had characterized the Greek nation from the time of Aristophanes downward. But in whatever way this tendency originated, the Apostle [here] treats it altogether irrespectively of any Jewish or Gentile custom, and condemns it solely on the ground of the low views which it implied of the greatness of a Christian's privileges, and the closeness of the bond of Christian brotherhood." STANLEY.]

VERS. 1. Here also, as in chap. v., there is indicated a lack of true Christian spirit in the failure to maintain the honor of the Church. In the former case it arose from a want of moral earnestness, here from an earthly temper, and from stubbornness of opinion. The tone of address is sharp.—Dare any of you.—This is not ironical, as Schrader imagines; but it is the direct outburst of indignation at the unworthy conduct manifested [and also at the risk run]. "The injured majesty of Christians," says Bengel, "is here noted by a grand word." Τολμῆν, sustinere, to have the heart to do that from which a just sense of the Christian dignity should have restrained them. Here the culpable party must be regarded as consisting mainly of Gentile converts, since it was already a custom among the Jews to choose their own umpires—having a matter.—Πράγμα ἔχειν is a phrase denoting civil suits, especially in matters of money and possessions.—against another—of course, a fellow church-member—go to law,—κρίνεσθαι, to separate oneself, to part from, then to contend, to strive, also to debate, and that before a tribunal. "This love of litigation—a remnant of the old leaven which abounded among the traffickers of Corinth—must have derived abundant nourishment from the divisions existing in the Church." BESSER.—before—ἐπι, as in Acts xxiii. 30.—the unjust—τῶν ἀδίκων. These are the heathen. So in Matth. xxvi. 45, they are called ἀμαρτωλοὶ, sinners; while the Israelites, on the contrary, are termed δίκαιοι, just; Wisd. xviii. 20; xvi. 17; xi. 15. The designation 'unjust' is employed to bring out more prominently the absurdity [and the peril] of seeking for justice in such a quarter. It exhibits those to whom it is applied as devoid of that true righteousness which is found alone in God's kingdom, as withholding from God His due, and therefore as unqualified to administer justice among His people. On δύων (= οἱ ἑωυ chap. v. 12) comp. i. 2.—["Paul does not here condemn those who from necessity have a cause before unbelieving judges, as when a person is summoned to court; but those who of their own accord bring their brethren into this situation, and harass them, as it were, through means of unbelievers, while it is in their power to employ another remedy." CALVIN. "And besides the scandal of such a proceeding, as exposing their internal differences to the eyes of the heathen, there were certain formularies to be gone through in the heathen Law Courts, such as adjuration by heathen Deities, which would involve them in idolatrous practices." WORDS.]

VER. 2. He here goes on to show still further what an entire disregard of the true dignity of the Christian state was evinced in their conduct.—Or do ye not know.—The 'or' presents an alternative, suggesting some other cause for their conduct, viz., that of ignorance; and the interrogative form used intimates that it was a culpable ignorance of an indubitable and plain truth. ["This question," says Words., "occurs no less than ten times in this Epistle, and only twice in all the rest. It was a very fit mode of remonstrance with those who vaunted themselves most on their knowledge."]—that the saints shall judge the world?—"This is the only clear, direct enunciation we have of the truth here expressed, though it is in perfect harmony with conclusions elsewhere furnished." BURGER. The words imply more than an indirect participation in the judgment of the world, such as is brought to view in Matth. xii. 41, where it is said: "The men of Nineveh shall rise up in judgment against this generation," etc., viz., that in contrast with the conduct, or faith exhibited by them, the guilt of the world will be set forth in clearer light, [so Chrys. and most of the Greek fathers, Erasmus, Words.]. Nor is it meant that the saints will simply unite in assenting to the sentence pronounced by Christ as assessors on his judgment seat [Barnes, et al.]; nor that they in some general way will be glorified with Him, [Schleus., Heyden., Barnes.]. Still less do they refer to any future judicial functions, which saints are to possess in this world as its princes and rulers, [Lightfoot, Whitby]; nor to any peculiar ability to estimate the value of the world's opinions and doings, [Mosh. Rosen.] (ii. 15, comp. ver. 8). And least of all are they to be interpreters of the church as the perpetual judge of the world, in so far as it carries the light which ever separates the darkness of the world from itself. (Cath.). But they refer to that reigning with Christ which is elsewhere promised to the faithful, (Rom. viii. 17; 2 Tim. ii. 12), and serve to define more exactly the import of the expression: 'glorified with Him.' What was said especially of the Apostles, that they should "sit on twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel" (Matth. xix. 28), is here extended, in general, to all the true followers of Christ—His royal people, in relation to that portion of the race which shall persist in its opposition to the Gospel, viz., the world. In short, Paul here asserts the active participation by the saints in the judicial work of Christ, such as is ascribed to them in Dan. vii. 22: "Until the ancient of days came, and judgment was given to the saints of the Most High; and the time came that the saints possessed the kingdom." [The same prediction reappears again in the Apoecryphal Book, Wisdom III. 8: "They (the righteous) shall judge the nations, and have dominion over the people, and their Lord shall reign forever"]; also Rev. ii. 26, 27; xx. 4-6. That this is the element in their glory which the Apostle alludes to, the context clearly shows. [Such is the interpretation also of Calvin, Beza, Alf., Stanley, and others. And it is plainly the only tenable one. The others are either too far fetched, or imply a more general acquaintance with the New Testament, in its present form, than could have been possible for the Corinthians; and we cannot suppose that the Apostle would be likely to consider their ignorance of the matters suggested a fit ground for rebuke. But the prophecy of Daniel was in their hands; and the anticipations of the final triumph and glory of the righteous during the reign of the Messiah, were current among believers; and the ignoring or over-looking of these matters might well have been reproved. In fact the final and complete supremacy of Christ's kingdom was already assured in the very character of its head, and the former could not be disavowed without offence done to the latter. As to the character of the functions which the saints were to fulfil, opinions will vary according to the views adopted in respect to the nature of the millennial glory, and of the relation which the church will sustain to the world at that time. But whatever these functions may be, the language which describes them plainly implies the exercise of an active supremacy in the affairs of the world. That which saints are expected to do then, must, in some way, be analogous to the duties which the Apostle urges upon the church-members to discharge for themselves in the present age. For this reason the view of Hodge and Barnes and others, who suppose a reference in the text "to the future and final judgment" (with a somewhat uncertain allusion to Dan. vii. 22, as though the event pointed to here were the same as the other), must be set aside. On that occasion the saints appear only as the retinue of the Judge, and are nowhere represented as taking an active part in the trial. The idea of Barnes that the saints are to judge the world by simply 'encompassing the throne,' and 'assenting to Christ's judgment,' and occupying "a post of honor as if they were associated with him in judgment," hardly suits the style of the Apostle's reasoning]. The natural conclusion from all this, viz., that persons destined to so lofty an office, ought also to be deemed worthy of passing judgment on the trifling matters of this life, is put in the form of a question, expressive of astonishment. This, as is often the case, is introduced with an 'and.' The question, however, is not thereby made dependent on the previous one, 'Know ye not?' but it stands by itself.—And if among you the world is to be judged.—The judges are here conceived of as constituting one vast assembly, in the midst of which the adjudication proceeds. The ἐν ὑμῖν is not precisely equivalent to: 'through you,' as in Acts xvii. 31; nor to: ὑπὸ ὑμῶν, by you, though the sense is about the same; nor: 'in you,' i. e., by your example; but properly: in the midst of you, and so; before you: (coram). [WINER § XL. VIII., etc. "Hence," says MEYER, "it is evident that the saints themselves are to be the judges sitting in judgment. And ἐν is employed in view of the following κρίτην, since the Christians judging therein, are conceived of as one judicial concourse, for the sake of representing the idea more vividly"]. The εἰ, ἴf, in εἰ κρινέται, as the context shows, is not meant to exhibit the judgment as at all problematical, but only states it as indubitably presupposed in what follows. The notion of futurity here retires into the background.—Are ye unworthy of the smallest judgments?—Κριτήρια is a word used to denote both places or courts of trials, and also the trials themselves which are there held. Here it means the latter, and the whole clause is to be taken in an active sense, q. d., are ye unworthy of holding trial in the smallest matters? [Many, like de Wette, Olsh., Hodge, Words., understand by κρίτηρα, the matters in trial, as better suited to the context, ver. 4, 7, but Meyer says that this is contrary to all usage]. The adjective here (ἐλαχίστων) refers to the matters brought to trial, and which are here designated as of the most trifling sort, having to do simply with the earthly 'mine and thine,' Luke xvi. 10.

VER. 8. Know ye not that we shall judge angels? to say nothing of things that pertain to this life?—[A still wider contrast.] But are there here two questions, or only one? or are we to take the second clause as a corollary? Since μήτις in the first instance means, not at all (Passow III. p. 230. [Rob. Gr. Lex.]), and then: yet much less, it would seem to indicate that there is also a second question here. The sense then would be: 'Our judicial power, as ye ought to know, extends even beyond, even unto celestial beings; should it not then be now first applied to terrestrial matters?' i. e., how much more now ought it to be applied to these?—In respect to the fact first alluded to, 'the judging of angels', we must at the outset put aside every explanation, which makes the phrase expressive of something inferior to the work of judging the world, instead of something which is an advance upon it—whether this be done by taking 'angels' to mean church officers, or priests, or teachers distinguished for devilish cunning; and by supposing the judgment spoken of to be of a spiritual kind, as relating to the errors of these parties, or to be even a mere ability to judge, (Gal. i. 8). The only point in doubt is, whether angels in general are referred to, or merely good angels, or merely bad ones. BÉSSÉGE says: 'both classes; to the damnation of the bad, but on the good, to pronounce a judgment of blessing, since they will be united with us under one Head in Christ'. (Eph. i. 10). Since, however, the idea that good angels are meant, finds support only in that relation which they sustain to believers, hinted at in Heb. i. 14, and in the hypothetical expression found in Gal. i. 8, and inasmuch as good angels are represented as furnishing a part of Christ's retinue in judgment, and as acting the part of organs and witnesses of His judicial work, (Matt. xiii. 39, xvi. 27, xxiv. 81, xxv. 81, 2 Thess. i. 7, Rev. xx. 1 ff.), we are constrained to adopt the explanation, which supposes evil angels to be referred to, as the only correct one. [So Chrys. and most of the Greek fathers, and Calvin and Beza, and Bengel, Poole, and most of commentators. Whitby, with the same reference understands the judgment to denote that expulsion of the devils from their dominion over the world by the power of the Gospel, of which our Saviour speaks in John xii. 81, and xvi. 11. On the contrary, Meyer, Alf. and Hodge, following the usage of the N. T., where the word αγγελοι, without any qualifying epithet always means good angels, interpret it so here. But they do not profess to explain how these are to be judged, or they give to the word, 'judge', a very comprehensive meaning, implying only superiority of a general sort. Billr., de Wette, Stanley, leave the matter undecided. See Pool and Whitby.] At the same time it must be said that the unqualified term 'angels' indicates the superhuman nature of the beings contemplated, and puts them in contrast with the world; [and 'the argument will be not less conclusive in this way.' CALVIN;] while the position they are in, so analogous to that of the world, marks them as standing in an abnormal relation to God, and implies that the judgment spoken of will be one of condemnation, the same as in ver. 2, and not one that merely decides upon honors and rewards.—βυστικά = things serviceable for this life (Luke viii. 43), which belong to bodily sustenance, and are therefore of an earthly, temporal sort, as is every thing which forms a ground for suits respecting property, debts or inheritance. [“The Latin translation of this word by secularia, is probably one of the first instances of the use of that word, in its modern sense of 'worldly' as opposed to spiritual, instead of its ancient sense, 'belonging to a cycle of a hundred years'; and from this has sprung the signification of the word 'secular' in modern European languages”. STANLEY].

VER. 4. Secular trials indeed then would ye have.—[βυστικά is repeated with emphasis, and so stands first, and] κρίτηρα is to be construed as in ver. 2, not as equivalent to πράγματα, matters to be judged, for this rendering is void of support. ἔχειν might denote in this connection: to have on hand; or, to have a just comprehension of; consequently: to be in a condition to manage (as in the phrases, ἔχειν ἐπιστήμην, ῥέχνα, τὴν ἰατρικὴν, etc.), and this would fit well with what precedes. The μέν, introducing a clause correlative to the one following, might remain untranslated, and οὐν be rendered by, then, accordingly, or by some word of transition, which would indicate that the point mentioned has been established, and that the clause where it occurs also stands in inward connection with some previous expression. Properly: 'Have ye then indeed such trials? but ye by no means proceed in a manner suitable to this fact!' This thought would then be expressed by a protasis and apodosis, of which the latter is to be regarded as a question of astonishment at such procedure. An interrogation similar to this we have in Jno. x. 36 (comp. ver. 35), "how happens it that ye do this?" But such an explanation would necessitate our taking ἐάν as equivalent to εἰ, which could only be justified on the score of the laxity of the later Greek in this respect, and provided another interpretation were inadmissible. But we may interpret the ἐάν κρίτηρα ἔχητε, of the actual existence of such trials among them; in which case ἐάν would mean, if, in case that, and we should interpret the clause thus: 'if now it should happen that trials, involving secular matters, are held among you,—those despised in the church these do ye set up?—i. e. as judges. By 'the despised,' he means the unjust or the unbelievers, before spoken of, who, as such, pass for nothing in the Church, and enjoy no confidence or authority there. [“This translation,” Hodge says, “is generally preferred as best in keeping with the context,” and Wordsworth adopts it also. See, however, the note below]. But if any do not choose to construe it as a question of astonishment, it may be taken as a simple affirmation, stating once more what was actually occurring among them. [“So in the main, Luther, Calvin, Rückert, Olsh., de Wette, Neander, and others]. The οὐν would then be an ecclastic particle. Yet the form of the question would in any case, be the more emphatic. The use of καθίζετε is also a remarkable way of expressing an appeal to heathen judges on the part of Christians, for it implies that such judges were formally set up in office by the Christians themselves, when they could have had no hand in their appointment, and only seemed to do so by appealing to them for decision in cases over which they ought to have no adjudication.—Τούτους, these, an emphatic repetition of the persons alluded to [involving also contempt]. Others, objecting partly to the use of καθίζεν in relation to heathen authorities, who are supposed to be already existing, and partly to the application of τοὺς ἐξουθενημένους to the heathen as unsuitable [and inconsistent with the respect which Paul inculcates toward heathen magistrates], understand the latter to denote church members, and construe the whole in the Imp. as an injunction [of rather an ironical sort]: 'If you must have trials, those least esteemed in the Church, these set up rather as judges.' But in such a case the text ought to read: τοὺς ἐν τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ ἐξουθεν., and the word 'rather,' would be an arbitrary insertion. This insertion would, however, be necessary, if we understood the Apostle to mean such persons as might be suitable for the office in question, but who, for some reason, were of little repute. But, however this may be, still our first interpretation is favored by what follows.*

VERS. 5, 6.—To your shame I speak.—Comp. on iv. 14. The expression applies, as in xv. 34, to what precedes; and what follows, in part, explains more fully how far that spoken of in ver. 4 is disgraceful to them, and, in part, repeats emphatically the case as it stood.—So is there not among you not even one wise man.—The οὐτως is either climacteric, meaning: 'so completely are ye wanting in wise men,' which rendering does not well suit a strong negation [but is adopted by Chrys., Luther, Billr., Calvin, Alf., Olsh., Rückert]; or it is: 'in this way,' 'under these circumstances,' referring back to ver. 4: 'seeing that ye set up those persons despised in the Church for judges.' [So Meyer. The rendering here must be determined by the view taken of the import of ver. 4. If that last advocated be the correct one, it would be more natural to understand οὐτως in the former sense. King James' translation places the stress of the interrogation here, deviating in this respect from the previous versions which translate it, "utterly," "at all," and supposes an ellipsis: "Is it so that there is not?"] 'Εν is for ἐνεντι, an adverbial use of the ἐν without the copula—'is there,' 'does there exist.'—Οὐ δὲ—εἰς, a strong expression, like non ullus, nemo unus, 'not even one.' Considering how wise they were in their own conceit, the question here is a very cutting one. At the same time it suggests a strong reason for their altering their conduct. By it he would urge them to the practical exercise of their vaunted wisdom—a matter in which they sadly failed. Σοφός, skilful, expert in resources, experienced, discreet.—who shall be able—i. e., when a cause comes up—to decide. διακρίνα—to arbitrate in a formal manner—between his brother, ἀνδρέσον τοῦ ἀδελφοῦ αὐτοῦ,—a wise expression, where a person understanding himself to be meant, supplies in thought: 'and a brother.' Meyer regards the party distinctly mentioned as the complainant (the defendant he understood as a matter of course, who is specified by way of distinction, as the party in fault). Had the plural been used, the two litigants would then have been equally brought to view. In the use of the term 'brother,' a rebuke is intended which is still further enlarged upon—but brother goeth to law with brother.—This is not a question, whether considered independently, or as continuing the previous one; but it is an affirmation full of severe reproof. ["Ἀλλὰ, after a question, passes rapidly on to the other alternative, the particle, which negatives the question being suppressed, q. d., 'nay; but.'"] ALF. Κρίνεται, goeth to law, stands opposed to διακρίνεται, to arbitrate. Then, by way of contrast with the "wise man among you," before whom they ought to have settled their difficulties, we have the sad opposite:—and that before unbelievers.—["and that," a form of expression used when particular stress is to be laid on the circumstance indicated."] HODGE].

VERS. 7, 8. Looking away now from the point last mentioned, i. e., going to law before unbelievers, he here passes to rebuke the entire practice of litigation among Christians as in itself wrong.—indeed therefore—ἡδὴ μὲν οὐν. The μὲν gives a peculiar prominence to the point to be mentioned as being the worst of all; οὐν is simply transitional and conjunctive; but ἡδὴ (see Passow II. 1326 ff.) is a determinative particle, which serves, in part, to strengthen the whole clause, and, in part, to call particular attention to certain thoughts about to be presented.—it is in any case a loss for you.—Ὀζος, presents the aspect of the case generally, without reference to any peculiar, aggravating circumstances, such as going to law "before unbelievers." [Stanley renders it: "certainly"] Ἡττημα, lit.: a falling short; it is used, partly, of failings and imperfections (hence the var. ἐν ὑμῖν), and, partly, of injuries, or damage, whether it be in an ethical sense, as caused by the outbreak of sin and the violence of passion (comp. ἡττάσθαι, 2 Pet. ii. 20; νικάσθαι, Rom. xii. 21), or as some evil consequence upon these outbreaks, such as hinderance to our salvation, and to our participation in God's kingdom. It is here undoubtedly the latter, and points to what is more fully stated in ver. 9. This is undoubtedly the more correct interpretation, and it forms an implied contrast to any supposed temporal advantage they might gain by any legal process. [So Meyer, de Wette, Words., Alf., Hodge. But Calvin, Beng., Billr., Stanley, Rückert, Olsh., all prefer the meaning: 'fault,' 'imperfection,' 'weakness.' And there is strong ground for their interpretation]. Neander: "A backsliding of the Church, and sinking down from the high standard of pure Christian feeling." ἐμὴν, Dative of interest—that ye have lawsuits with yourselves. — Κρίμα elsewhere means, judicial decision, sentence, also judgment. With this rendering the sense would be: 'that it comes to this, that ye have legal decisions,' etc. The same sense substantially is obtained if we adopt the meaning which attaches to κρίνεσθαι, and which does not elsewhere appear, viz.: lawsuits. [So Rob. Lex. sub. voce; but Alf. says: 'matters of dispute'. Μεθ' ἐαυτῶν: 'with yourselves;' more expressive than ἀλλήλων: one another. [It suggests the unity of the Christian body, so in contrast with the segregated condition of the world].—How Christians ought to conduct themselves in cases affecting the 'mine and thine,' he states in the more striking form of a question.—Why do ye not rather take injustice? Why do ye not rather suffer yourselves to be defrauded?—The verbs ἀδικεῖσθε—ἀποστερεῖσθε are both middle and to be rendered as above. They imply the suffering of a 'loss.' It is one, however, only in appearance, being a victory in fact (Osi.). Comp. Matth. v. 39 ff. What follows may be taken as a strong assertion, or as a question, which either stands independently, or is depending still on 'why,' since the question 'or do you not know,' of ver. 9, has also its logical relations in the 'why' (so Meyer, ed. 2). But the former construction, which makes the sentence direct and independent, would be more expressive, and it is supported by καὶ τοῦτο ἀδελφοί. The ἀλλὰ then will have its proper force.—But ye (ὅτι, emphatic, ye Christians) do injustice and defraud—[the same verbs as in the previous clause, but active transitive] and that brethren.—[This passage is remarkable as being founded on the spirit of Matth. v. 40.] STANLEY. [On the nature of ecclesiastical jurisdiction maintained by the early Church in secular affairs, its relation to that of the State, and the evils resulting from it, see NEANDER'S Church History, Vol. II., p. 189 ff., Torrey's Translation].

[* Yet the interpretation which Kling sets aside appears in all the six earlier English versions. WICKLIFF: "Ordeyne ye the contemptible men that ben in the chirche to deme." TYNDALE: "Take them which are despised in the congregation, and make them judges." CRAMMER, the same. GENEVA: "Them which are least esteemed in the Church, them I say set in judgment." RHIMS: "The contemptible in the Church set them to judge." In like manner the Ree version. Conant adopts it also. So, too, Syr. Vulg., most of the Greek Fathers, Calvin, Beza, Bengel, Hammond, Stanley, Alford. And certainly this interpretation is one which most readily suggests itself, being most in accordance with the tone of the Apostle's expostulation, full of lofty irony, and with the order of the words with the designations used, and with the use of ταῦτ with the subj. (see Kühner, § 339, 2 H. b.) and with the natural sense of καθίζετε: set up. What Paul means to say is: that if they would have trials over such trivial matters (a thing which he supposes they would have, even though they ought not), they ought to set up judges accordingly, not those of highest character, whose destiny was hereafter to judge angels, but persons who were comparatively of no account. This would be dealing with their litigious spirit as it deserved. And if we consider the complaints of Augustine, which Calvin alludes to, in consequence of the necessity he was under of devoting so large a portion of his precious time to secular affairs, we should see what reason the Apostle had for advising that the Corinthians should choose those "least esteemed" for this business].

VERS. 9, 10. Or know ye not.—The question presupposes a self-evident answer respecting the conduct spoken of. 'Such proceedings should not have been allowed by you, a people whose hope takes hold on God's kingdom, and who profess to be the children, and so the heirs of the Most High. "Or," etc., i. e., your conduct can only be explained on the supposition of such ignorance.'—that the unjust God's kingdom shall not inherit?—Here (ἀδικοὶ) the idea involved in ἀδικεῖν, to do injustice, must be kept in view, yet looking away from the point wherein they as members of the Church were especially guilty. The 'unjust' ("a term used of the heathen in ver. 1, and here designedly brought in for the purpose of putting all who were unjust on a par with the heathen" NEANDER) are properly those among whom the practice of injustice has become habitual, who persist in wrong without repenting.—But here the word denotes the immoral generally, those who offend God and man by iniquities of every kind, such as are specified in the following context.—In reference to 'God's kingdom,' see on iv. 20. Considered in its perfection, as the object of Christian hope, the kingdom of God is the blessed state, wherein the will of a holy, loving, all-restoring, beatific God is fully realized; or, in other words, a condition wherein men and angels are unitedly and perfectly controlled by the Divine will, lead a life of righteousness and peace, and together with this, possess the highest good which it is desirable for men to participate in. And this participation is expressed by the word 'inherit' (κληρονομεῖν). It is something that properly belongs to the believer as a child of God (Rom. viii. 17; Gal. iv. 7), and involves a gracious right and an enduring possession. The expression, meaning literally, to obtain by lot, and then, to receive as an inheritance, belongs to the language of the Theocracy, and is used in the Old Testament to denote the entrance into the promised land, and into the society of those who are governed by the will of God. And this was but the type or shadow (σκία) of the kingdom of God that was to be set up on a renovated earth (2 Pet. iii. 13; Matth. v. 5). (That the verb takes after it the Accusative instead of the Genitive, belongs to the later Hellenic usage). The 'not inheriting,' implying an exclusion from the possession of the highest good, explains what is meant by κατακρίνεσθαι and ἀπώλλυσθαι.—That all conduct, which contravenes the justice of God, or the ordering of holy love, should cause a forfeiture of this inheritance, lies in the very nature of the case. In the Corinthian Church, however, there appear to have been some light-minded people who sought to persuade themselves and others that God did not mean exactly what he said, that this inheritance could never be withheld from any who had joined the Church. ["Such a divorce of morality from religion has been manifested in all ages, and under all forms of religion. The pagan, the Jew, the Mohammedan, the nominal Christian, have all been exact in the performance of religious services, while unrestrained in the indulgence of every evil passion. This arises from looking on religion as an outward service, and God as a being to be feared and propitiated, not loved and served." HODGE]. Against all such false conceptions and vain words (Eph. v. 6), Paul here warns the Church with his oft-recurring—Be not deceived (xv. 33; Gal. vi. 7, etc.).—To this he appends a full catalogue of such immoralities as exclude from God's kingdom:—neither fornicators.—This indicates the vice prevalent in Corinth, and points back to chap. v. To this he annexes, that wherewith fornication was closely connected in Heathendom, and which when practised by God's people, was termed both 'fornication' and 'adultery':—nor idolaters.—Then comes that inordinate indulgence of the sexual passion which violated alike the Divine ordinance of marriage, and the rights of the married parties:—nor adulterers.—The series of this class ends with the mention of that unnatural gratification of lust indicated in the words:—nor effeminate, nor Sodomites.—These express correlative ideas. The former denotes those who allowed themselves to be used as women (qui muliebria patiuntur); the latter, such as used the former in this unnatural way—a wide-spread vice in that period (comp. Wetstein on this passage, and on Rom. i. 27). Next follow classes of the 'unjust,' in the more restricted sense, such as violently seized upon others' possessions, or more indirectly sought for them:—nor thieves, nor covetous.—(comp. on v. 10 ff.).—In like manner in regard to the following—nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor extortioners.—The enumeration is not strictly logical, since those last mentioned would naturally come in after the 'covetous.' But drunkards and revilers naturally go together, since the vice of the latter commonly results from that of the former. After asserting solemnly that such—shall not inherit the kingdom of God.—he goes on to remind the Corinthians that for them these trials belonged to the past, and that indulgence in such vices was for them a backsliding into their old heathenish state, which utterly contradicted their high Christian experience.

V. 11. And these things some (of you) were.—The neuter ταῦτα carries a contemptuous implication, q. d., 'such a set,' 'such stuff' (Meyer). Τινες: some, not all. What otherwise would be a too sweeping and severe imputation is thus limited in its application and softened in tone. [Calvin and Hodge regard the τινές as redundant or as distributive, q. d., some were one thing and some another]. The simple ἦτε, or ἦτε ἦτε, would imply too much, since all the Corinthian converts, without exception, had not been addicted to either one or all the immoralities specified; yet, on the other hand, τινὲς ὑμῶν ἦτε would have implied too little. "It would bring the whole body prominently to notice, and intimate that only a part would agree with the description." OSIANDER. The change which, however, had passed over them, is indicated by three expressions introduced with the emphatic repetition of 'but,' designed to set forth the contrast more strongly.—But ye were washed clean.—ἀπελούσασθε.—[ἀπό; off, all off, clean, intensive. This refers to their joining the Church in baptism. Comp. Titus iii. 5. In like manner Acts xxii. 16, where the verb is aor. mid., and signifies, baptize thyself, or, cause thyself to be baptized, not, 'be baptized,' as though it were passive. And so the verb here is middle, and must be taken in a reflexive sense, though it is difficult to translate it thus in English]. The term 'wash,' points to the defilement incurred by the sins before spoken of, and to the purification effected through the forgiveness obtained in baptism, or the removal of guilt then pledged (Acts xxii. 16). It is analogous to καθάρσις

(Eph. v. 26). The moral purification, by the doing away of all that is sinful (Rückert), we cannot therefore take to be here meant: although repentance and faith are presupposed in baptism. In this washing of baptism, however, the cleansing through the blood of Christ (Rev. i. 6; 1 Jno. i. 7) must be considered as included.—Ye sanctified yourselves, ἡγιασάσθε ἑαυτοὺς.—This, too, is middle. It cannot therefore be supposed to denote the inward, progressive sanctification accomplished by the Spirit; but, as in i. 2, the act of personal consecration to God, of separation from the world and translation into fellowship with God; yet this, not putatively, nor externally merely, but as involving also some operation of the Divine Spirit on the heart (comp. Titus iii. 5; 1 Pet. i. 2).—Ye were justified, ἐδικαιώσθε ἑαυτοὺς.—This, in accordance with the usage of Paul and of the Bible generally, is to be construed, not after Augustine and the Council of Trent, as if it meant: 'made righteous' inwardly. This is contradicted by the aorist tense of the verb. But it implies an introduction into the state of the 'just,' admission to a participation in the salvation of God—to a place in His kingdom and a share in His blessings. This exhibits the positive side of God's salvation (the removal of guilt being the negative side), and is the result of consecration to God. Hence it fitly concludes the series. All three taken together denote an entrance into the state of grace ["and refer to the first conversion." STANLEY. The view given by Kling is substantially that of Calvin, Hodge, Alf., Words. But the words also carry a further implication in the way of contrast. 'Having become thus, ye are not to defile and pollute yourselves afresh and incur renewed condemnation'].—in the name of the Lord Jesus and in the Spirit of our God.—These qualifying phrases are by some referred to all three of the foregoing verbs, and by others to the last alone. Others still make a division, referring the words, 'in the name' to 'justified,' or to this and 'washed;' but the words, 'in the Spirit' to 'sanctified.' These attempts are a failure; although it is indeed true that the 'washing' and the 'justification' are grounded upon the name of Christ. Even as, on the other hand, sanctification comes through the Spirit. Again the reference of these phrases to all three of the verbs appears to be opposed by the separation of the verbs effected by 'but,' as well as by the unsuitableness of connecting the fact of the washing with the Spirit, since according to the rule (to which Acts iv. 7 is no exception) the reception of the Spirit is consequent on baptism (Meyer). But the first reason given cannot be decisive; and so far as the second goes, we find that in Titus iii. 5, the 'renewal of the spirit' is connected directly with baptism, as exegetical of παλιγγενεσίας. And as the phrase 'in the name of Christ,' indicates the objective ground on which the washing rests, so does the phrase, 'in the Spirit,' indicate the subjective ground of the same, that is, the principle which inwardly imparts and applies the absolution implied in the washing. On the name of Christ comp. on i. 2. The entire personality of Jesus, so far as it is made known to us in the work of redemption and indicated in the name, is the objective ground both of the pardon granted in baptism and of our justification and sanctification, according to the sense of the terms above given. But the Spirit of God applies to each individual what is offered to us in that name. He brings it directly to our consciousness, insures and imparts it to us, and enables us to realize it all within our own hearts. ["By the ἡμῶν: our, added to 'God,' he binds the Corinthians and himself together in the glorious blessings of the Gospel state, and mingles the oil of joy with the mourning which by his reproof he is reluctantly creating." Al-road].

[Obs. This whole passage vi. 1-9, is memorable as laying the foundation for that ecclesiastical jurisdiction in civil affairs which in the lapse of centuries grew to such mighty proportions as to overshadow for a time the temporal sovereignty, and even threaten to subjugate it altogether. There are traces of the existence of church-courts for civil causes among Christians as early as the middle of the second century, and in the Apost. Const., II., 47, the rule for the regulation of their proceedings is laid down. Ordinarily, however, the bishop became the referee in such disputes, and his office as umpire contributed largely to the increase of his importance and authority, and also greatly endangered his spirituality. When the State became Christian, this jurisdiction was conferred by law, and made binding on all parties that appealed to it. The custom once established, gradually extended itself with the increase of ecclesiastical pretensions, and the decay of secular power, until the Church assumed the form of a political association, with a well defined system of ecclesiastical polity that divided the control with the State both over the laity and the clergy, even in temporal matters, and aimed steadily at exempting the latter in particular from all amenability to the State. The history of this wonderful and yet perverse development of authority from the positions laid down in the text, furnishes a most instructive commentary on its meaning, and shows us the necessity of correctly interpreting it.

The limitations by which the precept is beset are as follows: 1. The litigants must be both church-members. Redress from wrongs inflicted from without may be sought at civil tribunals when public justice seems to require it—Paul, c. s., appealed to Cæsar. 2. The causes, comparatively trivial, the minor matters of property, for example, in relation to which it were better that covetousness be mortified by quietly enduring the wrong, than indulged by the enforcement of rights. 3. The tribunals, heathen, or of a heathenish kind. The case may be altered when the judges are Christians. Yet even under such circumstances litigation between "brethren" ought, if possible, to be avoided. 4. The nature of the adjudication, informal—that of umpires chosen for the purpose by the contestants, and not of regular church courts. Paul's aim was to preserve the peace and spirituality of the Church by the avoidance of litigation, not to convert the Church into an arena for conflicts, and thus to secularize it. The Church was never constituted to be "a ruler and a divider" among men. 5. The evil condemned is not the practice of going to law, as though this were wrong in itself, for the magistrate, too, is a "member of God for good," but the litigious spirit so contrary to the Christian temper. There are instances when it would be a manifest sin not to seek justice. But in doing so, a Christian should take care to show that he was actuated, not by feelings of revenge, but by a supreme regard to law and order, and by a desire that even the wrong-doer may be reconciled to Him.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. [The judicial function of the Saints in the age to come]. Those are mighty words, "the saints shall judge the world," "we shall judge angels." Through them we catch a glimpse into the mysteries of the Heavenly kingdom, especially into the fundamental mystery of the creating and judging Word, and into the vital fellowship which believers have with their Lord, likewise also into the mystery of the future, when the inward life of the saints, which is now hid with Christ in glory, will be made manifest as a life of Divine power and holiness. Those of whom Christ said, "I in them and they in me," of whom it is grandly sung,

"Devoid of strength they are guardians for all; Poor, yet they win, let the worst befall,"— who here on earth have shared with their Redeemer in His sufferings and shame, these very ones will share with Him hereafter in the manifestations of His glory. "When Christ, who is their life, shall appear, exhibiting Himself as He really is, then will they also appear with Him as gods of earth, to the astonishment of the world. They will reign and flourish eternally, shining as stars in the firmament of God."

But by virtue of this union with Christ in glory, they become partners also in His judicial authority. Having been exempted from judgment through faith in their Lord, they will join with Him in executing judgment over all, whether men or angels, who amid the exhibitions of Divine love and wisdom and power and righteousness have continued hostile to God's truth, disregarding of His grace, contemptuous toward His salvation, and opposed to all the ways of His kingdom—hardening themselves evermore in their enmity, until past hope. And this judgment will be an act both of deepest insight,—piercing through to the very centre of the heart, and detecting there the inexcusableness of sin, and of highest moral power—exhibiting a righteousness full of decision and vigor—allowing of no further protests—exposing the fallacy of excuses, and annihilating them all as false and untenable through the might of an all-enlightening truth.

And this power to discern and judge at that period, is a living principle imparted to Christians now, through the indwelling life of Christ, and it unfolds itself onward unto perfection with the growth of their spiritual life, until it reaches its highest state of exercise in the future kingdom of glory. There is always implied in it a demonstration of the mind of Christ, as well in that pitying love which goes out after the lost, tracks them in their wanderings, and wisely and patiently applies the means of their restoration, as in that holiness which should keep them from all fellowship with sin, consecrate them entirely to God, and maintain them in the obedience of faith amid manifold temptations from within and from without, in joy and sorrow, in honor and dishonor, in abundance and want, in health and sickness, even unto death; so that, as the instruments of Christ's truth and love, they shall have done what they could towards awakening, convincing and converting those who still walk in darkness—thus proving themselves fit and warranted to act the part of judges with their Lord at the last.

But as their authority is also to be exercised over the world of spirits, these too must in some way be regarded as coming under this saving influence. For is not the blood of Christ's cross said to be God's means for reconciling all things unto Himself, whether they be things in earth or things in heaven? (Col. i. 20). And is not the manifold wisdom of God to be proclaimed by means of the Church, even unto principalities and powers in heavenly places? (Eph. iii. 10). Shall we then mistake if we imagine that even in the extra mundane sphere there are also fallen beings, yet capable of salvation; and that into this sphere, whence came temptation and ruin unto our race, there shall in return go forth blessed agencies of deliverance from this very race, according to the wonderful council of God, and by virtue of the advent of His Son, through whom every thing above and beneath has been created? This is indeed an operation which, like that of the operation of this spirit-world upon us, comes not within the direct consciousness of believers; yet this fact does not militate against its reality, and like much that is now concealed, it will be made known to believers, as they enter upon their heavenly state. And if it be true, this circumstance will the more qualify believers for sitting in judgment over those bad spirits who obstinately close themselves against all such gracious influences, and scorn the salvation offered in Christ. These are conjectures indeed, and they might be carried out still further into the consideration of the particular duties in which the departed saints might engage in the other world. But it will not do to reject them as idle dreams, since they are in accordance with the analogy of Scripture, and are supported by the essential connection which exists between the judgment, and preventient efforts directed to the recovery of the fallen.

Since the judicial work of the saints is not simply a corroboration of the sentence pronounced by Christ, but also an active participation in the judgment carried on by Him, as the organs of His office, a training preparatory to this high function will naturally be required of them. To this there belongs—1, a learning to speak what is true and right, not only in public, but also in private stations, so that a readiness may be acquired in distinguishing between right and wrong, and there shall be no danger of being misled, either through the purlblindness of the foolish, or by the corrupt sophistries and wretched infatuation of the self-opinionated and dogmatic (analogous with Luke xvi. 10 ff.; xix. 17 ff.); 2, a calm, self-denying willingness to accept justice as set forth in the sentence rendered, whether it come from a judge or an umpire; for here the rule holds good, that obedience to authority is the best qualification for exercising authority; 3, the still loftier self-denial shown in a readiness to suffer wrong rather than to gain aught by going to law at the expense of love and unity. On the other hand, the habit of over-reaching and defrauding, originating in a spirit of selfish greed, as it disqualifies for admission into God's kingdom, so does it in an especial manner unfit a person to exercise judgment. And this is true also of every act which violates the rights either of God or man; for all such acts virtually disown and entirely neutralize that state of grace into which a person has been brought through the name of Christ and by the Spirit of God. The persons who practise them have washed and consecrated themselves, and been justified (in baptism) to no purpose.

[2. The natural condition of man, depraved and lost (vv. 9–11). When unchecked, the original sin of our constitution breaks out into the most flagrant vices and crimes, which reveal the inherent corruption. The most refined Pagan civilization has no power to restrain and cure it. Rather it serves to intensify the evil. The most demoralized society in the old world was to be found in the most refined of its cities. And the character, thus vitiated, forever excludes from a state of glory. It shall not inherit the kingdom of God. The strong negation here precludes all hope for such as possess it, and together with this puts the stamp of falsehood upon the figment of a universal salvation. No statement could be more explicit and conclusive].

[3. The change which fits the sinner for heaven is a radical one, wrought in Christ and through the Spirit, yet not independently of human volition. "Ye have washed yourselves clean, ye have sanctified yourselves, ye are justified." The filth of sin is voluntarily removed. From being his own, the person consecrates himself to God, and becomes forgiven and reconciled to God through faith in the work of Christ, and by the influence of the Spirit. Thus old things pass away, and all things become new, under the operation of Divine grace, and through the consent of the individual. There is, therefore, in renewal a voluntary assumption of the weightiest obligation to keep one's self unspotted from the world].

[Litigation on the part of Christians—1, involves great risk, and betokens a corresponding 'daring,' for it is a seeking for justice before the avowedly unjust, ver. 1^a; 2 is a repudiation of their proper society, and of the advantages its saintly character holds out, ver. 1^b; 3, is derogatory to the dignity of the litigants themselves, who are, by their profession, destined to be hereafter judges of the world and of angels, ver. 2, 8; 4, is an imputation upon the ability of their brethren to decide in the matters of lesser moment here, vv. 2, 5; 5, should be superseded by the selection of umpires in the Church, and the small matters it involves treated as they deserve, ver. 4; 6, is a disgrace to the Church and a cause of scandal, as it opens the faults of Christians to the observation and sneers of the world; 7, is contrary to the spirit of Christ, "who, when He was reviled, reviled not again, and when He suffered, threatened not, but committed Himself to Him that judgeth righteously," ver. 7; 8, implies wrong doing on the part of Christians, provoking litigation by their conduct towards each other, ver. 8; 9, those who by their offences provoke litigation are in danger of losing their inheritance in God's kingdom and becoming outcasts with the vicious of every class, vv. 9, 10; 10, the offences which cause it, and the spirit in which it is often done, are contrary to the change which believers profess to have passed through, ver. 11].

STARKE:—VER. 1. It is not in itself wrong to seek justice before earthly tribunals, since government, too, is a Divine ordinance, designed for protection and order; and Paul himself appealed to unbelieving magistrates against the persecution of the Jews (Acts xxii. 25; xxv. 10). But in all law-suits let every one take care wherefore, and before whom, and how he litigates. Otherwise his action may prove both a disgrace and a sin.—VER. 2. In the coming judgment of the saints there is great comfort for those who have lost a righteous cause. Let corrupt judges mark well. Against whatsoever righteous ones they have declared unrighteous judgment, by these will they be righteously judged at the last day.—VER. 3. To be associated with Christ in judgment is one of the loftiest honors promised to believers, 1 Pet. ii. 9; Rev. i. 5, 6; iii. 21. The dignity thus conferred should be displayed even in this life by the control which they maintain not only over themselves and the world, but also over the Devil, and so in their conquest over all their spiritual enemies. It should be shown also in the way they judge and condemn the world in and through their life and doctrine.—VER. 4. Those who know and enjoy God ought to be held in higher esteem, and deemed more worthy of confidence, than those in whom such knowledge is wanting.—VER. 6. Earthly goods are the means of separating the most united, heavenly goods can unite the most hostile.—VER. 7. Christians ought to hold temporal possessions of such small account that the prime question with them should not be whether they have, or have not; and they should be so affectionate toward each other, that in case of dissension about "the mine and thine" the temporal good should seem so small and the brother so important, that ere they would disquiet their spirits by litigation, and unfit themselves for religious duties, and cause offence to their neighbors, they would let the whole thing go and suffer the loss.—VER. 8. (Hed.). If an intelligent person is guilty of the wrong, then he commits the greater sin in putting the innocent person to so much cost and trouble with his lies; if the wrong-doer is ignorant, then it is not right, 1, to pursue the most stringent course with him and practise no forbearance; 2, to go to law in envious, avaricious, or ugly temper; 3, besides, the thing does not pay.—Vv. 9, 10. Those who needlessly go to law are classed with thieves and licentious persons, etc., and incur a like condemnation. The world evidently judges very different from the Holy Spirit. Nothing is more common than to excuse sin because of its commonness.

If all on this catalogue are lost, you can count the saved, almost all. Ye unrighteous litigants, fornicators, small and great thieves, sly and open thieves, be alarmed!—VER. 11. (Hed.): "Such were some," etc., sweet word 'were.' To be and to be willing to remain such—that were the pity. Those who have escaped from the snares of the Devil should bear the past in mind continually, as a motive to avoid sin and foster gratitude.

BERLEN. BIB.:—VER. 1. The reason why the righteous are often passed by, and the unrighteous are chosen as judges, is because people hope to make something out of the latter.—VER. 2. Judicial honors hereafter await those only who have acted justly here, and allowed themselves to be judged.—VER. 7. So completely does the Holy Spirit drive nature from her supposed rights, and subject it to patient suffering, yea, to death, that we are not at liberty to maintain our rights arbitrarily, but are bound, everywhere and at all times, to have regard to the jewel of our peace, and see that it be neither injured nor destroyed.—Vv. 9-11. The unrighteous are all the unregenerate, 1 Jno. iii. 7; Jno. iii. 8. There are many kinds of sins. Hence, if thou seest another sin, point not thy finger at him. Perhaps thou art implicated in another sin more deeply than he is in this. Remembrance of the past ought to cause perpetual humiliation. To this end we ought to think of our old sins, but for other reasons we ought to forget them. "But,"—"but,"—"but." O the importance and the preciousness of the change. Gracious acts all go together, though they are distinguishable. If we pray, 'God be merciful to me a sinner,' that implies, 'create within me a clean heart.' What God hath joined let no man put asunder. Salvation comprises forgiveness, sanctification, redemption, and we can get it in no other way than through the name of Jesus and the power of the Holy Ghost.

REIGER:—VERS. 2, 3.—We must improve the glimpses here allowed into the grander future, in such a way, that even here, amid our small engagements, we may as far as possible be lifted into higher moods. Through selfishness, impatience, anger, greed, the complainant often incurs as much guilt afterwards as the man has who injured him.

HEUBNER:—VER. 1. Every true Christian ought to be a sort of a justice of the peace.—VER. 3. It is very natural that the betrayed should judge the betrayer. From a presentiment of this springs the hatred of evil angels against Christians.—VER. 5. The lack of wise men in a church is great disgrace.—VER. 6. That justice should be enforced by the secular power between those who profess to be governed by law is also a disgrace.

BESSER:—If we kept in mind what glory awaits us in the Church, it would prove a sad thing for us to strive with our brethren about mine and thine, and if we were drawn into strife then would the judges find in us peaceable people who respected the decision of the saints.—Vv. 7, 8. Paul says "ye." Mark then, a little leaven leavens the whole lump! The flagrant immoralities of some did not constrain the Church to mourning, did not move them to the exercise of discipline. A Christian Church, however, is not a mere aggregate of names, but it is the body of one Spirit, composed of many members. Hence the declaration of the Apostle, "ye do wrong," struck at the whole Church, and stuck in it like an arrow until it acknowledged its own disgrace in bitter repentance.—Ver. 11. Whatever has been done for us and is to be found in the name of Jesus, that is appropriated to us through the Spirit of our God—that God, who is our God and highest Good in Jesus Christ our Lord.

[F. W. ROBERTSON:—Let us guard against a natural misconception of the Apostle's meaning. You might think that he meant to say, that the Corinthians should have ecclesiastical instead of civil courts; and for this reason, that churchmen and clergy will decide rightly by a special promise of guidance, and heathen and laymen wrongly. But this has not to do with the case. It is not a question here between ecclesiastical and civil courts, but between law and equity, between litigation and arbitration. The remedy [for offences] is, not more elaborate law, nor cheaper law, nor greater facility for law, but more Christianity, less loud cries about "Rights," more earnest anxiety on both and all sides to do no wrong].

XII.—AN EXHORTATION TO CHRISTIAN CONTINENCE, AND A PROHIBITION OF ALL HEATHENISH LICENTIOUSNESS. THE RELATION WHICH THE BODY SUSTAINS TO CHRIST; ITS CHARACTER AS THE DWELLING-PLACE OF THE HOLY SPIRIT, AND THE GREAT PRICE PAID FOR ITS RANSOM, DO NOT ALLOW OF OUR REGARDING SUCH A GRATIFICATION OF CARNAL APPETITE MORALLY INDIFFERENT, LIKE THE ENJOYMENT OF FOOD.

² Ver. 14.—The Rec. has ὡμᾶς, which is feebly attested, and Meyer thinks an error from Rom. viii. 11.

⁵ The clause καὶ ἐν τῷ, &c., is an addition apparently with a view to make the exhortation complete. The most important MSS. and other old and good authorities omit it [and so do Alf, Stanley, Words.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

VER. 12. [After speaking of the sin of covetousness, which had produced litigiousness,—and having reminded the Corinthians of what privileges they had received, and what sins renounced,—he now proceeds to examine and confute an argument raised by some of the Gentile Christians at Corinth, who in the presumptuous spirit of Greek Philosophy, pleaded, in behalf of fornication and of eating meats offered in sacrifice to idols, that man is the measure of all things (πάντων μέτρον ἀνθρώπου),—a principle in which both the greatest schools of Greek Philosophy, with which St. Paul had disputed at Athens, agreed, though they applied it in different ways: and that all the creatures were his, and that all things were lawful to him—a tenet which they imagined had received some countenance from the Gospel itself, which promised to them universal liberty, and even universal dominion in Christ, a doctrine which, when properly stated, and understood, with due conditions, is productive of that genuine independence which is the best security for self-control, and had therefore been placed in its proper light by St. Paul in the earlier part of his Epistle (iii. 21-23). This principle he here adopts with true oratorical skill, and proceeds to examine it, showing at once its truth and the falseness of its application by them.' After Words.].

All things are in my power.—Paul here has in view that easy, tolerant view of fornication which was so common among the heathen, and to which he has already repeatedly alluded (v. 1; vi. 9). This view was still further vindicated on the grounds of that Christian liberty which was supposed to countenance this gratification of a natural appetite as no less proper in itself than the eating of food was to satiate hunger. But the words with which the discussion begins are not to be regarded as the objection of an opposer, here cited for the purpose of refutation [Calvin and Barnes]. Had this been so, the fact would have been indicated by some formula like ἀλλ' ἐπεὶ; but you say. They are rather the statement of a fundamental principle of Christianity, resting upon its own grounds, yet with a suitable limitation of its application to the actual life of a Christian (μοι, i. e., for me, as a Christian).* Accordingly we are not to interpret these, vv. 12, 13, as giving us a sort of dialogue maintained between some imaginary opponent and the Apostle (Pott). The context indeed shows that the fundamental principle here laid down was actually adduced in support of fornication; but there is no ground for supposing that the Corinthian converts generally advocated this practice on such a basis, or that they so argued in their letter to him. It were better to assume this only of a few individuals, and that the Apostle had been privily informed of the fact, as intimated in the case mentioned in chap. v. 1. Some suppose the maxim here to have a close reference to what just precedes in ver. 11, q. d., 'I being now in a state of grace, and free from all Jewish restrictions, and all outward ordinances, and being no longer in bondage to an accusing conscience and to fear of sin, have right to the largest liberty.' But such a connection is by no means probable, since the verbs introduced by 'but' are chiefly designed to warn his readers against relapsing into their earlier immoralities. It were better to connect with ver. 9, and to suppose that out of the catalogue of sins there mentioned, he selected the first, and referred to the efforts made for justifying it. Besser regards the phrase as one of Paul's proverbs, [and Bengel says: "Paul often uses the first person to express those thoughts which have the force of maxims, especially in this Epistle, ver. 15; vii. 7; viii. 13; x. 23, 29, 30; xiv. 11"]. The term "all things" must of course be limited to such as were indifferent (ἀδιάφορα), i. e., to such acts as were not in themselves wrong, but only under certain circumstances and connections seemed to conflict with Christian morality. "All things are lawful for me which may be lawful." BENGL. [So also Hodge; but Words., well styles this explanation weak and tautological, and hardly justified by the original, and prefers Theodoret's view: "all things are in my power, by reason of my free will; but it is not expedient in all things to use this freedom, for in doing that which is sinful thou lovest thy freedom." But is it not plain, after all, that Paul here has in view not actions, but external objects, the things in the world which were all given for man's use, and over which he held dominion, and which, under the Christian dispensation, were all restored to him unrestricted by carnal ordinances? (The Syriac version evidently so takes it; Tyndale, on the contrary, renders "I maye do all thinges; but I will be brought under no man's power." So Cranmer and the Geneva Bible). In this sense it may be said with the broadest scope "all things are in my power" (Ps. viii. 6; Heb. ii. 6-11). And to this the antinomian would add 'and I have the right to use them as I please, according to the cravings of my nature, and according as they contribute to my enjoyment.' And it is upon this lawless inference that the Apostle proceeds to put limitations]. "The abrupt commencement of ver. 12 is perhaps to be accounted for on the supposition that it alludes to a passage in their Epistle to him, and the words before us might have been used there even in reference to things indifferent; but without the proper limitations which the Apostle here supplies." NEANDER.

The first of these is—but all things are not expedient.—By this he means as in x. 23, not materially advantageous, but morally fitting and useful, especially, perhaps, in its bearing upon others. [It were better, however, to take the verb συμφέρει in its broadest acceptation and bearings—conduce to profit, whether to the person who uses them, or to others with whom he is connected, and whose welfare he is bound to consult. Every finite good has a special end, and must be wisely used with reference to that end, and not being absolute, is dependent on times and circumstances for the benefit it is to confer]. The second limitation is—but not will I be brought under bondage by any thing.—Ἐφ' ὧς καθ' ἡσυχίαν καὶ ἔξουσι are kindred words (the former being formed from ἐφ' ὧς, which is derived from ἐξουσι), and they involve a parano-masia, which serves to bring out the contradiction, caused by the misuse of liberty, in a more forcible light. [We give the play on the words in English thus: 'All things are in my power, but I will not come under power to any thing']. "Not I" is emphatic. It exhibits the moral self of the individual (not simply that of Paul, but of Christians generally), in sharp contrast with everything, which, if yielded to passionately, or enjoyed with an accusing conscience, or fondly clung to as indispensable, acquires a despotic control over us. [The lord must preserve his lordship, and take heed that he become not the slave of any thing which is properly subject to him. Freedom must not commit suicide. The body was designed to be the organ of the Spirit for ruling over nature, not the organ of nature for ruling over the Spirit]. Ἐξουσιάζειν, to be master of, and it is here put in the future to express the firm inward resolve not to be mastered by any thing. Τῷς is neuter corresponding to πάντα.

* It can hardly be supposed that Paul meant to lay any such stress on the word 'me,' as though he meant to assert a distinction between believers and unbelievers in this respect, claiming a liberty for the former which did not belong to the latter. This would lead to some pretty dangerous inferences.]

VERS. 13, 14. Meats for the belly and the belly for meats, etc.—Here we have a contrast drawn between what is in itself indifferent, and the view which cannot be brought under this category.* From the fact that a mutual relation has been established between meats and the belly by an ordinance of the Creator, the former being made to be received and digested by the latter, and the latter being formed to receive the former, and from the fact that both are alike transient, being designed only for this present life, it followed, as a matter of course, that eating was a thing morally indifferent, and was allowable, in so far as it neither proved inconvenient, or brought a person under bondage. Very different, however, was it with the act of fornication, since the body, standing as it did in direct relations with the Lord, and having been received by Him into the fellowship of an immortal life, does not in such practices fulfil any Divine destination, [but is rather alienated from its proper functions, and degraded by them]. After the nominatives, ἐν τῷ is to be supplied. It is altogether needless to suppose that the meats here spoken of had any special connection with the altar-feasts that were so closely associated with licentious practices.† By such a supposition the force of the argument is rather hindered than helped.—And God shall destroy both it and them.—Paul refers here to that great change which is to take place in the condition of mankind at the coming of Christ—a transformation which will preclude all need of physical nourishment, and dispense with the organs for its reception. Comp. xv. 44, 51; and Matth. xxii. 30. In the words, “and

* But have we not here the evidence that in the “all things” Paul had reference not to actions, but to external objects? Out of these he selects one class, and shows what they were designed for, and how far they are good or expedient. But the like adaptation and utility and propriety he denies to exist in the indiscriminate use of woman, since the body of both was destined for higher uses, in the sexual relation, than mere enjoyment; and the purposes of God in reference to it, were violated by that use. The logic of the Apostle is obscured, if we consider him as having the action primarily in view. It proceeds wholly upon the rule of adaptation of things to ends].

† This is Neander's view. He supposes that Paul “at first meant to speak only of partaking of meats offered to idols,” and “then was prompted to leave the topic and speak against those excesses at Corinth of which he had not thought at first.” The topic thus left, he supposes to be resumed again at the beginning of chap. viii., but approached from a different point; and after several digressions and expositions of it, to be taken up in the same form as here in chap. x. 23. This view, though at first seeming to involve the course of thought in needless intricacy, grows more plausible the more we meditate upon the logic of the whole section; and it is not surprising that Neander says that neither Billroth's arguments, nor de Wette's have sufficed to convince him of its erroneousness. The case had better be left without arguing to each person's reflection—taking into account all the while the fact that here among the Corinthians there was probably the same connection between the eating of things offered to idols, and the sin of fornication that we find afterwards spoken of in the heresy of the Nicolaitans, Rev. ii. 14, 15, and that consequently the two stood very closely associated in the Apostle's mind.]

them,” we have the hint of a time that reaches far beyond the death of the individual—a time when the world and all things therein shall be burned up. [Comp. 2 Peter iii. 11.]

In contrast with the foregoing, there is presented to us, first, that truth in a negative form, the analogy of which to the eating of food it is the aim of the Apostle to dispute.—But the body is not for fornication.—That is, fornication is not the natural function of a perishable organ, but it is the perversion to illegitimate uses of the entire body—that body which belongs to the Lord, and is with him, destined to an imperishable life. And in this also there are two elements involved; 1, a connection with the Lord;—but for the Lord.—And this relation is a mutual one, since the body is destined for the Lord, to be one of His members, and His exclusive possession; and on the other hand—the Lord is for the body,—to rule it, and to use it; yes, to appropriate and assimilate it to Himself; and, as others add, to nourish it with his life. (Comp. Jno. vi. 33, 58, and also ver. 15, μὲν). 2. The destination of the body to an immortal life, grounded on its connection with the Lord—a destination that stands in striking contrast with the destruction above alluded to, which awaits the purely material world.—And God both raised up the Lord, and will raise up us also by His strength.—This resurrection is an introduction into a life that is no more subject to death. Comp. Rom. vi. 9 ff. The καὶ καὶ, both—and, binds the two clauses together. In the second clause, however, the reading is contested, and Meyer (ed. 2d) considers ἐξήγειρε, has raised, as the only right reading, although not so well attested. Paul, he says, never asserts the ἐγείρεται and ἐγερσέται, that is, a restoration to life after death, of himself and of his contemporaries (2 Cor. iv. 14 is to be understood spiritually); rather, in anticipation of the speedy advent of Christ, he was looking to be changed without dying (xv. 51 f.; 1 Thess. iv. 16 f.); so that if he had been speaking of the future, he would have been more likely to have used the word ζωοποιήσεται, shall make alive, than ἐγερσέται, shall raise up. (Comp. xv. 22; Rom. viii. 11). He interprets the word, however, not of the spiritual resurrection, that is, the new birth, but as in Eph. ii. 6; Col. ii. 12 f., where Christ's resurrection is spoken of as the fact in which that of the believer is already involved, although the connection first becomes realized at the second advent, through the actual resurrection of the dead, and the transformation of the living. But if, according to this interpretation, both these ideas can be considered as included in the verb in its past tense (ἐξήγειρε), why not assume the same in its future form? In so doing, we should abide by the reading best attested—a reading which puts the verb in the same tense with καταργήσεται, shall destroy—and would construe the verb ἐγερσέται in its more comprehensive signification, as denoting the change which is to take place in the living, as well as in the dead. 2 Cor. iv. 14 might also be interpreted in the same manner. The distinctive changes awaiting the quick and the dead, although elsewhere made prominent, did not require to be alluded to here. (With this Meyer in his 8d ed. also agrees). It is hardly allowable to distinguish here between ἐνσώματι and ἡσώματι (Bengel and Osiander), as though the former referred to the first fruits of the resurrection in Christ, and the latter to the work consummated at the end. The reason why he uses the word "us," instead of 'our bodies,' is that he had used the personal form just before, 'in the Lord.' The context, in this case, allows of no misapprehension. "The body," says OSIANDER, "is the vessel of our personality." The clause, 'by his power,' it were better to connect with the latter verb, if by 'his' we understand, not Christ's, but God's, which is to be preferred, as God is the subject of 'shall raise.' Comp. xv. 38; Matth. xxii. 29; Eph. i. 19. Διὰ here expresses the internal instrumentality.

Vers. 15-17. Know ye not that your bodies are the members of Christ?—Here he amplifies what is said in ver. 13, and "upon the ground there adduced of the immorality of fornication, he brings to their distinct consciousness the abominable character of the vice in question." So Meyer rebuts Baur's assertion, that Paul here makes a petitio principii. Elsewhere Christians themselves are called members of Christ's body—the Church in its totality, the head of which is Christ. (Comp. xii. 27; Eph. v. 30). But here their bodies are spoken of as essential parts (the vehicles) of his personality. And this, not so much on account of his incarnation, and of His so sharing with us our nature, as on account of the indwelling of His Spirit (ver. 19). Whether the Apostle had in mind the figure of the marital relationship (comp. 2 Cor. xi. 2; Eph. v. 26 f.; Rom. vii. 4) is less certain. The incongruity of making Christ the antithesis to a harlot (Meyer), would not stand in the way of our supposing this, since it makes no difference whether the other party be male or female, for Paul is here speaking of the essential contradiction which exists between a person's belonging to Christ, and so holding vital fellowship with the Holy and Pure One, and his having intercourse with an individual who was addicted to impurity, such as a common prostitute—an intercourse which involved the surrender of the entire person to her. It was only the impure conscience of a heathen that could be blind to the immorality of such fornication. But to the Christian's conscience this should be evident at once, and we should denounce it as a crime perpetrated against Christ—as an abominable violation of his sacred rights. Hence the Apostle directly proceeds to ask—Shall I then take away the members of Christ, and make them the members of a harlot?—Αἰρεῖν means not simply, to take, but, to take away, to alienate from the proper owner. Οὐν, then, or, therefore, introduces the inference: "since this is so, I will not so far forget myself, as to," etc. Ποῦν may be either, Aorist subj., as in xi. 22, meaning, should I; or, have I any right to make; or it may be future, shall I make? The sense will be about the same. [Jelf says that "the second and third persons of the Future often express necessity or propriety, shall, must." Gr. Gram. § 406 8]. This query he answers with an emphatic negative—μη γένοιτο, let it never be,—an expression by which in Rom.

vi. 2, and elsewhere, he repels all unhallowed inferences and suggestions and declarations.

In order to prove that fornication involves all he has stated, he next goes on to show the nature of the connection it effects between the parties concerned, and sets over against this, the nature of the union believers have with Christ, so that the utter incompatibility of the two may be the more clearly felt—Or know ye not;—g. d., 'or if this at least, appear doubtful to you, then it must be because of your ignorance' (Meyer). that he who is joined to the harlot is one body?—Κολλᾶσθαι, to be most intimately joined with. In this connection it denotes the sexual union, which involves the most intimate conjunction of the physical powers of life. The consequence of such a union is stated in a citation from Gen. ii. 24, found also in Matth. xix. 51, and this he introduces as a Divine declaration.—For he saith—'He, i. e. God, since Scripture is the oracle of God, even though communicated through human organs (comp. xv. 27; Eph. v. 8; Heb. viii. 5). To suppose God to be the subject is better than to supply either the words 'Scripture' or 'Spirit,' though the meaning would still be the same. But most unsuitable of all would it be to construe it as impersonal: it is said,—they two shall be into one flesh.—This, which was originally affirmed of the marriage union, is here applied to illicit intercourse, it being the same thing, physically considered. Secundum speciem naturæ non differunt (Thom. a. q.). And by this application of the statement he shows that the act in question is not a mere momentary enjoyment with which the whole affair is concluded, but that it involves a real union of the natural powers of life in one complex personality. The term "flesh" here denotes simply man's physical nature, without the accessory idea of corruption. The words "they two" are not found in the Hebrew text. They occur in the LXX., and in all the quotations of this passage, even in those of the Rabbis. (Is this in the interest of monogamy?). "Into," εἰς, Hebr.

ἔ, even in classic Greek, implies a transition into a particular state [JELF, Gr. Gram., § 625, Obs. 4].—But he who is joined to the Lord is one Spirit.—Here we have the contrast: κολλᾶσθαι τῷ κυρίῳ, a phrase which occurs also in Deut. x. 20; 2 Kings xviii. 6. As the result we have, not 'one body,' but 'one spirit,' denoting the element wherein this union takes place. But this unity is not a merely ideal one. It is one in essential reality, the indwelling of Christ in the believer, so that His Spirit and our spirit become one. Comp. xiv. 23. This clause stands independently.

Vers. 18-20. The warning implied in what precedes is now expressly given, and, although clearly an inference, is introduced abruptly without any connecting particle—Flee fornication.—φεύγετε, flee—a striking expression. Anselm says, Alia vitia pugnando libido fugiendo vincitur. "Other vices are conquered by fighting, lust by flying." What follows substantiates this warning, by showing the characteristic peculiarity of that sin, which distinguishes it from every other. And this is exhibited antithetically.—Every sin which a man might commit—[ὅ ἐάν ποίησῃ ἄνθρωπος. The án here belongs to the relative and not to the verb, and gives an indefiniteness to it, annexing the notion, 'whatsoever it may be.' JALR, Gr. Gram. § 829, 1].—is without the body.—But how can he say this, when drunkenness and such like vices also involve an injury to the body, and indeed cannot be practised at all outside of the bodily sphere? There have been several modes of answering this question. We may either suppose that the word "every" (πᾶν) is to be taken in a popular sense for 'nearly all,' which is arbitrary; or we may consider the whole clause hypothetical, q. d., 'Although all other sins were without the body, yet this,' etc. (Flatt)—which is inadmissible; others [Jerome, Origen, Aug., Bengel, Words.] take it to mean that fornication pollutes the whole body as no other vice does,—but this is not stated in the words; and others still, that no vices sever the body of the Christian from that of Christ as this does (Fritzsche), a thought neither expressed in the text, nor consistent with the view of Paul in chap. ix. f.; Rom. viii. 9; others again take the idea to be, that no sin imparts to the flesh such tyranny over the spirit as fornication, an idea plainly foisted into the language of Paul; others suppose that drunkenness and gluttony are here included in with fornication [Mac-knight]—a supposition not sufficiently established by the fact that these vices are frequently associated together. We would rather say, that all other sins affect and injure only the transient, perishable organs of the body, or that they require for their commission some means that are derived from without, and are foreign to the body. ["Drunkenness and gluttony, e. g., are sins done in and by the body, and are sins by abuse of the body; but they are still introduced from without, sinful not in their act, but in their effect, which effect it is each man's duty to foresee and avoid. But fornication is alienating that body which is the Lord's, and making it a harlot's body—it is a sin against a man's own body from its very nature, against the verity and nature of his body; not an effect on the body from participation of things without, out a contradiction of the truth of the body wrought within itself." ALFORD].—but he that committeth fornication sins against his own body.—The scope of the argument is this: On the one hand the Apostle brings to view the fact that the fornicator by his sin surrenders his body to the harlot, and commingles his life with hers in such a manner that he loses the power to dispose of his body as he will, as it were yielding to another's nature the right he has to himself, and so coming in bondage to that (analogously to chap. vii. 4); and on the other hand, he considers how the body of the Christian (who is the only one here contemplated) is desecrated by fornication as it can be desecrated by no other sin. In both these respects this vice is a sin against one's own body in a preëminent sense. The truth, that the sin of πορνεῖν εἰς τὸ ἰδίον σῶμα, fornicating against one's own body, is chargeable upon Christians, the only persons with whom he has to do, he exhibits still more clearly by referring them to the well-known dignity which the body of the believer, as such, possessed.—Or know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost which is in you?—As in ver. 16 he ascribed to the bodies of believers what he elsewhere has predicated of believers themselves, so he does the same thing here in respect of their character as "the temple of God." This designation, before applied to the Church as a whole (iii. 16; also 2 Cor. vi. 16), he here applies to the bodies of Christians. Primarily, the Holy Spirit dwells in the "inward man," in the πνεῦμα, or spirit; but the body is its vehicle, or tabernacle, and inseparable organ. If we adopt the reading τὸ σῶμα ὑμῶν, then it would mean: the body of each one of you. The same sense is yielded by the other reading, σώματα, bodies. To this thought, but especially to the clause—which ye have from God.—(ἀπό, the same as in Jno. xv. 26), showing how dependent they were on him, he adds this further truth—and ye are not your own.—From this it followed that they had no power over themselves, or over their own bodies, and therefore could not properly dispose of them to another, or use them for the gratification of unhallowed lusts, but were bound to employ them only in executing the holy will of God. And how they came not to be their own, he proves by referring to their redemption—for ye were bought.—viz: for God, to be His peculiar possession (comp. Acts v. 9, and περιποιεῖσθαι Acts xx. 28). The figure involved is that of a slave or body servant, over whom his master holds exclusive control. The purchase was from the servitude of sin, and from the curse of the law, and from the power of Satan (comp. Rom. vi. 17 ff.; Gal. iii. 18; Col. i. 13; Acts xxvi. 18). And this purchase was—with a price—and this price was nothing less than Christ Himself, His "soul," His "blood" (see Matt. xx. 28; 1 Pet. i. 18). Passing beyond the mere significance of the word, yet observing its import, we come to the important thought that it was a high price, and the purchase, dear. [To this Winer objects, LXIV. 5]. This expression occurs in viii. 23, but where, as in Acts xx. 28; Titus ii. 14, Christ is represented as the possessor. The practical inferences from all this is—Now then glorify God in your body.—Δοξάζειν here denotes the exhibition of the Divine holiness (or of God's sacred presence, as in a temple) through a chaste, modest deportment. The praise is to be celebrated through deeds, as: 'do all to the glory of God,' x. 31; comp. also Jno. xxi. 19; xii. 28; xiii. 31. 'Ev. in, to suit the figure of the temple, or, on, specifying that whereon the conduct which is to glorify God should exhibit itself. Δὲ serves to make the exhortation more pressing. 'Act rightly, so that it shall be apparent to all that ye do it.' See Passow I. p. 612. [Obs.: "It is very remarkable how these verses contain the germ of three weighty sections of the Epistle about to follow, and doubtless in the Apostle's mind when he wrote them: 1, the relation between the sexes; 2, the question of meats offered to idols; 3, the doctrine of the resurrection of the body." DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. [Christian liberty, its nature and limitations. 1. Its nature. Through the redemption effected by Christ, the believer is restored to that supremacy over the world, which Adam had forfeited, and has a free right and title to use it and all things in it according to his ability and pleasure. No longer is he fettered by the restrictions which the elder economy imposed. To him now "every creature of God is good," and he is at liberty to make all things in their way tributary to his interests. In the person of his Lord they are all "put under his feet," and with his emancipation from the bondage of sin, and the restoration of his inward freedom, his lordship over himself, he is at the same time restored to his proper sovereignty over the external world, and qualified to maintain it. But 2.] This liberty has its limitations, [first, by the law of expediency; secondly, by the law of self-preservation; and thirdly, by the law of duty. All things, e. g., though in our power, do not prove in their use alike, and at all times equally, beneficial, either to ourselves or to others. Again, the use of some things in certain ways and degrees, may destroy the liberty which claims the right to use them. And, finally, we must yield to God and man what properly belongs to each, robbing neither of their rights. The liberty of the Christian is therefore not an absolute, but a restricted liberty.] Fundamentally, however, this restriction is a self-imposed restraint, an act of perfect freedom, nothing but the fulfilling of our appointed course in love. Though the Christian is made free through faith, free from all which the law imposed from without, and enforced by penalties, yet it does not follow from this that he is at liberty to assert his own sinful self-will in opposition to the revealed will of God. Rather this very freedom becomes the means of entirely cutting off all arbitrariness of conduct. For that faith, through which the believer has been liberated, is in fact an entrance into the very life of Christ. It implies such an apprehension of Christ, that the believer can say: 'It is no more I that live, but Christ that liveth in me.' But in taking Christ he takes into himself all that holy love of God which embraces both him and all his fellow-believers in one blessed union. Possessing this love, then, he comes to hate and shun everything which conflicts with the Divine will, everything which either tends to interrupt his fellowship with his Lord, or acts prejudicially upon his neighbors and associates in the churches; everything, also, which is calculated to weaken his power over the world, the flesh, and the devil, and bring him again under bondage. That alone he allows himself to use, in suitable modes and measures, which operates beneficially on himself and others, and advances the Gospel of Christ and promotes spiritual life, that alone which leaves his liberty perfect, and his mastery over self and the world undamaged. Thus does the truth and reality of our freedom rest in Christ, and prove to be nothing less than love freely and intelligently seeking its own proper ends.

[See this whole subject of man's freedom and dominion discussed in WUTTKE's Handbuch der

Christlichen Sittenlehre, I., p. 349, 408 f., 481 f.: "Man may and can perfect his rule over nature only when he has fully subjected himself to be ruled by the holy author and Lord of nature."]

2. The power to purify the soul and keep one's self from all manner of fornication and uncleanness, is to be found in Christ alone. The simple sense of shame or of self-respect, or the mere dread of weakening or deranging our physical nature, is not sufficient of itself to counteract the strong temptation to this sin, and quell the might of this the strongest of our carnal passions. The enjoyment is instant and sensitive, the injury is remote, and perchance may never be felt; and so the weak will give way.—But in our fellowship with Christ, in the clear living consciousness of His presence, we have the power to overcome the very strongest of our carnal impulses, and to resist the most seductive enticements. While He dwells in us with His holy love, He becomes the quickening power which animates and controls our whole constitution. Through this love, which consented to suffer the bitterness of deaths for our sins, sinful lust is essentially slain, and the Christian resolves that he, with his body and its members, shall belong to none other than his Lord. His body he henceforth regards as a member of Christ, an organ of His holy life. No more can he prostitute it to the control of another, or become bound in vital union to a harlot. The remembrance of Christ's presence within him causes him to shrink with horror from everything which might defile that which has become a sanctuary consecrated to His glory. Mindful of his being purchased to God at the cost of the precious blood of His Son, he feels the weight of the mighty obligation, and is neither able nor willing to use that body, which is now God's property, for any other purpose than for his service and glory. Being now joined to Christ in one spirit, he resolves never more to hold carnal intercourse with any, apart from the Divine ordinance of marriage (which is to be consummated in the Lord, and for the Lord), or to be guilty of aught whereby the body, which is destined to partake of the imperishable life of Christ, shall be unfitted for the heavenly communion.

[3. The true position and dignity of the body. In its doctrine concerning the body, Christianity avoids two opposite extremes. It neither disparages it as worthless and contemptible, after the fashion of some ancient philosophers, and the Manicheans; nor does it idolize it into an object of supreme regard and care, as the Epicureans, ancient and modern, do. Regarding it as essential to the perfection of our humanity, and as a needful organ of the Spirit, Christianity gives the body likewise a share in Christ's redemption, and unites it to Him for sanctification here and for glorification hereafter. It thus makes it a member of Christ's mystical body, to be controlled and regulated by His Spirit. At the same time it imparts to it the character of a Divine temple, and requires that we keep it from all defilement, and preserve it in a condition suited for the service and worship of God. So far, therefore, from being at liberty to despise or abuse the body, or to set up its welfare and claims in antagonism with those of the Spirit, or to make our care for it a distinct, though even a subordinate interest, our obligations to Christ demand that we unite it with the soul in one general system of spiritual edification and culture, yield its members as instruments of righteousness, and glorify God in it no less than in the spirit].

[4. The Church is God's purchased possession. He has redeemed it unto Himself by giving His own Son as a ransom for it, thereby delivering it from the tyranny of Satan and from the merited penalties of the law, to be His in love and devotion for evermore. Not that His hold upon the persons thus ransomed had ever been lost by their sin. God's property in man is absolute and inalienable, and His title to dispose of him according to His own pleasure and unto His glory remains unaffected, let man do what he may. But, if we may so speak, His right to love and favor them, and to treat them as His children, had been destroyed by the forfeit of sin, and instead thereof there rested on God the obligation to wrath and punishment. And this was the right which had been recovered by the purchase effected by the blood of Christ. Thus a new ground of dominion and rule has been laid, superadded to the former one, and with this a new mode of government devised, and new obligations imposed on the parties redeemed. God as Father holds the Church not only by the right of creation, but also by the right of redemption. He enforces His claims to obedience by pointing to the blood of His Son, which was shed for us: and the strongest incentive to devotion and praise on the part of the believer, both here and in eternity, is—"For Thou hast redeemed us unto God by Thy blood"].

[1. In the exercise of his power and liberty a Christian is bound to consult not simply the scope of his own rights and privileges, but also, 1, the bearing of his conduct upon, a, his own best interests, and b, the interests of others, ver. 12; 2, its effect upon his own spiritual freedom, ver. 12; 3, the intrinsic fitness of things for their special ends, ver. 13; 4, the worth of objects as determined by their durability, ver. 13; 5, the rights and claims of others, both God and man, ver. 13; 6, the particular honor which God hath put upon the objects under our control, being careful not to desecrate what he hath taken into fellowship with Himself, vv. 14-17].

[2. The sin of fornication consists, 1, in its being a violation of the Divine interest of the body, ver. 13; 2, in that it is an alienation from Christ of what belongs to Him, and an appropriation of it to another, vv. 15-17; 3, in that it is an abridgement of our own liberty, ver. 17; 4, in that it brings a person into intimate connection and union with the vilest of characters; 5, in that it is preëminently a sin against the body, being committed in and through it, in the perverted use of the highest functions of physical life, which were designed for the purpose of raising up a holy seed that should serve God; 6, in that it is sacrilege, vv. 19, 20].

LUTHER:—Ver. 19. A Christian may be compared with the tripartite temple of Solomon.

His spirit is the Holy of holies, God's dwelling amid the darkness of faith (he believes what he neither sees, nor feels, nor grasps); his soul is the Holy place, where are the seven lights of the golden candlesticks; his body is the forecourt, exposed to the general view, where every one can observe how he lives, and what he does. Deep within the heart is the consecration made which unites him to the Church; in the secret recesses within does the Holy Ghost affiancé itself to the believing soul; but the nuptial song rings throughout the entire man, and he becomes a spiritual temple of the Lord; and in the forecourt stands the altar of burnt offerings, whereon we are to lay our bodies as living sacrifices unto God (Rom. xii. 1).

STARKE:—Ver. 14. Our resurrection is founded upon the resurrection of Christ; and the thought of it should restrain us from all impurity; for although the impure also will rise again at the resurrection, yet it will not be to the glorification of their bodies.—Ver. 17. Christ and believers are united together in one mystical person; but from such union lawful marriage does not hinder believers, [for if he marries aright, he marries "in the Lord"]. Marriage is, in fact, a type of the heavenly wedlock (Hosea ii. 19; Eccl. iv. 9; Eph. v. 30).—Ver. 18. HEDINGER:—Fornication is the only sin which involves the whole body in disgrace, and so defiles it more than all other sins. Drunkenness and gluttony do not affect all the members of the body; neither are the meats and drinks, wherewith a person offends, members of the body. Other sins are committed against a neighbor's body (murder), his goods (stealing), his honor (bearing false witness), but fornication is a sin against ourselves, with our own bodies. Ver. 19. The inward glory of believers consists in this, that God Himself dwells in them and walks in them (Ps. cxxii. 14). Ver. 20. The precious and imperishable ransom paid by Christ for the human race, deserves entire consecration of body and soul to His holy service.

BERLINBURGER BIBLE:—Ver. 12. People are apt to inquire only whether a thing is allowable, but not whether it is fitting or obligatory. Christians are allowed greater privileges than many think, but they always take themselves into consideration. Christians are not blind; they see, indeed, that in Christ they are exalted above all things, but they bear in mind also how they are to use all things, and in their dove-like simplicity are as cunning as serpents. Freedom is a Divine endowment, but it cannot be preserved without Divine art. We have power over creatures only in God, and Christians are the only kings. If thou art in bondage to nothing, then hast thou all power. Freedom is a Divine jewel, but it must remain freedom, and keep clear of all snares and entanglements. Man boasts, saying: "I am lord of the creation." Yes, but let it only be so in fact, and become not a slave over it. We may, indeed, assert of any thing that it is good; but how art thou? May it not be holding thee in bondage?—Ver. 18. In this statement, 'The Lord is for the body,' we have a noble proof that Christ has verily given Himself to us. He, therefore, who now rightly honors his own body, is joined by the Lord unto Himself. He who sunders the bonds of the Divine order, abuses his own body. Originally the body was not intended for impurity, but now, and as it is now, it beguiles. It does not, however, follow that I, like an ox, must yield to that which impels me.—Ver. 14. Can he who expects in faith this glorification of his body at the resurrection, endanger his hope by impure lusts?—Ver. 15. Believers themselves are Christ's members; therefore every thing which is theirs also belongs to Him. Universally is it true that if a Christian surrenders himself to the world and to the creature, he withdraws himself from his Lord Jesus. He who sins takes that power which God has given him and offers it up to another.—Ver. 17. One Spirit. To will what God wills, this is to be a partaker of the Divine Nature. With God, being and willing are one and the same thing (St. Bernard). This union to Christ is learned and attained in the inmost depths of the soul alone. If we delight to be with Christ, let us then cleave to the Lord and not to a harlot. Let us walk with God and follow the Lamb whithersoever He goeth. Let us abide in God, so that heart, disposition, sense, and all our powers, shall enter into God and come out of their selfish isolation and false freedom, and be God's possession. In this way doth God recover the man who has forsaken Him, and dwells in him as in His own temple—Ver. 18. This passage instructs us also how we may deliver ourselves. It is by avoiding opportunities; by not running into danger, and thinking ourselves strong; tearing ourselves loose and fleeing as Joseph did.—Ver. 19. A believer is not his own, but is the servant of God, who looks at and executes his Lord's behests. Where can a greater happiness be enjoyed in this life, than in the feeling that we are entirely and altogether God's? God, as it were, is under obligation to care for, and to protect those who belong to Him and are no more their own. Be then in no respect your own, in order that God may be entirely yours.—Ver. 20. Christ has purchased the whole man. Through His spotless offering we are enabled to sanctify the body. Originally man was the dwelling-place and peculiar possession of the Godhead, and after his fall he was purchased anew for the same purpose by the redemption of Christ so precious; therefore ought men to consecrate themselves to God; and to this end should we purify ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and of the spirit. 2 Cor. vii. 1.

RIEGER:—VER. 12. By our misuse of freedom we are, for the most part, brought into bondage. Freedom is a condition wherein I am able both to use and also to misuse objects with ease.—Ver. 13. He who with every morsel he eats takes into himself something of that condemnation of death under which all things lie, will deem the pleasure to be enjoyed in eating as the least possible, and will be as little inclined to boast therein as a criminal would boast over his parting meal. Through the sense of shame imprinted by the finger of God upon the human heart, and by our longing after our primeval innocence, we are powerfully admonished to employ the power furnished by Christ's grace, for the proper preservation of the body and its members, and to bring them by means of it to the service of righteousness and fruits of sanctification; and for this reason also to rejoice that the Lord also belongs to the body, that the protection, love, and grace of God in Jesus Christ extends also over this, and works out its sanctification through His Spirit; yea, also its glorification at the resurrection.—Ver. 14. The liberty of giving one's body to fornication, and the hope of resurrection to life eternal, cannot co-exist in the heart. Those thorns choke this seed, and by the gross abuse of the body do we forfeit the enjoyment of the hidden manna, which is intended also for the nourishment of the bodies of the saints in eternal life.—Vv. 15, 16. Our bodies are Christ's members, since from Christ, the Head, there flows down upon them also both life and pleasure, and power to serve God and His righteousness, and also the control of His Spirit, together with the hope and desire of making manifest the mind of Christ also in our daily walk and conversation. But when a person withdraws his members from their proper Lord and Head, and in this way interrupts that enjoyment which flows from such communion, and destroys his peace and joy in the Holy Ghost; and besides this becomes joined to a harlot or a debauchee; then does such conduct bring with it such servitude of the whole man as compels a participation of all the other members likewise, or at least infects them with its own impurities, as if these were their own. What ought to happen according to God's ordinance only in lawful marriage, this happens also through commerce with a harlot; but it happens in such a way as to leave traces in the body and its members, which shall follow the guilty one even unto the resurrection of damnation.—Ver. 17. By idolizing the creature and by the pleasure sought therein, man becomes carnal; by cleaving to the Creator he becomes spiritual.—Ver. 18. The deeper the fire of lust lies in any individual, and the more the example of others and the hope that it will remain concealed and unpunished and the excuses furnished for it by man's wit, blow upon it to inflame it, the more need have we of the faithful watchman's alarm: "Flee fornication."—Ver. 19. A temple is consecrated to God and to His service; it is also decorated by God with many tokens of His grace. What a comfort then is it believingly to regard our body as built and furnished by God's hand, bought by Christ's blood, and consecrated in baptism to be a possession of God in Christ! Assaulted, indeed, and alas! too often overcome through the jealousy of the Devil, by all manner of alien powers, yet rescued again by the might of grace, and made meet to be the dwelling-place of God's Spirit! Ah, what a glorious thing it will be to carry a celestial body in which evil lusts no more dwell!

HEUBNER:—VER. 12. The doctrine of Christian freedom cannot be more basely perverted than when employed to the gratification of fleshly lusts. The rule of its use is a consistent regard for self and for neighbor. The Christian should allow himself to be fettered by nothing. True freedom is to be bound by no lusts.—Ver. 13. God has given us the body for holy purposes, its members and powers are, as it were, an image of the Divine Creative Power. Everything in us should be consecrated to the service of God.

The Lord has become also the Saviour of the body, in that He has freed it from eternal death, and has earned for it its resurrection.—Ver. 14. The resurrection of the body should awaken in us a certain respect for our body, constraining us to use it in a worthy manner.—Ver. 15. Every Christian is a member of Christ. This holy union strengthens the sense of shame at all impurity.—Ver. 16. Fornication is union with a harlot, with something impure, therefore separation from Christ. The man becomes that wherewith he unites, by assimilation.—Ver. 18. Fornication is a direct sin against ourselves, for we desecrate our personality by it.—Ver. 19. The body inhabited by the Spirit of God should be used in a holy manner. Christianity sanctifies even our physical life.—Ver. 20. God has given His own Son as a ransom for us. Meditation upon the greatness of His sufferings should fill us with gratitude. Earnestness in the work of sanctification flows from a living faith in the work of redemption, alike in its precious foundation and in its importance to us.

BESSER:—Ver. 12. There is something great in the power of a Christian freeman, which Paul has so celebrated in word and deed; but no where does the devil build his little chapels more cunningly than right by the side of the temple of Christian liberty.

Because Christians are in some respects yet carnal, and are in danger of being biased by the flesh (iii. 8), they always need the rule of the Holy Spirit to enable them to distinguish between what is spiritual and what is carnal.

Paul himself is an illustrious example of a noble independence of all external things. He knows how to abound and to suffer need, being careful for nothing and in everything giving thanks.

VER. 20. He who depends on the Lord knows the meaning of that declaration (Ps. lxxiv. 2), My flesh and my heart crieth out for the living God.

XIII.—INSTRUCTIONS IN REGARD TO MARRIAGE.

A.*—The propriety of marriage, and the duties involved.

CHAPTER VII. 1-11.

Now concerning the things whereof ye wrote unto me:¹ It is good for a man not
2 to touch a woman. Nevertheless, to avoid fornication [But on account of the forni-cations], let every man have his own [ἐαυτοῦ] wife, and let every woman have her own 3 [ἑαυτῆς] husband. Let the husband render unto the wife due benevolence [her due²]:
 4 and likewise also the wife unto the husband. The wife hath not power of her own body, but the husband: and likewise also the husband hath not power of his own 5 body, but the wife. Defraud ye not one the other; except it be with consent for a time, that ye may give yourselves to fasting and [om. fasting and³] prayer; and come [be⁴] together again, that Satan tempt you not for [through, διὰ] your incontinency.
 6 But I speak this by [as a, κατὰ] permission, and not of [as a, κατὰ] commandment.
 7 For [But, δὲ⁵] I would that all men were even as I myself. But every man hath his 8 proper gift of God, one⁶ after this manner, and another⁶ after that. I say therefore 9 to the unmarried and widows, It is good for them if they abide even as I. But if 10 they cannot contain, let them marry: for it is better to marry than to burn. And unto the married I command, yet not I, but the Lord, Let not the wife depart⁷ from 11 her husband: But and if she depart, let her remain unmarried, or be reconciled to her husband: and let not the husband put away his wife.

¹ Ver. 1.—Moi is stricken out by Tischendorf [Alf.] according to B. C. Cod. Sin., [but is retained by nearly all the critical editions according to A. D. F. K. L. Syn].

² Ver. 2.—ὀφειλὴν according to by far the most weighty authorities [A. B. C. D. F. Cod. Sin.¹]. The Rec. has ὀφειλομένην εὐνοίαν, an old gloss [found in L. and the Syriac and certain fathers], and an incorrect one arising from a mistaken interpretation of the nature of the due spoken of; [or perhaps it was a Euphemian].

[* I have taken the liberty of altering Dr. Kling's arrangement. He has treated this whole chapter connectedly, and divided the text into four subjects—vv. 1-7, 8-16, 17-24, 25-40—with captions accordingly. The divisions I have adopted seem more natural, and I have treated them separately for convenience' sake.—Ta.]

⁶ Ver. 7. The Rec. has γὰρ. This suits the sense, but is feebly supported. [It is found in B. D.³ K. L. Cod. Sin.² Syr.; while δὲ is found in A. C. D. F. Cod. Sin.¹].

⁷ Ver. 10.—χαρισθῆναι [so A. B. C. K. L. Cod. Sin.]. Lachmann [whom Stanley generally follows] reads χαρίζεσθαι [found in A. D. F.].

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Here we enter upon the second portion of this Epistle. Having first treated of those evils in the Church which he had learned by report, he, from chap. vii. and onwards, proceeds to give his opinion on those topics in regard to which the Corinthians had questioned him in their letter. This letter being lost, we can only infer what these questions were from the nature of the answers given. One was in relation to the propriety of marriage, and the performance of the duties it involved. This topic he treats of first, since it was closely connected with his earnest warning against fornication (vi. 12 ff.); for not only did it embrace the subject of the sexual relations; but that very depreciation of marriage also, which had begun to prevail in the Church, under the supposition that it was a sinful connection, which ought to be avoided, and, if possible, broken up when formed, was to be regarded as a reaction against the abounding licentiousness of the place.

This undervaluation of marriage, however, is by no means to be attributed (as by Grotius) [Whitby, A. Clark, Barnes] to the philosophic views current at that period;* since these affected not so much the morality of the thing, as the cares and dangers which belonged to the marriage institution. It were better to infer here an inference—though only a subordinate one—of that aversion to marriage which was just then springing up (so Osiander). But whether, and how far this difference of sentiment was connected with the party divisions in the Church, is a matter of doubt. Yet, if there were such a connection, still we are neither to suppose, (with Goldhorn and others,) that it was with the Christian party in particular, whose alleged theosophic, ascetic character is altogether problematical; nor yet (with Schwegler) that it was with the Essenian Ebionite Christians, whose presence at Corinth cannot be certainly ascertained; nor yet with the Petrine party, who, rather in view of the example of their leader (ix. 5; Matth. xiii. 14), and of the Jewish, Old Testament standpoint on the subject, must have held marriage in special honor. These questions must rather have originated with the Paulinists, who, through the precedent of their assumed leader, and by reason of such expressions of his as appear here, and were misunderstood by them, might have been led into an inordinate admiration of celibacy and disparagement of marriage, in opposition both to heathen immoralities, and to Jewish sensualism in this respect. With what modesty and wisdom Paul handles his subject will appear as we proceed.

[“The whole is written,” says Alford, “under the strong impression of the near approach of the end of the present state of things (vv. 29-31), and as advising the Corinthians under circumstances in which persecution, and family division for the Gospel’s sake might at any time break up the relations of life. The precepts and recommendations of this chapter are therefore to be weighed as those in viii. al., with reference to change of circumstances; and the meaning of God’s Spirit in them with respect to the subsequent ages of the Church, to be sought by careful comparison and inference not rashly assumed and misapplied. I may also premise that in hardly any portion of the Epistles has the hand of correctors and interpolators been busier than here. The absence of all ascetic tendency from the Apostle’s advice, on the point where asceticism was busiest and most mischievous, was too strong a testimony to be left in its original clearness.”]

VER. 1, 2. Now concerning the things whereof ye wrote to me.—[“Each of his replies is introduced by the preposition περί, as here.” WORDS.].—it is good.—There is here a Brachylogy, as in xi. 16; Rom. xi. 18. We might insert: ‘I say,’ or: ‘it is my opinion.’ [Some suppose that the Apostle is here taking up the language of the Epistle addressed to him and affirming it: ‘It is good, as you say, or inquire.’ And this is very possible, and may account for the use of the strong word καλόν here. It is adopted concessively.] The question is, however, whether by it the Apostle means to express the idea of suitableness, or allowableness, in consideration of the superior advantage of celibacy by reason of the religious opportunities it gave (comp. ver. 26); or whether he here has in view the moral beauty of continence. If we understand it relatively, then it cannot be inferred, as by Jerome, that the opposite is wrong, “malum est tangere,” and so the value and dignity of marriage as set forth in the context, will remain unaffected. “This agrees with the feeling in the previous chapter. Comp. below vv. 7, 8, 26, 84 (mid.), 35 (end), 40. ‘Good,’ i. e., becoming, suitable for liberty and exemption from the marriage due, ver. 3, and for entire power over oneself, ver. 4; [good, not in view of marriage as originally designed; for in that case it was not good for a man to be alone; but good in view of the evils which sin had engendered, and by which it had marred that which was designed to be one of man’s chief blessings]; though, on the other hand, the act of ‘touching,’ mentioned in ver. 1, is always au-company with modesty among the chaste. ["Much ingenuity," says Stanley, "has been employed by the advocates of celibacy in making this word (καλόν) mean 'lofty' or 'noble,' and by the advocates of marriage in depreciating it to mean 'convenient for existing circumstances.' The obvious meaning is the true one. It is used as in Aristotle and the Greek moral writers generally) for 'good,' like 'pulchrum' in Latin, opposed to 'turpe,'—αἰσχρόν, 'bad,' and the only limitation to be put upon it is that supplied by the context." It means, beautiful, praiseworthy, yet only under certain circumstances, and in view of the traits thus exhibited. And so all must admit it to be, as e. g., when practised by Paul. But not universally, for certainly he cannot be supposed to contradict intentionally what he says elsewhere of marriage, as "honorable in all;" or as a type of the union of the Church with Christ (Eph. v. 23-32); or as a thing, which to forbid was one of the signs of the great apostasy].—for a man;—Ἄνθρῳ does not stand precisely for ἀνδρά, although, of course, as the context shows, the man is here meant; ["and that, as Meyer remarks, not merely in his sexual, but in his human capacity. Thus in its deeper reference it would include the other sex also." ALF.].—Not to touch a woman.—This phrase the author formerly understood, with Rückert, to denote continence in the marriage state. In which case, then, the words in ver. 2: 'to have his own wife,' would mean sexual intercourse in the marriage state; and vv. 3-5 would only be a carrying out of the same idea; and, καλόν would be equivalent to 'morally beautiful,' in correspondence with the tender feeling implied. But, apart from all other grounds, both the whole context as well as the usage of language (ἔχειν), leads me to abide by the common interpretation, which takes the words to mean sexual connection in general (as in Gen. xx. 6; Prov. vi. 29) of which that occurring in marriage is one species. And this first comes to view prominently in ver. 2. [So Alf., Meyer, de Wette. And undoubtedly they are correct. But Hammond, Whitby, Henry, Hodge, Barnes and others, take the phrase as meaning marriage, directly and primarily, finding support in this from certain supposed classical analogies. But this is certainly a perplexing and needless limitation. Paul here evidently starts with a broad, and surely very credible proposition. 'There is, he would say, 'nothing wrong, as the Jews argued, but rather something very proper, nay, very honorable, in having nothing at all to do with women carnally,' as there certainly was in Paul's case, and in that of many others who for wise reasons have given themselves up to a life of chaste celibacy.]

* MEXANDER: “If a man consider marriage in a proper point of view, it is an evil; but then it is a necessary evil.” M. TULLIUS NEMIDICUS: “If we could live unmarried, we should be saved from a great deal of trouble; but seeing that nature has so ordered it, that we cannot live very comfortably with wives, and without them cannot live at all, marriage should be adopted not for the sake of the short-lived pleasure it has, but rather for the perpetual safety.” But this was not the general opinion. From A. Clark.

In ver. 2 he presents to us in contrast with the ideal καλόν the real practical need.—But on account of ["διὰ with the Acc. indicates the ground (ratio), not the aim (not even here), and it is only by implication that the notion of design can be brought in. Fornications are the reason for which the injunction is given, in order thus to prevent them." WINER, § XLIX. c.] fornications.—The plural points to the manifold and irregular sexual vices which prevailed in Corinth (Bengel: vagas libidines), in consequence of the multitude of courtesans to be found there. Now to ward off the temptations thus offered to the unmarried, by the enjoyment of legitimate intercourse in the marriage state he says,—let every one have his own (ἑαυτοῦ) wife, and let every woman have her own (ἰδίου) husband.—The ἑαυτοῦ and ἰδίου point to the established relation of the monogamy. [The contrast between τῇ ἑαυτοῦ χυvaίκα and τοῦ ἰδίου ἀνδρα is a difference of idiom which runs all through the New Testament. 'Ἰδιος' is never used for γυνή, nor ἑαυτοῦ for ἀνδρα, in speaking of husband and wife; perhaps from the seeming inappropriateness of using ἑαυτοῦ, except in the relation when the one party is, as it were, the property of another; perhaps from the importance of pointing out that the husband is the natural adviser of the wife." STANLEY. See WINER, § XXII.]

[The Imp. ἔχειν, let have, is not to be construed as permissive only, but it carries the force of a command [JELF, Gr. Gram. § 420, Obs. 1: "The Imperative is used when something of decision or authority is wanted, so that the more civil form of the Optative would be out of place"], as is evident from the analogy of the subsequent imperatives, and from the reason by which it is sustained. But, if a command, then of course we must limit the 'each one,' both of man and woman, to such as have not the gift of continence (comp. vv. 3, 7, 36, 37). Here then we have a view of marriage in its lower aspects and bearings, as a safeguard against incontinence. But this pedagogical or practical view of marriage, as meeting a contemplated necessity, by no means excludes the ideal view given in Eph. v. 29 ff. For, as Neander says, "we must not overlook the fact that Paul is here not treating of marriage in general, but only in its relation to the condition of things at Corinth, where he feared the effect of moral prejudices concerning celibacy." [Besides, it must be remembered that marital intercourse is not the same in kind with the illegitimate connection, but is refined and elevated by the pure love which binds the parties in life-long and absolute union for the very noblest ends, and of which it is the bodily expression. Hence the Apostle is here prescribing a veritable cure for the evil passion, and not simply allowing it indulgence within a certain sphere.]

VERS. 3-5. In order that the direction given in ver. 2 may attain its purpose, he goes on to insist upon the full consummation of the marital relationship, being prompted to this perhaps by the representations made in the letter of the Church, of a tendency towards a false asceticism in this respect, or of the actual practice of it among them.—Let the husband render unto the wife her due, and likewise also the wife to her husband.—ὀφειλόν cannot therefore mean simply ὀφειλουμένη εἰσοδια, due benevolence, as the Rec. Text has it [which was either substituted as an expository gloss on the supposition that 'the due' was one of affection merely, or as an euphemism], but it refers to the due of marriage, debitum tori. That marital intercourse should here be set forth as a matter of duty, belongs to the higher ethical aspects of the case. [See HARLESS, Christ. Ethik. § 52, A. a., WUTTKA

Süßenlehre, § 15, 3]. This he proceeds to establish more fully in the next sentence, omitting to connect it with any causal particle (for).—The wife hath not power over her own body, but the husband; and likewise also the husband hath not power over his own body, but the wife.—Here he shows that it is implied in the very nature of marriage, that the granting or withholding be not at the caprice of either party, but that each possesses a legitimate claim upon the body of the other, and has a right to its enjoyment. This is a reciprocity whereby alone marriage receives and maintains its monogamous character. The ellipsis at the close of each of these clauses is evident, and the nominatives must have their verbs supplied from what precedes. In the expression: the wife hath not power over her own, and: the husband hath not power over his own, Bengel detects an "elegant paradox." ["The ground of this being another's, while they are their own, is to be found in the oneness of body in which the marriage state places them." ALF.] It is to this 'power' that the next injunction refers: Defraud not one another. At any rate, it amounts to the same thing, whether we say, 'of this power,' or, 'of your body,' or, 'of the due.' What he forbids is the arbitrary refusal of intercourse when the other party desires it. Except it be, εἰ μὴ ᾤαν. [The αν belongs to τι. On the attachment of this particle to other than verbs, see Jelf, § 480, Obs. α.] There is here a limitation upon the above prohibition [which is elliptical in form; and, though it would naturally be supposed from the preceding verb, plainly implies a modification in meaning. It is not 'defrauding' that he allows, but 'abstaining,' as is evident from the appended condition], that both parties are agreed upon it, so that the rights of both parties are preserved: from mutual agreement, ἐκ συμφώνου. But even then the arrangement must only be for a time, πρὸς καιρόν. This might indeed denote some particular, suitable occasion that might occur, calling for such abstinence. But, according to later usage, it must be understood of some fixed definite period [Jelf, § 88, 2, b]. And this meaning is sustained by the purpose expressed, in its whole extent. First, he mentions religious exercises, for which they might wish to have time and rest.—that ye may give yourselves to prayer,—undisturbed by the excitements of this mighty passion. Such extraordinary and protracted devotional exercises were, in later times, enjoined for particular festival seasons, connected with fastings (hence the addition in the Rec. Text. of τῇ νυκτὶ καὶ)*. And it is possible that the beginnings of this custom are to be found in this period, though such seasons were evidently of a purely voluntary character. That indulgence in sexual intercourse did not comport with holy solemnities, was a point assumed alike in the Old Testament (Ex. xix. 15) and among pagan nations. [Yet, as Harless well says, Christliche Ethik, § 44, c., "we are not to suppose that the Apostle meant to say that such abstinence was a necessary condition to a spirit of prayer in general, but only that it was a suitable and necessary result of these peculiar circumstances in which the soul felt moved to special devotion toward God. To the Apostle who regarded the Christian's entire life as one continuous and perpetual prayer, it was impossible that such abstinence should appear as an absolute requisite to prayer, from the simple fact that he allowed of no enjoyment whatever which was not accompanied with prayer and thanksgiving," 1 Tim. iv. 4].—And be together again.—This indicates euphemistically the resumption of marital intercourse. Ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτὸ, a constructio pignans—'come together and remain together.' The dependence of ἦτε upon ἦτε is somewhat remarkable: hence the reading συνερχεσθε (Imp.). It nevertheless rests on good grounds.

The limitation of their abstinence to a definite period, includes two objects, that they might have leisure for prayer, and might be united again. The reason for this is—that Satan may not tempt you through your incontinency.—By this he means a betrayal into that against which marriage was designed to be a safeguard, viz., those fornications which were caused by incontinence. That such incontinence existed among them was to be inferred, not only from their peculiar circumstances, but also from the fact of their being married, which showed that they had not the gift of continence (comp. ver. 7). The betrayal through incontinence the Apostle ascribes to Satan. This is no mere form of speech, grounded on the supposition that all evil is to be attributed to Satan. Neither does it refer simply to seductions practised on them by the heathen, as though Satan were but another name for 'heathen,' the enemies of the Gospel. But it strictly accords with the whole doctrine of Scripture, and especially with Paul's teachings, that there is such a hostile evil spirit existing, whose business it is to seduce the people of God, and who, on this account, is styled preëminently "the tempter" (ὁ πειράζων) (Matth. iv. 8; 1 Thess. iii. 5). But the act of temptation (πειράζειν), in so far as it proceeds from this spirit of evil, is virtually a putting to the proof, since it presupposes some impurity or moral weakness in the parties operated on; or implies the hope of some pernicious result to them, on the ground of some suspected vitiosity of temper. In any case, it aims to demonstrate their impurity and impiety, and to effect their fall, and so to bring shame upon God and Christ, and to cause scandal in the Church, and involve it in disgrace, and hinder its spread, and weaken it in inward power and extent (comp. Job i. 2; 2 Cor. ii. 11, etc.).—Πειράζειν means, to entice, to sin, and that, too, with the intention of betraying (comp. Jas. i. 18ff.; Gal. vi. 1; Rev. ii. 10; iii. 10). But to derive ἀκαρπία from καρπίννυμι, as though it meant not mingling, i. e., in sexual intercourse, is a philological fiction of Rückert's [one, also, which Words. adopts], which is untenable, if for no other reason than this, that καρπίννυμι never appears as μίσγνυμι in this signification. The subst. ἀκαρπία from καρπίννυμι denotes bad mixture, such as that of insalubrious air. But the ἀκαρπία of the text is that which comes from ἀκαρτής and is—ἀκαρτεία, the opposite of ἐγκράτεια. [So Alford and Meyer. The latter takes the 'your' (ὑμῶν) as an emphatic allusion to the prevailing fault of the Corinthians. This Alford questions, but on hardly sufficient grounds.]

VER. 6. But this I speak as a permission, and not as a commandment.—['This' (τοῦτο). What? The thing is variously argued]. It refers neither to what follows in ver. 8 [as Rosen., Macknight] because of what intervenes in ver. 7; nor to ver. 2ff. [as Bera, Grotius, de Wette, Hodge], since the command there given, that each man have his own wife, etc., must in that case be taken concessively contrary to the direct obligation imposed in ver. 8; nor yet simply to the clause preceding: "and be together again," ["as the ascetics Orig., Tert., Jerome, Estius, and also Calvin, because this is but a subordinate member of the preceding sentence." ALFORD: "and the sense thus given to the passage is not consistent with the context" HODGE]; but to ver. 5, as a whole [so Alford, Meyer, Barnes]. The limitation imposed in regard to defrauding one another, he would not have taken as a command, as though persons were under obligation to practise longer or shorter abstinence by agreement. "By permission" (κατὰ συγγνώμην)—as an allowance or concession to your weakness. ['Not as a command.' "A proof of St. Paul's authority. He is empowered to give a precept (ἐπιταγή) or to bestow an indulgence" (συγγνώμη) WORDS.].

VER. 7. I wish rather (δέ) that all men were as also myself.—The reason why he does not wish to impose that restriction as a command, he here proceeds to state by pointing [to the different temperaments of individuals in respect to continence,] primarily to his own peculiarity. [That continence is the particularity in his condition which he refers to is assumed by Chrysostom, and is most probable. So de Wette, Meyer, Barnes. But Words understands it of his unmarried state.] The above construction of the connection occasioned, no doubt, the reading γάρ; for, instead of δέ; but it comports equally well with the latter (which is better attested), if, with Meyer, we interpret thus: 'I do not say this by way of command. I rather wish that all men might have the gift of perfect continence, as I myself have, so that marriage were unnecessary.'—To limit the expression 'all men' to Christians, is inadmissible. This comprehensive wish he utters in view of the near approach of Christ's second coming, when humanity would be made like unto the angels, and all marrying and giving in marriage would cease.

But each one has his own gift from God.—He here explains what he meant in ver. 6, when he said, 'by permission,' stating, on the other hand (ἀλλά), what hindered the realization of his wish. It was individual peculiarities. God had not given to every one alike the ability to practise continence. But whether by the word 'gift' (χάρισμα) he means an endowment of nature, or of grace, may be doubted. In view of the words 'all men' in the previous clause we might infer that he intended the former; a natural aptitude which existed as a Providential favor outside the sphere of redemption. But the uniform use of the word in this Epistle and in the New Testament generally inclines us to the opinion that it is the latter—a capacity granted by God within the Church, and therefore a proper gift of grace, grounded on an actual participation in Christ's redeeming power,—attached it may be, however, to a person's original disposition and temperament. Though the words 'all men' are indeed to be construed universally, yet the Apostle has here to do only with converts, and it is these that he has in his eye when he says, 'each one' and 'gift.' As Bengel observes, "that which in the natural man is a natural habit, becomes in the saints a gift of grace." The gift here is the entire habit of mind and body in the Christian, in so far, e. g., as marriage or celibacy is better suited to him, along with the actions suited to each state, according to God's commandments. But in a state not voluntarily assumed, the assistance of grace is more secure to the godly." Comp. the words in Math. xix. 11: "To whom it is given." The epithet ἰδίῳ, his own, is further explained;—one, so, and another, so.—This can either be construed generally, or applied strictly to the two subjects in discussion, viz. to continence and celibacy, on the one hand, and to the marriage state, on the other. The context inclines to the stricter construction. In this case, the second 'so' would refer to the fitness of the Christian of the marriage state, for forming and governing the family life.

VER. 8-9. A special application of the foregoing in the way of advice.—I say then to the unmarried, and to widows,—καὶ ταῖς χήραις, especially to widows; [so the καὶ must be interpreted, for widows being also unmarried cannot be regarded as a separate class.]—These, therefore, must be regarded as the parties singled out to be particularly addressed; while by the term, unmarried, single persons of both sexes are meant. And the emphasis is not to be placed on the latter, as though Paul were passing here to the consideration of a new topic—from the married to the unmarried; but it rests upon 'I say,' ["which is but a resumption of the 'I say' in ver. 6, and brings this advice under the same category as ver. 7." ALFORD]. It is otherwise in ver. 10, as may be seen from the position of the words: it is good, καλόν, as in ver. 1, for them, αὐτοῖς, masculine, if they should remain as I also am, i. e., unmarried. We are not to infer from this that Paul was a widower, as Clemens, Alex., Grotius [Luther, Ewald, Selden, Conybeare and Howson] suppose, for this is in no wise here intimated [so Alf., Meyer, Bengel and others. Words. leaves the case doubtful]. In view of his own gift (ver. 7), however, he wishes this advice to be taken conditionally. But if they are incontinent, let them marry. Ἐγκρατεῖν—ἐγκρατῆ εἶναι, to be master of one's self—especially as it regards the sexual passions; a word of the later Greek. For it is better to marry than to burn. Πυρρῶσθαι denotes the painful excitement of unsatisfied desire, which burns like a fire within, and inwardly overcomes the man, or at least disturbs and weakens the moral powers. Comp. Col. iii. 5; Sir. xxiii. 22-24. In saying 'it is better,' he intends no disparagement of marriage as being a lesser evil; but only contrasts a relation which, in this case, is morally allowable and sinless, with a state that is immoral, or at least troublesome to the moral life. "A second marriage among Christians is therefore not in itself unlawful; not a grievous transgression, as the Montanists and Novatians asserted; nevertheless the Church has always regarded second marriages with dislike, if only because the single marriage corresponds better with the idea of true Christian wedlock, which is a type of the union of Christ with His Church." BISPING. [Bisping, it must be remembered, is a Romanist*].

Vers. 10, 11. And to the married.—This is connected directly to the foregoing, meaning those who are enjoined to marry—hence, to Christians. To limit this to such as were newly married, or to some particular parties had in mind (Rückert), is warranted neither by the expression itself, nor by the context.—I command; παραγγέλλω.—Here comes in the ἐπαγγελία of ver. 6. It implies a stringent order, an injunction to do something (comp. Luke v. 14) 1 Tim. vi. 13. And this he exhibits as a command of the Lord Himself, i. e., of Christ, the Head of the Church.—not I, but the Lord.—Here he has in mind the words of Christ in Matth. v. 82; xix. 4; Mark x. 12, communicated to him by a reliable tradition. To suppose that he had received a special revelation on the subject, is altogether gratuitous. [Nor are we to imagine that Paul here intends to draw a contrast between what he himself commands and what the Lord had commanded, as to the degree of authority involved in each. For as he himself states in ver. 40, 'He had the mind of Christ;' and what is spoken under the inspiration of the Spirit, is no less valid than that which proceeded from the lips of Jesus. And what he intends here is not to draw a contrast, but merely to assert the distinction just alluded to. 'He is simply telling the Corinthians, that, so far as what he was about to say was concerned, they had no need to come to him to learn it.' He was merely repeating what had already been enjoined by Christ Himself.*] The exception "except it be for fornication," which does not appear in Luke xvi. 18, nor in Mark, is here dropped out, either because the tradition which came to him did not have the words, or because an instance of this sort had not occurred in Corinth (comp., however, v. 1), or because the matter was self-evident, fornication being itself a dissolution of the marriage bond.—that the wife.—The prominence given to the wife is not to be explained by supposing any reference to some existing case; but it may be accounted for on the ground of the greater inclination of the wife to obtain divorce; since she, as the weaker party, was more liable to suffer oppression, or was more naturally disposed to asceticism.—do not separate herself from her husband.—["χωρισθῆναι, the natural expression for the wife as not having power to dismiss her husband; ἀφεῖναι, the milder form for the husband (see last clause), although it is in ver. 18 used also for the wife. The words are taken from the phraseology of legal divorce; but the cases here spoken of are not so much regular divorces as accidental separations." STANLEY].—but and if she should be separated.—This and the dependent clauses are a parenthesis, so that what follows is in direct connection with what precedes. The words ἐὰν δὲ καὶ χωρισθῇ point to some possible case of divorce occurring hereafter contrary to the command of Christ, and not to any supposed actual separation which might have taken place before the latter should have reached them. The καὶ does not belong to the whole clause, making it equivalent to 'even if,' etc., but simply to the verb, and may be translated by 'actually,' or 'in fact.' ["This is not intended as an exception to the law, but it contemplates a case which may occur in spite of the law.—There are cases undoubtedly which justify a woman in leaving her husband, which do not justify divorce." HODGE.]—On the injunction—let her remain unmarried—See Matth. x. 12.—or let her be reconciled to her husband.—The verb καταλλάγηται had best be taken like χωρισθῇ in a reflexive sense, 'reconcile herself.' This does not, however, exclude the mediation of others. He means that she should do her part towards becoming united to her husband, to secure his love and devote to him her love again.—The injunction on the man is very short.—And that the man put not away his wife.—From the similarity of instruction given to both, we may infer that what was said to the woman in vv. 10 and 11, applied also to the man (Oslander).

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Marriage, its nature and obligations. In the Apostle's view, marriage is a vital and life-long communion between man and woman, involving an equality of claims on the part of both. As a living fellowship, it extends over the entire personality, embracing also our physical nature. And this is precisely the peculiarity of marriage, distinguishing it from all other kinds of friendly connexion. While it involves the element of friendship—as a union of hearts mutually completing each other—it has, likewise, besides this, a mutually supplementing bodily union, viz., the sexual. This has, indeed, its psychical side; yet it comes to its full expression and consummation in the bodily life. Both are in this respect adjusted to each other, and each party needs the other for the proper fulfilment of its position in the sexual relations. The man requires the woman in order to the exercise of his procreative power, in which respect he is "the image of God" (xi. 7) the Creator; and the woman requires the man in order that her capacity for receiving may become an actual conception, and her constitutional fitness for being a mother may attain to its proper development and exercise.

These mutual needs, so divinely ordained, lead to reciprocal obligations and claims in their relations to each other. Each has a right in the body of the other, and each is bound to yield to the other for sexual intercourse, so that no capricious one-sided refusal is allowable. Only an occasional abstinence by mutual consent for higher moral and religious ends is permitted.

* See this point discussed by WILLIAM LEE: The Inspiration of Scripture, Sect. 4, Am. Ed. p. 272, and TOWNSEND, hoc loco.]

But another consideration comes in here. Men are sinful. All their sensual impulses, especially the sexual instincts—the strongest of them all—have escaped from the control of the Spirit, from which they ought to receive their first motion. Instead of being the pure expression and exercise of love—free surrender of oneself for the pleasure and gratification of another—sexual commerce has become one of the worst forms in which a degrading selfishness manifests itself—a selfishness which prompts persons to seek others only to use them for their own gratification. Among mankind thus corrupted, marriage, therefore, appears as providentially designed to guard against the inordinate and irregular satisfaction of sexual passion, so that it shall not be indulged in promiscuously, as opportunity might be afforded; but that two persons bound together during their whole life, and in their entire personality, shall devote themselves to each other even in reference to this particular, [that so, if possible, mere passion may be refined through the power of a purer affection and the discipline of domestic life].

The less now the virtue of continence—that is, the power of the spirit over the animal passions—is cultivated and trained in full strength, the more needful will it be to take care that the abstinence agreed upon for special reasons, be not too long extended, lest either party be exposed to temptation for unlawful indulgence. [See WHWELL'S "Elements of Morality," B. IV. chap. VII., Art. 630. BAXTER'S "Christian Ethics," Pt. II. Chap. 1 and 7. "HARLESS, Christ. Ethik," § 52 A. a.; also "WUTTE'S Sittenlehre, § 152, 153].

2. Celibacy, its occasion, and how far praise-worthy. This stringency of the marriage obligation, which indeed, carries with it a wealth of moral and religious elements, is apt to evoke a reaction through the natural effort of the Christian after liberty and holiness—after an untrammelled and undivided devotion to his Lord—after a perfect consecration of soul and body to his service, and after an undisturbed enjoyment of fellowship with Him. This effort resulting in celibacy, is morally justifiable only on certain conditions. These are: 1, Provided that it is not prompted by a carnal love of ease, and by a dread of domestic crosses, and is likewise free from all spiritual pride and ambition, which, by refraining from marriage, aspires to possess a special sanctity, and to merit a higher degree of blessedness and glory. 2, Provided it is not tinged with mere caprice, or will-worship, or prudery, or vanity, or any such moral perverseness. 3, Provided it is prompted by a consciousness—not, indeed, of an incapacity for marriage, which would render the act morally reprehensible—but of a peculiar fitness for a single life vouchsafed by the Lord, and of a Divine call to some sphere of labor in God's kingdom, to which the married state would offer impediments; or occasioned by providential obstructions put in the way of some desired and sought for marriage connections, and by the quiet pondering of the Divine will as indicated in such occurrences; and, 4, provided, in general, a lack of inclination for marriage—which, on looking up to God and invoking His direction in the matter, comes to be regarded as a Divine hint as to duty—leads a person to remain unmarried. [When these conditions exist, celibacy and widowhood are states wherein some of the noblest traits of the Christian life may be displayed, and are no less honorable than that of wedlock. To disparage them in any way, is to put contempt on the plain doctrine of the Gospel. But no less un-Christian, not to say unnatural, is it to ascribe any inherent superior excellence to these states, and to make them the essential conditions of superior sanctity, and to impose them by authority upon any class of persons in the Church, as, e. g., on the clergy. The Romish doctrine on this point is not merely utterly groundless, but contrary to the express teachings of Scripture, and to the example of most of the Apostles. Paul himself specifies "the forbidding to marry" among the doctrines of devils, and when we would expect him to counsel virginity according to Romish teaching, he says rather (1 Tim. ii. 15) "the woman shall be saved in child-bearing, if they continue in faith and charity." Hence, where the above-mentioned conditions do not exist, and there appears to be a demand for marriage, and a well-grounded hope that it will be a fellowship in the Lord, and for the furtherance of his kingdom, and it appears to be the will of God, then does an obligation arise to enter into it [both for the good of the parties concerned, and] for the propagation of the race, and the rearing of future generations morally, socially and religiously in this relation.

The Apostolic counsels in regard to celibacy, given as they were in anticipation of Christ's speedy coming, in which case the obligation to marriage is lessened by reason of the impending dissolution of all earthly things, acquire new force whenever sure signs lead us to expect this catastrophe as at hand. [See on this subject BAXTER "Christian Ethics," Book ii. chap. 1; WUTTE'S "Sittenlehre," § 295; SCHAFF Hist. Ap. Ch., § 112.]

3. Divorce, its wrong and its right. The voluntary dissolution of a Christian marriage is a departure from a state ordained by God,—the rupture of a covenant with which members of His Church have entered with each other, in His name, and in which they have thus obligated themselves to live together as husband and wife, even under the most severe and trying circumstances, faithful unto death. A separation can properly take place only under the conditions appointed by God Himself, through Christ, viz., the actual dissolution of the marriage bond by the other party in adultery or fornication, which is in fact a surrender of one's self to a third party in such wise as is allowable only in marriage, and is reserved by the ordinance of God exclusively for those thus allied. Should any one wish to separate from his consort out of disinclination to marital intercourse, or from a dread of it, under the idea that it involved defilement, or through a general desire for liberty in this respect, he would, in so doing, be guilty of violating the most solemn obligations, and become chargeable with immorality. When conscientious scruples arise in these respects, it becomes a Christian to consult his pastor, or some experienced Christian friend, and above all to lay the matter in prayer before God, that he may be enlightened and instructed from on high, and that his partner might be induced to enter into some agreement that would not infringe on his conscience. Even though marriage has become burdensome, a person must still bear it from a sense of duty, in obedience to the Divine ordinance, and in conformity with the claims of the institution.— Mere aversion on the part of the one or the other, or of both, mortifications, maltreatment, sickness however incurable, whether of body or mind, furnish no warrant for divorce. A temporary separation, accompanied with a readiness for reunion, may, under certain circumstances, be allowed as the only means for restoring again the disturbed relations, and causing a return to a right tone of feeling, and effecting a lasting improvement.

If anything else, however, can be accepted as a ground for divorce, subsumed as it were under the head of adultery, it is malicious desertion. This means, the deliberate forsaking of the one party by the other, with the unmistakable or declared design of abandoning the marriage connection altogether. And this is nothing less than the actual dissolution of the bond, by which the obligation of the other party to fidelity is annulled. Yet, in this case, no right-minded person will be in haste to obtain a formal divorce. Rather he will be inclined to wait as long as possible, in the hope of seeing some change occur in the temper of the other party, which will lead to reconciliation and cohabitation once more. And such forbearance will show itself, even in the case of adultery, for even in such circumstances may the spirit of Christian faith signalize its patience.—And then, in reference to the forming of a new connection; after so severe a chastisement, which not unfrequently wears the character of a judgment on the conduct of him who suffers it—it may be for the manner in which he contracted the marriage, or for the manner in which he has maintained it—a true Christian will be naturally disposed to consider with great care, whether he ought to enter into a new relation; and with prayer for heavenly instruction he will seek to ascertain what is God's will in the matter, and whether it be not a mere selfish inclination (which we are very apt to take for God's will) that is moving him to marry again. And the whole issue of things he will leave to God, in humble resignation to His decision. And should God's providence seem to enjoin self-denial for a longer or shorter period, he will entreat Him day by day for the supplies of that grace which shall strengthen him to endure in all patience and purity.

But here a new point comes up. If the adultery committed, whether it be in the form of fornication or of malicious desertion, be not a momentary lapse not likely to be repeated, but is a settled thing, which no patience, or gentleness, or efforts at conciliation can overcome, then it will be right to infer that the Christian character of the guilty party is in such a case entirely renounced, and to treat him as standing in the relation of an unbeliever, or, still worse, of a heathen. Here, then, we would have, to all intents, an instance of mixed marriage, such as that spoken of in the next section. It would be in vain, then to look for the hallowing of one party by the other; and all continuance in a connection, which only obstructs the purpose of the Divine calling, and mars our peace, for some vague hope of recovering the lost, would be wholly unwarranted, and contrary to the Divine will.

From that which, according to the rule of Scripture, is right for the individual believer, we may infer the duty of the Church and the State in reference to marriage. First of all, the Church acknowledges itself as bound to the work of the Lord, and can, with good conscience, sanction no divorce and marriage of the separated parties again in other connections, contrary to His expressed will. The State, as an institution, which with its enactments and executive acts is rooted in the principles of Christianity, must aim to conform its marriage legislation to these. But inasmuch as strict conformity is not possible for it, the State must at least grant the Church the liberty of abiding by the decisions of her Lord, and protect it in the maintenance of its right. It must not require the Church to bless those un-Christian marriages which it may feel constrained to allow; nor must it hinder the Church from enforcing its discipline upon those who form permanent connections after a manner ordained by it, when not accordant with the Divine rule. Such is the position to be clearly and distinctly taken in the case.

But it is a question whether our mixed congregations do not admit, or even require some modification of such proceedings?—whether an extension of the principle of analogy already employed in granting divorces for malicious desertion, is not proper and necessary in other cases also, which may in like manner be regarded as a dissolution of the marriage tie. This is one of the pressing questions of the day, a further investigation of which would, however, lead us too far.

Much that is not good has place under the forbearance of our Heavenly Father. And it is a question whether the Church ought not to exercise a maternal patience towards much which she cannot sanction? This, in fact, no one will deny. Nevertheless she must hold by the authority of God's word, and try to enforce it. And her wisdom will show itself in wise endeavors to combine the two in a befitting manner. Consult on this question Ev. Kirch. Zeit. and Neue Ev. Kirch. Zeit. for 1859 [also WHEWELL, Elements of Morality, § 638-635 and § 1027-1037; NEANDER, Life of Christ, § 155, note, and § 224; HERZOG, Enc. Art. Ehe., BAX. Ch. Eth. B. 11, ch. 9].

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

[I. Celibacy or the single state, when maintained for worthy ends, being good, and in accordance with Apostolic example: 1, instead of encountering ridicule, or held in reproach, should be held in highest honor, ver. 1; 2, ought not to be preferred voluntarily, unless in accordance with the clear will of God, as intimated in the gift of continence, ver. 7; 3, should not be enforced by commandment upon any class of persons, ver. 6; 4, when thus enforced it is apt to lead to gross immoralities, ver. 2].

[II. Marriage, too, so far from involving spiritual contamination, as ascetics pretend, is: 1, good, as a safeguard against licentiousness and a help to purity, ver. 2; 2, should be entered into with full consent to all its obligations, ver. 3; 3, involves entire self-denial in affectionate regard each for the other, ver. 4; and 4, can be suspended long only at a hazard to morals, ver. 5; though, 5, a temporary suspension, like fasting, may occasionally be advisable, as furnishing greater freedom to devotion, ver. 5. 6, Being a union for life, neither party is at liberty to move for its dissolution, and one can be released from the obligation only by the infidelity or death of the other, ver. 10].

STARKE:—In view of the race, it was not good for the first man to be alone; in view of special circumstances and gifts it may be good for particular individuals to abide alone, ver. 1.—SPENNER:—Marriage is an antidote to the poison of sensuality.—HED.:—Marriage intercourse is not sinful lewdness—not a mere licensed fornication, ver. 3.—CRUSIUS:—In marriage a person parts with his liberty, and binds his entire person to another, ver. 4.—Marriage pleasures, like all others, may be suspended awhile for purposes of more concentrated devotion, ver. 5.—HED.:—Abstinence is not commanded, only allowed—hence not to practise it is not sinful. Yet even here there must be moderation and self-discipline. All immodest indulgence and abuse of this holy state is an abomination in the sight of a holy God, ver. 6.—HED.:—Without the Divine gift of continence, it were better to marry. Yet even with this a person is at liberty to marry, for thus he is better able to preserve the purity of his married life, especially if he have a partner like-minded, ver. 9.—IBID.:—The desire for marriage is divinely implanted like hunger for food. But alas for the heathenish dishonor and scorn—the hypocritical contempt—the un-Christian prohibition put upon this sacred institution by priests and soldiers!—HED.:—Marriage is no exchange bank. Love must here rule. But what the devil unites, and fleshly lust knits, and avarice and ambition couples, has poor luck and little blessing or aid. Pious people endure, and are silent, and shun evil occasions, and seek peace, ver. 10.—In the married state it often happens that one is not content with the other. But the only remedy in such cases is patience. It is no longer a question, what sort of a wife a man shall have, but how he shall best adapt himself to the one in possession.

BURL. BIB.:—VER. 2. A well-regulated marriage opposes a dam to a large current of scandals.—VER. 4. Many pretend that the man is not bound. But he is. He himself has concluded the bond and given the pledge, and both parties must recognize the debt.—VER. 5. In making vows a person must take himself into careful consideration. Few know the depths of corruption in them and the power of Satan. We must be humble. The agreement to abstain must arise from faith, and faith is humble. Earnest progress in the Divine life requires of them who marry, because of incontinence, that they cherish a constant, heartfelt confidence in God, and devote time and energy to the mortification of the body and to prayer. But since this cannot be properly done, avoid fleshly excite-ments; occasional abstinence becomes needful and obligatory. Yet nature must maintain its original rights; for it is not sin, but only tainted with sin. When purged by the blood of Christ, it resumes its prerogatives. It is God's work, not the devil's. In attempting to destroy the latter, I must not assail the former. Yea, the flesh often gains the more power by too much tampering with the body. In attempting more than we can carry out, we fall back sadly, and then the world taunts and vilifies.—VER. 7. Diversity of character gives rise to a variety of conditions, which must be harmonized by the unific power of Divine grace.—VER. 8. Every mode of life has its advantages and disadvantages, and a Christian must learn to strike the balance.—VER. 10. Marriage should be held sacred. The difficulties which attend it, God must be trusted to remove. If the law of Christianity be regarded as a law, it will, indeed, press hard; but there is mercy under such constraints, and every trouble should be considered an opportunity for the exercise of faith, hope, patience and love. Man is fickle and changeable. If now the marriage relation could be readily altered, this would serve greatly to foster this fickleness and levity, and so increase the evil. Hence, we see the holiness of the Divine ordinance even in respect to its apparent severity. Adultery alone is allowed as cause for divorce, and this because it breaks the bond. All other causes originate in a dread of the cross, and against this we must ever strive. Instead of following our natural inclinations when, c. g., a man has an invalid wife, he should reflect: 'so must I remain; here is my opportunity to exercise love; here I ought to be gladly; here is a Lazarus. God is now putting me to the proof.'—VER. 11. "Let her remain unmarried," and so let another burden press her, because she has wished to escape the burden of God's law. "Or let her become reconciled," this were better done. But it will cost more than a couple of words to do it. There will be needed earnest effort, a disposition to renew her covenant and begin it afresh in quite a different spirit from before.

HEUBNER:—VER. 1. A single life is commendable for a man only when it is maintained for the kingdom of Heaven's sake. The worth of celibacy is conditioned on personal relations and the period in which a person lives.—VER. 4. Man and wife belong to each other—body and soul. There must be a corresponding surrender on the part of each.—VER. 5. It is our duty to put limits on the charm of marital intercourse, in order to have time and inclination for religious exercises. There is danger of clogging from too much indulgence. Hours of solitude and prayer preserve the sweetness and purity of marriage. Christianity hits the golden mean.—VER. 7. It is the token of a holy heart when a person can wish that all were like him.—VER. 8. A false asceticism comes not within the scope of the Apostle. 1. What he gives is advice, and that, 2. suited to the times. 3. Elsewhere he gives marriage the preference (Eph. v. 2f.), and reckons the prohibition of marriage among the doctrines of devils (1 Tim. iv. 3); 4, and ascribes no merit to celibacy, which state has worth only when the heart is pure.—VER. 10. According to God's law marriages are as indissoluble as is the union of Christ with His Church.

[OLSHAUSEN:—Ver. 2. An apparently low view of marriage; but only its negative side here presented in view of particular circumstances. There is implied here an indirect exhortation to proud Christians not to sink into the slough of sin by a contempt of marriage.—Ver. 8. The begetting of children, not the only legitimate end of marital intercourse. It is the outward expression of a true spiritual union].

[CALVIN:—VER. 5. The importance of abstinence in marriage for the purpose of prayer, no more proves the evil of the thing than the importance of fasting for the same purposes proves the evil of eating and drinking. But it is the part of believers to consider wisely when to eat and drink, and when to fast. So in the other case.—Ver. 6. A false estimate of virginity led to three errors: 1, pronouncing it the most excellent of virtues, and the very worship of God; 2, adoption of it by numbers who had not the gift; 3, the enforcement of it on the ministry, and their consequent awful corruption—while many prudent and pious men were kept from the sacred calling, refusing to ensnare themselves in this way. See Inst. B. IV. chap. XII. § 23-28].

CHAPTER VII. 12-24.

12 But to the rest speak I,¹ not the Lord: If any brother hath a wife that believeth 13 not, and she² be pleased to dwell with him, let him not put her away. And the 14 woman which [who] hath a husband that believeth not, and if he³ be pleased to dwell 15 with her, let her not leave him [her husband⁴]. For the unbelieving husband is sanctified by [in, ἐν] the wife, and the unbelieving wife is sanctified by [in, ἐν] the 16 husband [the brother⁵]: else were your children unclean; but now are they holy.
17 But if the unbelieving depart, let him depart. A brother or a sister is not under 18 bondage in such cases: but God hath called us [you⁶] to [in, ἐν] peace. For what 19 knowest thou, O wife, whether thou shalt save thy husband? or how knowest thou, O
20 man, whether thou shalt save thy wife? But as God [the Lord⁷] hath distributed [allotted] to every man, as the Lord [God⁸] hath called every one, so let him walk.
21 And so ordain I in all churches. Is [Was] any man called being circumcised? let 22 him not become uncircumcised. Is any [Has any been?] called in uncircumcision?
23 let him not be circumcised. Circumcision is nothing, and uncircumcision is nothing, 24 but the keeping of the commandments of God. Let every man abide in the same calling wherein he was called. Art [Wert] thou called being a servant [slave]? care 25 not for it: but [even] if thou mayest be made free, use it rather. For he [the slave] that is called in the Lord, being a servant [om. being a servant] is the Lord's freeman:⁹ likewise also [om. also] he [the freeman] that is called, being free [om. being 26 free], is Christ's servant. Ye are bought with a price: be [become] not ye the ser-
27 vants of men. Brethren, let every man, wherein he is called, therein abide with God.

² Vers. 12, 13.—Αὐτή—οὗτος, [according to A. B. C. D.¹ F. Cod. Sin.]. The Rec. has αὐτή—αὐτός.

³ Ver. 13.—Rec. has αὐτός, to conform with ver. 11. The great preponderance of authorities is in favor of τὸν ἀδελφόν.

⁶ Ver. 17.—The Rec. has transposed the proper order of ὁ κύριος and θεός on very feeble authority. [A. B. C. D. F. Cod. Sin. Syr. read as above].

⁸ Ver. 22.—The Rec. has καὶ after ἀποκρίσεις with K. L. It is omitted in A. B. Cod. Sin. Syr., and by Alf, Stanley].

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

VERS. 12-14. But to the rest.—By these he evidently means those living in mixed marriage, having been converted in wedlock. From this it is plain, that in what he has been saying he has had to do solely with parties who were both Christian. But now he comes to consider a relation to which the command of our Lord does not absolutely apply. That was a command for disciples alone; but here those were involved who did not acknowledge subjection to him; and the continuance of the connection depended largely on their own free will. In this case now, the Spirit of the Lord, dwelling in the Apostle, and developing more fully and completely the injunctions given by him on earth, was called to make known what was right, in accordance with the mind of Christ. And it is to this he points when he premises—say I, not the Lord.—[The distinction here made, is simply one of fact as to the form—not one of authority]. His injunction is still an expression of the Lord's will—if any brother has an unbelieving wife, let him not put her away.—Yet this is conditioned on the pleasure of the wife—if she be pleased to dwell with him.—And this presupposes, on the one hand, that the husband, by reason of his higher love, and of his conviction of the sanctity of marriage, had an inclination to abide with his wife; and, on the other hand, that the wife had some respect for Christianity, and presented no obstacle to the practice of it. [“We see from this how despised the Christians were at that time by the heathen, since even wives would leave their husbands because they had been converted to Christianity.” BILLROTH. And the threat of this is one great obstacle to the conversion of men in heathendom at this day].—Οὐκ εἰναι is used in the classics the same as here, and in this connection means, to house with. [Here CHRYST. says: “He that putteth away his wife for fornication is not condemned, because he that is one body with her that is a harlot, is polluted; and the marriage bond is broken by fornication, but not by unbelief. Therefore it is lawful to put away a wife for the former sin, but not for the latter. But is not he who is joined with an idolatress one body? Yes, but not polluted by her. The holiness of the faithful husband prevails over the unholiness of the unbelieving wife. They are joined together in that respect in which she is not unholly. But not so in the case of an adulteress.” WORDS.].—And whatever woman have an unbelieving husband, and this one be pleased to dwell with her.—In καὶ οὗτος there is a change of construction, which appears also often among the Greeks. It is the introduction of a demonstrative in an accessory clause. Otherwise it would be καὶ αὐτός, which the Rec. has. [On this oratio variata see WINER § LXIII. 2, 1; also on the use of οὗτος for εἰς τὴν see JELF, § 816, 3, 7].—Let her not repudiate her husband.—The use of ἀρκεῖν in reference to the wife is somewhat remarkable. It means [properly, to put away, and is the same word as that used in the case of the man; but] here, to leave, to give up; [and so the E. V. renders it, making a distinction in the rendering by reason of the diversity of the subject. Alford well says, “this is unfortunate;” and there seems no adequate reason for it, as may be seen from what follows. Robinson translates alike in both cases]. Elsewhere, Mark x. 11, ἀπολύειν is predicated as well of the wife as of the husband. Bengel, whom Meyer follows, says, “the nobler part dismisses,” and this, in this instance, is the Christian party. According to Greek, as well as Roman law, the wife also had the liberty of obtaining divorce; among the Jews, too, the law in this respect was somewhat modified by Rabbinical definitions. LIGHT. II. 191. [Hence, there is good ground for affirming that it is not simple abandonment, but formal divorce that the Apostle here prohibits. So Hodge].

The above injunction he next proceeds to establish; and opposes the tendency to desertion arising from the dread of contamination through intimate communion with an unbeliever, by pointing to the fact, that in this case [the grace of Christianity triumphs over the disparity, and] the unbelieving party, [so far from desecrating the other, is himself sanctified by connection with the believing one.]—For the unbelieving husband is sanctified in the believing wife, and the unbelieving wife is sanctified in the brother.—The verb ἁγιασται, is sanctified, is not to be construed subjectively; since the supposition is, that the sanctifying principle—even faith, is here wanting. Neither does it point to a future conversion anticipated, (candidatus fidei); still less does it imply the sanctification of the marriage intercourse through the prayer of the believing party; but it denotes the Christian theocratic consecration. The unchristian partner standing, as he does, in vital union with a believer (one flesh), participates in his or her consecration, and is not to be regarded as profane, but as connected by this link to the Church of God, and to God's people. The phrases, ἐν τῇ γυναίκῃ—ἐν τῷ ἀδελφῷ, in the wife—in the brother, denote that the sanctification here comes through the Christian partner, whose character, as holy, passes over and is imputed to the unchristian partner. Hence, it followed that the marriage was still to be regarded as one acceptable to God, and that, therefore, the Christian party was to continue therein, so far as it was possible for him or her to do so. True enough it was, indeed, that the unbelieving party, by his consent to remain in such relation to the Christian community, afforded some ground for hope that he would, in the end, prove altogether acceptable to the Church, under whose spiritual influence he was thus brought; but this fact is not here distinctly expressed.

To prove this relative sanctification of the unbelieving party, through connection with the believing one, he introduces the following apagogic statement.—Else were your children unclean, but now are they holy.—Ἐπεὶ ἡ ἀρὰ; since then, i. e., in case this sanctification did not exist (comp. chap. v. 10). His meaning is this: if that vital communion which existed between the married parties, of which one was a believer and another not, imparted to the latter no sacredness, then it would follow that the like vital union between Christian parents and their children, would not impart to the latter any sacredness,—that the children of Christians themselves must be regarded as impure and profane, like the heathen. But to such an inference he opposes the views already held among them, that these children were holy,—that they, by virtue of their vital connection with Christian parents, were to be regarded as properly belonging to God's holy people. And if such a view were tenable, he argues a like result in favor of the unbelieving married parties; that they were similarly sanctified by a collateral union.

[Hodge, however, with more correctness, states the argument differently. He says: "The most natural, and hence the most generally adopted view, is this: 'The children of these mixed marriages are universally acknowledged as holy; that is, as belonging to the Church. If this be correct, as no one disputes, the marriages themselves must be consistent with the laws of God. The unbelieving must be sanctified by the believing partner, otherwise your children would be unclean, i. e., born out of the pale of the Church.'—The principle in question was not a new one, to be then first determined by Christian usage. It was, at least, as old as the Jewish economy, and familiar wherever Jewish laws and the facts of Jewish history were known. Paul circumcised Timothy, whose father was a Greek, while his mother was a Jewess, because he knew that his countrymen regarded circumcision in such cases as obligatory." Acts xvi. 1-3. Barnes most unaccountably interprets "unclean" to mean "illegitimate." Then "holy," of course, must mean legitimate, contrary to all usage.]—This whole argument militates against, rather than favors the existence of the practice of Infant Baptism at that period. (Comp. Meyer and de Wette, Stud. and Krit., 1830, p. 669ff.; [also Neander, Stanley and Alford in loco].) Had such a practice existed, it would be fair to presume, that the Apostle would have alluded to it specifically, in confirmation of his position. Here, most of all, would have been the place to have mentioned it by name, as furnishing ecclesiastical authority for the view he had taken. The fact that he did not mention it, therefore, affords some reason for concluding that the rite did not exist.]—It is another question, however, whether this passage does not furnish an important ground on which to establish the rite of Infant Baptism. According to Jewish notions, the baptism of a female proselyte sufficed for that of her child, which was afterwards born of her, so that this did not then need to be baptized. But so far as baptism is a means of grace, we may infer from this statement of the Apostle, that there was a claim for it on the part of the child, who had been already consecrated to God by virtue of his having been born of Christian parents. That relation to the kingdom of God which is founded on parentage, is sealed through baptism; and the child is set apart in a solemn manner as a partaker of the fulness of grace imparted to the Church. [On the whole subject see JOHN M. MASON'S Works, Vol. IV., pp. 378-382, who takes this in direct evidence of Infant Baptism; and also Hodge's note, who says: "Some modern German writers find in this passage a proof that Infant Baptism was unknown in the Apostolic Church. They say that Paul does not attribute the holiness of children to their parentage; if they were baptized—because their consecration would then be due to that rite, and not to their descent. This is strange reasoning. The truth is, they were baptized, not to make them holy, but because they were holy. The Jewish child was circumcised because he was a Jew, and not to make him one. So Christian children are not made holy by baptism, but they are baptized because they are holy." See also HOOKER, Ec. Pol. Ch. LX.] "Τμῶν refers to the Christian parents generally, who in mixed marriages were not excluded. Νῦν δὲ, but now, logical, as in chap. v. 11. On ἀγία compare Bengel and Osiander.

VERS. 15, 16. He here considers the possible alternative.—But if the unbelieving depart—How then?—let him depart.—That is his affair; he must be allowed to decide it for himself. And in such a case "let the brother or sister be patient, nor let him think that anything ought to be changed which cannot be changed." BENGE. That which follows, annexed by no connecting particle, confirms this advice.—The brother or the sister is not bound in such cases.—He here assigns the reasons why a divorce should be allowed on the part of the Christian; and the words cannot simply mean: 'he is not bound to crowd himself upon the other,' [to insist upon the connection, as in the case where both are Christians (as Photius, Alford, Billroth)]; but they carry the further implication: 'is not unconditionally bound to the marriage relationship like a slave,'—"is free," Δέδερα, as in ver. 39 (comp. Osiander). The words ἐν τοῖς τοιοῖτοις are either Masc. by such (not, to such) as separate themselves; or which is better, Neut.; under such circumstances (comp. Phil. iv. 11; Rom. viii. 37; Jno. iv. 87). "The Apostle only means, that in matters of religious conviction, one person cannot be the slave of another, [that a married Christian person cannot be forced to remain with a heathen consort, if the latter will not allow the exercise of his own religious views. Under such circumstances separation should be allowed; but concerning liberty to marry again, nothing is here said." NEANDER.]*—But in peace God hath called us.—This is directly connected with the foregoing, and confirms still further the propriety of the injunction: "let him depart."—The determination to continue in marriage against the will of the other party, would lead to hatred and strife; and this would be contrary to the peaceful character of the Christian calling.—Ἐν εἰρήνῃ, in peace, i. e., either: 'to this end, that we may live in peace'; in which case it would be equivalent to: unto peace [according to our English version] denoting the object of the call; † or:

* Here it will be seen that Neander does not find in the expression, "is not bound," all that Kling does, i. e., an absolute release from marital obligation. And in this he coincides with Hammond, Whitby, Bloomfield and others, who suppose that nothing more than a separation from each other's society is here allowed. Yet the use of the word δέδερα, is bound, in ver. 39, where it evidently implies the marriage bond, seems to sustain Kling's view. The desertion of the unbelieving party leaves the believing free. If any restriction upon this freedom was intended, we find it only in the context (see vv. 10, 11, and 50). "This passage," says Hodge, "is of great importance, because it is the foundation of the Protestant doctrine, that wilful desertion is a legitimate ground of divorce." President Welsey, however, in his Article on Divorce, in the New Englander, April, 1807, pp. 228-233, argues with great plausibility and force against the legitimacy of the inference. The whole controversy turns upon the meaning given to the words οὐ δεδούλωται, "is not bound." Does this phrase imply absolute release from the marriage obligation, and permission to marry again? or does it simply give permission to the deserted party to live apart without feeling constrained to enforce cohabitation? Persons interpret variously, according to their predilections. In fault of any deciding element in the text, it will perhaps be best to abide by the injunctions of Christ, in Matth. v. 31, 32; xix. 3-9.]

'since he has proclaimed to us the Gospel of peace, the essential effect of which is peace,'—denoting the way and mode of the calling (comp. Eph. iv. 1; 1 Thes. iv. 7; Luke xi. 11). Fundamentally, both constructions amount to the same thing; and imply that any separation would contravene the spirit of the Divine calling, inasmuch as it would increase existing estrangement and cause new outbreaks. ["Hence it is that the Rabbins, and Maimonides famous among the rest, in a book of his, set forth by Buxtorfius, tells us that 'divorce was permitted by Moses to preserve peace in marriage, and quiet in the family.' MILTON.] This view, corresponds to the whole train of thought, and agrees well with what follows. On the other hand, that view which regards the Apostle as here putting a limitation on the injunction: 'let him depart,' introduced adversely by the particle, ὅτι, as if he meant to say: 'a separation, however, ought, if possible, to be avoided,' is at variance with his line of argument [see below].

The Apostle yet further confirms his advice by obviating a doubt which contained a strong motive for resisting separation in the case supposed, viz.: whether the salvation of the unbelieving party, which might be secured by a continuance of the connection, would not hereby be cut off. This he meets by pointing to the utter uncertainty of the results of any efforts directed to this end.—For what knowest thou, O! woman, whether thou shalt save thy husband.—The meaning is, thou canst have no assurance that thou wilt be the means of saving him. [On the force of the εἰ, see JEN. Vol. II., § 877 B.].—Σωζειν, to save, as in chap. i. 18, is used here in a relative sense, q. d., to be the instrument of saving, as chap. ix. 22; Rom. xi. 14; 1 Tim. iv. 16.—["This verse is generally understood as stating a ground for remaining united, as ver. 18, in hope that conversion of the unbelieving party may follow. Thus ver. 15 is regarded as altogether parenthetical. But 1, this interpretation is harsh, as regards the context, for ver. 15 is evidently not parenthetical,—and 2, it is hardly admissible grammatically, for, it makes εἰ=εἰ μή,—'What knowest thou, whether thou shalt not save?' Lyra seems first to have proposed the true rendering, which was afterwards adopted hesitatingly by Estius, and of late decidedly by Meyer, de Wette, and Bisping; viz., that the verse is not a ground for remaining united, in hope, etc., but a ground for consummating a separation, and not marring the Christian's peace for so uncertain a prospect as that of converting the unbelieving party. Τὶ οὐδας εἰ thus preserves its strict sense: what knowest thou (about the question) whether, etc.? and the verse coheres with the words immediately preceding, ἐν εἰρήνῃ κέκληκεν ἡμῶς ὁ θεός. Those who take εἰ for εἰ μή, attempt to justify it by referring to 2 Sam. xii. 22; Joel ii. 14; Jonah iii. 9, where the LXX. have for Heb. יִרְיָהּ, τίς οἶδεν εἰ, to express hope: but in every one of these passages the verb stands in the emphatic position, self, and the result of it, viz., rest. An instance of this breviloquence he finds here. The peace is the abiding condition in, which those who have been called unto it are to rest. Nor must the use of the perfect here be overlooked.]

and the LXX. used this very expression to signify uncertainty." ALFORD. These arguments seem conclusive. They are received also by Billr. and Neander, and are virtually advanced by Kling, in the 1st Ed. President Wolsey, in his very carefully digested articles on Divorce, in the New Englander for Jan., Ap. and July, 1867, which are well worthy of study on this whole subject, says of the attempt to make this a dissuasive against separation: "Logic will not bend to this meaning." Words., Barnes and Hodge, however, do not admit their force. The latter says, "it is contrary to the whole animus of the Apostle. He is evidently laboring throughout these verses to prevent all unnecessary disruptions of social ties." No such special pleading, however, is apparent. If there be a point aimed at, it would seem rather to be to put the believer in the highest spiritual condition preparatory to the coming of Christ, that his obligations previously incurred would admit of. And this liberation from the bondage of a heathen partner, 'who has departed,' is one of the blessings he secures. Yet it must be added, that while the grammatical argument, and some of the logical bearings, support Kling's view, the sentiment involved in the other interpretation is thoroughly Scriptural (1 Pet. iii. 1, 2), and is favored by most interpreters because of its gracious tone. Most of the Homiletical and Practical remarks cited in this section proceed upon it.]

Obs. 1. Our passage, especially ver. 15, forms, as is well known, the Scripture ground for divorce on account of malicious desertion. But the support given is not direct or absolutely reliable. The Apostle is here speaking only of mixed marriages, in which the will of the unbelieving party is the chief thing under consideration. But for purely Christian marriages there is no other ground allowed in Scripture for divorce but adultery or fornication, which is an actual rupture of the marriage tie. The only question therefore is, whether the language of Christ is to be interpreted as giving a law literally and universally obligatory, or only laying down a principle which admits of being applied analogically, so that other circumstances also that are in fact a breaking of the bond, may be taken as furnishing good ground for divorce. In the latter case, malicious desertion would very properly be regarded as one of these circumstances.

Obs. 2. In regard to the phrase, 'is not under bondage' (ver. 15), the question arises, whether, according to the intent of the Apostle, a second marriage is allowed or forbidden. The words themselves express neither the one nor the other, and it is altogether arbitrary to supply the clause: 'but let her remain unmarried,' from ver. 11. Rather we may say with Meyer: "Because Paul does not apply our Lord's prohibition of divorce to mixed marriages, he does not intend also to apply his prohibition of a second marriage in Matth. v. 22 to such cases."

["Although a Christian may not put away his wife, being an unbeliever, yet if the wife desert her husband, he may contract a second marriage. Hence even Romish divines declare that in this case marriage is not indissoluble. Thus A. Lapidé says here: 'Observe that the Apostles in this case not only permits divorce of bed (thori divortium), but also of matrimony; so that the believing spouse is at liberty to contract a second marriage. Otherwise a brother or sister would be subject to servitude. And it is a great servitude to be held fast in matrimony, bound to an unbeliever; so that even though the latter desert you, you are not able to marry again, but must contain yourself and lead a single life.' And in support of this opinion he refers to St. Augustine, de Adulterinis Conjugiis, c. 18 and 19. St. Thomas and Ambrosiast., who says: 'The respect of a spouse is not due to him who condemns the Author of marriage, but a person is at liberty to unite himself to another.'" WORDS., who singularly contradicts this view in his comments on the next verse].

VER. 17. If not to each one as the Lord hath distributed, each one, as God hath called, so let him walk.—There are two points here in regard to which commentators differ: 1. The connection with what precedes, formed by ei mh; 2. The relation of the parallel clauses, beginning with dc: as,—whether they express essentially the same idea or different ideas. As it respects the second point, it is clear from what is specified in ver. 18ff., that Paul is here speaking of that position in life in which each one finds himself when called to be a Christian. The first of these clauses, then, designates this position as a lot appointed to each one by the Lord ["it is a dramatic metaphor, which will bring to mind a celebrated passage in Hamlet." BLOOMFIELD]; the second, as a position in which he received his call to salvation. It is to this position that the particles "as" and "so" refer. The two clauses, then, are not tautological. The use of the title 'Lord,' in connection with 'distributed' (utpote) is somewhat remarkable, since Paul generally employs this title of Christ. From this fact we are to explain the change of place between the two words, 'the Lord' and 'God' in the received text; since the former would rather be regarded as the subject of the verb 'call,' although the act of calling is also frequently referred back to God. This difficulty has led some to regard 'gifts' as the implied object of 'distributed,' i. e., the higher and Divinely-conferred qualifications for the state and calling of individuals (comp. ver. 7). Thus Osiander, Bengel, and others. But in ver. 7, the gift, which would then be treated of here, is referred back to God; and in the exposition which follows, so far from there being any hint of this, one would rather suppose that 'Lord' was to be taken as synonymous with 'God.' This might be explained on the score of a wish merely to change the form of expression, and of the fact that Paul was here speaking of the act of Lordship. The explanation of Reiche, who refers the words, "as the Lord hath distributed," to the beneficence of Christ (comp. Meyer, ed. 3), is neither supported by the context nor warranted by the position they occupy before the words, 'as God hath called.'

In respect to the first point, however, viz: the connection of this verse with the preceding by ei mh, it must be confessed that an explanation altogether satisfactory does not exist. If we supply χρησεται from ver. 15, or σωσεις from ver. 16, then it would have read: ei de mh, or ei de kai mh, and this would be a decided objection, apart from all other considerations arising from the unsuitableness of the idea obtained, viz: 'but if she should not depart,' or: 'if thou dost not save her.'—If, again, we join ei mh to what directly precedes, making it mean, or not, this would be both ungrammatical (hence the variation h mh), and would only weaken the force of the question.—If, moreover, we should refer the clause ei mh—d kbricos to the preceding words, this would be to read asunder parallel clauses most unjustifiably, and the consequent explanation, nisi prout quemque Dominus adjuverit, would be both flat and inconsistent with the meaning of the words themselves. To take ei mh as equivalent to alla, is contrary to usage.—If we render the words by: 'only,' then there is no suitable connection with the foregoing sentence; for to go back, as de Wette does, to 'is not bound' would be a very questionable overleaping of what intervened. But, not to say anything of the fact that it does indeed serve for the confirmation of ou dedolwrai, yet it does not suit, inasmuch as the contents of ver. 17 would then be put in entire contradiction to the above statement (ou dedob.). We should then be obliged to supply some phrase like this: 'in case that condition, viz: the departure of the unbelieving party, does not occur.' It still remains for us, with Grotius and Meyer, to attach ei mh to ver. 16, in the sense of except, or unless, and to supply oidate, you know, from 16: 'unless ye (know this, your obligation), let every one walk, etc.' How hard this construction is, every one can perceive; where, instead of going straight on with the words: 'that it is necessary for us so to walk as God hath called each one,' we have the abrupt introduction of the imperative form. Besides, there arises also an incongruity between the contents of ver. 16 and ver. 17. (See what has been observed above). We prefer here to allow a (philological) non-liquet, and accept Bengel's translation, which is most in accordance with the course of thought: 'if this be not so, otherwise (ceteroquin).' We might, perhaps, take ei mh in the sense of if not, and understand it to imply: 'provided no element comes in to destroy the purpose of the Divine calling' (ver. 15), as in the case mentioned,—the desertion of the unbelieving party. [Is it not, after all, the simplest method to consider this as resuming the implication of the previous question, and making it the basis of the following injunction, q. d. 'How knowest thou whether thou wilt convert thy husband? If not, if thou canst not know this fact, then let each one go quietly on his course, as the Lord has marked it out for him in his Providence. If it be to be deserted and left alone, let him accept that destiny, and not fight against it to the aggravation of all difficulties.' In such a view of the words we have no need of inserting a de. We would no more need it in Greek than in English. The argument is here on the rapids, and its flow is far from smooth].

[As to the two clauses, they are, as Kling asserts, by no means tautological, but seem to imply more than he states. In the first, Paul confines himself to the allotment of Providence in the case of desertion. But he at once recollects himself, as standing upon a broad principle, applicable not only to the parties directly in view, and their particular allotments (ἐμπράν), but also to all conditions and callings in life (ἐκκλησίαι). And here we see the reason why, in the first instance, he uses the term ὁ κύριος, the Lord, evidently referring to Christ. To the deserted one he intimates that it is the dear Saviour after all that rules in the lot, and it is not contrary to his or her salvation. It is a touch of tenderness. But when at once his view expands to all vocations and conditions of humanity, he uses the more seemingly universal epithet, God (ὁ θεός). And then it was natural for him to add—and so I ordain in all churches.—He here shows the great breadth of the principle he enjoined, and the emphasis he put upon it. It was nothing framed for the case of the Corinthians alone, but ran through all his teachings. Hence, they were the more bound to abide by it. Each one every where was to continue walking (περιπατεῖν) in that course of life, and in that outward state, where Christianity found him. This thought afterwards is more definitely expressed by μένειν. "Here we learn the general fact that Christianity does not disturb existing relations, so far as they are not sinful, but only aims to infuse into them a new spirit. Hence, it opposes every thing revolutionary." NEANDER.

VERS. 18, 19. Has any man been called who has been circumcised?—In illustrating his general precept, he takes into consideration, first, the religious position of the individual, with its outward token showing whether he was a Jew or not when making a profession of Christianity. In the one case, as little as in the other, does he approve of a change being attempted; because nothing at all depended upon these external signs, but every thing (comp. iii. 7) upon the keeping of God's commandments (comp. Rom. ii. 25 ff.),—upon the faith which works by love (Gal. v. 6). In opposition to the externality of such self-chosen God-service he insists upon the moral character—the obedience that involves faith (comp. 1 Jno. iii. 23) as that which alone has or imparts value for the kingdom of God (comp. Calvin and Osiander). In ver. 18, as also afterwards in ver. 21, some take the clauses to be questions; others as hypothetical statements. The latter is the more emphatic. Yet we might also regard them as direct assertions, as for example: "There is one who has been called, etc., let him not become uncircumcised." The word ἐπισπένδει denotes the drawing of the prepuce again over the glands—its artificial restoration which was effected by a surgical operation. This was often practised by the Jews of a later time, both when they lapsed into paganism, and when, from shame or fear of the heathen, in times of persecution, they wished to hide their nationality, and also, when they appeared naked as combatants in public sports (comp. 1 Macc. i. 15; JOSEPHUS Antiq. xii. 5, 1; and SÜNKERT Stud. and Crit., 1835, p. 657 ff.). Such were called קטנים. recutiti. A like measure must have been resorted to by the Corinthian Jewish converts, who wished not to be behind the converts from heathenism in their entire abandonment of the law, and who, therefore, wished to wipe out all trace of Judaism from their persons.—Was any one called in uncircumcision—ἐν ἀκροβυστία, as in Rom. iv. 10 (comp. Acts xv. 1). The desire of the heathen converts to become circumcised we are to regard as a Jewish reaction against all such Hellenism. Both vv. 18 and 19 are asyndetic by way of giving life and emphasis to the style.—Let him not be circumcised. The circumcision is nothing, and the uncircumcision is nothing, but keeping of the commandments of God.—[Supply: 'that, indeed, is something, yea, every thing.' "In this, as in the two exactly parallel passages, Gal. v. 6, and vi. 15, the first clause is the same. 'Circumcision availeth nothing, nor uncircumcision;' thus asserting the two sides of the Apostle's principle of indifference to the greatest of the Jewish ceremonies, exemplified in his conduct by the circumcision of Timotheus on the one hand, and by the refusal to circumcise Titus on the other. The peculiar excellence of the maxim is its declaration, that those who maintain the absolute necessity of rejecting forms, are as much opposed to the freedom of the Gospel, as those who maintain the absolute necessity of retaining them. In contradistinction to this positive or negative ceremonialism, he gives, in the several clauses of each of these texts, his description of what he maintains to be really essential. The variation of the three passages thus become valuable, as exhibiting in their several forms the Apostle's view of the essentials of Christianity—'Keeping the commandments of God,' 'Faith working by love,' 'A new creature.' These describe the same threefold aspect of Christianity with regard to man, which, in speaking of God, is described under the names of the Father, the Son, and the Spirit. In this passage, where man is viewed chiefly in his relation to the natural order of the world, the point which the Apostle wished to impress upon his hearers was, that in whatever station of life they were, it was still possible to observe the 'commandments of God' (perhaps with an implied reference to the two great commandments, Matth. xxii. 36-39). In the two passages in the Epistle to the Galatians (ver. 6; vi. 15), the more distinct reference to faith in Christ, and to the new creation wrought by His Spirit, is brought out by the more earnest and impassioned character of the argument." STANLEY].

VERS. 20-22. Each one in the calling in which he is called, in this let him abide.—Paul here goes back to his general rule, thus finishing up the special application in ver. 18, and introducing another illustration. The demonstrative, 'in this,' comes in by way of emphasis. The κλήσις, however, does not denote vocation, a position in life determined by the Divine Providence; for it nowhere else occurs with this meaning. (In Dion. H. the word κλήσις is used to denote the distinctions among the citizens at Rome, i. e., classes, which, however, does not mean the same thing). Rather we might say, with Bengel, that it denotes "the state in which the Divine calling finds one, which is in-star vocationis: as a calling." ["As he was called, so let him remain." ROBINSON]. But as applied, usage is against it. In the New Testament κλήσις is uniformly used to denote the calling or invitation unto God's Kingdom. This goes out broadly to all men, of every condition in life, addressing them as they are. It says, 'thou circumcised one, thou uncircumcised, thou slave, thou freeman, believe on the Lord Jesus!' It takes the man, therefore, as he is, in his own peculiar position in society, and in this way designates this position as compatible with Christianity, and capable of being sanctified by it. Hence, no surrender of it is required. On the contrary, the injunction is to abide therein. So we at last reach the above-mentioned sense of the word, but not in such a way as to imply that ελευθερία carries in itself this signification of a peculiar vocation. [Of course the injunction here given is supposed to be limited by the obvious consideration that there is nothing in the person's condition which is inconsistent with the Divine vocation. If there be, a change will be necessitated.]—As a slave art thou called.—After specifying in ver. 18 the religious distinction, which divided the entire human race at that time in respect to its outward token, and pronouncing it indifferent in relation to the kingdom of God, he comes now to the great distinction that existed in social life,—that between slaves and freemen, and affirms that a position of servitude even is by no means inconsistent with that of a Christian, and, therefore, that the slave, who becomes a believer, need not be troubled about changing his outward state.—Let it not concern you—i. e., as though you, in this eternal bondage, could not, as a Christian, and as a freeman, pray or serve God; and must be curtailed of your Christian rights.—But if also thou art able to become free, use it rather,—ἀλλὰ εἰ καὶ δύνασαι ἐλευθεροῦ γενέσθαι, μάλλον χρησάσαι. The meaning here is much disputed. Some supplement χρησάσαι with τῇ ἐλευθερίᾳ, from ἐλευθεροῦ, take ἀλλὰ as equivalent to: 'but' (aber), and attach καὶ, not to the whole sentence, but to ἐλευθεροῦ, and translate: 'but if thou mayest in any way also become free, use this freedom rather.' But against this it is justly objected: 1. that καὶ ought in that case to stand before ἐλευθεροῦ, and 2. that what immediately precedes and what follows (ver. 22), as well as the scope of the whole clause, does not indicate that he is exhorting the slave to seek a change in condition. Rather the whole drift of the argument is the other way—to make men content with their lot, and so favors the other explanation, that which regards ἀλλὰ as equivalent to: sondern, on the contrary, and εἰ καὶ to mean: even though, and makes the being called as a slave, the object of χρησάσαι; and then translates: 'but even though thou mayest be made free, use your servitude rather, [as a means of discipline, and an opportunity for glorifying God by showing fidelity therein]. It may be said, indeed, that this conflicts with the general spirit of the Apostle. But in opposition to this Meyer justly observes: that the advice to improve opportunities for becoming free, which was rendered unimportant and trivial by the anticipation of the speedy advent of Christ, was, on the other hand, by no means incompatible with the exalted idea of Paul, that all men were one in Christ (Gal. iii. 28), and that in Christ the slave was free, and the freeman was a slave

(ver. 22). Compare also Bengel (who adds explanatorily: for he, who might become free, has a kind master, whom it were better to serve than to seek other avocations, 1 Tim. vi. 2, comp. ver. 22: and sets aside the apparent contradiction between this and ver. 23, by saying: it is not said then, 'be not,' but 'become not the servants of men'), and Osiander, who, in the end, observes, that the severity of the advice becomes moderated by the consideration of the very tolerable condition of slaves in the civilized States of Greece, where, in many respects, they enjoyed the protection of law, and the masters did not have the power of life and death over them. "The question assumes a different aspect altogether in the slave States of North America; for there the slaves are prevented from becoming Christians, and in this way good care is taken that the fundamental principles respecting the position of Christian slaves cannot come into application. And this is one of the most frightful violations of Christian principle." BURGER. [Thank God! we can put this into the past tense now].*

For the slave who was called in the Lord is a freeman of the Lord, in like manner he who was called as a freeman is a slave of Christ.—The advice just given, is here sustained by a general truth, and the person who was called as a slave is comforted in respect to his condition. The Apostle shows how the converted slave must estimate his relation to Christ, viz., as swallowing up all the evils of his earthly lot, and conferring on him a blessed emancipation; and how the freeman has to regard his relation to Christ, viz., as one that puts him under obligations to obey. Mark the connection between the phrases 'in the Lord' and 'of the Lord.'—By 'called in the Lord,' he signifies either, that which the calling involves, i. e., to be in Christ; or, what is simpler, the Being in whom the call is grounded. Or it may even denote the sphere in which the calling is to be fulfilled—the element in which the person called is to live. Hence it may be equivalent to: has become a Christian.—In the expression: 'the Lord's freeman,' the Lord will, of course, not be understood as the person who had liberated the individual in question from His own service; since it was in Satan's service that he was previously bound, but as the one to whom he belonged in consequence of his liberation from the yoke of the other, and for which he was under deep obligations to his deliverer. Yet he belongs to Christ, not as a slave, but as a freeman, since in the sphere of Christ there is liberty (comp. 2 Cor. iii. 17; Jno. viii. 32, 36); there all slavery is done away, and the persons so liberated become His possession.—Of course the freedom here spoken of is moral and religious freedom—deliverance from the bonds of guilt, and from the power of sin; just as in the antithesis, the servitude meant is a state of moral and religious obligation to Christ—of absolute inward dependence on His grace and will. The points here contrasted belong together, as complements of each other (comp. Rom. vi. 16 ff.). "Hence the distinction between master and slave is here virtually obliterated. To be the Lord's freeman, and to be the Lord's slave, are the same thing. The Lord's freeman is one whom the Lord has redeemed from Satan, and made His own; and the Lord's slave is also one whom Christ has purchased for Himself. So that master and slave stand on the same level before Christ. Comp. Eph. vi. 9." HODGK.]

* [Stanley's comment is too important not to be given entire. "The question here is, whether to understand ἐλευθερία or δουλεία after χρησάσαι: whether the sense is, 'Take advantage of the offer of freedom,' or 'Remain in slavery, though the offer is made.' It is one of the most evenly balanced questions in the interpretation of the New Testament. 1. χρησάσαι may either be 'choose,' or 'make use of,' although it leans rather to the former, and thus favors the first interpretation. 2. εἰ καὶ may either be, 'If, besides, thou hast the offer; or 'Even if thou hast the offer,' although it leans rather to the latter, and thus favors the second interpretation. The sense of this particular verse favors the first: for, unless the Apostle meant to make an exception to the rule which he was laying down, why should he introduce this clause at all? The sense of the general context is in favor of the second; for why should the Apostle needlessly point out an exception to the principle of acquiescence in existing conditions of life, which he so strongly recommending? The language and practice of the Apostle himself, as described in the Acts, favor the first interpretation: e. g., his answer at Philippi, 'they have beaten us without a trial, and imprisoned us, being Roman citizens; . . . nay, let them come themselves and take us out,' (Acts xvi. 37); and to the tribune at Jerusalem, 'but I was free born' (Acts xxii. 28). The general feeling of the Church, as implied in the Epistles and in this passage, favors the second interpretation; it would hardly have seemed worth while to grasp at freedom in the presence of the approaching dissolution of all things; and the apparent preference thus given to slavery may be explained on the same grounds (see vv. 22, 30) as the apparent preference given to celibacy. The commentators before the Reformation have chiefly been in favor of the second; since, in favor of the first; but Chrysostom observes that, in his time, there were some who adopted the view favorable to liberty; as, there have been some Protestant divines (e. g., Luther) who have adopted the view favorable to slavery. On the whole, the probability seems slightly to incline to the second; and the whole passage is then expressive of comfort to the slave under his hard lot, with which the Apostle sympathizes, and which he tenderly alleviates (as in Philém. 16, 17), though not wishing him to leave it. And if, as is possible, the prospect of liberty, to which the Apostle alludes, arose from the fact of the master being a Christian, this sense of the passage would be still further illustrated and confirmed by 1 Tim. vi. 2: 'Let not [the slaves] that have believing masters despise them, because they are brethren, but rather serve them (ἀλλὰ μάλλον δουλεύετε τωσαν).'" Calvin, Beza, Grotius, Hammond, Hodge, Barnes, and most English commentators, declare decidedly for the first view: but the best modern German Exegetes, d. Wette, Meyer and others, follow the early Greek Fathers in adopting the second.]

VERS. 23, 24. Ye were bought with a price.—The thought of belonging to Christ leads to the ground of this relation, viz., the purchase of the believer by Him (comp. vi. 20).—From this the exhortation follows, not to be faithless to the obligation thus imposed, by coming under servitude to men.—become not the servants of men.—As the transition to the plural shows, he is here addressing the Corinthians at large. What he dissuades them from, is not simply men-pleasing in general, and compliance with their immoral demands; nor yet undue attachment to human guides; but rather such a subservience to popular opinion as would cause them to seek a change in their external social position (so Fritzsche and Meyer). Paul is here showing the Christian slaves a trace of freedom, even under their outward yoke. The slaves who are obedient to their masters for the Lord's sake (1 Pet. ii. 13), belong in truth to no man. Hence, no Christian, dearly purchased and called from sin, death and the devil, to true liberty, should make himself so dependent on man, as to imagine that he was not really free, even though he had a master over him (Besser).—Less in accordance with the immediate connection Osiander says: "No one should abrogate his true freedom, or his true subjection, by sacrificing his faith to unbelieving masters or companions." To suppose a reference here to slaves, implying that they should not serve men merely (Eph. vi. 6); or to freemen, that they should not dispose of their liberty;* or, which would be better, that they should not become morally subject to men, is unwarranted.—The whole digression from ver. 17 [entered upon by way of illustration], he concludes with an exhortation essentially the same as in ver. 20.—Wherein each one was called, brethren, in that let him remain with God.—Here also the emphasis is on the words "in that" (ἐν τούτῳ); and its antecedent denotes that relation in life which a person occupied when called. The adjunct 'with God' (παρὰ θεοῦ) is somewhat peculiar. It may mean: directing his mind towards God as in His presence (= ἐν ὧν ὁ τοῦ θεοῦ); or: as in God's sight, tantum in spectante Deo, (Grotius); (comp. Pa. xiii. 2; Eph. vi. 6), or: in communion with God. The injunction would then be: 'let every one continue in his original condition and relations; and yet so conduct his affairs as not to disturb his fellowship with God in them.' The last interpretation is undoubtedly to be preferred as introducing a new thought more definitely, and such a one too as refers that which is hinted at in ver. 23, to its proper connection with the absolute principle of Christian life. ["To live near to God is, therefore, the Apostle's prescription both for peace and holiness." HODGK.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Christianity as the absolute religion is distinguished by the fact, that it takes up into its own sphere every legitimate occupation or function in life; and either ennobles it by its sanctifying power, or allows it as something indifferent, so far as its spiritual work is concerned. The contrasts in religion between Jews and Heathen, externally symbolized by circumcision and uncircumcision, vanish in the Christian sphere; there the only thing which is held valid and imparts value, is the entering of man, with his entire personality, into holy covenant with God. This takes place by faith—faith which works by love; so that the uncircumcised, who is thus found in faith, is like to the circumcised, who in like manner believes. Hence, neither the one nor the other has any reason for passing out from his own state into that of the other; as though circumcision, the token of bondage to the law, were unworthy of a Christian who has been freed from the law; or as though uncircumcision, the sign of a position outside the covenant and promise, were a hindrance to a participation in the same.—The contrasts also of civil life, such as those which exist between the slave and the free, likewise vanish, so far as it respects the inward life. The slave, as belonging to Christ, is a freeman, bound only inwardly to Christ, whom he serves in everything which he has either to do or suffer in his position; since he does and suffers everything for His sake, or because it is the will of his Lord that he should do and suffer that which his position involves, and thus should honor Him, and prove that communion with Christ makes a servant faithful and zealous. On the other hand, the freeman, as a Christian, is bound to Christ; his acts proceed not from caprice, but in constant subjection to Christ's will. As a person who is outwardly dependent on another, is a freeman when in communion with Christ, since in his devotion to Christ, all dependence upon other men is done away; so is the person who is outwardly independent of another, made a servant by his connection with Christ, since in his entire dependence on Christ, all arbitrariness, arising from his outward independence, is removed. Thus are both essentially alike; and the slave has no reason to strive after a change of his external position, as if his dignity as a free Christian man were conditioned upon it.

* ["The practice of selling one's self was for quantity in slave markets, such as must have been at Corinth." STANLEY. But this plainly could not be the thing referred to here. Though Hammond, A. Clarke and others so construe the passage.]

It is altogether another thing, however, when within the limits of Christendom a mighty irrepressible reaction arises against slaveholding, on the part of such as wish to be Christians, and to be counted a part of Christendom. For men who are destined one day to have part in Christ, the Son of Man, the Saviour of all (even though they have not as yet any actual part in Him), are even, on this account, bound to have their personality respected, and are not to be treated always as chattels. It is inconsistent, therefore, with the spirit of Christianity, for such as for Christians, to presume on perpetuating bondage; and Christendom ought not to rest until it has wiped out this stain. For such has been the tendency of the Gospel from the beginning. Ever since the first centuries, in proportion as Christianity has gained the ascendancy, has it operated more and more to put an end to slavery.

2. Christian Freedom.—There is something great in the freedom of a Christian, into which he has been lifted by faith—a freedom wherein he is freed from all things, and is independent of all, and yet, through love, is the servant of all. (See Luther's remarkable treatise, which has this title). In that faith, which apprehends the eternal word of God, and beholds the unseen and future world disclosed therein, he acquires the pilgrim-sense, which looks on the fashion of this world as passing away, and keeps from all entanglement in its business, in its connections and possessions, in its use and enjoyment; nor allows himself to be captivated by it. Yet, on the other hand, so long as he is outwardly occupied with it, he overlooks or neglects nothing; but rather bestows upon it all requisite duty, care, and oversight; attending to it, while he stands inwardly about it. His chief occupation, viz: his care for the kingdom of God and for a participation in it, he in no way suffers to be disturbed; and, for the sake of the highest good, he is always ready to sacrifice everything else, however dear; indeed, in all his having, and holding, and using, he is intent only upon how he can serve the Lord, further His ends, prove himself to be

His follower, and do every thing in His name and to His honor (x. 31. Col. iii. 17).—So also in marriage he aims at the same thing, by his tender solicitude for his wife, by pious domestic discipline, by acquisition of a livelihood, by skill and fidelity in the use and enjoyment of temporal goods, by moderation, beneficence, etc. The same holds good, also, of joy and sorrow, and of the various experiences arising from the vicissitudes of life. In this also does the Christian maintain his inward freedom. Not that he is devoid of feeling—not that he affects a stoical apathy; rather, in the midst of deep emotions, his aim is to preserve a mastery over self, and keep composed in God; so that joy ever resolves itself into filial gratitude; and pain, into filial resignation; he is enthralled by no affections, he is carried away by no passionate desires.

[8. Importance of unity of religious faith in married life.—According to its true ideal, marriage is the union of a man and woman in their entire personalities, and for their entire earthly existence. Being mutual complements of each other, they combine to form a larger and complex whole; “for they are no more twain but one flesh.” But in order to the perfection and harmony of this union, and for the fulfilment of ends for which it was instituted, it is necessary that there be a prevailing fellowship in thought and feeling, in ends and aims, in interests and pursuits, not only in respect to their natural, but also in respect to their spiritual life. Thus only can their influence on each other be kindly, and they prove mutual helpers in joy and sorrow, in cares and labors; thus only can they properly contribute to the happy development of each other's character, and suitably cooperate for the training of their children and management of their household; thus only can that good be realized, in all its fulness, which was contemplated when it was ordained that ‘man should not live alone.’

It follows, therefore, that precisely to the extent that the fellowship above spoken of fails, there will be a lack of sympathy and coöperation, and occasion furnished for alienation, strife and separation. The perfect oneness of the flesh is in danger of being interrupted and broken, when there is not also oneness of spirit. And to such evil and bitter consequences do those Christians expose themselves who become voluntarily allied in marriage to the children of this world. Supposing their faith sincere, the bond which unites them to their partners can only be the lower one of the natural life. In all their deeper experiences, in all their more important hopes and aims, there is essential and irreconcilable antagonism. “For what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness? and what communion hath light with darkness? and what concord hath Christ with Belial? or what part hath he that believeth with an infidel? and what agreement hath the temple of God with idols?” Harmony, in such cases, can be preserved only by “agreement to disagree,” or by an inconsistent and irksome compliance of each with the wishes of the other in the greater part of those pursuits and pleasures which involve their common action. And when there is not in the worldling a conviction of the superior worth of religion, and a considerate affection, which tolerates what it cannot share in, the effect upon the religious life of the other can only be disastrous. Instead of that kindly sympathy and furtherance so needful to the cultivation of piety, there is perpetual obstruction interposed in the way of every higher duty. Household religion becomes impossible. And so also the religious instruction and training which the Christian parent would exercise upon the children, is neutralized by the irreligious example of the other.

For such evil results there can be no responsibility incurred when conversion has taken place after marriage. But those who have voluntarily hazarded them under earthly inducements must bear the burden of the blame and take the consequences, as the penalty for consenting to be unequally yoked, contrary to the very nature of the marriage rite. For the Christian the condition of a blessed marriage is, "in the Lord." This is at once highest reason and Divine precept].

[VER. 12-24. This section shows I. the method in which Christianity entered into, and revolutionized human society. 1. It assailed no existing social institutions from without; marriages, callings, conditions were to remain as they were. 2. It wrought from within, sanctifying and ennobling the individual character. 3. It employed the existing bonds of society, as conductors through which to diffuse its saving power—sanctifying wives through husbands, and husbands through wives; children through parents, and parents through children, and even servants through masters, and masters through servants. 4. It aimed at the preservation of peace, as far as possible, in consistency with being in God. 5. It ignored outward distinctions—counting the external condition as of little moment, in comparison with the inward state. 7. It begot contentment with the outward estate, by imparting a blessing which more than counterbalanced all earthly ill. 8. It reconciled the opposite poles of human condition, freedom and obligation in the love it engendered, making the slave a freeman, and putting the freeman under obligations to serve, and making all alike free, and alike obligated. And 9. It placed all in the presence of God, in whose sight it constrained believers to live; whose honor it urged all to subserve; and from whom it invited all to derive their chief good. II. The true mode of preaching the Gospel. It is 1, to bring the individual to believe in, love and serve the Lord; 2, to teach him how to improve the circumstances of his condition to the discipline and improvement of his character; 3, to show him how he is to make the very evils that press upon him a means for illustrating the greater power of the Gospel, and for promoting the glory of God.]

STARKE (HEDINGER):—1. To the pure all things are pure (Titus i. 15). As it does not injure a pious man to dwell under godless rulers, so also does it not injure a believer to dwell with a heathen wife, [i. e., in case he finds himself living with her when called, and she consent to dwell with him without interfering with his religious obligations]. 2. Where married people profess one Christ and one Gospel, and yet, one party, if not both, cleave to the world, there is then certainly an occasion for exercising patience and charity, ver. 12, 13. And 3. If one of the married parties is a believer, then is the other party sanctified by the communion of the marriage state, and the children are holy in virtue of that gracious covenant which God has instituted with believers and their seed. Gen. xxii. 7. 4. A pious partner may be able to win and convert his irreligious companion, by means of the word, prayer, and Christian conversation. (1 Pet. iii. 14). 5. If one of the married parties becomes faithless, and withdraws from his covenant, and can be recovered by no instrumentality, then is the other party free, and the Church authorities themselves declare him free, ver. 15. 6. It is not enough that married people should hold together in friendship and in earthly communion, but each ought to assist in promoting the salvation of the other. ver. 16. STARKE:—Since one condition and calling is in itself the same as another before God, it becomes every one to be content with 'whatsoever state he is in' ver. 17.—We must forget what we were before we belonged to Jesus, and think only of how we may sanctify our hearts for Him now.—In Christ no regard is paid to external conditions, whether it be for honor or contempt. Outward circumstances pass for nothing before God; they neither hinder nor help in the matter of our eternal salvation. Acts x. 34. God is no respecter of persons. ver. 18, 19. It is a glorious proof of the preëminence of Christianity, that it adapts itself to all nations, communities, ages and conditions in life, and is to them what salt and seasoning is to our food. ver. 20.—Thou poor man! art thou doomed to live in servitude and oppression; be of good comfort! Thou mayest yet please God, and attain to everlasting liberty (Eph. vi. 8). ver. 21.—To be a servant in the eyes of the world, and a freeman in Christ before God, is honor, comfort, and blessedness enough. Gal. iii. 26, 28. Hast thou been made free, abuse not thy freedom for a cover to iniquity (1 Pet. ii. 16); but serve thy Lord, Christ, in righteousness and true holiness (Tit. ii. 14). ver. 22.—Away with all lords and masters, who are opposed to Christ.—Gratefully should we estimate the great benefit of freedom of conscience which we have in the Evangelical Church, and improve it all the more worthily, Phil. i. 27. ver. 28.—Although one vocation in life may be subject to more temptations than another, yet every one nevertheless stands under the providence of God; and if sufficient care be taken, we can remain with God in all. So, then, this remaining with God in every calling should be the first thing sought for and practised. 1 Pet. i. 15, ver. 24.

BERLENE. BR.:—When married to a heathen, or an infidel, a Christian ought simply and earnestly to consider the providence of God herein, and not cut himself loose arbitrarily. Rather he should regard and improve such a state as a happy opportunity for exercising the spirit of Christ; and to this end he should pray for this spirit, and endeavor to convince and win the unconverted spouse at least by his good conduct alone, if by nothing else.—Thou art not at liberty to refrain from any possible means for effecting. at least preparatorily or initiatively, the conversion of thy associate. Since we all belong to each other, God uses all conditions and occasions for sanctifying one person through another. God desires, therefore, that we all aim at this point. This is a sacred thing in His sight. Therefore our conditions and circumstances are wisely ordered with reference to this end.—The children are holy. By prayer they are taken from Satan and consecrated to God as their rightful Lord. vv. 12-14.—Liberty should be enjoyed with a readiness to suffer if need be; then it is good, and one can accept it. This is better than arbitrarily to consent to be a slave.—God does not begrudge us peace. But, at all events, we are not to think of our own trials, but to look to the sanctification of the other.—Suffering comes from sin. If a way, however, is open to a better condition, let a person improve it. Not that we should shrink from necessity and privation; but if God shows a way of escape, let us escape; and then be prepared to suffer again, if God will.—Where God appoints, there I abide in peace. But peace is often lost, simply because people are not prepared for all circumstances. ver. 16.—Each one has his own duties. Hence we are not to look upon others. Be thou only true on thy part. God wills not that any should perish; but, in the apportionment of other matters, we must concede to Him His absolute right.—Each one stands under the providence of God, and as that eye leads, so let each one walk suitably to his calling, and do nothing in and of himself. Let no one undertake anything which he is not certain in his own conscience that God would have him do. Only on such terms can a man be sure of God's blessing.—In spiritual matters we should faithfully follow the promptings of the Spirit of God. But in externals, the Gospel as little requires us to imitate the ways of others, however innocent, as it allows others to enforce their ways upon us. All arbitrariness is hereby cut off; and our conduct exhibits all suitable obedience to God, industry and fidelity, submission and patience,—in short the whole round of Christian duty towards God, our neighbor and ourselves.—On such righteous behaviour in our calling, our well-being for time and eternity depends. Not that we become blessed through such external performances, but our mode of life is so closely connected with the spiritual state of our souls, that the one cannot exist aright without the other. He, who in external matters lives disorderly, falsely and iniquitously, cannot possibly remain sound and honest within. He who, on the contrary, is in heart well ordered, governed and protected by God, can also conduct himself rightly in external things.—Inward perfection consists in following one's gifts.—Outward perfection consists in discharging one's own obligations in such conditions and callings as God has placed us in. ver. 17.—Men often gladly pass by the essential commands of God, and take up some incidental matters as the main objects of their regard (comp. Matth. xxiii. 23); but Paul says: 'nothing is as you apprehend it.'—But to perform the will of God—to be obedient to His light, and Spirit, and word—this is of consequence; and the new creature in Jesus Christ is every thing (Gal. vi. 15). ver. 11.—Most men make themselves servants to each other; but O! let each man recognize the greatness of his own soul, and what it has cost. It has cost the blood and life of God, which is more than all the world,—yes, hundred thousand worlds. And yet, oftentimes, this soul, so great, so noble, is sold for a trifling enjoyment—a little piece of foolery.—All those, who in any respect act upon Christ, their true pattern, have passed into the imagination and thoughts of men, and so have become their servants. But so far as thou art a servant of men in any other sense, thou withholdest from God His due. The Lord tolerates no rivals: He also needs no vicegerent, nor anything of the sort. He is alone, and there is no second. His honor He will give to no other. (Is. xii. 8). He is the bridegroom, and to Him only the bride shall listen. He is the Lord, and to Him only shall men hearken. ver. 23.—So great is the value put upon the immortal soul, that God takes upon Himself the labor and the care of it, calls each one especially out of His own free grace, and appoints certain ways and methods, in which each one may and should pass his life on earth beneficially and well. For this also he furnishes all the means requisite, and wisely ordains the result; and everything which He gives into our hands, He sanctifies to our use, if we will but follow Him. But each one must be certain of his calling; and in this calling let him remain and improve his gifts to the general good. Let us adorn the place to which God has appointed us, so that everything may stand and go on well in His house.—Our calling and its use must be sanctified by remaining with God and in His presence. Apart from this, our calling is subject to a curse, although in itself it were never so proper and promising. Each one must learn to look upon his state and calling wisely, and remember how it has become corrupt in and through the fall, and how the best things in life also have become vitiated by a will alienated from God, and how much that is impure cleaves to most of the modes of life, and how all such things continue only under the forbearance of a holy and merciful Creator. Bethink thyself, accordingly, how humbly and worshipfully thou hast to live in thy station before God. The blessing to spring from it must be sought from God and in communion with Him. What comes from God is good, and can also transpire in the name of God.—Faith is quiet communing with God; and while it is nothing pusillanimous, neither is it at the same time audacious. It is God in us.—Were we always calm in that position where we happened to be, and only sought to fulfil these, the ordinary duties of a true Christian satisfactorily, this would be the best thing for us, and the most acceptable to God.—There is no station in which one cannot attain to blessedness—in which he may not live in God and abide in Him; and this we can do through love—an affection which we may cherish in all circumstances. 1 Jno. iv. 16. Everything then turns on this, that each in his own station abide with God and keep near to Him. ver. 24.

RIEGER:—VERS. 20, 21. If God has not allowed thine external circumstances to hinder His bringing to thee His heavenly calling, and to advance thee thereby to the glorious possession of our Lord Jesus Christ, suffer thou not such circumstances to hinder thee from walking worthily in the Gospel, but regard thy station in life as a most favorable opportunity for serving the will of God in thy day and generation. Do not defer the inward duty, viz., obedience to the heavenly calling, because of some external circumstance. Think not to effect this or that change first, but in whatever circumstances God summons thee, and deems thee worthy of His calling, in those be assured that He will bring thee successfully through. Everything turns on the amount of light a person has from the Lord, to enable him to fulfil his vocation conscientiously, and to make it tolerable also for himself. God does not advise us to change our external condition, but to change our hearts. But if any mode of life can be spent with God, and in the light of His presence, let a person therein abide with God.

[BARNES:—VMB. 20, 24. Change in a man's calling should not be made from a slight cause. A Christian should not make it unless his former calling were wrong, or unless he can by it extend his own usefulness. But when that can be done he should do it, and do it without delay. If the course is wrong, it should be forthwith abandoned. No consideration can make it right to continue it for a day or an hour; no matter what may be the sacrifice of property, it should be done. If a man is engaged in the slave trade, or in smuggling, or in piracy, or highway robbery, or in the manufacture and sale of poison, it should be at once and forever abandoned. And in like manner if a young man who is converted can increase his usefulness by changing his plan of life, it should be done as soon as practicable.]

CHAPTER VII. 25–40.

25 Now concerning virgins I have no commandment of the Lord: yet I give my judgment,
 26 as one that hath obtained mercy of the Lord to be faithful. I suppose therefore that this is good for the present distress, I say, that it is good for a man [person, ἀνθρωπος,] so to be. Art thou bound unto a wife? seek not to be loosed. Art thou loosed from a wife? seek not a wife. But and if thou marry, [But if also thou mayest have married] thou hast not sinned; and if a virgin marry, she hath not sinned. Nevertheless shall have trouble in the flesh: but I spare you. But this I say, brethren, the time [henceforth] is short [narrowed down]: it remaineth,^a [omit, it remaineth, insert, in order] that both they that have wives be as though they had none; And they that weep, as though they wept not; and they that rejoice, as though they rejoiced not; and they that buy, as though they possessed not; And they that use this world,^a as not abusing [overusing] it: for the fashion of this world passeth away.
 32 But I would have you without carefulness. He that is unmarried careth for the things that belong to the Lord, and how he may please^a the Lord: But he that is married careth for the things that are of the world, and how he may please^a his wife.
 34 There is difference also between a wife and a virgin.^b The unmarried woman careth for the things of the Lord, that she may be holy both in body and in spirit: but she that is married careth for the things of the world, how she may please her husband. And this I speak for your own profit;^c not that I may cast a snare upon you, but for that which is comely, and that ye may attend upon the Lord without distraction.^d But if any man think that he behaveth himself uncomely toward his virgin, if she pass the flower of her age, and need so require, let him do what he will, he sinneth not: let them marry. Nevertheless he that standeth steadfast in his^e heart, having no necessity, but hath power over his own will, and hath so decreed in his heart that he will keep^f [in order to keep] his virgin, doeth^g well. So then he that giveth her in marriage^h doeth well; butⁱ he that giveth her not in marriage doeth^j better. The wife is bound by the law^k [omit, the law] as long as her husband liveth; but if her husband be dead, [sleep, κοιμηθῇ] she is at liberty to be married to whom she will; only in the Lord. But she is happier [more blessed] if she so abide, after my judgment: and I think also [om. also] that I [also] have the Spirit of God.

- ¹ Ver. 29.—Γαμήτης, the Rec. has γήμη in conform'ty with what follows; the former is better attested [and preferred by Alf. Stanley]. Others [D. E. F. G.] read λάβης γυναίκα—a gloss [found in D. E. F. G.].
- ² Ver. 29.—The various readings are ἐστὶν before, or after τὸ λατρεῖν; some repeat ἐστὶν λατρεῖν with and without τὸ. The older authorities have τὸ λατρεῖν ἐστὶν (see Exeget. and Crit.).
- ³ Ver. 31.—The Rec. τὸ κόσμῳ, a correction. The right text is τὸν κόσμον (without τῶν), which originated in what follows. [So A. B. D. F. G. followed by all good editions].
- ⁴ Ver. 32, 33.—Ἀπίστει; Lachmann ἀπίστῃ; less probable, because more common. [Yet it is found in A. B. D. E. F. G., and is preferred by Stanley. Alford reads ἀπίστει.]
- ⁵ Ver. 34.—Many readings and punctuations. See Exeget. and Crit.
- ⁶ Ver. 35.—Συμφορον. The Rec. συμφορον. The former is supported by the older authorities [A. B. D.].
- ⁷ Ver. 35.—Εὐπρόσδεον is better supported than the Rec. εὐπρόσδεον, being found in [A. B. D. E. F. G.].
- ⁸ Ver. 37.—Αὐτοῦ is strongly supported, and is indeed original.
- ⁹ Ver. 37.—The τοῦ before ταπειν is indeed omitted by good authorities, but is nevertheless strongly supported [A. B. D. E. F. G.], and besides is the more difficult reading [Meyer, de Wette, Alf., have it; Stanley rejects it].
- ¹⁰ Ver. 37, 38.—Lachmann reads ταπειν with good, but not sufficiently adequate authorities.
- ¹¹ Ver. 38.—Ὁ ἐγαμίζων. So Tisch., Meyer, Lachmann [Alford] and others [after A. B. D. E.]. The reading γαμίζων τὴν παρθένον ἑαυτοῦ, though indeed sustained by important authorities, is nevertheless perhaps a Gloss.
- ¹² Ver. 38.—Καὶ ὁ. The Rec. ὁ δὲ. The former is the original [found in A. B. D. E. F. G.], the latter was substituted by reason of the contrast implied.
- ¹³ Ver. 39.—The Rec. has νόμιμ taken from Rom. viii. 2 [omitted in A. B. D. F.], and by Alford, Stanley, and other critics.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

VERS. 25-28. But now concerning virgins.—In what follows Paul speaks indeed of unmarried men also, but it by no means follows from this that the word παρθένος, virgin, should be extended to both sexes.* This would not suit with New Testament usage, for in Rev. xiv. 4, it stands only as a predicate, and describes a state; [Hodge, on the contrary.].—Virgins, properly so-called, are the ones to whom his counsel here applies. Yet a reference to other unmarried persons is also involved. Schott (in his studies upon the Epistles to the Corinthians, Luth. Zeit. 1861-4) supposes him to denote such single persons of both sexes as had chosen the celibate state to serve the Lord in, whether as Deacons or Deaconesses, or in the free exercise of their gifts; [similarly Bengel, Olsh. But Meyer, et al., limit the designation to the female sex.] The δέ indicates an advance in the discussion, which now returns from its digression to its proper theme, and contemplates the same in a new aspect.—I have no commandment of the Lord; but I give my judgment.—Ἐπιταγή, commandment, just as in ver. 10. “We see here how important it was, in the view of the Apostle, to distinguish the positive commands of the Lord, from all others. This care of his presupposes with great probability the existence at that time of not merely an oral, but also a written tradition of the discourses of our Lord. Here we have a sure fixed point against the theory of the mythical origin of the Gospels.” NEANDER. [“This passage has furnished the two words γνώμη and ἐπιταγή, which the Vulgate translates “consilium” and “preceptum,” advice and command—the origin of the famous distinction of later times, between ‘counsels of perfection’ and ‘precepts.’ In this passage the distinction lies only in the fact that one was a command of Christ, and the other his own opinion, although pronounced with Apostolical authority.” STANLEY.] Respecting γνώμη consult on chap. i. 10. Here it means, best judgment, advice, counsel, (as in ver. 6, συγγνώμη). But this advice he presents as something important and worthy of consideration, by adding—as one that hath obtained mercy of the Lord to be faithful.—In this he, on the one hand, brings to view his Apostolic authority, showing that he is worthy of reliance, and that what he advised was something which ought to be accepted as agreeable to the mind of the Lord, even though it may not have been credibly handed down in any express precept of His, according to the saying of Christ, “Who-soever heareth you heareth me.” But, on the other hand, he speaks as in 2 Cor. iv. 1, in all humility giving honor to the grace of Christ, who had lifted him out of the depths of misery into this Apostolic office, and had given him the Spirit of truth, and had so revealed to him his own mind, that the advice he gave should merit perfect confidence (comp. ver. 40).—Πιστός, as in 1 Tim. i. 12, 15, Rev. i. 5, not exactly in the sense of believing (Olst., Meyer, de Wette), nor yet precisely as true (Billr. and Rückert), but, faithful [as a steward, and dispenser of the hidden things of God. Winer, sec. iv. 2; and so Stanley. Bloomfield says: “as one worthy of credit,” referring to 1 Thess. ii. 4. “Faith makes a true casuist.” BENDEL].—In ver. 26 ff., he gives his advice, first, in reference to the unmarried in general, and comes to speak of virgins in particular, not until ver. 36. The judgment is then introduced with a modest νομίζω [“which seldom, if ever, denotes in Scripture an absolute authority or decree, but a matter of opinion or private judgment, Matth. v. 17; x. 34; xx. 10; Luke ii. 44; 1 Tim. vi. 5, etc.” BLOOMFIELD].—I suppose, therefore, this to be good on account of the present distress, that it is good for a person so to be.—i. e., unmarried. [Perhaps better, οὕτως, so i. e., as he is, married or single. This better suits the context; and the other is too far-fetched]. From the infinitive construction, he passes over into that, with ὅτι, to which he might have been prompted by the subject of the clause, τὸ οὕτως εἶναι, so that we need not assume, with Meyer and others, an anacoluthon here. [Yet it is very like one, and is so regarded by Alford and Stanley.] De Wette renders ὅτι, because, and τοῦτο, as referring to the being unmarried; and makes the sense: ‘because it is, in general, good for men to be unmarried;’ but here, he inserts the words: ‘in general,’ and his explanation by no means tallies with the clause: ‘on account of the present distress.’—Κάλλον here designates that which is fitting, or advantageous, as may be seen in the ground alleged. [Ἀνδρό-πω—general term, including females, and might be rendered person]. By “the present distress,”

* Bloomfield says, Crit. Dig.: “The most eminent modern commentators are agreed that it must refer to both sexes, and thus be equivalent to our single persons; a sense not only recognized by the ancient Lexicographers, but occurring also in the Classical writers. So Krause, Lampe, Schleiermacher.”

he means either some then urgent necessity,—according to some, the famine under Claudius, according to others, marital cares and sufferings (?), and, according to others, the oppressions and persecutions of Christians, according to Möhler, the eradication of the sexual impulse in marriage; or it were better to understand by it some impending catastrophe just on the point of occurring,—it may be the fearful crisis and bitter conflicts just preceding the coming of Christ (dolores Messie) which was anticipated as near. [So Alford and Stanley (comp. Matth. xxiv. 8, 19, 21). At all events, the reference must be to something extraordinary. This is implied in the epithet ‘present.’ And it is nothing more than “a Popish perversion,” as Bloomfield says, “to change this from a special to a general admonition.”] This ground avails naturally also for the explanatory clause,—Hast thou been bound to a wife? do not seek a separation. Hast thou been loosed from a wife? seek not a wife.—In the latter clause, his advice to single persons already introduced by ἀνδράσω, in a general way, is more plainly brought out. This appears in the form of a contrast, as repeating the injunction of ver. 11, evidently for the sake of avoiding a misconstruction by opposers, of what had been previously said. [So Meyer and de Wette; but Alford more plausibly questions this, and takes the conjunction to be simply explanatory of his ‘so to be’]. Here also, as in vv. 18, 21, various grammatical constructions are possible. It is best to regard the introductory clauses as either hypothetical or declarative: “If thou art bound, then,” etc.; or: “Thou art bound, seek not,” etc., the sense is the same. The γυναικί stands as in Rom. vii. 2, ἀνδρί: Dative of communion.—Δέλυσαι, ‘hast thou been loosed?’ implies primarily the dissolution of a connection before existing, whether by death, or otherwise. [If this be insisted on, the subsequent injunction of the Apostle must then be interpreted of a second marriage]. But in this connection the simple fact of being free or unmarried, in general is meant; and the expression is introduced simply for the sake of harmonizing with δέδεσσαι, ‘hast thou been bound?’ [so Alford; and Bengel, who says “that the latent participle here has the force of a noun.” It is also remarked by Grotius and others, that passives in Heb. and Gr. are often used as neutrals’]. That the injunction: “do not seek a wife,” is to be taken merely as advice, is plain from what follows.—but even if thou shouldest have married, thou hast not sinned.—Not so, however, would it be in the other case. There would be sin in a married person seeking to be loosed. Hence it was only the last clause that was advice. [‘From these words it has been rightly inferred that there were among the Corinthians persons, like those spoken of (1 Tim. iv. 8) forbidding marriage, as if it were sinful.’ Bloomfield]. Γαμήσης lit.: ‘If thou shouldest have married.’ In like manner γάμος. The word γαμίζω can be predicated also of the woman, if no accusative is appended. Otherwise the phrase is γαμεισθῆναι τινα, to be married to some one.—After quieting all doubts of conscience in the matter, he points to another consideration which was closely connected with the present distress.—Tribulation in the flesh, however, will such people have.—If with Calvin and others we here conceive an allusion to domestic troubles, these must be understood as intensified by the ‘distress,’ since the relations entered into by the married people (their cares for husband, wife and children, and bodily needs) involve peculiar perplexity in times of persecution and of other troubles (comp. Luke xxiii. 28; Matth. xxiv. 19). The words: ‘in the flesh,’ are to be connected either with ‘tribulation,’ or with ‘shall have;’ the sense is the same. Σάρξ, flesh, denotes the lower sensuous life, with all its interests; here it refers to the domestic life, with its manifold solitudes about food, and clothing, and the preservation of things appertaining to it from all injury, etc. Οἱ τοιοῦτοι, such people, i. e., such as marry.—But I spare you.—Paul here expresses his paternal benevolence; q. d., ‘in giving you such advice, I would fain obviate all your troubles.’ Φείδομαι stands here for φειδοίμην ὑν, I desire to spare you. Paul is not here ascribing to the unmarried any greater moral excellence than to the married, as Romanists imagine; but is only contrasting the comparative outward ease of the one, with the burdens which will press on the other by reason of approaching troubles. [Another interpretation given by Augustine and the Latin Fathers, and preferred by Estius, Newmacher, and Bloomfield, is: ‘I spare you the pain of dilating on those evils’—parallel to 2 Cor. xii. 6]. This seems to be confirmed by the following, τοῦτο δὲ φημι: ‘but this I do say’].

VERS. 29–31. He now proceeds to confirm the advice above given, and to render his readers more inclined to follow it.—But this I say, brethren.—Τοῦτο, this, might refer to what precedes, provided only the εἰ, because, were genuine. But now it can serve only to introduce what follows, and that, too, in such a way as to exhibit the importance of this opening—the time henceforth is shortened, in order that.—Here the punctuation and reading are contested. The reading best accredited is ἐστὶν τὸ λοιπόν. In this case, as in the reading τὸ λοιπὸν ἐστὶν, τὸ λοιπόν may be connected with what precedes, as well as with what follows. On the contrary, were ἐστὶν repeated, it could only be joined with the latter; hence, we might suppose that this reading originated in the idea that τὸ λοιπὸν must be connected with what follows. Then it would mean: ‘it remains that,’ etc. [as in the E. version]. This would be opposed neither by the article, nor by the ἐν. For even in Plato the article is found in such a mode of speaking: τὸ δὲ λοιπὸν φησὶ ἡμῖν ἐστὶ σκέψασθαι (Passow II. 1, 81). But the ἐν shows that he is treating here about the solution of a moral problem: ‘what remains is, that they may be,’ etc. But if we connect it with the foregoing, then it must be taken as a more exact qualification of the clause, q. d., ‘henceforth, for the future.’ The decision in regard to this case depends upon which connection yields better sense. [Most commentators decide for the latter view. Among these Meyer, Alford, Bloomfield, Hodge. It certainly yields the best sense.] But what are we to understand by the declaration: ὁ καιρὸς συνεσταλμένος ἐστί. Some [Rosen., Rückert, Olshausen] explain it: 'the time is full of straits—grievous.' But in those passages from which this signification is attempted to be proved (Macc. iii. 6; x. 3), the word is used only of persons, and then means humbled, cast down, which terms cannot be predicated of time. There remains, therefore, only the other interpretation, contracted, limited, shortened. [“Συντέλλεσθαι and συντόλην are the regular grammatical words used for the shortening of a syllable in prosody”]. In any case, however, ὁ καιρὸς is not to be taken for the earthly life-time of individuals, [as Calvin and Estius]. The context rather points to the period of time from thence onward, until the second advent. But does it here denote the simple period of time in itself, or does it mean favorable time (opportunity)? i. e., the time in which one can yet ensure his salvation, or prepare himself for that great change concurrent with Christ's second coming, which is to wind up the entire present condition of the world—the καιρὸς δεκτός: "the time accepted," (2 Cor. vi. 2; comp. also Gal. vi. 10). In this case the predicate would suit still better, and also the adjunct τὸ λοιπὸν: and we should render: 'the time (the opportune period) is compressed, or shortened henceforth.' The final clause—in order that those having wives, etc.—may be either referred to: 'this I say,' as if by declaring the time short, he arrived at the thing here stated; or, which is better, it may be taken as assigning the reason why the time is shortened, so that it indicated the Divine purpose in this curtailment. [So Hodge, Alford]. And this is confirmed by the subsequent declaration brought in as proof: 'for the fashion of this world passeth away,' ver. 31. In this way a good meaning is obtained. But the other mode of punctuating yields also good sense: 'it remains,' i. e., no other choice is left, but that those having wives, etc. This, however, is somewhat harsh, and the other merits the preference. But, perhaps, a still better one is afforded by the connection of τὸ λοιπὸν with what follows, maintained by Meyer (8 ed.) in the sense of: henceforth, implying that "henceforth the relations should be regarded differently, from what they had been hitherto." 'Iva is postscripted as in Gal. ii. 10, and elsewhere.—may be as those not having them, and those weeping as though they wept not, and those rejoicing as though they rejoiced not, and those buying as those that possessed not, and those using the world as not using it.—These clauses denote an internal loosing of the spirit from all bonds (even the closest), and from all circumstances, and from the possession and use of all earthly goods; in short, they enforce the maintenance of a personal independence of all external worldly relations (Meyer), the refusal to be fettered by these things in our communion with God and Christ, so that the sacrifice of all of them could be readily made when called for (comp. Luke xiv. 20). Accordingly, we are taught that no conjugal love, no sorrows over disasters and losses, no exultation over good fortune, should be allowed to possess the spirit, so as to impair that divine communion. And as Christians must ever be inwardly free from what is transient, in order to maintain that eternal blessing, so it becomes them to hold lightly by the earthly inheritance. They must ever remember that it is no abiding possession, and are not to cleave to it fondly; and finally, in reference to the use of the world, they should use "as using not." The word 'buying' comported well with the circumstances of the Corinthians. Corinth being a great emporium, the people were given to traffic, especially to buying. In regard to καταχρώμενοι, expositors are divided; some take it as equivalent to χρόμενοι, κατὰ being only intensive; others translate it, abuse; but the latter meaning does not sustain the analogy with the foregoing clauses. [Alford renders it: "'using it in full,' implying an extreme and greedy use, which turns a legitimate use into a fault"]. The κατὰ was, perhaps, suggested by that in κατέχοντες just preceding. Χρησάται, to use, takes its object here in the accusative [the only instance of the kind in the New Testament], (comp. Passow No. II. 2, p. 2496). The Rec. τῷ κόσμῳ is a change made in accordance with the more common construction. By 'the world,' we are to understand the totality of the visible creation, of all objects, goods, relations, belonging to the present age. It comprises in one, all the objects expressed or implied in the previous clauses. Hence, the following sentence, also, extends to these,—for the fashion of this world passeth away.—(παράγει—τὸ σχῆμα).—By this we are not to understand a mere change of scene (an image drawn from the theatre)—a daily shifting of events belonging to the present; nor yet the transiency of earthly things in general; but the mighty revolution attendant upon the advent of Christ—the entire vanishing or destruction of the form of this world, its outward appearance and mode of existence, of which mention is made in 1 Jno. ii. 17; Rev. xxi. 1. This great change presents itself to him as one close at hand, and, therefore, he speaks of it in the present. (Meyer: 'is on the point of passing away'). "The disposition which Paul here inculcates in view of the expected palingenesis of the world, is one demanded at all times. All earthly things are vanishing and in perpetual flux; we are ever approaching a new order of things. The woes which Paul saw, have often repeated themselves, and will often be repeated, until the final catastrophe breaks in." NEANDER. Since this sentence does not assign the reason for an exhortation, but is brought in to substantiate that which has been previously set forth as a Divine purpose, we cannot directly annex to it the following verse, putting a comma after τοῦτον. But we are to regard this (ver. 32) as a new thought introduced—a still further reason assigned for recommending the single state. It is, however, directly joined to what precedes, in so far as Paul's will and wishes aim at having them free from the care which belongs to the things of this world, which is so fast hastening to its end.

VERS. 32-34. But I would that you were without care.—By ἀνέμουναι, he means, freedom from care about the things of this world, as set forth in the 33d verse; for the care which he first speaks of,—he that is unmarried careth for the things of the Lord—can only be something which must command approval. It is perfectly right for a person (with undivided heart) to be solicitous for that which belongs to his Lord. And in what way, he explains further by the expression,—how he may please the Lord.—To the unmarried, i. e., to him who has the gift of continence, and who remains single, in order to devote himself to the interests of God's kingdom, untrammelled by earthly bonds (comp. Matt. xix. 12), it belongs to occupy himself in the concerns of his Lord, and that with the simple desire of pleasing Him.—While the Apostle here has in his mind, those who, like himself, were in the true sense ἀγατοι, unmarried, in what follows, on the other hand, he exhibits to view the ordinary experience of mankind, [and explains the nature of the care from which he would have them relieved].—But he that is married careth for the things of this world, etc.—Here he shows that on entering the married life, they have at once a divided heart, become entangled in the occupations of the earthly life, and exhibit a tendency to consider how one party may please the other, how the one (even in these worldly interests), may do right by the other, etc.—Yet in this Paul does not intend to set forth the evils which are necessarily involved in the very nature of marriage, but only to state what is usually found to be the case in actual experience. He does not mean to disparage the divine ordinance, as though it was necessarily calculated to promote estrangement from God, (Burger.)—In carrying out of this thought in reference to the wife (ver. 84) Paul continues:—Divided also is the woman and the virgin.—Μεμέρισται καὶ ἡ χυρὴ καὶ ἡ παρθένος.—We encounter, first, a great diversity of readings and punctuation. The first consists in the following variations:—1. On good authorities Lachmann reads καὶ μεμέρισται καὶ,—and after this, although on fewer authorities, ἡ γυνὴ ἡ ἀγαμος. 2. Tischendorf, with Griesbach and Scholz: μεμ. καὶ ἡ γυνὴ καὶ—supported by authorities, in part equally weighty, and in part more preponderant. 3. The received text drops the καὶ after μεμ., but without sufficient authority.—The punctuation, apart from the various untenable experiments of Griesb. and Scholz, may be twofold. Lachmann and Rückert attach the καὶ μεμ. to what precedes, making ὁ γαμήσας the subject of it; and read, 'he that is married is divided, i. e., distracted with cares.' Καὶ ἡ γυνὴ then begins a new sentence, translated thus: 'both the unmarried wife (= widow) and the unmarried virgin cares,' etc. On the contrary, Tisch. and Meyer begin a new sentence with μεμ. 'And there is a difference between the wife and the virgin; the unmarried careth,' etc. [In his edition of the Codex Sinaiticus, Tisch. follows the punctuation of Lach. and Rückert, given above, putting a period after καὶ μεμ.]. The difference, according to De Wette and Meyer, is to be explained from the fact that μεμ. was not understood (and therefore entirely left out), or was misunderstood (as meaning: 'distracted with cares,') and therefore was attached by καὶ to the foregoing; consequently, γυνὴ was necessarily taken to denote, a widow (Esth. vidua), and as the result, ἡ ἀγαμος, the unmarried, was either put before (Vulgate), or inserted after. (comp.

REICHE. Comm. Crit. Spec. III. Gött. 1839). But μεμέρισται, is divided, indicates the diversity between the woman and the virgin, in respect of care (μεριμνῶν). They are divided, separated, in their interests. (Comp. μερίζεσθαι, Matt. xii. 25.) Theoph.: μεμερισμέναι εἰς τὰς σπουδαίς. 'The man is divided between the Lord and his wife.' NEANDER. Luther's translation: 'there is a difference,' is not sufficiently definite. The use of the singular is to be explained from the position of the verb, and because the whole female sex is here embraced as one idea (Meyer.)—The unmarried cares for the things of the Lord, that she may be holy in both body and spirit.—For 'virgin,' he now says the 'unmarried;' and instead of 'how she may please the Lord,' he now puts, that which leads to this, 'that she may be holy,' i. e., entirely devoted to the Lord, to serve Him with her whole person, and all her powers. First, he specifies 'in body,' because the marriage state primarily obligates the body in an earthly or worldly relation, and involves power of the man over the body of his wife (ver. 4), and easily occasions a defilement of the physical life. But the sanctity of the body, if it is of the right sort, is rooted in the sanctity of the spirit (comp. Oslander). The καὶ before σώματι has the predominance of authorities in its favor; a few support Lachmann in reading τῷ σώματι καὶ τῷ πνεύματι. ["The word holy has the sense that it has in ver. 14, and so often elsewhere. It is not in purity and spirituality that the virgin is said to have advantage of the wife; but in freedom from distracting cares. In ver. 14, even the unbelieving husband or wife is said to be sanctified, or made holy. And it is in the same general sense of consecration, that holiness is here predicated of virgins, as distinguished from wives. It would be to impugn a divine ordinance, and to contradict all experience, to say that married women, because married, are less holy than the unmarried. Paul advances no such idea." HODGE.]—But she that is married careth for the things of the world, how she may please her husband.—[This is not charged upon her as sin, but it is a part of her obligation of marriage, and is therefore expected of her. And if she has 'married in the Lord,' then even this very effort to please her husband may be a part of the service she renders unto the Lord. Yet while this is so, the obligation to the husband, it must be confessed, not unfrequently presents a temptation to a divided service, and in her endeavors to gratify his wishes, especially if he is of a worldly, or even partially sanctified spirit, is often betrayed into acts which militate against her piety, and interfere with her higher obligations. This is how it happens that many a Christian woman comes to be found absenting herself from the place of prayer, frequenting the ball-room and theatre, giving parties on the Sabbath, and in other ways compromising her conscience to her own spiritual injury and the discredit of her profession. And it is to the danger of such evils, incurred by marriage, that the Apostle points.]

VER. 85. And this I speak for your own profit.—Here he obviates misapprehension, and assures them that his commendation of the single state, did not flow from any selfish motives—out of a desire to rule their conscience, or to obtain honor by enforcing upon them his own celibate condition; but only out of regard to their own advantage, whether it be to spare them trouble (ver. 28), or, as the following context would indicate, to render the maintenance of their Christian profession at that particular crisis a little easier. This is the profit which he now develops antithetically:—not that I may cast a snare over you—(βρόχον ἐπὶ βάλω) [a figure borrowed from hunting, and means lit., to fling a noose]. Here he applies it to mean the ensnaring of their conscience, and binding them to his opinion. In like manner we have the expressions “to put a yoke,” “to lay a burden,” in Acts xv. 10; Matth. xxiii. 4. Less plausible is the explanation: ‘to awaken scruples of conscience,’ or, ‘to endanger your purity by withholding you from marriage.’ And just as little may we connect either of these interpretations with the first. The ‘profit’ above spoken of is more fully explained by the phrase—but with a view to seemliness.—ἀλλὰ δὲ πρὸς τὸ εὐσχημον. Πρὸς here denotes the final end, as in chap. x. 11, etc.,—‘for the furtherance of what is comely; that is, honestum, the worthier, more independent position—the one free from worldly cares (comp. Rom. xiii. 13; 1 Thess. iv. 12).—As a further definition of this, he proceeds,—and that ye may attend upon the Lord without distraction.—By this he means a perpetual engagedness with him, without being diverted hither and thither by another’s influence. This is “the caring for the things of the Lord,” mentioned above, a life entirely devoted to the Lord and His cause—the opposite of being “troubled about many things” (Luke x. 41)—the practice of holiness (ver. 84). The whole is—εὐσχημονεῖν καὶ εὐπρόσδετον εἶναι (Meyer, Ed. 8). The exhibition of the inner life in its entire outward manifestation in a mode corresponding to this devotion to the Lord; the whole moral consecration and self-discipline, so far as it expresses itself in demeanor, in speech, posture, behavior, as the true outward type of the Christian life). [“The image here conveyed is exactly expressed by the story in Luke, of Mary “sitting by the side of Jesus’ feet” (παρὰ-καθίσασα, comp. εὐπρόσδετον), and Martha, “who was cumbered (Περίεσπᾶτο) with much serving,” and “careful (μεριμνῆς) about many things.” STANLEY].

VER. 36. But if any man think that he behaveth himself unseemly towards his virgin.—He now comes to speak particularly of virgins [and addresses himself especially to fathers, since, according to the custom of Jews and Greeks, and most oriental nations at this day, the disposal of daughters in marriage rested with them]. The δὲ introduces in contrast with the ‘seemliness’ above spoken of, an unseemliness (ἀσχημονεῖν). This word means to act unseemingly, unbecomingly (xiii. 5). It may also mean [see Wetstein], ‘to suffer something unbecoming, to be disgraced.’ [And so most of the Gr. fathers, and Grotius interpret the word here. ‘The disgrace, which, according to the opinions of the East, female celibacy involved, extended from the virgin to the father (comp. Ecclesiasticus xlii. 9).’ Hence their desire to marry their daughters as speedily as possible (Bloomfield)]. But only the former meaning suits with ἐπὶ, which indicates the direction of an action [so Hodge, Robinson], towards, or in respect to [JELF’S Gr. Gram., § 685, 3, 6, comp. § 905, 3, 6]. If it had the latter signification, we would rather expect ἀσχημονῆσθαι, that he will suffer disgrace, etc. Both significations, however, lead to the same thing: for he does not here allude to the disgrace of living unmarried, and so becoming an old maid, which would be brought upon the virgin, but to the disgrace of the temptation which would be occasioned by refusing her marriage; [so Alford, Hodge]. ‘His virgin’—his daughter,—if she be of full age.—Παρθένος ὑπέρτατος means one who has passed the years of her youth (according to Plato, the ἀκμή of a woman was at twenty years of age), an age when, by the refusal of marriage on the part of the father, a surrender to her lover on her part was more to be feared than in earlier years.—and it must needs so be,—καὶ οὕτως ὀφείλει γίνεσθαι. These words cannot be made dependent (Rückert) on the εἰν preceding, on account of the indicative; neither can γίνεσθαι ever be=μείνειν, q. d., ‘so she should remain single.’ They depend rather on εἰ [understood]; and by οὕτως γὰρ he means that which is expressed in the following clause, viz., the marriage of the daughter. The ὀφείλει (=oportet, Passow II. 2. p. 1029) implies that the temperament of the daughter, [or some other equally cogent circumstance for the phrase, may include those of every kind, whether existing in the father or in the daughter] makes marriage necessary. It introduces a further objective element, in addition to the subjective one, expressed in νομιζει.—let him do what he wishes.—Ὁ θέλει denotes not mere caprice, the arbitrary wish of the father, but a purpose grounded upon his best judgment (νομιζει) [and here it will be seen that the whole authority in the premises rested with the father].—let them marry.—The subject of γαμίζουσιν is easily understood, viz., the virgin and her lover. “It can also be the plurality implied in the single subject ‘virgin,’ παρθένος, q. d., ‘let the virgins marry.’” NEANDER. [Freedom of opinion and action is wisely allowed in matters morally indifferent. As to what is the specific duty each person must decide for himself].

VER. 37. But he who—Here he introduces a case directly the opposite, and with unmistakable approval, as is shown by the last clause. In contrast with the previous one, who has the negative virtue of sinning not, this one ‘doeth well.’ The same may be inferred from the imperative, which are to be construed as permissive. First, he brings prominently to view the steadfastness and independence of conviction and resolve shown,—hath stood steadfast in his heart,—in contrast with the weakness and dependence of the other, in ver. 36 (ἐδραϊος, fast grounded, found also in xv. 58 and in Col. i. 24). [“This allusion here is to a statue standing firm on its pedestal.” BLOOMFIELD]. The points in which this firmness is shown are more fully defined in the two following clauses, which are to be considered as the positive and negative explanation of the first.—having no necessity,—in contrast with the necessity occasioned by the temperament of the daughter, [or any other constraining circumstances] (ver. 26)—but has power.—There is an anacoluthon here ἔχει (instead of ἐχόν)—over his own will—i. e., to do as he chooses. [“Often the will is one thing, and the power is another.” ΒΕΝΟΥΣ]. And what this will is he next states,—and has resolved this in his heart.—By ‘this’ (τοῦτο) he means, but doesn’t say: ‘to keep her unmarried.’—in order to preserve his virgin.—τοῦ τηρεῖν τὴν ἑαυτοῦ παρθένον. If it read, τηρεῖν, or, τὸ τηρεῖν, then we would simply have here the explanation of what goes before; but since the correct reading, τοῦ τηρεῖν is to be regarded as a final clause, this, according to all well established usage, cannot be. We are therefore to take τηρεῖν τὴν παρθένον not as a periphrasis for: ‘to keep her unmarried;’ but it means: ‘to preserve her in her virgin state, so that she may be holy both in body and in spirit.’ [Hence we might render it: ‘in order to keep her as a virgin’]. Not, however, for the sake of his own paternal interests, as Meyer assumes. This by no means follows from the ἐαυτοῦ, and it must be regarded as a selfish motive, altogether inconsistent with the spirit of the Apostle’s exposition. The whole matter rests upon the paternal authority acknowledged not simply among Jews and Greeks, but also in the sphere of Christian life. And to this also the words τὴν παρθένον ἑαυτοῦ refer. But the very manner in which the Apostle treats the affair, indicates that it is not a despotic, reckless rule, but the exercise of an authority which is considerate of the nature, the circumstances and the well being of the daughter, so that the resolve expressed in κέρικεν is to be regarded as a well considered one. The exclusive action of the father in this case, however, indicates a distinction between the customs of antiquity and those of our modern times (comp. Grot. in hoc loco).—doeth well.—[An approval which went right in the face of Jewish and Gentile opinions and prejudices—a commendation of a course of conduct, which in view of the exigencies of the times, and probabilities of good it involved, might seem desirable; but yet might not be adopted, because of the prevailing views of marriage; and which therefore required the special sanction of the Apostle to strengthen persons in the adoption of it.]

VER. 38. So then both he that giveth her in marriage doeth well, and he that giveth her not in marriage doeth better.—Here he reaches the result of his discussion. The καί—καί, both—and, suit properly only to a repetition of the words, ‘doeth well,’ (hence the var. δέ, in which case the first καί might be translated, also). It appears as if Paul intended originally to repeat the words, ‘doeth well;’ but then found it more suitable to the relation previously expressed (‘he sinneth not’—‘he doeth well’), to put the second clause in the comparative. The former is well done, as being in accordance with the circumstances, and avoiding disgrace; [indeed, the man would have done wrong, had he acted otherwise]; the latter is better, according to what is said in ver. 34,—[better, not in moral worth, as the Romanists pretend, but in point of advantage, considering the times, and the duties to be performed.]

VERS. 39, 40. The wife is bound by the law so long as her husband liveth.—That which he has said in reference to the marriage of virgins, he now applies to the remarrying of widows. [“There seems to be no doubt entertained respecting the second marriage of the man, probably because in the case of widowers a new marriage was generally of pressing importance, on account of the motherless children; therefore the question here is only touching the woman. The limitation, ‘only in the Lord,’ moreover, must be regarded as referring also to the man (2 Cor. vi. 14, 15.) OLSHAUSEN]. After that he has expressed the woman’s release from obligation to her husband in case of his death, and her liberty to marry again according to her pleasure, on the sole condition that it be a Christian union, he points to the higher satisfaction of remaining in widowhood. But he sets this forth as his own view; which, however, is to be regarded as the view of one who has the spirit of the Lord. The word δέδερα, is bound, as in ver. 29, Rom. vii. 2, excludes the idea of divorce and marriage with another.—but if her husband ‘sleep,’ i. e., is dead. Rom. vii. 8. The καί before κοιμηθῇ, which Tischendorf has accepted, is not sufficiently well attested. In that case it would necessarily be translated: “but in case the man should even die.”—only in the Lord.—These words do not simply mean: ‘in a Christian spirit,’ but they teach that the marriage should be in fellowship with the Lord,—hence a marriage with a Christian (ver. 12 ff. refer to marriage before conversion). This only gives to this limitation its proper significance; μονον, as in Gal. ii. 10.—But she is more blessed.—He presupposes the possibility of an undisturbed devotion to the Lord and His cause, such as shall insure to a Christian woman higher contentment (comp. ver. 34); not simply freedom from tribulation, nor yet higher blessedness in heaven.—if she so remain, i. e., unmarried (comp. ver. 26); “it being supposed that she can preserve herself pure.” BLOOMFIELD.—according to my judgment.—[Is this a modest way of uttering what should be deemed by us authoritative, as coming from one who was inspired by the Spirit; or is it simply the expression of an opinion, which, though coming from an inspired Apostle, was not intended to bind the conscience? In short, is this advice which we are at liberty to set aside, or is it obligatory precept? This question, one would suppose, ought to be decided by the consideration of the source whence it comes. If it proceeds from a person who, however sound in judgment, is still fallible, and has no authority over us, then there would be in us the liberty to differ. But if it comes from the all-wise God, advice at once partakes of the character of a command; for not to follow the best light, not to do the best thing, is certainly sin. Who, then, is the author of the advice—Paul, as a counsellor or friend? or Paul, as an inspired Apostle? This depends on how we interpret the next clause.]—I think also, etc.—There is here a polemic side-glance cast at his opponents, who disparaged him, and refused to recognize him as an Apostle endowed with the Spirit of God equally with the others. Δοκῶ, an ironical Litotes. "The κἀγω, and I, presents an antagonism against those who ascribed to themselves alone the possession of the Spirit; we detect in these words a side-glance at the Judaizers who refused to acknowledge the authority of the Apostle, and especially condemned the single life so much esteemed by him." NEANDER.—[If this construction be correct, then the expression: "I think I have," is not to be taken as implying any distrust on the Apostle's part as to his actual possession of the Spirit. On the contrary, there is here, as most commentators concede, "an emphatic meiosis expressive of full persuasion and certainty." The inference then is, that the "judgment" issuing from this high source, is entitled not only to deference, but to obedience. When it is God that advises, who will venture, or has the liberty to say, Nay?]

[Obs.:—"The arguments by which the Apostle here recommended celibacy to the Corinthians, have been urged by the Papists in support of the rulers of their Church, who oblige the clergy and the monastic orders to live unmarried. And it must be acknowledged, that at first sight, these arguments seem to be properly applied by them. Nevertheless, when it is considered, that the Apostle's advices were suited to Christians in the then persecuted state of the Church, and were addressed only to such as could live chastely unmarried, it may fairly be presumed, that the Papists have stretched his advices farther than the Apostle intended, when they represent them as binding in all ages and countries, on those who wish to live piously." MACKNIGHT.]

1. Duties of parents towards their children in the matter of marriage. Among the most delicate problems of human life, calling for the exercise of firmness no less than of consideration, of wisdom no less than love, is the right conduct of parents in reference to the marriage of their children—especially of daughters. To insist upon their settlement unconditionally, is, without doubt, unworthy of a Christian, and must be looked upon as the token of a worldly, unbelieving, or, at least, little-believing temper. At all events, regard should be had to this, that a Christian should marry one like-minded. Here, that which is inculcated upon widows in v. 40, holds good absolutely—"only in the Lord." Matrimonial connections between believers and children of this world, entered into out of mere carnal complacency, or with an eye to property and brilliant position in society, and in the hope that some saving influence may at the same time be exerted, are, to say the least, exceedingly hazardous; and they more commonly result in a way directly the opposite of the one counted on—the secularization of the believing party (comp. Gen. vi.). All such connections Christian parents should aim to hinder, rather than help; yea, they should endeavor, by all the means in their power, to restrain and hold back their children from them, even though it be at the cost of much pain and bitter struggle. Cases may indeed occur, when yielding will be unavoidable;
